Economists' forecasts had been for a reading of 100,000 and many investors had been betting on an even weaker number. A report by private employment service ADP on Wednesday indicated US private sector employment had fallen in December.

The news produced a rapid sell off in US Treasuries, pushing yields around 10 basis points higher across all maturities. By late afternoon in New York, the market had recovered slightly, leaving the yield on the benchmark 10-year bond 4.8bp higher at 4.66 per cent, after starting the week at 4.70 per cent. The two-year note yield was most sensitive, adding 6.2bp to 4.77 per cent, down from 4.81 per cent at the start of the week.

DOJ_NMG_0113827

The payrolls report also prompted investors to adjust their bets in the interest-rate futures markets. Short-term interest rate futures fell, bringing the implied odds of a 25-basis-point cut by the end of the first half of this year to 30 per cent, down from 50 per cent before the data.

The US market moves spilled across the Atlantic. European government bond prices had been firmer ahead of the data, having followed the positive trend from the US for much of this week.

However, the payroll figures saw them stumble instantly and end in the red for the week once again. The two-year Schatz yield was up 2.8bp on the day and the week at 3.918 per cent, while 10-year Bund yields were 4.5bp higher on the day and 2.6bp higher on the week at 3.979 per cent.

UK gilts also suffered in spite of data from the country's leading mortgage lender showing a surprise fall in house prices in December. Two-year gilt yields hit their highest level since July 2001 after rising 3bp to 5.221 per cent, which was 5.4bp up on the week. Ten-year yields, meanwhile, were 2.9bp higher on the day and 6.6bp up on the week at 4.804 per cent.

The benchmark 10-year Japanese government bond yield was up 0.5bp at 1.720 per cent.

Dollar Jumps To 6-Week High Against Euro On Jobs Data (WSJ)

By Dan Molinski

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

The dollar rose to a six-week high against the euro Friday and recovered much of its overnight losses against the yen after a surge in U.S. jobs growth.

Late Friday afternoon, the euro stood at $1.3003, down from $1.3083 late Thursday, while the dollar was at 118.68 yen, down from 119.08 yen. The euro fell to 154.32 yen from 155.79 yen. The dollar rose to 1.2361 Swiss francs from 1.2332 Swiss francs, as the pound fell to $1.9302 from $1.9435.

"We've broken through some big levels," said John McCarthy, director of foreign exchange at ING Capital Markets. "The number came in way on the upside."

The dollar has been rallying for three days against the euro, and is up 1.5% this week, despite forecasts by most economists for it to decline in 2007.

The euro's support level at around $1.3050 that hadn't been broken since late November easily gave way during the morning rally, and the psychological $1.30 level also buckled, with the euro dipping as far as $1.2981, a low not seen since Nov. 24.

But for most of the session the euro steadied around $1.30. Against the yen, the dollar used the employment report to grab back most of its overnight losses on speculation the Bank of Japan may raise its ultra-low key interest rate when it meets Jan. 18.

After The Dow's 2006 Rise, Investors Ponder A Correction (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

Some investors are wondering if the Dow Jones Industrial Average is due for a significant short-term drop, nearly four years after the blue-chip average last suffered a 10% tumble, the traditional definition of a "correction" that helps keep a bull market from overheating.

After the Dow's 16% gain last year, some investing pros, including a few who are upbeat on stocks for the long haul, are nervous. The market's lackluster performance for the week, punctuated by the Dow's 82.68-point tumble Friday, only raised more questions for such skeptics.

The blue-chip average shed 0.7% Friday to end at 12398.01, down 0.5% in 2007's first week of trading. While such moves sometimes turned into full-blown corrections in the past, the market's pattern since its lows last summer has been to shrug off such modest weekly setbacks and continue higher, producing a relentless rally that has defied old-fashioned, what-goes-up-must-come-down market wisdom.

Jim Bianco, president of Bianco Research in Chicago, says he has struggled since late last year to explain the lack of a correction to his clients.

One possible explanation, he says, lies in the rising popularity of new investment products such as exchange-traded funds, which allow everyday investors to trade indexes or blocks of companies in one stroke.

Mr. Bianco says the trend may be cutting into the volatility of individual companies' shares, which, in turn, may be cutting into the volatility of the indexes of which the companies are components, creating a cycle that feeds on itself.

DOJ_NMG_0113828

"This is the new environment we're in," Mr. Bianco says, "It's difficult to know what to make of it."

Friday's market woes could be traced to a few specific factors, starting with a report by the Labor Department that nonfarm payrolls rose by 167,000 jobs last month, larger than the rise of 115,000 jobs analysts expected.

This sign of economic strength curbed hopes that the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates to spur growth anytime soon, a move that would lower borrowing costs throughout the economy and help stocks.

The jobs report also buoyed energy traders' confidence that U.S. fuel demand will remain high. At the New York Mercantile Exchange, Crude-oil contracts for February delivery ended a two-day plunge, rising 72 cents, or 1.3%, to $56.31 a barrel, still off 7.8% on the week.

The energy rally also weighed on stocks, as higher pump prices tend to leave consumers with less to spend with nonenergy companies. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index on Friday fell 0.6%, or 8.63 points, to 1409.71, off 0.6% for the week. The Nasdaq Composite Index shed 0.8%, or 19.18 points, to end at 2434.25, up 0.8% on the week.

A rally in the U.S. dollar against the euro pushed gold to a fresh two-month low, since the yellow metal is traditionally viewed as an alternative to paper currency in some parts of the world. Contracts for January delivery tumbled 3%, or $19, to $604.90 a troy ounce, off 4.8% on the week on Nymex's Comex division.

George Gero, vice president with RBC Capital Markets Global Futures, says oil, gold and other sagging commodity prices could rally later this year if the Fed eventually cuts interest rates, as most of Wall Street expects. Although traders' hopes for a rate cut were dealt a blow Friday, they should eventually be rewarded, Mr. Gero says.

"The gold market has been spooked by a number of things the past week or so," Mr. Gero says. "The jobs report was just the straw that broke the camel's back."

A fresh rally in commodities, especially crude oil, would tend to hurt stocks and could feed a correction.

S&P strategist Sam Stovall, who fretted publicly late last year about the possibility of a sustained setback, says he has become less worried, although he is still forecasting a relatively modest 6.5% gain in the S&P 500 this year.

Like the Dow, the broad-based S&P hasn't had a traditional 10% correction in several years. But, Mr. Stovall says, some global indexes did suffer 10% pullbacks in 2006 on the way to gains for the full year.

"I took a second look and realized that markets are more global now, with more money flowing into U.S. shares from overseas," Mr. Stovall says. "By that standard, it made sense to look more globally for the correction as well."

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell.1 Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was three billion shares, as 845 stocks advanced and 2,477 fell.

Bond prices fell.2 The 10-year note fell 7/32 point, pushing up the yield to 4.648%. The 30-year bond fell 8/32 to yield 4.743%.

The dollar was mixed.3 Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 118.68 yen, compared with 119.08. The euro fell to $1.3003, compared with $1.3083.

Dow's Dogs Still Having Their Day (NYT)

By Conrad De Aenlle

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

EVERY dog has its day, but the Dogs of the Dow have had their day for seven years. During that span, the Dogs — the 10 stocks in the Dow Jones industrial average with the highest dividend yields at the end of each year — have handily outperformed the index itself and other benchmarks of blue-chip stocks.

Owning the 10 Dogs in equal dollar amounts would have produced an annualized total return, share price appreciation plus dividends, of 5.5 percent since 1999, according to Dow Jones & Company. The complete 30-stock index could manage only 3.3 percent.

The Dogs of the Dow are the sort of stocks that value investors covet. Despite the unflattering appellation, the Dogs are solid, long-established businesses that are selling at bargain prices and producing enough cash flow to have high dividend yields.

"These are companies that have been around for years," said James Huguet, president of Great Companies Funds, a Florida portfolio manager specializing in shares of large American businesses. "You're buying them at a discount, and they're paying dividends, so it takes some of the risk out."

The Dogs for 2007, in descending order of yield, are Verizon, Altria, AT&T, Pfizer, Citigroup, Merck, General Motors, Dupont, J. P. Morgan and General Electric.

DOJ_NMG_0113829

A refinement of the strategy is to buy just the five Dogs with the lowest share prices at the end of each year. Doing so would have raised the performance of a Dogs portfolio over the last seven years to an annualized return of 7.3 percent. The five lowest-priced Dogs for 2007, beginning with the cheapest, are Pfizer, G.M., AT&T, G.E. and Verizon.

Many Dow Dogs, now or in any year, have something in common besides longevity and low valuations. They are flawed in some way, which is why they are cheap in the first place.

"These are companies that are in temporary trouble," said Pat Dorsey, research director at Morningstar. "That is what the strategy is supposed to highlight. Sometimes they bounce back after a rough patch, sometimes management gains some I.Q. points, and sometimes it gets booted out." (A high yield can signal trouble because it sometimes results from a decline in the share price rather than an increase in the dividend.)

Mr. Huguet focused on the third possibility. Many of the companies that attain Dog status have been taken down the wrong path, he said. Share prices sink, forcing changes at the helm. The new broom begins sweeping around the time that the stocks would be added to a Dogs portfolio.

"A lot of the time when Dogs of the Dow that have been downtrodden suddenly come alive, it's because you have new management in there," he said. "Earnings turn around, and because the stock is depressed, it can have a huge effect on the price."

Mr. Huguet prefers to own fast growers rather than potential turnaround plays, so he is not a fan of the Dogs strategy. He does own a couple from this year's crop, though: Citigroup and J. P. Morgan.

Walter McCormick, lead manager of the Evergreen Fundamental Large Cap fund, also likes the two banks, along with the drug maker Pfizer and the food and tobacco producer Altria.

THIS year may be an especially good one for the Dogs, Mr. McCormick said. After the strong run turned in by many species of Dow stocks over the last few years, returns for the Dow industrial index may diminish, encouraging investors to put a premium on stocks with high dividend yields, he explained. "You'll want the wind at your back," he said. "If we have a year when returns are in the high single digits, you're halfway there with high-yielding stocks."

Mr. Dorsey, at Morningstar, has mixed feelings about the Dogs. He, too, likes Citigroup, J. P. Morgan and Altria, calling them "reasonably cheap." On the other hand, he considers G.M. and AT&T "ridiculously overvalued."

He is shunning Merck, which is fending off lawsuits over its painkiller Vioxx, and has had good results in court, but not where it counts, he said. "Merck has a terrible pipeline" of new drugs, he said. "That's what makes drug companies go."

All in all, Mr. Dorsey finds the 2007 Dogs to be "not a very inspiring group." Even so, he approves of the strategy because it may help to teach old investors a new trick.

"You're buying solid companies when they're down on their luck," he said. "That's better than buying whatever was hot last year, as many investors do."

Lower Oil Prices Slow In Reaching Pump (WP)

By Steven Mufson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

With cherry blossoms coming out in New York City, Merrill Lynch & Co. oil and gas analyst John Herrlin sent a note to investors yesterday saying "soon I might have to cut my lawn rather than run the snow blower."

The warm weather was bad news this week for oil and gas companies, the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries and any traders who had bet on rising energy prices. But for consumers, the unseasonably warm weather may make it cheaper to fill their gas tanks -- though it hasn't yet.

Three straight months of tepid demand for heating oil, combined with a broad commodity sell-off triggered by a New Year's change in the investment mix of index funds, helped drive down crude oil prices sharply this week. Crude prices plunged almost 9 percent on Wednesday and Thursday, before stabilizing on Friday. They finished the week at $56.31 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange, down 7.8 percent since the start of the year.

So far, the benefits of falling crude oil prices haven't trickled down to consumers. Drops in gasoline prices tend to lag somewhat behind declines in crude oil prices. According to AAA, the average nationwide price for unleaded regular gasoline was $2.33 a gallon yesterday, essentially unchanged from the day before and up nearly 3 cents from a month ago.

"Though gasoline prices have dropped in the last couple of days by a fraction of a cent, they are still historically high gasoline prices," said John Townsend, a spokesman for AAA. "The yearly average price for 2006 was the highest pump price paid ever in history." Regular unleaded prices in 2006 averaged $2.57 a gallon, up 31 cents from hurricane-ravaged 2005.

Townsend said that because several factors had contributed to high prices last year, it was harder for consumers to comprehend. "There were a lot of little cuts that all added up to a lot of bloodletting at the pump," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0113830

This week, however, the bloodletting was on Wall Street. The swift drop in prices fueled questions about whether a hedge fund had taken a major hit, but the funds remained mum about their positions.

"We don't know the carnage yet," said Peter Fusaro, chairman of Global Change Associates and founder of a listing of hedge funds. But Fusaro said that European investors were still adding money to hedge funds, many of them trading energy.

Many investment banks have been forecasting relatively high oil prices for 2007. Barclays Capital predicts the price of West Texas Intermediate grade crude will average $76 a barrel, Lehman Brothers says it will average $73.50 and Goldman Sachs in December trimmed its forecast to a still-pricey $72.50.

Many of these investment banks say they expect oil and gas prices to stabilize because index funds will finish rebalancing their portfolios and OPEC could trim its output further. OPEC cut production in October and in December agreed to reduce it again starting Feb. 1. Later in the year, geopolitical factors could crimp supplies, and the summer driving season will return. Motor fuel demand has shown little sign of slackening despite high prices.

Qatar's oil minister, Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah, helped stop this week's slide in prices by telling Bloomberg News yesterday that OPEC was "very concerned" about the price drop. "For now there's no need before our meeting in March, but we have no objection to a meeting if prices continue to fall," he said.

Even with mild weather, oil inventories in the world's industrialized countries have been declining at a rate of about 1 million barrels a day, noted Edward Morse, chief energy economist for Lehman Brothers. Morse expects prices to level off.

"OPEC was meeting on Dec 14, and the rhetoric from OPEC was pretty bullish," said Adam Sieminski, chief energy economist of Deutsche Bank. "Then the oil traders got back to their desks on Jan. 3 and they looked out the window and people were stretching with their shirts off in front of the Nymex."

Sieminski, who expects prices to average $62 a barrel this year, said oil could drop to $50 in the near term because of the warm weather. But, he added, "with OPEC already cutting output and poised to cut more, we believe that oil prices are not likely to rest at the $50 a barrel level . . . even if prices do 'test' that level."

"This seems to be a bit of a short-term knee-jerk reaction to the weather," agreed Doug Leggate, oil analyst at Citigroup. He said that prices would head higher again as the summer driving season approaches because, he argued, the same bottlenecks involving the blending of ethanol and gasoline that helped drive up prices last year would happen again.

Even if prices stayed around this level, Leggate said, "that's not a low number."

Gauging The Demand (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

With great hoopla, automakers will unveil futuristic prototypes next week at the Detroit auto show, including advanced hybrids and a gas-electric sports car, the FT-HS, from Toyota.

The only problem is that some of the technology being touted exists only as fancy fiberglass models.

The buzz machine shifts into high gear tomorrow with carmakers competing to demonstrate their concern about high gas prices, U.S. dependence on foreign oil and global warming. But despite all the glitz, what Americans will drive in the next few years will look a lot like what they drive today. Industry analysts say automakers won't have significant numbers of alternative-energy vehicles -- hybrids, diesels and plug-ins -- for sale until well after the turn of the decade.

The hype is racing ahead of consumer appetite for alternative-fuel vehicles, industry experts say. Only a small fraction of the cars on the roads are hybrids and diesels, which get better fuel mileage than gasoline-only cars and burn cleaner than they used to. While such vehicles have distinct advantages, consumers for the most part seem unwilling to pay their higher prices. As a result, carmakers will push ahead cautiously before deciding to turn out large numbers of the vehicles.

Auto companies are hesitant about the price of new technology. In hybrids, batteries and other components add $1,500 to $3,000 to the cost of each vehicle. Current cost pressures have auto companies scrounging to save as little as half a cent on some parts.

But the manufacturers are doing everything they can to be perceived as environmentally friendly.

Automakers are "investing large sums of money attacking the problem" of heavy fuel consumption and carbon dioxide emissions, which scientists say lead to global warming, said Tom Purves, chief executive of BMW's North American operations. "As an industry, I believe we've never worked as hard on these problems."

Environmental groups contend that the companies are delivering "automotive vaporware" to deflect attention from political momentum in Washington that could force them to boost fuel efficiency. The groups say carmakers are also trying to stay out of the crosshairs of a looming federal debate on global warming. The car companies have gone to court to fight attempts by states to regulate global-warming gases and have resisted attempts by U.S. lawmakers to mandate fuel efficiency increases.

DOJ_NMG_0113831

"We would be much more impressed if GM were to say the U.S. needs to cap greenhouse gas emissions. That would be a wonderful new concept," said John M. DeCicco, senior fellow at Environmental Defense. "The country needs a climate change policy, and automakers need to step up to the plate."

Vehicles powered by fuels other than gasoline occupy a small corner of the U.S. auto market. Diesels have accounted for about 3 percent of the U.S. market over the past few years, and most are extra-large pickups used as work trucks. Diesels, which get 30 percent better fuel mileage than gasoline-powered cars, account for nearly half of the market in many European countries.

Though still small, hybrid sales are growing steadily. In 2006, automakers sold 255,000 hybrids, according to estimates by J.D. Power and Associates. This year, the figure is projected to be 350,000, in part because Toyota is increasing production of its popular Prius. Even with the growth, analysts don't expect hybrids to reach 1 million units, or 5 percent of the total market, until after 2011.

Plug-in technology is probably even further in the future because battery technology does not yet exist. Several sources in the industry said they expect Toyota to add plug-in power to the next-generation Prius, which is due later in the decade. Toyota declined to comment. Later this year, Toyota will bring out the Lexus LS 600h, a hybrid version of the luxury brand's flagship sedan.

Analysts say hybrid demand could dry up as early adopters finally get their hands on Priuses after waiting-list delays.

"Everybody who wants a hybrid is probably driving one," said Eric Fedewa, an industry analyst with CSM Worldwide. "There might not be substantial upside on the numbers unless there is legislative change or fuel prices change dramatically."

Other hybrids will go on sale this year. They include the Nissan Altima sedan and the Saturn Aura. GM will also begin selling hybrid versions of the Chevrolet Tahoe and GMC Yukon sport-utility vehicles. Dodge plans to introduce a hybrid version of its Durango SUV later in the year.

European automakers have been at the forefront of pushing acceptance of diesel technology. Despite diesels' fuel economy, the U.S. government has long considered their tailpipe emissions to be a health hazard. Manufacturers have talked up the new technology and worked with federal regulators to improve diesel fuel and engines to address air-quality concerns.

"Increasingly, people are going to become aware of the fact that there is more than one solution," said Purves, the BMW executive.

Just a few new diesels are due over the next few months, including a diesel version of the Jeep Grand Cherokee. Automakers will monitor how consumers react to them before they make plans to expand model lines or add production, said Fedewa, the CSM Worldwide analyst. "If we see that consumers buy every one that's made, then we know diesels are going to be strong sellers in North America," he said.

Other big automakers, such as Volkswagen and BMW, have pushed diesel introductions to 2008 in order to meet clean-air standards in all 50 states. BMW said it will bring a new diesel vehicle to the U.S. market in 2008, but so far the company won't identify the model.

Purves said improving fuel efficiency and reducing emissions is expensive and technologically challenging. He said any tax breaks Congress enacts should include credits for diesel-powered cars. "You shouldn't discourage diesels here," Purves said. "You shouldn't have legislation that backs one horse."

Outdated And Inefficient (WSJ)

By William H. Donaldson, Harvey L. Pitt

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

In 1934, Congress created the Securities and Exchange Commission and employed an ingenious approach -- a partnership between government and the private sector. The SEC was given pervasive authority to proscribe and pursue fraudulent, deceptive or manipulative conduct. As an extra measure of investor protection, the securities industry was charged with defining (and disciplining those who engaged in) unethical and unacceptable business practices even if those practices didn't rise to the level of illegality. Although this system worked well, eventually the evolution of markets, advance of technology, and concept of for-profit securities markets made manifest that this system was outmoded, and highlighted the critical need to restructure and revitalize our system of securities industry self-regulation.

As Theodore Roosevelt noted, people are destined to be regulated, and their choices are either to regulate themselves, or sit back and wait for the government to do it for, and to, them. We think the NASD and the New York Stock Exchange deserve strong support for their recently announced, sensible and much-needed plan to improve securities industry self-regulation. It's the first significant change in the self-regulatory regime in this country in more than 70 years. Reform is due, and the plan is timely, well thought out and comprehensive.

DOJ_NMG_0113832

Despite government's increasing role, there remains an important need for securities industry self-regulation. Given some of the lapses we've seen over the last several years, the need for high ethical standards and business practices is more important than ever. And yet, under the current, outmoded system, there are conflicting standards, inefficiencies and waste. Almost 200 firms are regulated by both organizations as well as the SEC. Under the current system, they're subject to dual -- but not always consistent -- rulebooks, examinations, investigations, sweeps and enforcement actions. Much of that burden is passed on to thousands of smaller securities firms through their clearing firms. The system is redundant and inefficient and in that context doesn't benefit either investors or the industry.

The proposed merger of the NASD and NYSE regulatory regimes put forward last month is in the best traditions of the government-private sector partnership Congress envisioned when it enacted the federal securities laws. Both of us, during our tenures at the SEC, were concerned about eliminating the overlap, duplication and excessive costs of self-regulation, while strengthening the industry's commitment to leading the way in developing best-in-class standards.

The proposal put forth by the NYSE and NASD is an important step forward in achieving these objectives. By establishing a single, independent self-regulatory organization (SRO) to oversee securities firms, the plan would eliminate complexity and confusion that doesn't increase investor protection -- and that, after all, is the ultimate goal of regulation. And the plan should reduce the cost of effective regulation across the board, helping firms of all sizes.

More than merely eliminating redundancy and attendant costs, the new SRO structure will make meaningful contributions to enhanced regulation. The significant knowledge, experience and expertise of broker dealer regulation that now resides in two separate organizations will be consolidated and housed in one. Rule writing, examination and enforcement will be enhanced, and information sharing, which is an important factor in effective regulation, will be improved.

The plan also addresses the important issue of governance. A majority of the new organization's Board of Governors will be from outside the industry, a check and balance critical to ensuring that investors' interests will be protected. At the same time, the governance structure of the new SRO also promises fair and balanced industry participation, thus assuring that the board's decisions will be informed by the views and insights of all segments of the industry. Under the plan, firms of all sizes will have the opportunity to voice their opinions and make their concerns known.

The dual regulation that exists today isn't well suited to a world in which there is keen and growing competition among strong capital market centers around the globe. The self-regulatory status quo does not work. The SEC's agenda is to ensure that self-regulation becomes even more effective and efficient, in order to enhance investor protection, while enhancing the competitiveness of our capital markets.

The NASD-NYSE plan is a good one on its own merits, and it offers the industry an important, and perhaps its only, opportunity to shape its own future. The SEC can't allow the current self-regulatory system to continue as is. With the SROs and the industry taking the lead, the need for a governmental solution is eliminated, and that's always a preferable course.

We look forward to the completion of this important initiative, and commend not only the self-regulators who have initiated it, but also the members of the industry who, we are certain, will hasten to make this proposal a reality.

Messrs. Donaldson and Pitt are former chairmen of the SEC.

Republican Sen. Sam Brownback Set To Move Forward With Presidential Run (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON Jan 5, 2007 (AP)— Sen. Sam Brownback, a Kansas Republican and favorite son of the religious right, will officially enter the presidential race later this month in his home state.

"He will be fully announcing on January 20 in Topeka, Kansas," Brian Hart, the senator's spokesman, said Friday. The move was expected even though Brownback set up an exploratory committee in December to gauge whether he had enough support for a full-blown campaign.

After the announcement in Kansas, Hart said Brownback will fly to Washington to participate in the anti-abortion march marking the anniversary of the Supreme Court ruling.

Brownback is a lesser-known candidate in a crowded GOP presidential field that likely will include Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Rudy Giuliani, the former New York City mayor. Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor, rounds out the top tier. All three are considering runs but, to various extents, also have records or positions on social or fiscal issues that don't sit well with the Republican base.

So, Brownback a Catholic revered by the GOP's conservative wing for his opposition to abortion and gay marriage sees an opening in the race for someone like him. "I am an economic, a fiscal, a social and a compassionate conservative," Brownback said last month.

DOJ_NMG_0113833

At the time, Brownback also called for a return to an American culture that promotes family values. He said the main focus of his campaign would be "to save and improve lives, rebuild families and renew the culture" in the United States that supports the institution of family.

Brownback, 50, was raised on a farm near tiny Parker, Kan. population 281 today where his parents still live.

His first foray into national politics was in 1976 while a student at Kansas State University, where he campaigned for Ronald Reagan in his unsuccessful quest to wrest the GOP nomination from Gerald Ford.

After receiving his law degree from the University of Kansas in 1982, he practiced law in Manhattan, Kan., and served as secretary of the state board of agriculture. He was named a White House fellow in 1990, and worked in the office of the U.S. trade representative.

Owens To Join Romney Presidential Team (DENP)

By Christa Marshall

Denver Post, January 6, 2007

Washington - Outgoing Colorado Governor Bill Owens has joined the senior advisory team of former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who is gearing up for a 2008 presidential bid.

Romney, 59, has not announced his candidacy officially, but submitted paperwork this week to form a presidential advisory committee, the first step in a race for the White House. If elected, he would be the first Mormon president.

Owens, a two-term governor who worked with Romney at the National Governors Association, revealed his support for the Massachusetts Republican last night on the Hugh Hewitt Show, a conservative talk radio program.

"I think he's (Romney's) one of the brightest people I've ever seen in public office," Owens said on the show. "He's a businessman, he's a manager. He is a conservative, he wants to cut taxes."

Owens added he had doubts about the conservative credentials of other potential candidates and was impressed by Romney's organization of the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City before becoming Massachusetts's governor the same year.

In a statement, Romney said he was pleased to have a senior advisor who was elected to the Colorado governorship with the greatest majority in the state's history.

"In his eight years as Governor of Colorado, he has shown a commitment to finding the kinds of new and innovative solutions that America needs if we are to meet a new generation of challenges," Romney said.

Owens could not be reached for comment today.

Owens joins U.S. Representative Marsha Blackburn, R- Tenn., as a senior advisor on the Romney for President Exploratory Committee, Inc.

Leaked Notes On '08 Show Giuliani Without The Spin (NYT)

By Joyce Purnick

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

The country sure has been enjoying itself reading about the Rudy Caper, feasting on the inside dish gleaned from Rudolph W. Giuliani's presidential playbook.

The purloined or lost document gives outsiders a glimpse behind the curtain, a rare look at political calculations that, if predictable in their revelations, are decidedly surprising in their candor. Irresistible. The unexpected — the macaca tidbit, it might be called today — is always irresistible in the game of control that is politics.

Consider the alternative: Mr. Giuliani's own site on the Internet JoinRudy2008.com, which went up last month when he formed his presidential exploratory committee. Anyone with a computer can access the cheerful red, white and blue site to learn how the former mayor wants the public to see him, how he would like to be portrayed in a presidential campaign.

The Rudy Giuliani portrayed on JoinRudy2008.com is a dragon slayer with a record of unmitigated success. He is a man with an open smile, replacing the fearsome City Hall scowl that he used so often to great effect.

While the site is shiny and superspun, the campaign document — whether it was stolen and leaked by a Giuliani political opponent as the former mayor contends, or provided to The Daily News by someone sympathetic to a rival, as the newspaper contends — is dark and forthright.

And so the leaked campaign notebook has created a stir, and surely not for its contents. What else should Giuliani advisers do but plan to raise a lot of money from the superrich, and worry about their man's political vulnerabilities?

The Giuliani campaign document is anti-spin. Meant for insider eyes, it concedes that Mr. Giuliani as a presidential candidate may have to contend with such trouble as questions about his former wife, Donna Hanover, and his former associate, the controversial Bernard B. Kerik. It cites concerns about Mr. Giuliani's relatively liberal positions on social issues — stances not likely to find favor with the Republican Party's conservative wing.

DOJ_NMG_0113834

This is all surely true.

The other way to look at these matters is: Don't look at them. That is the JoinRudy2008.com Web site's way.

For instance, the Web site liberally features Judith Nathan, Mr. Giuliani's current wife, providing a polished version of her career, accompanied by two flattering photographs.

Nowhere on the site is there even a mention of Ms. Hanover, married to Mr. Giuliani for 18 years and the mother of his two children. They divorced in 2002 after Mr. Giuliani announced to a stunned press corps, without, Ms. Hanover later said, telling her first, that the couple was splitting up.

The Web site doesn't mention Mr. Giuliani's first wife either, Regina Peruggi.

It does not mention the former mayor's two children, Andrew and Caroline.

It does not mention Mr. Kerik, the disgraced former police commissioner who would have been the secretary of homeland security today if his messy past hadn't caught up with him.

It does not mention Amadou Diallo, the unarmed West African immigrant whose death in 1999 in a fusillade of 41 police bullets was one of the most wrenching episodes of the Giuliani mayoralty.

The Web site does not cite the social issues referred to in the leaked document either — his support for abortion rights, civil rights for gay people, and gun control, for instance — positions that are not popular with many conservative Republicans.

As many political analysts have frequently pointed out, his record and conduct before the Sept. 11 attack are not well known to those beyond the borders of New York City, and as a private citizen for the last five years, he has often been able to stay above the political infighting on issues like Iraq or global warming, unless he has chosen to get involved.

The Web site won't fill in the blanks, focusing as it naturally does on Mr. Giuliani's strongest and best-known accomplishments, from presiding over a significant reduction in crime to becoming "America's Mayor" after Sept. 11.

His record is portrayed only in a successful light.

Missing is any reference to the famous Giuliani combativeness, which he and many (not all) New Yorkers seemed to relish; that crime had actually begun to go down before he took office; that the city, which improved in many areas during his mayoralty, was still not a utopia after two terms of his leadership; that polls showed that many New Yorkers, including some who had voted for him, had grown weary of his pugnacious style.

Asked about the site's contents yesterday, a spokeswoman for Mr. Giuliani, Sunny Mindel, said she would not comment.

The Web sites of other prospective candidates are just as relentlessly positive because, political strategists note, they are no more than the cyberspace version of campaign brochures.

Most voters recognize the limitations of today's managed politics, those same strategists say — from the sound bite to the carefully modulated speech — and so relish the unscripted moments. Almost as much as reporters do.

Obama To Headline Big Fundraiser (WP)

By Tim Craig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Money Will Help Party's Bid to Defeat GOP Legislators This Fall

RICHMOND, Jan. 5 -- U.S. Sen. Barack Obama, a possible presidential candidate next year, will be the featured guest at a major fundraiser for the Virginia Democratic Party next month, his spokesman said Friday.

The Illinois Democrat will speak to 2,000 donors and activists at the party's annual Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner here.

The first-term senator's participation comes as he considers running for the White House, a prospect generating a lot of buzz among Virginia Democrats, and as national Democratic Party leaders recognize that Virginia has become more competitive, especially in the northern suburbs.

James Webb upset Sen. George Allen (R) in November, and Democrats have won the past two elections for governor. The $165-a-ticket dinner is designed to help the party raise money for its efforts to unseat Republican legislators this fall. The GOP controls both houses of the General Assembly.

Robert Gibbs, Obama's communications director, said the senator is eager to help Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) and the state party.

"Sen. Obama is an admirer of Gov. Kaine's and believes that Gov. Kaine is somebody who demonstrates that working together to get something done is not just a slogan," Gibbs said.

Because Obama could announce his plans as soon as this month, his speech at the fundraiser at the Richmond Convention Center could prompt a lot of discussion about Virginia's role in the presidential race.

DOJ_NMG_0113835

Virginia's Democratic presidential primary has been held relatively early in past elections, before any candidate had the nomination locked up.

In 2004, Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts, then-Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina and retired Army Gen. Wesley K. Clark spoke at the Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner, which was held days before the primary.

Kerry easily won the Virginia primary, and Clark and Edwards dropped out of the race shortly thereafter.

If Obama enters the 2008 race and stays in it until the primary Feb. 12, Virginia Democrats say, he will probably be a major factor in the state's nominating contest.

"Barack is an exciting, substantive, inspiring speaker and leader. He has to be at the very top of potential candidates," said Del. Brian J. Moran (D-Arlington), chairman of his party's caucus in the House.

Democratic leaders are also hopeful that the party's nominee in 2008 will break the GOP's grip on the state's 13 electoral votes. A Democratic presidential nominee hasn't won the state since 1964.

Obama has made several high-profile visits to Virginia in recent months.

Last fall, he headlined two rallies for Webb during his heated contest with Allen. Thousands of people attended the rallies in Old Town Alexandria and Richmond. When Obama finished speaking at each, the crush of admirers and autograph-seekers swarming around him was so large that his staff had trouble clearing a path for him to his car.

Obama also campaigned for Kaine during the final days of the 2005 governor's race, which helped energize black voters.

Other potential Democratic presidential candidates were also visible in the state on behalf of Webb. Kerry, Edwards and Clark made appearances, as did New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, whom many Democrats regard as the front-runner for the nomination if she enters the race.

But many Democratic organizations and candidates across the country have come to rely on Obama to draw a crowd.

Obama headlined the West Virginia Democratic Party's Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner in September. Party leaders said Obama's presence made the dinner the most well-attended in its history, according to local media accounts.

Former Democratic Party Boss Lambasts Kerry Campaign (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON - Former Democratic Party boss and Clinton friend Terry McAuliffe is lambasting John Kerry's unsuccessful presidential campaign, calling his effort to unseat President Bush "one of the biggest acts of political malpractice in the history of American politics."

In his scrappy memoir, McAuliffe criticizes the 2004 campaign that he was responsible for defending but ultimately lost to what he describes as a more organized Republican machine. McAuliffe calls the Kerry campaign gun-shy, distracted and incompetent.

McAuliffe is close to Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton and will support her presidential bid if the New York senator runs in 2008. McAuliffe's book, published by Thomas Dunne Books, could serve as the opening salvo against a potential Clinton rival as Kerry weighs another bid. However, McAuliffe has kind words for other possible candidates, such as Sens. Barack Obama and Chris Dodd and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack.

The book, "What a Party! My Life Among Democrats: Presidents, Candidates, Donors, Activists, Alligators and Other Wild Animals," goes on sale Jan. 23, but copies have already shown up in some bookstores.

McAuliffe plans a 25-city tour to promote the memoir and parties to celebrate its publication _ Feb. 8 in Washington hosted by Mrs. Clinton and Jan. 22 in New York City hosted by former President Clinton.

The book is full of revelations from McAuliffe's years among the power elite _ getting a startling leg rub from Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat at a dinner, watching movie stars Ben Affleck and Gwyneth Paltrow smooching during a showing of "Good Will Hunting" at Camp David and being chastised by former President George H.W. Bush during the 2000 election for treating his son with such "disgrace."

He had an insider's look at the Clintons' marriage during the Monica Lewinsky scandal _ going along on a chilly Clinton family vacation to Utah a month after the impeachment vote and watching Mrs. Clinton silently click through channel after channel reporting on her husband's infidelities before settling on ESPN. He wrote that the president described the period to him as "an absolute living hell."

McAuliffe served as chairman of the Democratic National Committee from 2001 to 2005, although he says Kerry's aides wanted to oust him once the Massachusetts senator secured the nomination. He said he was never invited to a single meeting at Kerry headquarters.

DOJ_NMG_0113836

Kerry spokesman David Wade said although many people wish the outcome of the 2004 election had been different, Kerry is proud of the hard work of his campaign staff and McAuliffe's efforts as party chairman. "It's time to look forward, not backwards," Wade said.

McAuliffe said Kerry's camp was so afraid of offending swing voters that it didn't defend his record or criticize Bush. He said he was muzzled by Kerry's aides from assailing Bush's military record.

He said the campaign also ordered speeches at the Democratic National Convention to be scrubbed of any mention of Bush's name or his record _ although McAuliffe privately encouraged firebrand Al Sharpton to go ahead with his attacks on the president in his crowd-pleasing speech.

"I thought the decision of the Kerry campaign to back off any real criticism of Bush was one of the biggest acts of political malpractice in the history of American politics," he said.

Meanwhile, Republicans went on a sharp tirade against Kerry at their convention. But when Bush said in an interview on the first day that he didn't think the U.S. could win the war on terror, Kerry did not respond. The Massachusetts senator was windsurfing off Nantucket, unaware of the president's comments.

McAuliffe said Kerry later told him that was one of the biggest mistakes of his campaign. "I should have gotten off the island," McAuliffe quotes Kerry as saying.

McAuliffe said he was "flabbergasted" to learn after the election that Kerry had $15 million left that he could have spent in the final push. "It was gross incompetence to hoard that money when the race was bound to be so close," McAuliffe said.

McAuliffe said Republicans told him they were shocked that Kerry just took the attacks on his military record, but also overjoyed. He said Bush called President Clinton while he was recovering from his heart attack in September 2004 and said, "The Kerry campaign is the most inept group I have ever seen in politics. Don't let them ruin your reputation."

He said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., asked him why Kerry wasn't fighting back more. "My guy (Bush) is no great shakes, but your guy (Kerry) looks like a wimp," McAuliffe quotes McCain as saying.

Kerry's former running mate, John Edwards, also was frustrated with the campaign, according to McAuliffe. McAuliffe said Edwards was angered that the campaign wouldn't let him go after Bush, but Kerry disputed Edwards' claim and said he was frustrated his vice presidential pick wasn't campaigning harder.

Goal Is To Look Good, Writer Of Democratic Memoir Admits (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 — Most memoirs — and virtually all memoirs by people in politics — are heavily varnished and blatantly self-serving. Say this for Terry McAuliffe, the former Democratic Party chairman and fund-raiser extraordinaire: at least he admits it right up front in his author's note.

"This is my book and I've done my best to make myself look good," he writes in his new memoir with the ungainly title, "What a Party! My Life Among Democrats: Presidents, Candidates, Donors, Activists, Alligators and Other Wild Animals" (Thomas Dunne Books).

"Even if you think I'm full of it, I bet I can still make you laugh."

There are any number of humorous anecdotes sprinkled among the chest-deep pile of dropped names in the 406-page volume, including Yasir Arafat's repeatedly rubbing Mr. McAuliffe's leg under the table at a dinner in Washington in 2000 and the South Korean secret police's warning the White House in 1998 that President Bill Clinton had spent most of the night in a hotel room in Seoul with "a good-looking younger man." That younger man was Mr. McAuliffe, who had been up late playing cards with his buddy the president.

And he shares the tale of getting up on stage half-plastered at the Foxwoods Casino in Connecticut to sing "Will You Still Love Me Tomorrow?" to nail down a $500,000 contribution from the chief of the Mashantucket Pequot Indians. There are two sections of photographs, a portable version of the Washington Power Wall, displaying the author with all manner of celebrities and potentates: Jimmy Carter, Kevin Spacey, Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., Richard A. Gephardt, Pope John Paul II, Al Gore, Chris Tucker and Cicely Tyson, Hillary Rodham Clinton, Olivia Newton-John, Edward M. Kennedy and John Kerry, Ariel Sharon, King Juan Carlos of Spain, Mikhail Baryshnikov.

And a Washington memoir would not be complete without a little old-school score settling, in this case with Mr. Kerry, who lost the 2004 presidential campaign despite what Mr. McAuliffe portrays as his own Herculean efforts.

Mr. Kerry's biggest blunder, in Mr. McAuliffe's account, was to forbid any attacks on President Bush from the lectern at the 2004 Democratic convention. Mr. McAuliffe calls that decision "one of the biggest acts of political malpractice in the history of American politics."

DOJ_NMG_0113837

He also knocks Mr. Kerry for not responding forcefully to the Swift boat group's attacks on his military record and for hoarding money at the end of his campaign, ending the contest with a surplus of $15 million that Mr. McAuliffe believes would have made the difference in Ohio, the decisive state.

David Wade, a spokesman for Mr. Kerry, said that his boss was grateful for Mr. McAuliffe's "incredible" efforts in the 2004 campaign and that he wished the outcome had been different. But, Mr. Wade added, "it's time to look forward, not backwards."

Mr. McAuliffe, reached on the golf course at the Army-Navy Club in Arlington, Va., on Friday afternoon said, "Kerry and I went through all these issues, and he agrees with me on every one."

He added, before teeing off with Mr. Clinton, "I say a lot of nice things about Kerry in the book, too."

Buckley Quits Race For State Dem Chair (NHUL)

New Hampshire Union Leader, January 6, 2007

MANCHESTER – Party vice chair Raymond Buckley, facing a criminal probe, withdrew this afternoon as a candidate to succeed Kathy Sullivan as chair of the New Hampshire Democratic State Committee.

UnionLeader.com has learned that Manchester police began an investigation of Buckley at the request of the Attorney General's office after Gov. John Lynch received a complaint linking him to pornography. Buckley tonight denied any wrongdoing.

"After much consideration and discussion with family and friends, I have decided for personal reasons that it does not make sense for me to seek the chairmanship of the N.H. Democratic State Committee at this time in my life," the veteran Manchester political activist said in an afternoon press release.

Tonight, in a statement, Buckley said, "These politically motivated allegations are completely false. I have no doubt that the allegations will be proven baseless but I am angry beyond belief that the politics of personal destruction have come to New Hampshire."

A letter letter containing allegations against Buckley was sent to Gov. John Lynch's office late last week, said spokesman Colin Manning. The letter was reviewed on Tuesday, and immediately referred to the state Attorney General's office for investigation, Manning said.

Lynch told party officials Buckley should not run for the chairmanship given the allegations, said Manning, who would not say whether Buckley was spoken to directly.

Ray Buckley (left) took the stage with Democratic National Committee Chairman Terry McAuliffe at a rally in Derry on Sept. 19, 2004. (AP)

"The governor made it clear to state party officials he did not feel Ray Buckley should run with this matter pending," Manning said.

Sullivan nevertheless defended her longtime political ally tonight. She issued a one-sentence statement saying "Raymond will be exonerated, and I believe he will be vindicated of these politically motivated charges."

In a prepared statement earlier this afternoon, Sullivan had said: "Raymond Buckley's contributions to the state and national Democratic Party and the state of New Hampshire are many, and we are so grateful for his service. I am very sorry that he has decided not to run; he would have been an excellent state party chair. A lot of the credit for our successes in 2006 has to go to my friend, Raymond Buckley."

When called at her law office and asked if law enforcement authorities have seized Buckley's or any computers at state Democratic headquarters, the outgoing party chair refused to answer. Sullivan said, "I'm going home."

Manchester Deputy Police Chief Glenn Leidemer, who heads the department's investigative division, confirmed that Buckley is the target of a criminal investigation. "Through the Attorney General's office, we received a complaint against Mr. Buckley. Our department is in the early stages of investigating the complaint. Based on this being an ongoing, active investigation, I am not going to comment on the nature of the complaint nor am I going to identify the person who brought the allegation forward," he said.

Three sources, including city GOP activist Joe Kelly Levasseur, said the letter to Lynch was sent by Manchester Rep. Steve Vaillancourt, a Republican who shared a house with Buckley several years ago.

Vallancourt refused to comment directly when asked if he sent the letter.

Buckley, 47, of Manchester, is a veteran campaign strategist. He serves as chair of the Eastern Region Caucus of the Democratic National Committee and sits on the DNC executive committee. He is a national at-large board member of the National Stonewall Democrats, an lobbying group of gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered party activists.

He is also the director of the state Senate Democratic Caucus political action committee, which raised nearly $1 million to help Democrats win control of the state Senate in November.

Ray Buckley was a speaker at the 2000 Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles. (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0113838

He served one term as a Manchester alderman and is a former executive director of the Democratic State Committee, a member of the Democratic National Committee's executive committee and vice president of the Association of State Democratic Chairs.

The 28-year member of the state party committee is in his fifth term as the chair of the Manchester City Democrats and served eight terms in the state House of Representatives.

Within days of Sullivan's decision not to seek a fifth term as chair, he was endorsed by Sullivan, Gov. John Lynch, Senate President Sylvia Larsen, House Speaker Terri Norelli, and the state's two newly-elected congressmen, Paul Hodes and Carol Shea-Porter.

Buckley's list of supporters also included all 14 Democratic state senators, the officers of the state Democratic Party, Democratic National Committee members Anita Freedman and Gaetan DiGangi, six former Democratic state chairs, former U.S. Sen. John Durkin, former U.S. Reps. Norman D'Amours and Dick Swett, nine Democratic county chairs and the leadership of the Young Democrats.

Buckley said this afternoon that "an outstanding public servant" would enter the race to succeed Sullivan. Former House Minority Leader Jim Craig of Manchester is that replacement candidate.

Craig issued a statement announcing that he has the backing of Lynch, Larsen and Norelli.

State Rep. Betty Hall, 85, is the only other announced candidate. The party election will take place Saturday, March 24, at the Institute of Politics at St. Anselm College in Manchester.

At Inauguration, Governor Praises The Central Path (SFC)

By Mark Martin

San Francisco Chronicle, January 6, 2007

Sacramento -- Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger cast himself Friday as the leader of a "post-partisan" movement that would give birth to innovative ideas through collaboration, not party warfare, urging leaders in his second inaugural address to govern from a "dynamic center that is not held captive by either the left or the right or the past."

In a 15-minute speech, the Republican governor made no policy proposals and instead focused entirely on tone, rejecting the liberal versus conservative battleground in favor of the pragmatic middle.

Aides said the message, from a governor who bucked a national anti-GOP trend last fall by cruising to re-election, was aimed beyond the state toward a national audience.

"The American people are instinctively centrist," the governor insisted. "So should be our government. America's political parties should return to the center. They should return to the center where the people are."

Schwarzenegger, who broke his right leg skiing two weeks ago and hadn't been seen in public since, delivered the speech standing at a podium in the ornate Memorial Auditorium in Sacramento after walking on stage with crutches. He was sworn in by California Supreme Court Chief Justice Ronald George while standing, but he leaned on first lady Maria Shriver, who gripped his left arm as he raised his right hand and took the oath of office.

Rumors had swirled in Sacramento throughout the week about how the image-conscious governor would appear, and internal administration suggestions about using a wheelchair were dismissed as appearing too weak for a former Mr. Olympia.

Schwarzenegger gave his speech standing without crutches and without referring to his condition. Others noted it, however: Emcee and former San Francisco Mayor Willie Brown called Shriver "foxy and sexy" as he introduced her, saying he could make the remarks because Schwarzenegger couldn't chase him down.

Schwarzenegger's second and last term began more than three years after he stunned the world by quitting his movie career to run in the recall election. In November 2003, he took office as an international curiosity; on Friday, his celebrity was far less of a story. "Entertainment Tonight" did not cover this inaugural as it did the last time, and the number of credentialed media was 316, down from more than 700 before.

The speech did invoke some of the same themes as the 2003 version, however.

Then, he said the recall election demanded a change in the political climate and a new culture in Sacramento.

On Friday, the governor conceded he had stumbled on those ideals in 2005, when he called for a special election that created war between the governor and Democrats and ended in disaster for him when all of his initiatives failed. Schwarzenegger has freely admitted the special election was a mistake and did so again Friday as he called for four years of the kind of cooperation that led last year to deals with Democrats on such issues as raising the minimum wage, spending on public works projects and curbing greenhouse gas emissions.

Cooperation is what the people want, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0113839

"The people are disgusted with a mind-set that would rather get nothing done than accomplish something through compromise," he said.

Schwarzenegger argued that both liberal ideas like the New Deal and conservative ones espoused by Ronald Reagan were important to the country's history, but "it is time we combined the best of both ideologies into a new creative center." He noted that that the number of registered voters not affiliated with either party could become the majority in the next 20 years.

Schwarzenegger is hardly the first politician to call for bipartisanship.

Former Gov. Gray Davis, who was kicked out of office when Schwarzenegger won the recall, said he delivered a similar message in his 1999 inaugural.

"I said then I didn't care if the ideas came from the right or the left as long as they moved the state forward," said Davis, who attended the ceremony Friday with his wife, Sharon.

But others said Schwarzenegger's message was coming in the right place at the right time.

Assembly Speaker Fabian Núñez, D-Los Angeles, who has become perhaps the governor's strongest ally in the Legislature, said the deals struck in Sacramento in 2006 were in contrast to stalemates on major issues in Washington, D.C. Núñez noted that Congress and other states could learn from the lessons in California, saying Schwarzenegger's call for cooperation "isn't just empty words. There's a lot of accomplishment to back this up."

The speech could mark a turning point in the governor's still-nascent political career. Aides say he is planning to travel to states around the country to deliver remarks with a similar bipartisan theme in hopes of influencing national politics.

While the governor is constitutionally barred from running for president because he is foreign-born, he clearly wants to be a national figure.

But whether his message will resonate elsewhere remains to be seen, one political analyst noted.

Schwarzenegger is too unique to be a national model, said Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia's Center for Politics.

Sabato said Schwarzenegger has to appeal to moderates and independents to win in California. And because he can't run for president, he doesn't have to play to the partisan Republican base as he moves forward, he said.

"Schwarzenegger is the moderate for Republicans nationally," Sabato said. "The problem is that almost none of them can afford to follow because their constituency is far more conservative. ... There will be plenty of Republicans wishing they could follow Arnold's footsteps, but the reality is that we will see very few pupils following the master."

And in Sacramento, as Schwarzenegger prepares to tackle an ambitious agenda including revamping health insurance, fixing a broken-down prison system and addressing always-contentious water issues, the governor's centrist mantra is likely to be tested by the push and pull that comes with deeply divisive issues. Friday was marked by mostly friendly platitudes and gestures -- Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata, D-Oakland, held Schwarzenegger's crutches as he made remarks at a lunch with legislators after his speech -- but that could change.

And legislative Republicans, who often have had an uneasy relationship with a governor far more moderate than most of them, did not exude enthusiasm Friday. Schwarzenegger spent a few minutes in his speech promoting global warming legislation that passed last year with only one Republican vote.

"One person's success is another person's failure," said Assemblyman Rick Keene, R-Chico. "Working together across the aisle, trying to get some things done, is something we're all interested in doing. But when it comes to specific solutions to specific problems, there are going to be a diversity of problems."

Schwarzenegger was sworn in with his hand on a Bible that has been in his family since 1878. The governor missed the first part of the ceremony, which featured diverse acts ranging from a group called the Mariachi Divas to Irish dancers, before appearing on crutches. About 3,000 people attended.

The governor is set to introduce his 2007 agenda, including his budget proposal and a health care reform plan, next week.

Schwarzenegger Adopts "Centrist" Line (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP) -- Hobbling to his inauguration on crutches, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger promised yesterday not to be beholden to a political party in his second term and declared that "centrist does not mean weak."

Nursing a broken right leg, Mr. Schwarzenegger missed the first part of the program before coming out to deliver his speech.

Centrist "does not mean watered down or warmed over," he said. "It means well-balanced and well-grounded."

The Republican governor said his dismal year in 2005, when a clash with the state's public employees union cut his approval rating in half, had awakened him to a new way of doing business.

DOJ_NMG_0113840

"Like Paul on the road to Damascus, I had an experience that opened my eyes," he said. "And what was it that I saw? I saw that people, not just in California, but across the nation, were hungry for a new kind of politics, a politics that looks beyond the old labels, the old ways, the old arguments."

Mr. Schwarzenegger said growing numbers of independent voters are showing the way to a new era of what he called "post-partisanship." And he called for a new "creative center" in politics.

"This is a dynamic center that is not held captive by either the left or the right or the past," he said.

The state's 38th governor was sworn in by California Supreme Court Chief Justice Ronald George, using a Schwarzenegger family Bible from 1878.

To burnish his bipartisan credentials, Mr. Schwarzenegger invited the state's top Democrats, including U.S. Rep. Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, who on Thursday became the first female speaker of the House, and U.S. Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer, although none of them attended.

The master of ceremonies was another famous Democrat, former San Francisco Mayor Willie Brown, who once was speaker of the state Assembly.

The symbolism is important for Mr. Schwarzenegger, who will need the cooperation of Democrats again this year as he attempts ambitious reforms in health care and prisons. Democrats hold majorities in both houses of the California Legislature.

Glitterati, Gawkers Shrug Off Second Inauguration (LAT)

By Scott Martelle, Robert Salladay, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

Three years ago, when the revolution was still new, thousands of people crowded the streets around the state Capitol hoping for a glimpse of Arnold Schwarzenegger and his fellow-travelers — Hollywood celebrities — as California swore in a movie action hero as its 38th governor.

On Friday, the celebrities and the crowds were notably absent, spotlighting the difference between a movie star doing the unusual — winning a gubernatorial recall election — and a now-seasoned politician signing in for four more years.

Not nearly as many people care.

"It seems so long ago," said Bonnie Rose, 58, a hospital lab technician who steered her morning walk past Sacramento Memorial Auditorium hoping for a glimpse of fame. "I think he's looked at more as a governor now" than a political curiosity, she said. "He's proved himself."

With Schwarzenegger's personal party schedule limited by a broken leg, and the drama of the recall election faded into the politically distant past, the governor's second inauguration came off Friday like a small-town parade instead of an international event.

Gone were the global media and TV tabloid shows such as "Access Hollywood." No smiling Jamie Lee Curtis or Danny DeVito, Kelsey Grammer or Dennis Miller were to be found. The only returning celebrities were Rob Lowe and Tom Arnold. "I am the lieutenant governor," Arnold joked to reporters.

But even Bob Saget, who emceed a special "green" program Thursday on the Capitol lawn, had already headed back to Los Angeles and missed the inauguration and Friday night gala.

"It seems like maybe there's a little bit less energy," said Andrew Tescher, manager of Lucca, one of the governor's favorite Sacramento lunch spots. "There seemed to be a lot more energy behind the media last time. There was more hype."

There was more of everything then. About 8,000 people were invited to Schwarzenegger's first inauguration, a big-ticket event in a city unaccustomed to glitz — or hosting international media. On Friday, not even all of the 3,000 expected guests showed up. And the list for media credentials that topped 700 three years ago barely broke 260 this time.

The program, though, was more varied and crisper, led by former Assembly Speaker, ex-San Francisco Mayor — and legendary Democrat — Willie Brown. Brown joked about helping make California "ungovernable" when he was speaker and said "incredible change" had come to California.

"Under Arnold Schwarzenegger's leadership, and with the incredible cooperation of leaders from both parties, a revolutionary thing has taken place," Brown said to applause. "Things are getting done."

Brown then mispronounced several names of dignitaries on the stage, turning the mayor of San Francisco — Brown's hometown — into "Galvin" instead of Gavin Newsom. Other dignitaries included former Govs. Gray Davis and Pete Wilson; Democratic Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa; and such elected statewide officials as incoming Controller John Chiang and Secretary of State Debra Bowen — both Democrats — as well as departing Republican Secretary of State Bruce McPherson, whom Bowen defeated in November.

DOJ_NMG_0113841

There were two prime Democratic absences: Phil Angelides, who is leaving his post as treasurer after getting trounced in the governor's race, and Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante, who lost the insurance commissioner race to Steve Poizner.

The governor's wife, as she did three years ago, played a prominent role in the ceremony. As dramatic New Age music played and images of California's natural wonders flashed on a jumbo video screen, Maria Shriver read a Hopi prayer. "Be good to one another and do not look outside yourself for the leader.... The time of the lonely wolf is over." At the 2003 inaugural, Shriver read a five-minute essay created from the works of poet Maya Angelou.

Invited guests — mostly government figures and Schwarzenegger supporters — had begun lining up outside the red-brick auditorium a few blocks from the Capitol before 10 a.m. A large television screen was set up on the lawn outside for the uninvited to watch the ceremony, but 50-degree air and a stiff, bone-chilling wind made standing still uncomfortable.

About three dozen people — nearly everyone who braved the cold — wound up getting lucky. As Brown began the program, a Schwarzenegger aide emerged with a fistful of tickets in hopes of filling unclaimed seats.

"We were just going to watch a little on the screen," said Elijah Caron as he and fellow state worker Carlos Galindo stepped up to the security table for screening. "Now we're going to see the show."

Jim Devisscher, 53, of Sacramento just missed the cut. As he was waiting for the aide to hand him a ticket, the invocation began inside and organizers barred anyone else from entering.

"This is probably a better view than our seats would have been," he said as he moved closer to the TV screen.

Schwarzenegger Opens In A Sequel (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Jan. 5 — Nursing a broken leg but armed with an electoral mandate, Arnold Schwarzenegger was sworn in Friday to his second term as governor of California.

The ceremony, in a nearly full arena here in the state capital, came two months after Mr. Schwarzenegger's convincing victory over his Democratic challenger, Treasurer Phil Angelides, and two weeks after a painful fall on a ski trip to Sun Valley, Idaho, which shattered his right leg.

Before Friday, Mr. Schwarzenegger had not been seen in public since the accident and his resulting surgery, though photographs had shown the still-buff, preternaturally tan governor looking surprisingly meek in a hospital bed.

So the ceremony served both as a celebration and as a kind of group get-well card, complete with the kind of bipartisan oratory that usually marks the beginning — and usually only the beginning — of any governor's term.

"There is an incredible change that has occurred here in Sacramento," said Willie L. Brown Jr., former San Francisco mayor and onetime Assembly speaker, who acted as the event's rakish master of ceremonies. "Things are getting done. Over the last year it has been dramatically demonstrated, and California is better off for that effort."

Likewise, the inauguration was a chance for Mr. Schwarzenegger to take hold of the political center, something he did effectively during the election year — the accomplishments included passage of a major bill on global warming and another raising the state's minimum wage — and in the election itself, which the governor, a Republican in a predominantly Democratic state, won by drawing large numbers of voters across party lines.

"We must think of ourselves as belonging not to just the Republican Party or the Democratic Party, but to the Party of California," he said in his inaugural speech, moments after taking the oath of office with his wife, Maria Shriver, at his side.

The bipartisanship was evident in the half-dozen prominent California Democrats on the stage at the Memorial Auditorium, a 3,800-seat arena just blocks from the Statehouse. Among them was Gray Davis, whom Mr. Schwarzenegger succeeded after a recall election in 2003.

Mr. Schwarzenegger has already begun to lay out an aggressive agenda for his second term. A major address is set for Monday in which he is expected to announce plans for a sweeping health care overhaul that may include providing medical coverage for 6.5 million uninsured Californians. His State of the State address will be on Tuesday, and the announcement of his budget on Wednesday.

Friday's speech was devoted primarily to one topic — centrism in what he called the "nation state" of California — though he struck almost presidential chords when he began his address with references to the war in Iraq, a country he described as "fertile with bloodshed and hate," and the killing in Darfur.

"Faith and hope are two qualities that are in short supply in the world right now," he said. "There are such deep divisions in our human family."

DOJ_NMG_0113842

By and large, however, the inauguration was a chance for supporters to enjoy the kind of pomp and star power that Californians have come to expect during Mr. Schwarzenegger's tenure. Jose Feliciano and Jennifer Holliday serenaded the governor at the ceremony, and a gala here Friday night featured Paul Anka and Donna Summer as headliners.

Before the swearing-in, a procession of multiethnic performers took the stage, including an Irish-style dance troupe, a mariachi band, a black gospel choir and a white youth choral group, who performed wearing flag-adorned sweaters and shirts.

Mati Waiya, a ceremonial leader of the Chumash Indian tribe, arrived at the inauguration bearing a condor and an eagle feather, which he said symbolized peace and dignity. Mr. Waiya, who also wore a bear bone through his nose, said he had worked with Mr. Schwarzenegger's transition team after the recall election and had been impressed by the governor's efforts on the environment and his willingness to differ with fellow Republicans.

"I think he's serving both sides," Mr. Waiya said, "but it's nice to see him get the Republicans a little upset."

Indeed, the two major speakers on Friday, other than the governor, were Democrats: Mr. Brown and Ms. Shriver, whose mother is Eunice Kennedy Shriver, sister of President John F. Kennedy. The elder Ms. Shriver, 85, drew a standing ovation as she took the stage.

Mr. Schwarzenegger got a few laughs during his address with his now-familiar comparison of his political career to his action-movie days. "My escapes here have been more hair-raising than anything I've ever done in the movies," he said.

But Mr. Brown got the biggest laugh, when he said Maria Shriver, a former television reporter, had "taken the role of the embedded journalist to the ultimate." Ms. Shriver seemed to enjoy the joke.

Moments later, Mr. Brown went even further, calling Ms. Shriver "foxy and sexy," something he said he would not have had the courage do if Mr. Schwarzenegger, still backstage before being introduced, had been closer at hand. Or not on crutches, for that matter.

Patching Up What's Broken? (WP)

By William Booth, Sonya Geis, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger Limps Toward the Center

All hail the peaceful, prosperous and powerful nation-state of California in all its super-fantastic diverse glory! And just so you get the message: Out comes the multicultural Mariachi Divas, an all-female band fronted by an Irish Italian and including a Samoan and a couple of Mexican Americans, singing the Beatles' "Twist and Shout." There was a gospel choir, too, and precocious children playing harps and a National Guard marching band and the silver-maned Jose Feliciano strumming his acoustic guitar for the national anthem.

Yes! There were the most excellent of production values Friday morning at Memorial Auditorium in Sacramento, with those sweeping, aerial camera shots on the televised version, just like the Academy Awards. Because it was a show, and it was a pretty good one. It was Arnold's second inauguration -- and unlike the first one (boring), his wife, former TV news star Maria Shriver, was clearly in charge of the sequel.

The theme? Make nice.

It is apparently the dawn of "post-partisanship" in California, as Schwarzenegger renounced the "fringes of left and right" (technically, he's still a Republican) and declared the "new creative center."

Gone: references to the Terminator.

You remember the plot. After famously sweeping into office three years ago on a weird and wild wave of populist revolt, the former Mr. Universe famously veered to the right in 2005, and famously got his Austrian butt kicked by a disapproving electorate (his poll numbers sank, his initiatives tanked), and now the former global action star is back where he started, in the middle, embracing all.

To this party? Everybody was invited. The master of ceremonies was none other than the Mac Daddy of California Democrats, the former "Ayatollah of the Assembly," former mayor of San Francisco Willie Brown.

Brown introduced the former governors Pete Wilson (Republican), whom he called "my buddy for many years," and Gray Davis (Democrat), whom he described as "a former driver of mine" (warmhearted laughter ensued).

Davis, recall, was the governor recalled by voters in 2003. Now? There he was, waving to the throng, as robotic as ever and stiffly smiling, apparently just glad to be back on the rostrum.

Schwarzenegger's mother-in-law, Eunice Kennedy Shriver, was greeted with a standing O, and then Brown brought out Shriver and the four Schwarzenegger kids (one of whom has that now long boy hair). Brown said it was his honor and his joy to introduce Shriver, "who has taken the role of the embedded journalist to the ultimate level." Then Brown added, "because the governor can't catch me," that Shriver was "foxy and sexy."

DOJ_NMG_0113843

Shriver, looking chic and thin in a black coat dress, called it "an extraordinary day" and thanked so many people for coming "to celebrate one man," her husband.

Then Shriver, inspired, she said, by a recent book of essays by Alice Walker, recited a Hopi Indian prayer titled "We Are the Ones We Have Been Waiting For," and as she read, she was accompanied by projected images of the rapturous California landscape and by mystical flute music, really quite soothing, like the soundtrack at a particularly good spa.

Then the money shot. To the orchestral swell of Aaron Copland's "Fanfare for the Common Man," Schwarzenegger emerged on the stage, supported by silver-colored crutches. In a dark suit and sky blue tie, the henna-headed actor-turned-governor soaked in the applause, for it was a moment, his biographers have noted, that he dreamed of years ago.

Except, of course, the crutches. Perhaps you recall that over the holidays, while at their chalet/compound in Sun Valley, Idaho, Schwarzenegger, 59, experienced what has been described in the press as "a freak skiing accident": He broke his upper right femur when he tripped over his ski pole, which he caught under his ski, while he was standing still. Very, very painful. (Indeed, the medical reporter for the San Francisco Chronicle speculated that "it is reasonable to assume that the governor must handle the stress of a highly public inauguration and the rollout of new policy initiatives while also taking medication to manage the pain.") But seemingly clear-eyed, Schwarzenegger laid his crutches aside and, steadied by his wife, raised his right hand and took the oath of office.

Then (with crutches again) he hobbled over to the lectern as a choir sang a "hallelujah" refrain. "Wow, this feels good," he said, so maybe the Chronicle was right.

Anyway, in his 15-minute speech, Schwarzenegger said that the last three years have been "the most fulfilling of my life," and that "my escapes have been more hair-raising than anything I've done in the movies." He acknowledged the defeat of his initiatives in a 2005 special referendum: "I took the wrong approach," but "like Paul on the road to Damascus" his personal thumping inspired a vision. "We must think of ourselves as belonging not just to the Republican Party or the Democratic Party, but to the Party of California," Schwarzenegger said. "Because California is a collective ideal worth preserving."

He continued on this theme.

"Centrist does not mean weak. It does not mean watered down or warmed over," he said. "It means well balanced and well grounded. The American people are instinctively centrist -- so should be our government."

Gone: references to weak "girlie men."

Schwarzenegger said that his dream California -- peaceful, prosperous, multicultural, where the people live healthy lifestyles and have health insurance, where the children are well educated, the infrastructure sound, the economy humming along on clean, green, post-fossil-fuel technologies and the biotech industry is booming because of stem cell research -- was "a model for the world."

At the end of the swearing-in ceremony, Schwarzenegger and the audience of 3,000 were treated to singer Jennifer Holliday belting out her classic, "And I Am Telling You I'm Not Going," with its pivotal lyric, "I'm staying and . . . you're gonna love me."

O'Malley To Travel State To Thank His Supporters (WP)

By John Wagner, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Governor-Elect to Reprise Theme of Unity

Martin O'Malley (D) announced plans yesterday for a "One Maryland Inaugural Tour and Celebration" in the week leading up to his swearing in Jan. 17 as the state's 61st governor.

The tour, which will also feature Lt. Gov.-elect Anthony G. Brown (D), is scheduled to begin with a town hall meeting Tuesday in Montgomery County and wrap up a week later with a gathering in Annapolis of several hundred high school students, according to O'Malley's inaugural committee. Other stops are planned in Anne Arundel County, Southern Maryland and Western Maryland and on the Eastern Shore.

"They are going on the tour because they feel it's important to thank the people who supported them during the campaign, and they campaigned on the theme that we're all in this together, and we're one Maryland," said O'Malley spokesman Rick Abbruzzese. "It's the way they intend to govern."

The entertainment lineup for the inaugural gala at the Baltimore Convention Center will include 1970s R&B superstars Kool & the Gang; retro swing band Big Bad Voodoo Daddy; Irish rockers the Saw Doctors; and Latin star Eddie Palmieri Jr.

O'Malley, who until recently fronted a Celtic rock band, has been an opening act for the Saw Doctors.

Tickets for the black-tie-optional gala are $50 and can be bought online at http://www.mdinauguration.com.

O'Malley's swearing-in and inaugural parade will take place in Annapolis.

DOJ_NMG_0113844

Besides O'Malley and Brown, Tuesday's town hall meeting will include O'Malley's nominee for transportation secretary, John D. Porcari, and Montgomery County Executive Isiah Leggett (D). The meeting will start at 8 p.m. at Albert Einstein High School in Kensington.

Making No Small Plans (NYT)

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

Gov. Eliot Spitzer is fond of saying that you can't change the world by whispering. What New Yorkers saw in his first week in office was a governor in full trumpet about how to overhaul their state government. While some veterans of state politics saw Mr. Spitzer's State of the State speech on Wednesday as too ambitious, former Gov. Hugh Carey got it just right. "It's a very big agenda," he said, "but it's not too big for New York."

We are still in the promising stage, of course, and the real test will begin later this month with Mr. Spitzer's first executive budget. But he has begun by laying down a number of important, and sensible, markers. On health care, he wants insurance for all children. He hopes to find some of the money to do this by consolidating hospitals and shifting patients from nursing homes to at-home care.

On education, Mr. Spitzer says he wants to spread money out more fairly to students who most need it. Suburban lawmakers whose schools are favored by the current formula will object. But he may win them over with his plan to lower property taxes that fall heavily on middle-class suburbanites.

He made a strong pitch for economic revitalization upstate, a familiar but elusive goal of a long line of New York politicians.

Mr. Spitzer also proposed a series of reforms that are certain to rile legislators accustomed to lifetime tenure in Albany. He intends to create a nonpartisan redistricting commission and vowed to veto any future district lines that are gerrymandered to make elections uncompetitive. And he wants to "replace the weakest campaign finance laws in the nation with the strongest." That means lowering contribution limits and providing public financing so that moneyed interests can no longer buy political clout.

Also on Mr. Spitzer's ambitious to-do list, and appropriately so, are restructuring the courts and organizing the overlapping local governments across the state.

Mr. Spitzer faces two major hurdles. One is finding top-flight appointees to make these proposals a reality. One of the most important sales jobs he has now is convincing enough good people that working for government wages is worth it to help reinvent such a powerful state government. Mr. Spitzer's other challenge will be getting the Legislature to go along. Much of his speech was met with an odd silence from lawmakers. Perhaps it was the way Mr. Spitzer carved out new political territory that does not entirely cater to upstate Republicans or downstate Democrats. But it may simply be that they do not yet know what to make of all that urgency, all those promises, all that work.

Mr. Spitzer certainly acts like a man ready to go forward quickly. The goals he has set may be daunting to the old guard in Albany, but anything less from this governor would have been a grave disappointment.

"Embryo Bank" Stirs Ethics Fears (WP)

By Rob Stein, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Firm Lets Clients Pick Among Fertilized Eggs

A Texas company has started producing batches of ready-made embryos that single women and infertile couples can order after reviewing detailed information about the race, education, appearance, personality and other characteristics of the egg and sperm donors.

The Abraham Center of Life LLC of San Antonio, the first commercial dealer making embryos in advance for unspecified recipients, was created to help make it easier and more affordable for clients to have babies that match their preferences, according to its founder.

"We're just trying to help people have babies," said Jennalee Ryan, who arranged for an egg donor to start medical treatments to produce a second batch of embryos this week. "For me, that's what this is all about: helping make babies."

But the embryo brokerage, which calls itself "the world's first human embryo bank," raises alarm among some fertility experts and bioethicists, who say the service marks another disturbing step toward commercialization of human reproduction and "designer babies."

"We're increasingly treating children like commodities," said Mark A. Rothstein, a bioethicist at the University of Louisville in Kentucky. "It's like you're ordering a computer from Dell: You give them the specs, and they put it in the mail. I don't think we should consider mail-order computers and other products the same way we consider children."

DOJ_NMG_0113845

Prospective parents have long been able to select egg or sperm donors based on ethnicity, education and other traits. Couples can also "adopt" embryos left over at fertility clinics, or have embryos created for them if they need both eggs and sperm. But the new service marks the first time anyone has started turning out embryos as off-the-shelf products.

Before contracting for the embryos, clients can evaluate the egg and sperm donors, and can even see pictures of them as babies, children and sometimes adults. A fertility specialist will then transfer the embryos into a client's womb or into a surrogate, which Ryan can also arrange.

"We're unique," Ryan said. "We're the only one in the world doing this right now."

Some fertility doctors and ethicists are undisturbed by the Abraham Center because the service does not differ markedly from what already happens routinely at fertility clinics.

"I know some people say: 'This is shocking. Embryos made to order,' " said John A. Robertson of the University of Texas at Austin, who advises fertility specialists on ethical issues. "But if you step back a little bit, you realize that people are already choosing sperm and egg donors in separate transactions. Combining them doesn't pose any new major ethical problems."

But others condemned the process as the unsettling culmination of recent objectionable developments, including the payment of egg and sperm donors and the growing tendency to try to select traits such as sex, intelligence and appearance.

"People have long warned we were moving toward a 'Brave New World,' " said Robert P. George of Princeton University, who serves on the President's Council on Bioethics. "This is just more evidence that we haven't been able to restrain this move towards treating human life like a commodity. This buying and selling of eggs and sperm and now embryos based on IQ points and PhDs and other traits really moves us in the direction of eugenics."

"We find this very troubling," agreed Steven Ory, president of the American Society for Reproductive Medicine. "This is essentially making embryos a commodity and using technology to breed them, if you will, for certain traits."

Ryan dismissed the complaints.

"People can say, 'Oh, this is the new Hitler.' That's not the case," she said. "I don't take orders. I say 'This is what I have' and send them the background. If they don't think it's right for them, they don't have to take them."

So far the embryos Ryan has created have been from white donors, but she said that was because most of the couples that have contacted her are white. Among the more than 150 couples on her waiting list are African Americans, and she plans to try to create embryos for them, as well as possibly other races and mixes of races.

Ryan is, however, using only egg donors who are in their 20s and have at least some college education and only sperm donors who have advanced education, such as a PhD or law degree. All must undergo a standard round of health tests required for all egg and sperm donors, as well as screening to make sure they have no criminal record or family history of mental illness, Ryan said. They answer detailed questionnaires that ask about their childhood temperaments, favorite books, adult hobbies and family histories.

"If I do discriminate, it's that I only want healthy, intelligent people," Ryan said. "People will say, 'You're trying to create the perfect human race.' But we've always done gene selection just by who women choose as their husbands and men choose as their wives. This is no different."

Ryan said the main advantage is not the attributes of the donors but the cost: She charges $2,500 per embryo and estimates the total price tag should be less than $10,000 for each attempt at pregnancy, which is much less than the cost of standard adoption or in vitro fertilization.

Some experts questioned the creation of embryos for unspecified recipients when about 400,000 excess embryos are in storage at fertility clinics. But Ryan said her embryos are better because she uses young, fertile donors, whereas excess embryos frozen in storage tend to come from older women with fertility problems.

The cost, convenience, prospects of success and ability to vet the donors all are attractive to Ryan's clients -- potentially not only infertile couples and single women but also gay men and lesbian couples.

"You get to get an idea of what your baby will look like, and it just seems like it's a lot easier and more affordable," said Joan, 42, of Birmingham, Ala., who asked that her last name not be used. She contacted Ryan after she was unable to get pregnant using three egg donors and becoming disenchanted by the prolonged process of trying to adopt a child or a leftover embryo. She and her husband want a sibling for their 3-year-old son. "I am not going to give up until I have another baby. This seems very, very attractive," she said.

Some experts, however, warn that the legal status of these embryos remains unsettled.

"Having an interstate business involving human embryos seems to be a bad practice from pretty much every perspective," said Susan L. Crockin, a lawyer in Newton, Mass., who specializes in reproductive technology.

DOJ_NMG_0113846

So far, Ryan said, she has produced one batch of 22 embryos using an egg donor in her 20s from Arizona and a sperm donor from Fairfax Cryobank, a sperm bank operated by the Genetics & IVF Institute in Fairfax. He is a 6-foot-tall lawyer with blond hair and blue eyes. She is a student with brown hair and hazel eyes.

A single woman in her 40s from California and a married woman from Canada in her 30s each had two of the embryos implanted and are five months pregnant, Ryan said. In case they want more children or the pregnancies fail, the two clients split the rest of that batch and had the embryos frozen.

A Houston doctor whom Ryan planned to hire to create the second batch dropped out after learning what Ryan was doing, she said. Another doctor in New York subsequently signed on to use the same sperm donor and a blond-haired, blue-eyed egg donor from Utah who works for an airline. The egg donor started taking hormones this week to trigger ovulation.

Another single woman from California in her 40s has signed a contract for two of these embryos, with a 30-day option for more, Ryan said. Any remainders can be shipped frozen to clients on the waiting list, she said.

"When the first 'test tube' baby came out, some people said it was evil," Ryan said. "I think the same thing is happening with this. Because it's new, it's getting all this criticism."

Texas Firm First To Offer Ready-made Embryos (HC)

By Rob Stein

Houston Chronicle, January 6, 2007

A San Antonio company has started producing batches of ready-made embryos that single women and infertile couples can order after reviewing detailed information about the race, education, appearance, personality and other characteristics of the egg and sperm donors.

The Abraham Center of Life, the first commercial dealer making embryos in advance for unspecified recipients, was created to help make it easier and more affordable for clients to have babies that match their preferences, according to its founder.

"We're just trying to help people have babies," said Jennalee Ryan, who arranged for an egg donor to start medical treatments to produce a second batch of embryos this week. "For me, that's what this is all about: helping make babies."

But the embryo brokerage, which calls itself "the world's first human embryo bank," raises alarm among some fertility experts and bioethicists, who say the service marks another disturbing step toward commercialization of human reproduction and "designer babies."

"We're increasingly treating children like commodities," said Mark Rothstein, a bioethicist at the University of Louisville. "It's like you're ordering a computer from Dell: You give them the specs, and they put it in the mail. I don't think we should consider mail-order computers and other products the same way we consider children."

Off the shelfProspective parents have long been able to select egg or sperm donors based on ethnicity, education and other traits. Couples also can "adopt" embryos left over at fertility clinics, or have embryos created for them. But the new service marks the first time anyone has started turning out embryos as off-the-shelf products.

Before contracting for the embryos, clients can evaluate the egg and sperm donors and can even see pictures of them as babies, children and sometimes adults. A fertility specialist will then transfer the embryos into a client's womb or into a surrogate.

"We're the only one in the world doing this right now," Ryan said.

Some fertility doctors and ethicists are undisturbed by the Abraham Center because the service does not differ markedly from what already happens at fertility clinics.

"I know some people say: 'This is shocking. Embryos made to order,' " said John Robertson of the University of Texas at Austin, who advises fertility specialists on ethical issues. "But if you step back a little bit, you realize that people are already choosing sperm and egg donors in separate transactions. Combining them doesn't pose any new major ethical problems."

But others condemned the process as the unsettling culmination of recent objectionable developments, including the payment of egg and sperm donors and the growing tendency to try to select traits such as sex, intelligence and appearance.

"People have long warned we were moving toward a Brave New World, " said Robert George of Princeton University, who serves on the President's Council on Bioethics.

Ryan dismissed the complaints.

"People can say, 'Oh, this is the new Hitler.' That's not the case," she said. "I don't take orders. I say 'This is what I have' and send them the background. If they don't think it's right ... they don't have to take them."

No discriminationSo far, the embryos Ryan has created have been from white donors, but she said that was because most of the couples that have contacted her are white. Among the more than 150 couples on her waiting list are blacks, and she plans to try to create embryos for them, as well as possibly other races and mixes of races.

DOJ_NMG_0113847

Ryan is using only egg donors who are in their 20s and have at least some college education and only sperm donors who have advanced education, such as a Ph.D or law degrees. All must undergo a standard round of health tests, as well as screening to make sure they have no criminal record or family history of mental illness, Ryan said.

"If I do discriminate, it's that I only want healthy, intelligent people," Ryan said.

Lower cost advantageRyan said the main advantage is not the attributes of the donors but the cost: She charges $2,500 per embryo and estimates the total price tag should be less than $10,000 for each attempt at pregnancy, which is much less than standard adoption or in vitro fertilization.

The cost, convenience, prospects of success and ability to vet the donors all are attractive to Ryan's clients.

"You get to get an idea of what your baby will look like, and it just seems like it's a lot easier and more affordable," said Joan, 42, of Birmingham, Ala., who asked that her last name not be used. She contacted Ryan after she was unable to get pregnant using three egg donors and becoming disenchanted by the prolonged process of trying to adopt a child or a leftover embryo.

A Houston doctor whom Ryan planned to hire to create a second batch of embryos dropped out after learning what Ryan was doing, she said. A doctor in New York subsequently signed on.

Texas Company Sells Ready-made Embryos (DMN)

By Rob Stein

The Dallas Morning News, January 6, 2007

A San Antonio company has started producing batches of ready-made embryos that single women and infertile couples can order after reviewing detailed information about the race, education, appearance, personality and other characteristics of the egg and sperm donors.

The Abraham Center of Life LLC, the first commercial dealer making embryos in advance for unspecified recipients, was created to help make it easier and more affordable for clients to have babies that match their preferences, according to its founder.

"We're just trying to help people have babies," said Jennalee Ryan. "For me, that's what this is all about: helping make babies."

But the center, which calls itself "the world's first human embryo bank," raises alarm among some fertility experts and bioethicists, who say the service marks another disturbing step toward commercialization of human reproduction and "designer babies."

"We're increasingly treating children like commodities," said Mark A. Rothstein, a University of Louisville bioethicist. "It's like you're ordering a computer from Dell: You give them the specs, and they put it in the mail. I don't think we should consider mail-order computers and other products the same way we consider children."

Prospective parents have long been able to select egg or sperm donors based on ethnicity, education and other traits. Couples can also "adopt" embryos left over at fertility clinics or have embryos created for them if they need both eggs and sperm. But the new service is the first time anyone has turned out embryos as off-the-shelf products.

Before contracting for the embryos, clients can evaluate the egg and sperm donors, and can even see pictures of them as babies, children and sometimes adults. A fertility specialist will then transfer the embryos into a client's womb or into a surrogate, which Ms. Ryan can also arrange.

Some fertility doctors and ethicists are undisturbed by the Abraham Center because the service does not differ markedly from what already happens routinely at fertility clinics.

"I know some people say: 'This is shocking. Embryos made to order,' " said John A. Robertson of the University of Texas at Austin, who advises fertility specialists on ethical issues. "But if you step back a little bit, you realize that people are already choosing sperm and egg donors in separate transactions. Combining them doesn't pose any new major ethical problems."

But others condemned the process as the unsettling culmination of recent objectionable developments, including the payment of egg and sperm donors and the growing tendency to try to select traits such as sex, intelligence and appearance.

"This is just more evidence that we haven't been able to restrain this move toward treating human life like a commodity," said Robert P. George of Princeton University, a member of the President's Council on Bioethics. "This buying and selling of eggs and sperm and now embryos based on IQ points and Ph.Ds and other traits really moves us in the direction of eugenics."

Ms. Ryan dismissed the complaints.

"People can say, 'Oh, this is the new Hitler.' That's not the case," she said. "I don't take orders. I say 'This is what I have' and send them the background. If they don't think it's right for them, they don't have to take them."

DOJ_NMG_0113848

So far the embryos Ms. Ryan has created have been from white donors, but she said that was because most of the couples that have contacted her are white. Among the more than 150 couples on her waiting list are African-Americans, and she plans to create embryos for them, as well as in other races

Ms. Ryan is, however, using only egg donors who are in their 20s and have at least some college education and only sperm donors who have advanced education, such as a doctorate or law degree. All must undergo a standard round of health tests required for all egg and sperm donors, as well as screening to make sure they have no criminal record or family history of mental illness.

"If I do discriminate, it's that I only want healthy, intelligent people," Ms. Ryan said.

Ms. Ryan said the main advantage is not the attributes of the donors but the cost: She charges $2,500 per embryo and estimates the total price tag should be less than $10,000 for each attempt at pregnancy.

The cost, convenience, prospects of success and ability to vet the donors all are attractive to Ms. Ryan's clients.

"You get to get an idea of what your baby will look like, and it just seems like it's a lot easier and more affordable," said Joan, 42, of Birmingham, Ala., who asked that her last name not be used.

She contacted Ms. Ryan after she was unable to get pregnant using three egg donors and becoming disenchanted by the prolonged process of trying to adopt a child.

"I am not going to give up until I have another baby," she said. "This seems very, very attractive."

Reagan Bust OK'd For Hill (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

Nearly twenty years after leaving office, Ronald Reagan is coming back to Washington. California lawmakers have voted to place a bronze bust of the former president in the Capitol Rotunda and alongside other national luminaries such as Abraham Lincoln, Sam Houston and Gen. Robert E. Lee.

The bust of Mr. Reagan, who was often referred to as "the great communicator," will replace that of Thomas Starr King, "the orator who saved the nation." King is credited with keeping California in the Union during the Civil War.

King's bust has resided in the National Statuary Hall since 1931. Lincoln once credited King with preventing California from splitting from the Union to form its own republic during the war.

Each state is allowed to have two bronze statues bearing the likeness of figures instrumental to the state's history. In 2000, Congress voted to allow state legislatures to replace their state's statues. Since then, only one state, Kansas, has chosen to do so. Kansas replaced the likeness of former Gov. George Washington Glick with one of Dwight D. Eisenhower.

"As the only governor of California to serve as president of the United States, Ronald Reagan is a clear choice for a delegate to Statuary Hall," said Grover Norquist, head of the Ronald Reagan Legacy Project, an organization that works to have landmarks named after the former president. Mr. Norquist also leads Americans for Tax Reform, a group that promotes federal candidates for office.

In addition to his reputation as a fiery orator, King's legacy includes raising millions of dollars for state sanitary commissions in New York and California, which helped to care for wounded soldiers. After his death in 1864, mountain peaks in Yosemite National Park and New Hampshire were named in his honor.

The National Statuary Hall is located next to the Capitol Rotunda and served as the original House chambers when the Capitol was first erected. After a new House chamber was built, it was decided in 1853 that the room should be used to house works of art, according to Capitol Architect spokeswoman Eva Malecki.

Ms. Malecki said busts of former presidents, including Eisenhower and Lincoln, are typically housed in the Rotunda. However, it's still unclear whether Mr. Reagan's bust will be there or along with the other statues in the Statuary Hall. "That will be up to Congress to determine," Ms. Malecki said.

Mr. Reagan's statue will accompany that of Junipero Serra, the Roman Catholic founder of nine California missions. Mr. Reagan, elected governor of California in 1967, served two terms before pursuing the Republican presidential nomination in 1976.

The resolution to replace Mr. King's bust with Mr. Reagan's was passed on Aug. 31 by the California Legislature with only one lawmaker, Sen. Debra Bowen, voting no. Mrs. Bowen is a member of the Unitarian Church, as was Mr. King.

The resolution's author, Sen. Dennis Hollingsworth, said lawmakers had plenty of time to address any concerns with the change because his resolution was first introduced in 2005. "Folks who have raised opposition have tried to make it sound like a last-minute thing," Mr. Hollingsworth said in an interview with the Associated Press. "But there were two years where the bill was able to be analyzed and scrutinized."

DOJ_NMG_0113849

The California-based Ronald Reagan Presidential Foundation will fund the project and commission a sculptor for the bust. The foundation also will pay to have the bust of King transferred to Sacramento. Mr. Hollingsworth said having the King statue in his state's Capitol will help Californians become more familiar with his legacy.

"Now fourth-graders on school field trips will have the opportunity to get to know King better."

C. William Verity Jr. Former Commerce Secretary, 89, Dies (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

COLUMBIA, S.C., Jan. 5 (AP) — C. William Verity Jr., United States secretary of commerce under President Ronald Reagan and a steel executive, died Wednesday in Beaufort, S.C. He was 89.

Mr. Verity, who suffered from asthma, died of complications of pneumonia in a Beaufort hospital, said his oldest son, John Verity.

William Verity was named commerce secretary in August 1987 after his predecessor, Malcolm Baldrige, was killed in a rodeo accident.

Mr. Verity retired as chairman of the board of the Armco Steel Company, now the AK Steel Corporation, in 1982 but remained a director for another four years. He was the grandson of George M. Verity, who founded the company.

A Navy veteran and a Yale graduate, he was born Jan. 26, 1917, in Middletown, Ohio.

His wife, Peggy, died in 1999. Survivors include a daughter, Peggy Verity Power, of Edwards, Colo.; two sons, Jonathan George and William Wymond, of Beaufort; two sisters, Betsy Verity Blakey, of Columbus, Ohio, and Jean Verity Woodhull, of Dayton, Ohio; seven grandchildren; and four great-grandchildren.

Remember Cindy Sheehan? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

When Cindy Sheehan became a celebrity for her "peace" vigil outside President Bush's Texas ranch in 2005, the antiwar left hailed her as a heroine. A DailyKos.com blogger anointed her "'Mother Sheehan,' . . . the bringer of life who has been wronged by state power." A mainstream media columnist proclaimed that "the moral authority of parents who bury children killed in Iraq is absolute." Even before Mrs. Sheehan became a media darling, minority House Democrats called her as a witness at a June 2005 hearing about Britain's so-called Downing Street Memos.

Well, she's their problem now. On Wednesday members of the new House majority tried to hold a press conference to discuss their legislative priorities, but a group of hecklers, led by Mrs. Sheehan and chanting, "De-escalate, investigate, troops home now," forced Representative Rahm Emanuel to shut it down. Thursday, Representative Louise Slaughter was treated to an encore, although her press conference was merely delayed 45 minutes. "I was a little perplexed about why they were protesting us," Ms. Slaughter said.

She shouldn't be perplexed, for Mrs. Sheehan is not just the grieving mom of media lore, or even a liberal war opponent. She is an outright anti-American activist, who has called the U.S. a "morally repugnant system," said that "this country is not worth dying for," and during Hurricane Katrina demanded that the President "pull our troops out of occupied New Orleans," among many similar utterances.

Many who once lionized "Mother Sheehan" have simply gone mum. We found few comments about her latest antics on the left-wing blogs. It's heartening to realize that her erstwhile backers were motivated by partisanship, not hatred of country.

A Meeting With Gerald Ford (NYT)

By Orlando Patterson

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

In the summer of 1975, I was asked by Robert Goldman, President Ford's in-house intellectual, to participate in a discussion on ethnicity at the White House, one of a series put on for the edification of the president.

America was then going through the so-called ethnic revival. Talk about the recovery of threatened ethnic heritage was everywhere, the beginnings of what later evolved into the multicultural and identity movement. Politicians had been quick to grasp the movement's potential, and it would become a controversial issue in the subsequent presidential election.

I gathered from our conversation that the unusual nature of Ford's ascent to the presidency had prevented the normal electoral process of learning that transformed local politicians into potential statesmen, and that the discussions were a crash course substitute. The other members of the ethnicity session would be Daniel Patrick Moynihan, the future senator from New York, Nat Glazer, my colleague at Harvard, Michael Novak, a writer and public speaker who had recently emerged as the leading ideologist of the revival, and John Higham, the historian of immigration. I was flattered to be so honored, but felt it necessary to point out that I was then the friend of and special adviser to the second most radical leader in the hemisphere, Prime Minister Michael Manley of Jamaica, who at the time was very much on the radar screen of the C.I.A. and State Department. They already knew that, but my associations were deemed irrelevant. I was impressed.

DOJ_NMG_0113850

We met one Saturday in an airy, informal part of the White House, the room flooded with the late-morning light of early fall. The president's golf game had gone on a bit longer than anticipated, and as we waited I mused to myself that we were being asked to perform the intellectual version of a medieval jousting tournament. Novak would passionately defend the ethnic revival; I was strongly against it. Higham was more of my persuasion. Moynihan and Glazer were presumably the moderates, but since their recently published text, "Beyond the Melting Pot," had rapidly become the locus classicus of the new ethnicity, it was hardly an even match.

The president's entry was refreshingly lacking in drama. There was no sudden hush, no ego filling up the room, not the slightest whiff of alpha male testosterone. He was a fine-looking man, in a Lake Wobegon sort of way. Casually dressed and relaxed in manner, he shook hands firmly, apologized for being late with a self-effacing remark about his game, then invited us to have drinks with him. He finished two martinis before lunch. Moynihan and I happily joined him, while the others discreetly held glasses filled with something else.

Accompanying the president was the soft-spoken young aide who had initiated and made this all possible. His shoulders hunched in a confiding way as he addressed us, and his thoughtful, collegial manner put us instantly at ease. This was Dick Cheney, the chief of staff, and I will never be able to reconcile the open, intellectually broad-minded person I met that day with the secretive éminence grise of today.

During the discussion's more formal phase, I told the president that I had been drawn to America by the cosmopolitanism of its mainstream, not to seek sanctuary in an atavistic cocoon. I argued that all ethnic movements are two-edged swords. Beginning benignly, and sometimes necessary to repair injured collective psyches, they often end in tragedy, especially when they turn political, as illustrated by German history.

I also argued that the ethnic revival was partly a reaction against the recent gains of black Americans. Sadly, black leaders' shift to separatism and identity politics had legitimized this reactionary backlash against them. Whatever the president's personal position, I urged him to keep the state out of it.

Throughout our discussion the president listened attentively. He occasionally asked a question — nothing profound, but enough to suggest that he was following it all quite closely. As we talked over lunch it slowly dawned on me that the president's behavior was the most inspiring display of self-assured humility I had ever witnessed. Here he sat, the most powerful man in the world, eager to learn about his own society, even from a recent immigrant.

He was a man at peace with himself. Uncomplicated but without a trace of shallowness; calm, dignified and quietly engaging, a person you would like to be your friend.

Mr. Ford Gets The Last Laugh (NYT)

By Chevy Chase

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

IN recent days, I've been bombarded by requests to comment on my relationship with President Gerald Ford. Until now, I've tried to say nothing — any remarks from me during the Ford family's private time of grief would have been inappropriate.

The requests were understandable, I guess. You see, I made a reputation for myself 30 years ago on "Saturday Night Live" in part because of a number of sketches and "Weekend Updates" that I wrote or appeared in ridiculing Mr. Ford for his apparent "stumble-bumbling" (though he was perhaps the best athlete to have been president) and making fun of his presidency.

Luckily for me, Mr. Ford had a sense of humor.

I've often thought how odd it was that we became linked together. It's not like we had a lot in common. After all, Mr. Ford had never been helped for any problems with "self-medication" in a facility that has helped so many throughout these past decades. And he had never been castigated by the press for such atrocities as "Oh! Heavenly Dog" or "Cops and Robbersons," among other slightly awful films I had made in Hollywood.

But linked together we were. And not just in the obvious ways. If it hadn't been for the courage of Mr. Ford's wife, Betty, for admitting to an alcohol problem, I would never have received the help I needed in the early 1980s at the Betty Ford clinic, located not far from the Ford residence near Palm Springs. During my short stay there, I often saw Mrs. Ford personally surveying the clinic and generously offering a helping hand to those who were lucky enough to face their problems and, with the learned help of the clinic staff, appraise their behavior and their lifestyles.

One day when my wife, Jayni, came to visit me at the clinic, the Fords invited us to lunch. As it happened, Mrs. Ford had become so beloved and respected by many for her earlier openness about breast cancer and her alcoholism that a television network was in preproduction on a special bio-pic about her. Mr. Ford suggested that while we ate lunch, the four of us could view the videotape of various performances by actors being considered to play the part of the president.

DOJ_NMG_0113851

Seated at a small table set for four in a simple dining room also containing a somewhat complicated videotape recorder and TV set were the former commander in chief and I making friendly small talk before lunch was brought in. And on all fours, literally on their hands and knees in front of the bulky and confusing tape machine, were Mrs. Ford and Jayni trying their best to figure out the wiring of the playback machine and the way the whole system worked, so we could watch the screen tests. Noting the effort the ladies were putting into getting the VCR to work, I suggested to Mr. Ford that perhaps we might help them out.

As I began to stand up from my chair, he took gentle hold of my arm, sat me back down and said: "No, no, Chevy. Don't even think about it. I'll probably get electrocuted, and you'll be picked up and arrested for murder."

We both laughed.

I'll never forget that moment. My laughter was hearty and genuine.

Rice Calls For Denuclearization Moves From North Korea (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, January 6, 2007

The United States has intensified efforts to resume nuclear disarmament talks with North Korea, while confirming it was working with Japan on an emergency plan for a possible crisis in the Korean peninsula.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told a joint news conference with visiting South Korean Foreign Minister Song Min-Soon that the six-party talks could resume "fairly soon" if Pyongyang signals it is ready for constructive denuclearization steps.

A first round of talks in Beijing last month involving the six -- China, Japan, North Korea, South Korea, Russia and the United States -- ended without apparent progress.

But Rice said Friday that those five days of discussions had laid the groundwork for further negotiations.

"We did not make the progress that I think we would have liked, and we believe that the North Koreans need to come in a more constructive spirit," she said.

"But it does not mean there were not very productive discussions that took place during that round," she said.

Rice said there was "intensive discussion among the parties about a resumption of the six-party talks" and that if the North Koreans demonstrate they are "prepared to come with a constructive response," the negotiations could resume soon.

Rice declined to speculate on when the negotiations might resume, though her spokesman said the next round could take place later this month.

Song, for his part, said it was "North Korea's turn to come back to us with a positive and realistic response" to proposals made to Pyongyang during the talks December 18-22 in Beijing.

"I know of no substantive response from the North Koreans" yet, Rice added, but she said the Chinese were in discussions with the reclusive communist regime.

White House spokesman Tony Snow on Friday confirmed that Washington and Tokyo were working on an emergency plan for a possible crisis on the Korean peninsula but said it was a routine contingency effort.

"People make plans all the time," Snow said after Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso, in Tokyo, revealed that the aim was "to protect some 20,000 Japanese residents and tens of thousands of tourists" in South Korea.

"It is a standard part of any government's preparation to try to take a look at all alternatives, domestically and internationally, and try to prepare for them," Snow told reporters.

Aso, who did not elaborate on the various scenarios being considered, said officials needed to consider "ways to evacuate Japanese nationals using US military vessels and civilian ships."

He added that the plan would also consider how to deal with refugees from the Communist North.

Snow said the United States and Japan were hoping "for the six-party talks to resume soon."

The negotiations were suspended in late 2005 after North Korea walked out in protest at US financial sanctions imposed on a Macau bank accused of illicit dealings on behalf of Pyongyang.

Before the breakdown, North Korea signed a statement agreeing to give up its nuclear weapons program in exchange for economic aid and security guarantees from the other five states.

But it then went ahead and conducted its first nuclear test explosion in October, sparking international condemnation and UN sanctions.

Under intense pressure from its main ally, China, the North agreed to return to the talks last month.

DOJ_NMG_0113852

The resulting five-day round of negotiations in Beijing failed to make any progress, as North Korea insisted the financial sanctions be lifted as a condition for tackling the nuclear disarmament issue.

Rice played down press reports this week that North Korea was making preparations for a second nuclear test explosion as a way of pressuring its partners for concessions in the next round of talks.

"We don't see any change in the circumstances that we currently face," Rice said, adding that a new nuclear test by the North Koreans would "obviously further deepen their isolation."

Song said South Korea had no indications another test was imminent.

US officials have declined to lay out publicly their specific demands of the North Koreans, but they are believed to include reopening nuclear sites to UN inspectors and initial steps to dismantle key installations, including the nuclear testing center in the mountains north of Pyongyang.

Parallel talks on the financial sanctions issue are also due to resume later this month in New York, though no date has been set.

Rice Cautions N. Korea (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, January 6, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice cautioned North Korea on Friday that a second nuclear test "no doubt would deepen its isolation."

Rice and South Korea's foreign minister, Song Min-Soon, agreed at a State Department news conference that their governments want negotiations on North Korea's nuclear program resumed.

"If North Korea is prepared to return in a more constructive spirit" the talks could be reopened fairly soon, Rice said. But she added, "We know of no substantive response from the North Koreans."

The South Korean minister said he had no indication that a fresh nuclear test by the North Koreans is imminent, following its initial blast last Oct. 9.

The talks, held last month in Beijing, would swap economic incentives and a U.S. assurance of respect for North Korea's security for cessation of the nuclear weapons program that produced a nuclear test nearly two months ago.

Nuclear Talks With N. Korea Expected To Resume (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

U.S., Allies Hope to Learn Whether Pyongyang Will Accept Suggested Steps Toward Standing Down

Six-nation talks on ending North Korea's nuclear program are likely to reconvene this month or next, when the United States and its allies hope to get a clearer sense of whether Pyongyang has any interest in giving up its weapons, U.S. and South Korean officials said yesterday.

South Korean Foreign Minister Song Min Soon, who held talks yesterday in Washington with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, said in an interview that North Korea did not "flatly reject" a number of ideas presented by the United States at the last round of talks, held in December, "even though it did not accept them."

Song would not detail those ideas, but U.S. and Asian diplomats have said the United States laid out steps that Pyongyang could take at the outset to demonstrate progress, including suspending operations at its Yongbyon reactor, readmitting international nuclear inspectors, reporting its nuclear facilities and closing its nuclear testing site.

The push to persuade North Korea to end its programs has been complicated by the fact that Pyongyang conducted its first nuclear test in October. Earlier this week, tens of thousands of North Koreans held a rally in the capital to defend their government's right to have nuclear weapons.

Previously, U.S. officials said they hoped to get a response to those ideas, first advanced at a bilateral meeting in November, at the December talks. But Song said it appeared the North Korean diplomats needed to take the proposals back to Pyongyang for further evaluation. "They are looking at a chance to make a deal, as usual, on their own terms," he said, adding that he did not know whether the differences could be bridged.

At a news conference with Song, Rice said, "There was some good work that was done during the round at the end of December, but really we're going to need to move well beyond that to consider this next round of talks, I think, successful."

Some U.S. officials have suggested that the main interest of the administration in continuing the talks is to convince China, North Korea's main patron, of Pyongyang's intransigence and the need to take forceful action against it.

DOJ_NMG_0113853

South Korean news agencies reported yesterday that vehicles and personnel movement had been spotted near the site of North Korea's first test, but U.S. and South Korean officials cast serious doubt on those reports.

"Seoul and Washington are having a close joint-intelligence assessment, but so far we do not have direct indication that there is an imminent test," Song said. He noted that North Korea conducted its last test underground, giving analysts very little time to detect possible preparation.

Song defended South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun for comments late last year, when he suggested that a split between the U.S. State Department and the Treasury Department had led to the rupture of the talks in 2005. Four days before an agreement was reached on principles for North Korean disarmament, Treasury accused a Macau bank of assisting in North Korean counterfeiting. North Korea used the incident to boycott the talks for 13 months and would discuss only that issue when the talks restarted in December.

"With a conspiracy view, you may say [the two departments] were playing games," Roh said. As a result, he added, the statement of principles "was buried the moment it was born."

Song said: "The point of my president's remark was not about some conspiracy but about his frustration, his frustration of nonprogress in the implementation program of the September agreement."

Policy Pat With Diplomat's Death (WT)

By Andrew Salmon, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

SEOUL -- The death of North Korea's foreign minister, Paek Nam-sun, the communist nation's top "diplomatic warrior," is unlikely to lead to any change in Pyongyang's policy toward Washington or the North's nuclear weapons programs, analysts say.

Mr. Paek's death was confirmed Thursday. No cause of death was given, but Mr. Paek, 77, was thought to be suffering from kidney disease.

Mr. Paek took on the role of foreign minister in 1998. Before that, he had come to prominence as a party cadre engaged in North-South Korean relations work with the Red Cross in the 1970s and 1980s. His last appearances on the international scene were at an Asian foreign ministers' meeting in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, followed by an official visit to Singapore, in July. During the visits, he was clearly ill and almost immobile.

Yesterday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, meeting in Washington with her South Korean counterpart, Song Min-soon, warned that a second nuclear weapons test by Pyongyang, following up on the test conducted in October, would only "deepen North Korea's isolation" in the international community.

Miss Rice declined to discuss whether U.S. intelligence officials have picked up on recent private reports that the North could be preparing a second such test.

"I'm not going to speak about intelligence information, but we don't see any change in the circumstances that we currently face," she told reporters after talks in Washington with the Korean diplomat.

Mr. Song said there were no signs of an imminent nuclear test, which would be North Korea's second since Oct. 9.

In a society as opaque as North Korea's, it is impossible to predict a successor to Mr. Paek, but one analyst expected Mr. Paek's deputy at the foreign ministry to succeed him.

"In real political terms, Paek has been a somewhat nominal minister. His deputy, Kang Sok-ju, has been playing the key role, talking directly to Kim Jong-il," said Kim Sung-han of Seoul's Institute of Foreign Affairs and National Security. "Kang is a possible successor, and he has been the point man in North Korean policy toward the United States."

The chances of Mr. Paek's successor having any leeway in moderating the country's nuclear policy are small.

"In propaganda, the diplomatic corps is referred to as 'diplomatic warriors'; there is talk of 'attack diplomacy'; and every time they have a success on the diplomatic front, when they face down America, they consider it a 'victory,' " said Brian Myers, an authority on North Korean propaganda at Dongseo University in South Korea. "This adversarial approach to relations is not going to change. In a dictatorship, there is no room for individual ministers to make policy decisions."

State Department officials said yesterday there was a chance that six-nation talks on the North's nuclear program could resume as early as this month. A short negotiating session last month in Beijing -- following a 15-month boycott of the talks by Pyongyang -- produced no progress, but Miss Rice said there had been some "very productive discussions" in the latest negotiating session.

In talks with China, the United States, South Korea, Russia and Japan, the North in September 2005 agreed to rid the peninsula of nuclear arms in exchange for economic aid and security guarantees.

But fleshing out the accord stalled when Pyongyang angrily reacted to U.S. Treasury sanctions on a Chinese bank that handled much of the North's state accounts.

DOJ_NMG_0113854

China Advises "Serious Response" By Iran To U.N. Sanctions (WP)

By Edward Cody, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

BEIJING, Jan. 5 -- China told Iran's top nuclear negotiator Friday that Tehran should abandon its defiance of U.N. sanctions and work for a swift return to talks to resolve the standoff over its nuclear program.

The Chinese admonition, conveyed by the official news media, came in a meeting between Ali Larijani, secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, and President Hu Jintao, who urged a "serious response" to the U.N. sanctions. State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, China's senior foreign policy troubleshooter, gave Larijani a similar message Thursday, the New China News Agency reported.

China's public advice to Iran marked another instance in which Beijing seemed to be following a course parallel to that of the United States on nuclear nonproliferation. Diplomats from the two countries have worked with increasing closeness over the past three years in Chinese-sponsored negotiations to dismantle North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

The Bush administration, in tandem with European leaders, has championed tough sanctions to force Iran to back down and reportedly is seeking new measures that would go beyond those already imposed. President Bush said Thursday that he thought it would be difficult to ensure a peaceful world if the Iranian government pushed forward with its research program and eventually equipped its military with nuclear weapons.

Although it has been reluctant to support sanctions in the past, China backed the U.N. Security Council's unanimous resolution of Dec. 23 that imposed sanctions on Iran and called for a suspension of its uranium enrichment program. But the Iranian Foreign Ministry dismissed the resolution as "illegal," President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad called it "trash paper" and the enrichment effort has continued apace.

Tang and Hu both reminded Larijani that the resolution passed unanimously, meaning China also voted for it, and said it reflected the concerns of the international community about safeguarding nonproliferation.

"China has always maintained that dialogue and negotiations are the best way to resolve the Iranian nuclear issue," Tang said, according to the news agency.

Larijani, in a news conference, said he had conveyed a letter from Ahmadinejad to Hu. He declined to specify its contents but sought to dispel the notion that Iran and China might be estranged because of China's decision to join the United States and other Security Council members in condemning Iran's nuclear research program.

"Of course, we know who is really behind these sanctions, so we are not blaming anybody for this," he said, alluding to the United States. The growing commercial ties between China and Iran will not be affected, he said, adding, "Countries that have long-term strategic relations will not change them because of tactical issues, and this was a tactical issue."

Larijani said that, in any case, Iran's government is not concerned about the new sanctions, which bar trade in nuclear- and missile-related goods. "The Americans have been carrying out this kind of policy for 27 years," he said, "and it's not had much effect."

Larijani said Iran's case is different from North Korea's because North Korea has developed a nuclear weapon, and "it is not part of our strategy to seek nuclear weapons." He said Iran wants to remain in the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty regime, but added, "If we are threatened, that could change."

Larijani dismissed Bush's comments as just one more in a string of U.S. criticisms. If the U.S. leader is genuinely worried about the dangers posed by nuclear weapons in the Middle East, Larijani said, "he should worry about Israel."

Report: China Prods Iran To Answer U.N. (AP)

By Audra Ang, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 6, 2007

China on Friday urged Iran to give a "serious response" to a U.N. Security Council resolution that imposed sanctions on Tehran for refusing to suspend uranium enrichment.

Iran's top nuclear envoy, however, warned that Tehran's commitment to the peaceful use of nuclear technology will change if the country is threatened.

The negotiator, Ali Larijani, was in Beijing for a two-day visit and gave Chinese President Hu Jintao a letter from Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Larijani and Hu discussed the U.N. sanctions, which bar all countries from selling materials and technology to Iran that could contribute to its nuclear and missile programs. The resolution, passed last month, also froze the assets of 10 Iranian companies and 12 individuals related to those programs.

DOJ_NMG_0113855

If Iran refuses to comply with the demand to suspend uranium enrichment within 60 days, the resolution warns Tehran that the council will adopt further nonmilitary sanctions.

The sanctions reflect "the shared concerns of the international community over the Iranian nuclear issue, and we hope Iran could make a serious response to the resolution," Hu told Larijani, according to China's official Xinhua news agency.

Hu added that "China continues to believe the Iranian nuclear issue should be resolved through diplomatic negotiation."

In Tehran, Ahmadinejad said Friday that sanctions won't stop Iran from enriching uranium, state-run television reported.

"Iran will stand up to coercion. ... All Iranians stand united to defend their nuclear rights," state-run TV quoted him as saying.

"Enemies have assumed that they can prevent the progress of the Iranian nation through psychological war and issuing resolutions, but they will be defeated," Ahmadinejad was quoted as saying on state-run TV.

While the United States has led the drive to stop Iran from enriching uranium — a process that produces the material for either nuclear reactors or weapons — it compromised on the sanctions to win the support of China and Russia, both veto-wielding members of the Security Council who have strong trade ties with Tehran.

Larijani indicated that China's decision to support the resolution has not hurt ties between the two sides, calling them "long-term and long-lasting."

"Countries who have strategic long-term relationships will not change their strategic relationships because of tactical issues," he said at a news conference.

He added in reference to Washington: "We know who is really responsible, who is really behind the sanctions and nobody else can be blamed for this."

Iran has denied that it seeks to build atomic weapons, saying its nuclear program is limited to the generation of electricity, a stance Larijani reiterated.

"We oppose obtaining nuclear weapons and we will peacefully use nuclear technology under the framework of the Nonproliferation Treaty," he said.

"But," he warned, "if we are threatened, the situation may change."

In another show of defiance, Iranian Vice President Gholamreza Aghazadeh, who also heads the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, announced that Tehran has produced and stored 250 tons of uranium hexaflouride gas, the feedstock for enrichment, state-run TV reported.

The hexaflouride gas, or UF-6, is being stored in underground tunnels at a nuclear facility in Isfahan to protect it from any possible attack.

"Today, we have produced more than 250 tons of UF-6. Should you visit Isfahan, you will see we have constructed tunnels that are almost unique in the world," state-run TV quoted Aghazadeh as saying.

The central Iranian cities of Isfahan and Natanz house the heart of the country's nuclear program. In Isfahan, a conversion facility reprocesses raw uranium, known as yellowcake, into uranium hexaflouride gas. The gas is then taken to Natanz and fed into the centrifuges for enrichment.

Iran has said it is moving toward large-scale uranium enrichment involving 3,000 centrifuges and plans to later expand this to 54,000 centrifuges. Centrifuges spin uranium gas into enriched material, which at low levels is used to produce nuclear fuel to generate electricity. But further enrichment makes it suitable for use in building nuclear weapons.

Iran has claimed to enrich small amounts of uranium at the low percentages needed for fuel-grade uranium, as opposed to weapons-grade enriched uranium, which must be enriched at levels above 90 percent. U.S. intelligence agencies have estimated that Iran might be able to develop a nuclear weapon in four to 10 years.

Aghazadeh confirmed in April 2006 that Iran has produced 110 tons of uranium hexaflouride gas. Experts say that amount would be enough to produce up to 20 nuclear bombs if Iran was to divert its civilian nuclear program into making weapons.

Associated Press Writer Ali Akbar Dareini in Tehran, Iran, contributed to this report.

American Diplomat To Visit Strife-Torn Somali Capital (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

KISMAYO, Somalia, Jan. 5 — The State Department's top diplomat for Africa plans to visit Mogadishu, the violence-scarred Somali capital, on Sunday, American officials said Friday. It would be the first time in more than a decade that a high-ranking United States official has set foot there.

But Al Qaeda's second-in-command, Ayman al-Zawahri, urged the world's Muslims on Friday to turn Somalia into a battlefield and use suicide attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0113856

These developments were part of Somalia's transformation after Ethiopian-led forces ousted the once powerful Islamist movement from the capital last week and helped install a potentially viable government there for the first time in over 16 years.

American officials said the schedule for the diplomat, Jendayi E. Frazer, assistant secretary of state for African affairs, was still tentative, but that she planned to be in Mogadishu for four hours to meet with officials of the transitional government and leading Somali intellectuals.

The United States has had a minimal presence in the country since its diplomats were withdrawn in the fall of 1994, nearly a year after 18 Americans were killed during an ill-fated attempt to capture a warlord in Mogadishu. In his speech on Friday, Mr. Zawahri urged Muslim fighters to wage a holy guerrilla war in Somalia. "I speak to you today as the crusader Ethiopian invasion forces violate the soil of the beloved Muslim Somalia," he said in an audio recording on a Web site that has featured Qaeda messages before. "Launch ambushes, land mines, raids and suicidal attacks until you consume them as the lions eat their prey."

It was not the first time that Muslim extremists have called for a holy war in Somalia.

Ethiopia has a long Christian history, and Somalia's Islamist leaders had been trying for months to rally outside support by portraying the Ethiopians as infidel invaders and urging Muslims worldwide to turn Somalia into the third front for jihad, after Iraq and Afghanistan.

In the end, though, Western intelligence officials said that only a few hundred foreign fighters heeded the call, and that they seemed to make little difference. The Islamist forces, made up of mostly untrained teenage troops, were routed by Ethiopian soldiers in one battle after another and lost in one week all the territory they had gained in the past six months.

Somalia's transitional government is now in loose control of most of the country and Western diplomats, including Ms. Frazer, are urging African nations to quickly put together a peacekeeping force before Somalia reverts to anarchy.

Officials from Ethiopia, one of the poorest nations in the world, have said that they do not have the resources to keep soldiers here much longer. Ethiopia has justified its intervention by saying that Somalia's Islamists were a regional menace.

Ms. Frazer met Friday with Kenyan and Somali officials in Nairobi to discuss the details of the peacekeeping force. Uganda has already volunteered troops, and Nigeria, South Africa and Tanzania have indicated they might also send forces.

Ms. Frazer was to travel to Yemen and Djibouti on Saturday to pursue the matter.

In Mogadishu, the transitional government was struggling to collect weapons. Earlier in the week, Ali Muhammad Gedi, the transitional prime minister, announced that Thursday was the deadline for all militias and gunmen to surrender their arms. Only a handful have complied and the deadline has been pushed back to Saturday.

As for the Islamists, Somali officials said Friday that the last remnants of their forces were cornered in a remote area of southern Somalia, south of Kismayo. Somali officials said they expected the conflict to end soon, though the Islamists have vowed to fight on as an underground insurgency.

Iraq-style Insurgency Urged On Somalis (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

Al-Qaeda's second-in-command on Friday urged members of a Somali Islamist movement to launch an Iraq-style insurgency against Ethiopian troops to "wipe them out".

In an audiotape purportedly by Ayman al-Zawahiri described the Ethiopian soldiers as a crusader invasion force and called on the Islamists to "ambush, mine, raid and [carry out] martyrdom campaigns."

Ethiopia, an important regional US ally, has thousands of troops in Somalia backing that country's weak transitional government. Its forces launched a rapid offensive against the Islamist movement, which had controlled much of southern Somalia, forcing it to flee all its major strongholds during the last two weeks.

However, the Islamists have vowed to fight on with a guerrilla campaign, and it is unclear what state the Islamists' forces are in and whether they have been genuinely defeated. There have also been concerns that any insurgency could attract foreign militants – Somalia is a Muslim nation with one of Africa's longest coastlines, stretching from the Indian Ocean to the Gulf of Aden.

Both Addis Ababa and Washington, which gave its tacit support to Ethiopia's offensive, accuse the Islamists' leadership of including and harbouring alleged al-Qaeda members, including three men wanted in connection with the 1998 bombing of the US embassy in Nairobi and the 2002 suicide attack on a Israeli-owned hotel on the Kenyan coast.

The Islamist movement that began as an alliance of Islamic courts and was not a monolithic group has denied any links to terrorism. However, a hardline military element, known as the Shabaab, was thought to include extremists.

Somalia, which has not had a functioning government since the fall of dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991, is awash with weapons and has been plagued by 15 years of lawlessness.

DOJ_NMG_0113857

On Friday, African and western officials, including Jendayi Frazer, US assistant secretary of state for Africa, met Abdullahi Yusuf, the Somali president, in Nairobi to discuss peacekeeping options and support for the transitional administration, which is deeply unpopular in many areas and has had little influence since it was formed two years ago.

Ms Frazer said Washington would provide $40m to Somalia in political, humanitarian and peacekeeping assistance, while the EU said it would help finance a force envisioned at 8,000 troops.

"If international support is to be effective, it is essential an inclusive process of political dialogue and reconciliation...be launched without delay," the diplomats said in a joint statement.

Without Ethiopian support, the transitional government would struggle to survive. But a peacekeeping force is likely to take weeks to put together. The only country that has indicated it would be willing to contribute troops is Uganda, and a mandate and logistical issues still have to be worked out.

Addis Ababa has said it plans to withdraw its forces within weeks, but there are fears that an Ethiopian pull-out could leave a vacuum and the resumption of rule by warlords and clan-based violence. But the longer they stay, the greater the chance the Ethiopians will be seen as an occupying force.

Islamist Stragglers Vow Guerrilla Tactics, Suicides (WT/AP)

By Elizabeth A. Kennedy, Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia — Islamist fighters hiding in Mogadishu since their movement's main force was driven from the Somali capital say they will heed al Qaeda's call for guerrilla attacks and suicide bombings against Ethiopian troops whose intervention was key to the Islamists' defeat.

"I am committed to die for the sake of my religion, and the al Qaeda deputy's speech only encourages me to go ahead with my holy war," 18-year-old Sahal Abdi told the Associated Press, referring to an audio message posted on the Internet yesterday.

Troops of Somalia's transitional government, backed by the Ethiopian military, routed the Islamic militia from much of southern Somalia, ending their six months in power. The group had brought a semblance of stability here but terrified residents with a version of Islamic rule that included public executions and floggings of criminals.

Interviews with militants who fought with the Islamic Courts Union and went underground when most of their comrades fled Mogadishu last week suggest their movement is ready for battle.

Somalia's interior minister says 3,500 fighters are hiding in and around the capital.

The AP contacted several militants by telephone after townspeople identified them as former fighters known from the months when the Islamic movement controlled Mogadishu.

None of those interviewed was a leader.

They acknowledged being fighters but refused to be photographed and, in some cases, to give their full names, fearing reprisals from government or Ethiopian troops.

They said the movement they served as foot soldiers will rise again.

"The call from the al Qaeda deputy leader is based on Islam and we are adamant in our religion," said Sheik Musa, who would not identify himself further. "There is no option but to heed his call."

Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden's deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, urged the Islamic movement's fighters and other Muslims to attack the troops of Christian-dominated Ethiopia, which he called a "crusader" invasion force.

"Launch ambushes, land mines, raids and suicidal combats until you consume them as the lions and eat their prey," al-Zawahri said in the taped message that aired on a Web site frequently used by militants and carried the logo of al Qaeda's press production wing, as-Sahab.

A meeting of U.S., European Union, African and Arab diplomats ended in Kenya yesterday with a U.S. pledge to provide $40 million to Somalia in political, humanitarian and peacekeeping assistance, and a plan to ask more African nations to send troops to help stabilize the country. Uganda has pledged at least 1,000 peacekeepers.

The EU said it would also help pay for a peacekeeping force envisioned at 8,000 soldiers.

Still supported by Ethiopians, government troops prepared yesterday for a major assault on Ras Kamboni, the last stronghold of the Islamic militia. U.S. warships patrolled offshore to prevent militiamen from escaping by sea.

The U.S. 5th Fleet said vessels were being boarded to look for militants, including three al Qaeda suspects wanted for the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in East Africa. The Islamists have denied U.S. accusations that the three were leaders in the Somali movement.

Quick Deployment Of Peacekeepers Urged For Somalia; Aid Pledged (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0113858

By Karen DeYoung, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Western and African diplomats meeting yesterday in Nairobi urged the quick deployment of an African peacekeeping force in Somalia, as the United States pledged $40 million to assist the mission and provide humanitarian aid.

In a communique peppered with references to the urgency of the situation, the Somalia Contact Group called for "immediate support for the stabilization of Somalia," noted an imperative to launch a political reconciliation process "without delay" and cited the need for "immediate concrete assistance."

"The group clearly felt it was important that there not be a security vacuum," Jendayi E. Frazer, the U.S. assistant secretary of state for African affairs, who chaired the meeting, told reporters in Nairobi.

Ethiopia has said its military force, which drove out the Islamic movement that controlled the southern part of the country and installed a weak, internationally backed transitional government, would stay only a short time.

If money were the only problem, Somalia would be on its way to stability, noted a diplomat from one of the countries involved in the group, whose membership includes the United States and several European countries as well as the European Union, Kenya and Tanzania, with participation from the United Nations and the African Union.

So far, only one African country has agreed to contribute troops to the force. Uganda has offered a 1,200-member contingent that Frazer said she hoped would be deployed by the end of January but that is only about a tenth of what is seen as necessary. The contact group communique said that Kenya's foreign minister would begin a mission to "explore additional troop contributions."

Of the $40 million pledged by the United States, $16 million is designated for peacekeeping support. The E.U. has pledged $47 million, of which $19.5 million is to go to the force.

U.S. Gen. William Ward, the deputy commander of the U.S. European Command who is traveling with Frazer, told reporters in Nairobi that there were no plans to deploy U.S. military personnel. U.S. assistance would include airlift, logistical and intelligence support.

The Europeans are similarly loath to send troops to Somalia, where a U.N. humanitarian force was withdrawn in 1995 following the deaths of numerous soldiers, including 18 Americans killed in a single battle.

Equally problematic is the reconciliation of Somali clans whose loyalty is distributed among the transitional government, a divided Islamic leadership and myriad other warlords. Western aid pledges are contingent on the warring groups -- with the exception of the Islamic leaders the United States says are harboring al-Qaeda suspects -- agreeing to a political accommodation.

If an international force were to enter the country before a political deal is made, the European diplomat said, it would be seen as supporting only one faction.

In Somalia, Confusion Remains In Command (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Premier Exhorts Revived, Ragtag Army

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 5 -- The revived Somali national army assembled here Friday in the sand-blown yard of the former parliament, a hollowed-out building splashed with grenade blasts and scrawled with apocalyptic graffiti.

About 1,000 men sat in the sun, soldiers who had been inactive for 15 years, old men with graying beards wearing whatever shade of camouflage they found at the market or dug out of storage. Few had boots; most wore leather loafers, sandals or thin-soled tennis shoes. They squinted at the newly ascendant prime minister, Ali Mohamed Gedi, who was swept into power last week on the strength of Ethiopian soldiers now pointing machine guns at the crowd.

"As prime minister, I say let us go back to our national interests," said Gedi, a former veterinarian. "This capital of Somalia is not for clans or tribes. It's for all Somalis. Is this clear? Will I repeat it, or have you got it?"

They all stood to sing the Somali national anthem, with many soldiers simply moving their lips, having forgotten the words. When it was over, 100 or so civilians heckled the new force -- "Traitors!" -- and Gedi zipped off in a convoy.

Even at such orchestrated events in Mogadishu, it is unclear who is in control, and the same could be said of Somalia itself.

Candidates for the title include the heavily armed Ethiopian forces stationed at strategic points around the city, without which Gedi's government would have failed to take the country from the popular Islamic Courts movement. There is Gedi himself, who leads an internationally recognized government but is perceived by many Somalis as a puppet of the Ethiopians.

The Ethiopians, in turn, are perceived as closely tied to the United States, which has expressed concern that Somalia could become a stronghold for terrorists. There is the fractious parliament, which Gedi is set to meet with in the next few days and whose members include warlords formerly backed by the United States, and others tied to webs of clans, sub-clans and sub-sub-clans, most with their own militias.

DOJ_NMG_0113859

And somewhere in the oceanside city of sand, goats, poetry and barbed wire, an estimated 3,500 former Islamic Courts fighters who shed their uniforms are thought to be awaiting instructions to attack the Ethiopian troops. On Friday, al-Qaeda's deputy leader, Ayman al-Zawahiri, posted a message on the Internet calling on the fighters and other Muslims to attack the invading "crusader" force, Ethiopia, which has a government and army dominated by Christians and a population that is nearly half Muslim.

All week, pamphlets circulating in the city have warned residents to stay away from Ethiopian soldiers.

"This is a funny question," said Gedi, when asked who is controlling Somalia. "The transitional federal government. It's a fully inclusive and representative government. This is my commitment, this is my responsibility as a prime minister to lead the Somali people."

Gedi's government is frail, however. He has not reached out to any moderate Islamic Courts leaders, widely credited with bringing security to Mogadishu, choosing to provide amnesty instead of inclusion in the government. A process of disarming the city is going badly, and Gedi said this week that he has only half the security forces he needs. Although the United States pledged $40 million in aid Friday, the government has practically no revenue to pay soldiers and set up ministries, or to assist thousands whose farms were ruined by recent floods.

Somalia's parliament, where representation is based on clan and sub-clan, includes many of the old warlords who had organized as an "anti-terrorism coalition" funded by the U.S. government, and otherwise made money by setting up roadblocks across the country to extract bribes. They were defeated by the Islamic Courts in June and are now seeking to wield power again, with some, such as Mohamed Qanyare Afrah, growing impatient with Gedi, whom they accuse of favoring his own people.

"They don't have any real power or any real authority," Qanyare said of the government. "My people want a government of national unity, not a government of certain clans, and that is what this government looks like."

Qanyare, a charismatic man known as the founder of the anti-terrorism coalition, sat in his armed compound on a hill at the city's crumbled edge, a place that seemed more like a military position than a home. He is from a sub-clan that is a rival of Gedi's.

A fleet of trucks was parked behind a wall, and militiamen armed with AK-47 assault rifles clustered at the door. Qanyare wore a bright yellow shirt with an abstract print, his hair wild and gray, and compared the prime minister and the various clans to a man with many unequally loved wives.

"If you don't love them, they will get a divorce," said Qanyare, adding that, at the moment, he is reading a book titled "Global Intelligence."

Ordinary Somalis are not sure who is in charge: the Ethiopians, the government, the warlords or the exiled Islamic Courts leaders and their underground fighters. Asked who he thought was wielding the most power, Amir Sheihk Elmi, who is in the cellphone business, said, "Allah."

Security continues to be the main concern in Mogadishu, where many residents fear that without an effective government force, authority in the country is reverting to the old collection of warlords and freelance militiamen.

Former Islamic Courts fighters in the city are hoping to harness those fears, along with resentment toward the Ethiopian troops, to reassert control.

"We are in Mogadishu, and we will challenge anyone to get security back," said Ali, a 21-year-old former fighter who declined to be identified further.

Late Friday afternoon, Ali said he had not heard about Zawahiri's Internet message. But he said that "shebab" fighters -- the young volunteer core of the Islamic Courts militia thought to be the most serious fighters -- were in "full contact" with Islamic Courts leaders who had fled the city last week. Asked whether he had a weapon, Ali shrugged and said insouciantly: "I have an AK-47 at home."

"When I hear about disarmament, I laugh," he said. "Who is supposed to take the guns? Who will be doing this?"

Asked who was in control of Somalia, he said without hesitation, "Sheik Sharif," referring to Sharif Ahmed, a top Islamic Courts leader reportedly among those on the run along the Somali coast.

The United States and Ethiopia have accused the Islamic Courts leaders of harboring three suspects in the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania and of cooperating with al-Qaeda. Intelligence analysts disagree over the extent to which al-Qaeda has influenced leaders in the Islamic movement, if at all, and whether the three terrorism suspects were in hiding in Somalia or being sheltered.

On Friday, U.S. Navy warships patrolled off the Somali coast to prevent suspects from escaping by sea. And Ethiopian troops were preparing for a major attack on Ras Kamboni, a town near the Kenyan border that is thought to be the last stronghold of fleeing Islamic Courts fighters.

DOJ_NMG_0113860

Day After Killings, A Hamas Leader Calls For A Truce (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 5 — The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, called Friday for an end to the internal violence in the Gaza Strip, a day after members of his own Hamas militia surrounded the house of a Fatah commander, killed him and his bodyguards and seriously wounded his wife and brother.

Before his death, the commander, Col. Muhammad Gharib, begged for help on a live telephone call to Palestinian television, saying his home near Jabaliya was being attacked by the Executive Force, a parallel security force under the command of the Hamas-run Interior Ministry, but that Fatah leaders and fighters did not respond.

"They are killers," he said of the gunmen. "They are targeting the house. Children are dying, they are bleeding. For God's sake, send an ambulance! We want an ambulance — somebody move!"

On Friday, Fatah issued a statement suggesting another round of retaliation. "All killers are legitimate targets," the statement said, adding, "What is called the Executive Force is an enemy."

The statement, confirmed by a Fatah official, Abdel-Hakim Awad, also said negotiations with Hamas on a unity government were impossible in the present atmosphere.

"There will be no dialogue in the midst of this series of killings and organized terrorism practiced by Hamas," the statement said, calling on the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, to fire Interior Minister Said Siam and disband the Executive Force.

"Said Siam is responsible for the execution and the cold-blooded murder to which our martyrs in Jabaliya were subjected," the statement said.

Mr. Abbas, who met with Mr. Haniya early Friday in an attempt to restore calm, tried to disband the Executive Force when it was established, but failed. Now it has about 6,000 men, including several hundred drawn from factions usually loyal to Mr. Abbas's Fatah movement.

Hamas officials said Colonel Gharib had been responsible for the deaths of two of their fighters.

Mr. Abbas has called for early parliamentary and presidential elections, a challenge to the Hamas government, which won parliamentary elections a year ago. Hamas has said it will not allow early elections, which it says are illegal, and has moved to enforce its hold over Gaza while calling for renewed talks on a unity government that Mr. Haniya would lead.

The new tensions have set off a series of battles between Hamas and Fatah forces that show no sign of ending, despite various efforts to restore calm.

There were emotional funerals on Friday for some of the dead from the attack on Thursday on Colonel Gharib's home. Two more people who had been wounded died Friday, bringing the total to eight. As a funeral cortege passed the colonel's blackened, shrapnel-riddled house, masked men fired guns into the air and shouted for revenge.

In Palestinian violence on Thursday, more than 60 people were wounded, including 10 children, Palestinian medics said. On Wednesday, five people died from violence.

On Friday a local cleric and frequent critic of Hamas, Adel Nasar, was murdered as he left his mosque, witnesses told The Associated Press.

There was no claim of responsibility in the death of Mr. Nasar, who was not openly affiliated with any political party, though he often spoke against Hamas in his sermons. In his sermon on Friday, Mr. Nasar warned that God would punish the killers of Colonel Gharib and his bodyguards, as well as the Palestinian rulers for not putting the rule of God into effect, witnesses said.

Speaking in another mosque on Friday, Mr. Haniya called for Palestinian guns to be aimed at Israelis, not other Palestinians. "Our fight is not an internal one, it's against the occupation," he said. But it is increasingly clear that Mr. Haniya, although prime minister, does not have operational control over many of the Hamas gunmen, just as Mr. Abbas cannot control Fatah-affiliated militias.

As in Iraq, the division of power created by democratic elections, in the absence of a traditional powerful state or after the disappearance of one, has meant the continuation of party politics through armed militias affiliated with factions but not always controlled by them.

In the West Bank on Friday, Fatah supporters celebrated an anniversary by attending the weekly demonstration against Israel's separation barrier in the town of Bilin, where the barrier cuts off the village from much of its farmland.

The demonstrators are a mixture of Palestinians, Israelis and foreigners, and as usual, what was supposed to be a nonviolent protest turned into exchanges of rocks, rubber-coated bullets and tear gas with the Israeli Army and the border police.

Ten demonstrators were wounded, and two were hospitalized. Jibril Rajoub, a Fatah member and former security chief, said, "Our battle with Hamas is not a battle of assassination, kidnapping or revenge."

DOJ_NMG_0113861

"Our battle is with the occupation, not with each other," he added.

According to [a news organization], the Bush administration is asking Congress for $86 million in aid, not including weapons and ammunition, to bolster Mr. Abbas and his Presidential Guard. The aid, mostly training and supplies, according to an American document obtained by [a news organization], is intended "to dismantle the infrastructure of terrorism and establish law and order in the West Bank and Gaza." Officials said previously that they expected to ask for nearly $100 million for the effort, which has itself been widely reported.

In Israel, there were recriminations over a failed army arrest raid in the center of the West Bank city of Ramallah on Thursday, hours before Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was to meet President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt. The wanted man, though wounded, escaped, and four Palestinians were killed as Israeli forces exchanged fire with Palestinians in violent scenes that were televised live on Al Jazeera.

Mr. Olmert's aides said he had not been informed of the raid in advance and was angry about what had happened. The violence overshadowed the summit meeting, which Olmert aides said had gone well.

Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, an Israeli cabinet member and former defense minister, criticized the timing of the raid. "I don't think this operation should have been carried out on the day of a visit by the Israeli prime minister to a country in which we have a supreme strategic interest," he told Israel Radio. "Our relations with Egypt are more important to us than anything else."

Cleric Shot In Gaza After Plea For Calm (FT)

By Harvey Morris, Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

Unidentified gunmen shot dead a Muslim cleric after he delivered a sermon in the Gaza Strip on Friday calling for an end to fierce factional fighting between Hamas and Fatah, hospital officials and local residents said.

The cleric's shooting in central Gaza came hours after Ismail Haniyeh, the Palestinian Authority's Hamas prime minister, and Abu Mazen, its Fatah president, agreed to keep rival gunmen off Gaza's streets after clashes in which eight were killed.

Brushing aside Mr Haniyeh's plea for calm, Fatah issued a statement in Gaza: "Blood for blood and aggression for aggression...and all the sons of the movement should retaliate to each aggression openly."

It was their first encounter since last month's announcement by Mr Abbas that he planned to call new elections, which sparked the latest round of factional violence.

There was no statement from the president on the outcome of the meeting, but Mr Haniyeh said: "We are going to end all armed displays in the streets."

Mohammed Ghayeb, a commander of the Fatah-linked Preventive Security Force, and six of his bodyguards were killed on Thursday at the end of a day-long Hamas assault on his Gaza home. In a call to Palestine television shortly before he died, Colonel Ghayeb appealed for an ambulance to be sent to his home.

Hamas militants had held the Fatah force responsible for the killing of one of their number earlier in the day.

The factional violence is worsening just as the US is gearing up for another diplomatic effort in the region, sending Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, to Israel and the Palestinian territories late next week. However diplomats and US officials in Washington give no sign of any significant shift away from the current strategy of supporting Mr Abbas, with money and equipment, while isolating and shunning Hamas.

The international Quartet seeking to direct the peace process with Israel – the European Union, the US, Russia and the United Nations – are to meet on the sidelines of an international conference for Lebanon in Paris on January 25.

Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, and Javier Solana, the EU foreign policy chief, were both in Washington this week to press for renewed US engagement before the US electoral calendar of the 2008 presidential race pushes foreign policy aside. But the US has rebuffed efforts by some Europeans to broaden negotiations to include Syria.

Leaders of the two Palestinian factions have reached numerous deals to calm the factional violence but few have held for more than a few days.

Relations between the rival parties deteriorated after Hamas defeated Fatah in general elections a year ago and worsened after Mr Abbas called for new elections after the breakdown of talks to form a national unity government.

The rivalry is exacerbating a de facto split between the Gaza Strip, Hamas's power base, and the West Bank, where Fatah has a stronger armed presence.

Tanzanian Woman Is Chosen For U.N.'s 2nd Highest Post (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113862

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 5 — Secretary General Ban Ki-moon on Friday appointed Asha-Rose Mtengeti-Migiro, the foreign minister of Tanzania, to be deputy secretary general and said he intended to give her responsibility for day-to-day management of the world organization.

In choosing Ms. Migiro, 50, a professor who has served for six years in Tanzania's cabinet, Mr. Ban fulfilled a pledge to place a woman from a developing country in the second most powerful post at the United Nations. In a statement, he praised her "outstanding management skills" and said he intended to delegate to her "much of the administrative and management work of the Secretariat."

On Wednesday Mr. Ban, who took over as secretary general on Jan. 1, appointed Alicia Bárcena Ibarra, 54, a Mexican diplomat, to be the under secretary general for management, the top post focused exclusively on administration.

While some United States officials were unenthusiastic about Ms. Bárcena because of her lack of experience in financial management, they praised the choice of Ms. Migiro.

"Her experience indicates she will do a fantastic job," said Richard A. Grenell, the spokesman for the United States Mission. American officials said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was personally acquainted with Ms. Migiro and was pleased when she heard of the appointment on Friday.

Ms. Migiro has been Tanzania's foreign minister since January 2006, and before that she served for five years as minister for community development, gender and children. Over the past year she has played a leading role in efforts to resolve conflicts in central Africa.

As Mr. Ban started to build his team this week, African diplomats said they were pleased to hold on to one of the most influential posts after Kofi Annan, the former secretary general, who was from Ghana, stepped down.

"Women are multitasking people," said Dumisani S. Kumalo, the South African ambassador, who is a major player on behalf of developing nations. "And African women are even better. Watch out!"

African diplomats said Ms. Migiro had carried out a management overhaul in the foreign ministry, requiring new standards of efficiency.

Some United Nations officials noted that Mr. Ban's choices signaled a step back from the corporate-style management reforms that Washington has pushed since the early 1990s. Neither Ms. Migiro nor Ms. Bárcena had substantial business experience. Mr. Ban made it clear that he would focus on diplomacy and did not intend to play the chief executive role, as some Americans had hoped.

But Ms. Migiro may help Mr. Ban to win new support for reform. "The developing countries have seen the United States reforms as a way of taking control of the United Nations away from them," said Princeton N. Lyman, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations. He said Ms. Migiro might be able to propose reforms "in a way that does not seem threatening to them."

UN Chief Picks Tanzanian Deputy (BBC)

BBC.com, January 5, 2007

The new United Nations Secretary General, Ban Ki-Moon, has named a Tanzanian official, Asha-Rose Migiro, as his deputy.

The current Tanzanian foreign minister, she replaces British diplomat Mark Malloch Brown.

Before joining the government, Ms Migiro was a senior lecturer at the law faculty of Dar es Salaam University.

The appointment fulfils Mr Ban's pledge to choose a woman to fill the post of deputy secretary general.

Mr Ban described Ms Migiro as a highly respected leader who had championed the cause of developing countries over the years.

Mr Ban, 62, is the first Asian to hold the top post in 35 years.

The former South Korean foreign minister succeeded Kofi Annan, of Ghana.

Tanzanian Woman Chosen For No. 2 Post At United Nations (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

UNITED NATIONS — Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon on Friday made good on his pledge to appoint a woman from the developing world as deputy, choosing Tanzanian Foreign Minister Asha-Rose Migiro.

Ban called Migiro "a highly respected leader who has championed the cause of developing countries," and said he planned to delegate much of the U.N.'s management and administrative work to her. She will also oversee socioeconomic affairs and development issues.

DOJ_NMG_0113863

The deputy secretary-general is a relatively new U.N. post, created by Ban's predecessor, Kofi Annan, in 1998. After the Iraq oil-for-food scandal revealed systemic mismanagement in the organization in 2005, Annan tried to transform the post to help rein in the bureaucracy. Ban has pledged to streamline the U.N. staff, and Migiro will oversee the day-to-day running of the world body and the changes in management and operations that Ban says he plans.

Migiro, 50, became Tanzania's first female foreign minister in January 2006 after serving as a university lecturer and Cabinet minister in Dar es Salaam, the nation's capital.

U.N. spokeswoman Michele Montas said Migiro proved her ability to manage as the chairwoman of the Great Lakes regional conference in Central Africa in December. Montas said Ban carefully considered many candidates and emphasized that Migiro "was not named because she's an African and because she's a woman, but essentially because of her qualifications."

South African Ambassador Dumisani Kumalo, however, said that although Migiro "is very experienced in managing foreign affairs," being an African woman was her best qualification.

"Women are multi-tasking people," Kumalo said. "African women are even better. Watch out!"

African Union envoy Salim Ahmed Salim, Tanzania's former prime minister and foreign minister, said Migiro was a good choice, and not just because she was Tanzanian. "She's a very informed person, well educated, extremely articulate," he said. "She is one of those who has been an activist in the political situation in Tanzania, and an activist basically in the struggle for human rights on the continent."

Ban has spent his first week on the job filling his Cabinet, trying to balance merit, gender and geography. The permanent Security Council members have traditionally been guaranteed some of the top Cabinet posts, and so far, the custom seems to be continuing.

The new secretary-general named British diplomat John Holmes to be the new chief for humanitarian affairs and appointed Montas, an award-winning Haitian broadcast journalist, as his spokeswoman. Former Indian ambassador and undersecretary-general Vijay Nambiar is Ban's chief of staff. Mexican environmentalist Alicia Barcena Ibarra, who was Annan's chief of staff, succeeded American Christopher B. Burnham as undersecretary-general for management.

The U.S. is expected to receive a bolstered political affairs post and France to retain peacekeeping. China may run the Department of Economic and Social Affairs.

U.N. Chief To Open Financial Records (WP)

By Colum Lynch, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 5 -- U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki Moon announced Friday that he will release his personal financial records, making him the first U.N. leader to subject his financial dealings to public scrutiny.

Ban also appointed Tanzania's female foreign minister, Asha-Rose Migiro, as the United Nations' second-ranking official, fulfilling a campaign pledge to pick a woman from the Third World as his deputy.

The moves came as Ban faced a week of tough questioning from reporters over his decision to select two U.N. insiders to run his office and to oversee the institution's management. Those appointments raised questions about Ban's commitment to reinvigorate the world body's tarnished administrative culture.

The former South Korean foreign minister's action on his financial records was partly symbolic, because Ban had already been required to file disclosure statements when he served in the South Korean government. It was calculated to prod other senior U.N. officials to voluntarily make their own financial statements public.

Still, his announcement represented a break from his predecessor, Kofi Annan, who declined news media appeals to release his personal financial records and grudgingly agreed to disclose them to the newly established U.N. ethics office only during his final months in office.

Michele Montas, Ban's spokeswoman, said that Ban filed his financial statement on Tuesday with the U.N. ethics unit, where it will be examined by a U.S. auditing firm, PricewaterhouseCoopers. Other senior U.N. officials are required to file a financial disclosure statement with the ethics unit, but they are not required to make them public. "If they voluntarily want to do it, I guess they could do it. However, they are not in any way forced to do it," Montas said. "The secretary general said he wanted to give an example."

Montas said Ban has also asked the United Nations' top 60 officials to offer letters of resignation to allow him greater flexibility in selecting a new management team. She said the officials will continue their work for the organization until Ban assembles his new team.

DOJ_NMG_0113864

Ban will "delegate much of the management and administrative work" to Migiro, a former academic who served for five years as Tanzania's minister for community development, gender and children's affairs, Montas said. Migiro, who was appointed Tanzanian foreign minister in January 2006, will also oversee U.N. social, economic and development activities.

It remained unclear how vigorously Ban examined Migiro's qualifications before offering her the job. Montas said that Ban had not held a single face-to-face interview with her before she was selected. But she said that Migiro, who beat out several other candidates for the job, had impressed him when they worked together as foreign ministers. "She was not named because she's an African and because she is a woman, but essentially because of her qualifications," Montas said.

In a statement, Ban called Migiro "a highly respected leader" with "outstanding management skills" who has championed the cause of the world's poorest countries. The appointment was praised by a bloc of developing countries -- the Group of 77 -- which has been lobbying aggressively for greater representation in the U.N. leadership.

A Status Quo Secretary General (NYT)

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

The big powers in the United Nations Security Council chose Ban Ki-moon as secretary general because they wanted a low-key bureaucrat who wouldn't rock the boat. Judging by Mr. Ban's early moves, the world has gotten exactly that.

Expect no Kofi Annan-style exhortations to live up to the values of the U.N. charter. In commenting on the sordid execution of Saddam Hussein, Mr. Ban even managed to forget that the U.N. opposes the death penalty on principle. Expect no shift from patronage to selection based on merit for key staff positions. The top jobs in peacekeeping, political affairs and humanitarian relief are already being doled out to the favored candidates of London, Paris and Washington (three of Mr. Ban's backers).

And expect no serious drive for much-needed administrative reform. The top management job, previously held by a reform-minded American, has now been given to a long-serving insider, Alicia Bárcena Ibarra of Mexico.

Mr. Ban takes over at a difficult time. The secretariat's reputation for integrity has been battered by the oil-for-food scandal, and the Security Council's claim to influence has been battered by its failure to halt the genocide in Darfur or the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea.

On one crucial front, though, the outlook may be brightening. Under President Bush, relations between Washington and the U.N. were driven to their lowest point ever, following the twin blows of the Iraq war and the destructive presence of the former ambassador, John Bolton. The White House reportedly plans to nominate a new ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, who actually believes in diplomacy.

Mr. Khalilzad is currently the ambassador in Baghdad, where he is one of the few American officials to try to reach out to Sunni Muslims and curb the divisively sectarian policies of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. Unfortunately, the White House — desperate to make Mr. Maliki look like a leader — decided it did not want such an activist ambassador. We hope that choosing Mr. Khalilzad for the United Nations is at least a sign that Mr. Bush is learning the importance of diplomacy and cooperation, if not the importance of a powerful U.N. leader or a strong-minded ambassador in Baghdad.

China Moves To Tighten The Money Supply (NYT)

By David Barboza

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

SHANGHAI, Jan. 5 — China's central bank said late Friday that it had raised the reserve requirement ratio for banks, the fourth increase in six months, to further tighten the nation's money supply.

The modest move, which takes effect this month, increases the reserve ratio by half a percentage point, to 9.5 percent. Analysts said it was the government's latest warning that too much money in the financial system could ignite inflation and perhaps fuel a stock market bubble.

"This is a warning shot," said Dong Tao, the chief economist for non-Japan Asia at Credit Suisse. "If the stock market continues to go up, we might see further tightening."

Raising the amount of cash reserves that Chinese banks keep on hand with the central bank effectively restricts the amount of money that banks can lend. While not being very restrictive, the central bank aims to curb excessive lending to new factories, real estate projects and road construction.

The move also comes as China's stock market is booming after several years in the doldrums. Last year, the country's key index — the Shanghai exchange — rose 130 percent to close at 2,675, a record and the best performance of any major stock exchange in the world in 2006.

The market reached a 16-year high in December, as millions of investors who had been sitting on the sidelines in 2004 and 2005 jumped back into stocks.

DOJ_NMG_0113865

Analysts say the government is determined to keep the economy expanding but is concerned about growing so quickly that the economy might crash before 2008, when Beijing is host to the Olympic Games, viewed as the ultimate coming-out party for China.

Overinvestment in real estate and construction has been among the chief worries for the government. And for much of the last two years there have been frequent warnings and government measures to tame a wild property run.

The Central Bank said that last October, for the first time in five years, the bank savings of Chinese citizens decreased from the month before, presumably as more money went into the stock market. Credit Suisse estimated that more than $30 billion in bank deposits have flowed into mutual funds or direct plays into the stock market over the last six weeks.

Many analysts say now that the bull run will continue in 2007, prompting even more money to flow into the market. One Chinese mutual fund raised $5 billion in a single day recently before closing its doors to new investors, an astonishing achievement here, according to some economists.

Industrial and Commercial Bank of China, which was publicly listed only last October, here in Shanghai and in Hong Kong, has already gained over 70 percent. This week, prices shot up again, before falling sharply Friday.

The run-up means companies in China can once again raise money in the Chinese market rather than relying on the Hong Kong stock market. But huge risks remain in a market that many analysts have long derided as a gambling den crowded with companies with suspect accounting.

Several economists say that more increases are expected in the coming months, to tame the economy and the stock market.

Hong Liang, a Hong Kong-based economist at Goldman Sachs, said that the government had used the reserve ratio as a policy tool to help manage the economy but that it had not been very effective in cooling things down. She did not "expect it to have much impact on the real economy or the financial markets."

Large amounts of money flow into the country through foreign investments and surplus dollars from trade. China also has a high savings rate. So many people are looking to put that money to work — in real estate, the stock market and even by investing in art and antiques.

"A lot of hot money has entered the market, legally and otherwise," said Chang Chun, a professor of finance at the China Europe International Business School in Shanghai, speaking of the stock market. "In the past few years people were overpessimistic. Right now, they are overoptimistic and they're bringing a lot of money into the market."

China Currency Near Parity With Hong Kong's Dollar (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

HONG KONG, Jan. 5 — For more than half a century, residents of Hong Kong have taken pride in being more prosperous than their cousins nearby in mainland China, and have enjoyed feeling like big spenders whenever they crossed the border.

Merchants across the border in Shenzhen were happy to take Hong Kong dollars, pocketing the 6 percent premium it commanded over China's currency. Mainland tourists offering Chinese currency here were charged extra or even turned away and told to come back with Hong Kong dollars.

But the yuan is poised to become more valuable than the Hong Kong dollar by the end of the month, and could pass the traditional benchmark for the Hong Kong dollar's value as early as next week. The shift has been the latest in a series of shocks for residents' confidence that they or their ancestors had made the right decision to live in Hong Kong instead of anywhere else in China.

"Nowadays, the gap between China and Hong Kong has narrowed, and some people even think the standard of living in China is higher," where prices are lower and incomes are rising quickly, recalled Chan Chi Him, the second generation of a family that has sold birds' nests as a delicacy here since the end of World War II.

"It's easier for Chinese people to make money," he said.

Average incomes per person in cities like Beijing, Shanghai or Guangzhou remain a fifth or less of incomes for people in Hong Kong. But the averages in China are dragged down by very large numbers of very poor people.

People in Hong Kong are used to comparing themselves with the educated middle class on the mainland. And they are finding that a growing class of Chinese businessmen and businesswomen have become more affluent than the average resident of Hong Kong.

Millions of middle-class Chinese flock here every year, and shopkeepers are now happy to take Chinese currency, known as the yuan or renminbi.

DOJ_NMG_0113866

At the same time, many shopkeepers across the border in China have stopped taking Hong Kong dollars or have begun asking a slightly greater number of dollars than the number of yuan on price tags would suggest.

Prices are rising here in markets for everything from luxury apartments to dried bugs, and the culprit is the same: the rising value of the Chinese yuan and the falling value of the Hong Kong dollar.

The winning bid in a land auction last month worked out to more than $7,000 a square foot once houses are built, making Hong Kong real estate some of the most valuable in the world. Developers are betting that multinationals and mainlanders alike will continue to see Hong Kong as an excellent base for doing business in China.

But Hong Kong also imports much of its food and other goods from the mainland, and the prices are climbing.

Sellers of traditional Chinese medicine are having to pay more for the herbs, insects and other wares they buy from the mainland. The price of dried cicadas, which are boiled in soup to improve eyesight, has risen close to 4 percent in the last year as the yuan has gradually strengthened, said Lee Chun Hung, the chairman of Lee Hoong Kee Ltd., a Chinese medicine wholesaler.

Prices have soared for herbs that are in demand across China, as increasingly affluent mainlanders have bid up prices to levels that many people in Hong Kong cannot afford. A rare root that is boiled in soup and eaten to strengthen the lungs now sells for $618 for a small box, four times its price two years ago.

"It's not just the rise of the renminbi," Mr. Lee said, "it's also because the standard of living is going up on the mainland."

While prices are starting to creep up here after years of deflation, rising home prices and falling unemployment have helped produce soaring confidence here in the territory's economic future, recent surveys have shown.

The yuan has been rising partly because of calls from the United States and Europe for the Chinese currency to reflect China's rising trade surplus and huge intake of foreign investment.

Chinese officials have also voiced concerns that maintaining a low value for the currency may eventually unleash inflation, although prices are barely rising now on the mainland.

China unified various exchange rates in 1994 and, after several years of gradual appreciation, fixed the exchange rate of the yuan at 8.28 to the dollar in 1998. Beijing officials maintained that level until July 2004. They then began allowing a slow appreciation, with the yuan climbing 3.4 percent last year. It was worth slightly more than 7.81 yuan to the dollar in Friday trading in Shanghai.

The Hong Kong Monetary Authority pegged the Hong Kong dollar at 7.8 to the United States dollar in September 1983, and maintained that policy with few changes until June 2005. It then moved to a narrow trading band of 7.75 to 7.85 to the dollar.

The Hong Kong dollar has been trading near the top of that band lately, which is why it is likely that it will take a couple of more weeks for the yuan to reach parity.

Ben Simpfendorfer, a currency strategist at the Royal Bank of Scotland, said that the yuan would surpass the Hong Kong dollar "definitely before the end of the month."

While some speculators have raised the idea that the Hong Kong dollar might be repegged to the yuan, the Hong Kong Monetary Authority has been opposed, and most economists say that the move would be a bad idea. The weaker Hong Kong dollar improves Hong Kong's competitiveness relative to cities on the mainland, and a peg to the yuan would be difficult to maintain.

The yuan is not an internationally traded currency and the Chinese government backs it with a fairly inflexible monetary system in which the economy is controlled less by interest rate changes than by administrative measures, like an order on Friday that banks raise their reserves at the central bank to 9.5 percent of assets, from 9 percent.

The sometimes tumultuous violent history of currency policy in Hong Kong has also discouraged officials. When the Hong Kong dollar plunged in early September 1983, partly on uncertainty over what would happen to the territory after its return to Chinese rule in 1997, gasoline prices climbed because they were set in dollars and taxi drivers responded by holding a protest that turned violent; the Hong Kong dollar has been closely managed ever since.

China Media Battle Hints At Shift On Intellectual Property (NYT)

By Howard W. French

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

SHANGHAI, Jan. 3 — One of China's largest newspapers has filed a lawsuit against one of the country's leading Internet portals claiming that it violated copyright laws, setting off a media war and highlighting the first signs of a possible shift in policies toward intellectual property rights here.

DOJ_NMG_0113867

In the suit, which was filed in October and is expected to go to court soon, the newspaper, The Beijing News, is seeking $400,000 in damages from a popular Internet site called Tom.com, alleging that it has copied and republished more than 25,000 articles and photos without authorization since 2003.

China has long had the reputation as a sort of no man's land for intellectual property rights, with companies in virtually every industry freely copying designs and other content from foreign companies and domestic rivals with little fear of punishment.

The lawsuit, however, is headed to court at a time of accelerating legal change and signs of increased efforts by law enforcement to protect copyrights and intellectual property. It is also a critical time for China's newspaper industry, which grew explosively in the last decade or so but now faces an even faster-growing rival: Internet-based news media.

Now, as in the United States and many other countries, with computer use and broadband access booming here, newspapers are losing readers to large, corporate-owned Web sites. What had set China apart from much of the rest of the world until recently was that these Web sites faced no legal obstacles in copying material from newspapers, often wholesale.

"There is a very brutal competition between newspapers — with seven or eight big ones just in Beijing — and now a big, new player, the Internet, wants to wipe them all out, to change the landscape," said Yu Guofu, a lawyer who specializes in intellectual property. "The press is leading a hard life and facing an unpleasant future, but it has decided it is better to protect its rights than just sit and wait to die."

According to one recent study, newspaper readership in China has declined sharply in the last three years, with the number of people who say they read a newspaper at least once a week falling to 22 percent last year from 26 percent in 2003.

A major presumed cause for the decline is that big Internet content providers, or portals, have become one-stop sources for all manner of information, including news, entertainment and blogs.

Until recently, the general practice for most portals was to lift news and other information directly from other sources, sometimes crediting the original source and sometimes not, but rarely paying for the information.

The Beijing News lawsuit was filed a little more than a year after a meeting of major newspaper publishers in Nanjing at which strategies were discussed to shore up the industry's base and combat the leeching of content and readers by Internet companies.

"In terms of the law, things are quite clear, that Tom's use of Beijing News's work without authorization clearly violates Beijing News's copyrights," said Yu Guoming, dean of the school of journalism at Renmin University in Beijing. "There are lots and lots of cases very similar to this one, but with this lawsuit, the traditional media is sending a very clear signal to the electronic media that their free lunch is over."

A spokesman for Tom.com, Tu Jianglu, denied any violations. "As a big company we respect copyright and property rights," he said. "I can only say that there are other facts that make this more complicated."

The Beijing News declined to comment on the lawsuit.

Until recently, China's laws have generally been anything but clear on intellectual property, and have made it difficult to win a suit over an alleged infringement. Such an environment may have served China's needs earlier in its industrial takeoff, when its industries were straining to catch up with the West.

The battle in the news media reflects part of a shift in the intellectual property landscape as China's growing place in world trade has brought strong new pressures to rein in wholesale piracy. Many of the country's largest Internet companies, for example, are listed on foreign stock exchanges, making them liable for lawsuits filed abroad.

Zhang Xin, a spokesman for Sohu.com, a leading portal, said, "We've signed agreements with over 1,000 traditional news organizations in China, which means that if we use their articles or reports, we definitely have reached prior agreement with them."

An awareness also seems to be taking hold here that Chinese companies must build strong brands of their own to succeed and that they cannot do so in an environment where copying goes unpunished.

"To enhance the country's development we are trying to encourage innovation," said Xu Chao, vice director of the National Copyright Bureau, a government agency. "We are placing more emphasis on intellectual property, and have made improvements in the law. It used to be possible for traditional media or Internet media to simply copy each other's work, but now this has been forbidden."

White Farmers Given Leases In Zimbabwe (WP)

By Craig Timberg, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

19 Grants Signal Modification Of Divisive Land Reform Policy

DOJ_NMG_0113868

JOHANNESBURG, Jan. 5 -- Zimbabwe has granted long-term leases to 19 white farmers in a step toward allowing as many as 1,000 white-owned commercial farms to resume operating legally after years of land seizures, a top government adviser said.

The issuing of the leases is the latest indication that Zimbabwe is pulling back from the harshest elements of a seven-year-old land reform program that has devastated its once-thriving agricultural sector and helped push the annual inflation rate over 1,000 percent, the highest in the world.

The adviser, Sam Moyo of the African Institute for Agrarian Studies in Harare, the capital, said the government is not abandoning an effort that has given farms to tens of thousands of landless black peasants. But he said it is now clear that Zimbabwe has sufficient fertile land to also allocate modest plots to most of the white farmers who remain.

"There's enough land to accommodate a thousand white farmers," Moyo said from Harare. He outlined the plan in Thursday's editions of Britain's Guardian newspaper.

Many white farmers have rejected the move as a desperate bid to revive the country's economy without restoring their property rights. The new leases are for 99 years but include conditions that would allow government officials to easily revoke them, and the leases can be bought and sold only with the approval of the government.

Farmers say that few banks will lend the capital necessary to restart major commercial operations without legally recognized, transferable deeds.

"They don't seem to be serious," said Trevor Gifford, vice president of Zimbabwe's Commercial Farmers Union, speaking from the eastern border city of Mutare. "Those 99-year leases they've issued are not worth the paper they're printed on."

Gifford was once a prominent promoter of the government's on-again, off-again effort to allow some white farmers to legally return to their land. But his public optimism about the government's intentions dimmed in May after his 600-acre farm was taken over. Ten families now inhabit the farm, and commercial cultivation has halted there, he said.

"It's very obvious the government is not interested in production, or even protecting the existing businesses," Gifford said Friday.

Land has long been an emotional, politically explosive issue in Zimbabwe, a southern African country of 12.2 million people that was once the region's breadbasket, producing lucrative surpluses of corn and tobacco.

Before the land invasions began in 2000, an estimated 4,500 white families owned most of the fertile land in a country whose citizens were overwhelmingly landless blacks. The average size of commercial farms in that era, Moyo said, was nearly 5,000 acres.

President Robert Mugabe, in power since the end of white-minority rule in 1980, backed the land invasions, which were spearheaded by self-proclaimed veterans of the guerrilla movement he once led.

Land redistribution, however chaotic and violent, was popular in some areas, but many of the new owners -- including some members of Zimbabwe's business and political elite -- lacked the expertise to run large-scale farms. Agricultural output collapsed, as did a national economy long dependent on farm exports. Zimbabwe, meanwhile, became a chronic recipient of massive international food aid.

Most of the white farmers have fled -- in some cases starting new agricultural ventures in Zambia, Mozambique or Nigeria -- or left the business.

Moyo estimated that 600 white farmers continue to work in Zimbabwe, though many of them on plots one-tenth their previous size, and said that 300 or 400 former farmers would like to return to work. The Commercial Farmers Union gives similar estimates, saying that nearly 1,000 current and former white farmers have applied for long-term leases from the government.

Among the contentious issues remaining is whether white farmers must surrender the deeds to their land to qualify for new leases. Many have locked them away in safes or in bank deposit boxes in other countries, with the intention of waging legal battles to reclaim the property when Mugabe is no longer president.

Moyo said that he did not expect that white farmers would have to relinquish their deeds but that the documents have been made void by a 2005 constitutional change nationalizing all property in Zimbabwe.

Government officials have for the past year made contradictory statements about the nature and extent of their plans to issue long-term leases to white farmers.

Moyo said the debate has often been confused by semantic distinctions, with the government seeing the new leases as an extension of the land reform program rather than a reversal of policy.

"What they are against is having oversized white farms, or too many white farms," he said.

Ties To Communist Secret Police Snare Polish Bishop (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

DOJ_NMG_0113869

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 5 — Warsaw's new archbishop, Stanislaw W. Wielgus, caught in Eastern Europe's widening witch hunt for former Communist secret police informers, admitted Friday that he had collaborated with the Sluzba Bezpieczenstwa, or Security Service, known as the S.B.

"Before you today, I confess to the mistake committed by me years ago, just as I have confessed to the Holy Father," Bishop Wielgus said in an open letter to Polish Catholics. "By the fact of this entanglement, I have damaged the church."

He said he compounded that damage by denying "facts of this cooperation" in recent days.

Bishop Wielgus insisted, however, that he had neither spied on anyone nor harmed anyone. He said the only thing he ever did was to inform the secret police of his agenda during foreign academic meetings and to promise not to take part in anti-Communist activities.

He said it was up to Pope Benedict XVI to decide whether he would keep his new job, which he took up Friday.

The bishop is to be officially elevated to archbishop during a ceremony on Sunday in Warsaw at St. John's Cathedral, though many voices in Poland have called for him to step down.

The Warsaw archbishopric is a particularly symbolic institution in the former Soviet bloc. The Polish church, together with the Polish-born Pope John Paul II, were crucial supporters of the pro-democracy Solidarity movement, which helped bring down the totalitarian system and end the cold war.

Confirmation that the archbishop collaborated is doubly troubling because the Polish secret police murdered a charismatic anti-Communist priest from the archdiocese, the Rev. Jerzy Popieluszko, in 1984. Warsaw's departing archbishop, Cardinal Jozef Glemp, waged a quiet battle with the Communist Party in those years.

Many historians argue that a significant segment of the clergy in Poland and other Eastern bloc countries collaborated to varying degrees with the secret services. Priests have recently been added to those segments of society under scrutiny in several countries during recent efforts to expose former Communist collaborators.

Two years ago, files surfaced showing that the Rev. Mieczyslaw Malinski, who had been close to John Paul II, worked for the S.B. in the 1980s. Several other prominent priests have since been accused of having been informers, and some have admitted that they had links to the secret police. The Polish church publicly apologized last year for priests who collaborated with the S.B., but has tried to keep their names secret.

The uproar over Bishop Wielgus's past began shortly after Pope Benedict picked him in early December to succeed Cardinal Glemp as Warsaw's archbishop. A Polish daily newspaper, Gazeta Polska, reported Dec. 20 that the bishop, 67, had spied on dissidents and fellow clerics for more than two decades, until Communism collapsed in 1989.

Both Bishop Wielgus and the Vatican sought to deflect the accusations by saying his involvement with the secret police had been nothing out of the ordinary for people traveling abroad during the Communist era. Leading representatives of the Polish clergy denounced the accusations against him.

But Poland's human rights ombudsman, Janusz Kochanowski, said Thursday that there was evidence in the secret police archives that Bishop Wielgus had knowingly cooperated with Communist authorities. Rzeczpospolita, one of Poland's most respected newspapers, published documents showing that he had met with police agents more than 50 times in one five-year period.

Even Poland's Catholic Church Historical Commission issued a statement on Friday, saying, "There are numerous, substantial documents confirming Stanislaw Wielgus's willingness for a conscious and secret cooperation with the Communist security forces."

The commission said that there was no evidence that Bishop Wielgus's actions harmed anyone, and that the documents would be sent to the Vatican for further study.

Monsignor Wielgus first admitted Friday that he had signed a cooperation statement with the secret police in 1978 under pressure by a "brutal intelligence officer" when he was seeking permission to travel to Munich. "That was my moment of weakness," he wrote.

But he accused the secret police of falsifying documents that cast him as a more eager, useful collaborator than he actually was.

"The personality ascribed to me in the intelligence service documents is so far from the truth that I would never have recognized myself," he wrote.

Those claims are not far-fetched. Almost from the moment the Iron Curtain fell, the nations of the former Communist bloc have been steeped in controversies over the files of their secret police forces. The documents are often elliptical and incomplete, and were sometimes embellished by secret police officers eager to impress their superiors, experts say.

DOJ_NMG_0113870

The documents published by Rzeczpospolita and other newspapers suggest that Bishop Wielgus was recruited by the S.B. in 1967 when he was a philosophy student at the University of Lublin in eastern Poland, more than a decade before he signed the cooperation agreement. Newspapers cited other documents in which the S.B. claimed he had given them information about activities at the university, where he later served as a professor of medieval philosophy.

The newspapers claimed that some documents referred to Bishop Wielgus by the code names Grey, Adam and Adam Wysocki. They said he received training and was rewarded for his collaboration with a grant to study in Munich.

Later Friday, Bishop Wielgus issued another statement, which was broadcast by Vatican Radio's Polish service, in which he said he had collaborated so that he could travel abroad for his academic research.

"I'm not trying to justify anything, I know that I shouldn't have had any relations with the Communist regime's secret services," he said. "At the time I thought I had to continue my important scientific research and acquire sound training for the good of the church."

The Vatican has continued to support the embattled prelate.

"The Holy See, in deciding the nomination of the new archbishop of Warsaw, took into consideration all the circumstances of his life, including those regarding his past," the Vatican said in a statement on Friday, repeating the position it has taken for the past month.

The statement said Benedict "has every confidence in Bishop Stanislaw Wielgus and in full conscience entrusted him the mission of pastor of the archdiocese of Warsaw."

Polish Archbishop Admits Signing Communist Pact (WP/AP)

By Vanessa Gera, Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Cleric Allegedly Cooperated With Secret Police

WARSAW, Jan. 5 -- After calls for him to step aside, Warsaw's incoming Roman Catholic archbishop admitted Friday that he had signed an agreement to cooperate with the secret police during the Communist era and said he was leaving his fate in the hands of Pope Benedict XVI.

Archbishop Stanislaw Wielgus, whose installation ceremony is scheduled for Sunday, expressed regret for an act that he acknowledged "harmed the church." He said that despite signing the document, he "never informed on anyone and never tried to hurt anyone."

"Before you today, I confess to the mistake committed by me years ago, just as I have confessed to the Holy Father," Wielgus said in an open letter to Poland's Roman Catholic clergy and believers.

The mounting allegations against Wielgus have gripped the heavily Roman Catholic country, where the church is esteemed for its opposition to the former Communist government. People widely revere the late Polish-born Pope John Paul II, who is credited by some with hastening the fall of the Communist system.

The scandal grew after church officials said Friday that documents at a historical institute indicated Wielgus had willingly collaborated. A church commission said documents "confirm Rev. Stanislaw Wielgus's willingness for conscious and secret cooperation with the security organs of Communist Poland." The statement added, however, that there is no proof that he "inflicted any harm on anyone."

Newspapers on Friday devoted their front pages to the revelations. A government commission also concluded he had collaborated.

The allegations surfaced in the right-wing Gazeta Polska weekly, two weeks after the Vatican appointed Wielgus archbishop of Warsaw. He initially denied any collaboration.

In a statement Friday, Wielgus acknowledged that he had contact with the secret service, but he said documents indicating he collaborated were written by the secret police and reflected their account of events, not the truth.

Wielgus, who has been bishop of Plock since 1999, said he was leaving his fate in the hands of the pope: "With full humility, I declare to the Holy Father that I will submit to each of his decisions."

Wielgus is the latest in a series of church and public figures in Poland to face allegations of collaboration with the secret police before Communist rule ended in 1989.

In his statement, Wielgus acknowledged signing a declaration of cooperation in 1978 when seeking permission to travel to Munich because he was threatened by "a very brutal" secret police agent. "That was my moment of weakness," he wrote, insisting that he never cooperated with the secret police.

DOJ_NMG_0113871

He also said many statements about him in the police documents are wrong, including that he spoke Spanish or had publications abroad. "The characterization of me in the secret police material differs so much from the truth, that I would not recognize myself on their basis if it were anonymous," he said.

During a visit to Warsaw in May 2006, Benedict cautioned against passing judgment on people who lived in different times, remarks that came in the wake of similar allegations against a Polish priest.

"We must guard against the arrogant claim of setting ourselves up to judge earlier generations who lived in different times and in different circumstances," Benedict told clergy. His comments were met with applause.

Chavez Denounced For Canceling TV License (LAT)

By Chris Kraul, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

The OAS says the president's decision to shut down Venezuela's oldest network appears to be censorship.

BOGOTA, COLOMBIA — Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's decision not to renew the license of his nation's largest and oldest television network, a frequent critic of his policies, drew a rebuke Friday from the Organization of American States.

OAS Secretary-General Jose Miguel Insulza said in a statement that Chavez acted in an arbitrary manner in yanking the license of RCTV, which began operations in 1953 and has the largest viewership of any network in Venezuela.

"The closing of a mass communications outlet is a rare step in the history of our hemisphere and has no precedent in the recent decades of democracy," Insulza wrote, adding he hoped "this decision will be revised."

Chavez's "adoption of an administrative measure to close a news outlet gives the appearance of a form of censorship against freedom of expression and at the same time serves as a warning against other news organizations leading them to limit their actions at the risk of facing the same fate," Insulza said in the statement.

The OAS objection follows similar condemnations by news media freedom groups, including Reporters Without Borders and the Inter-American Press Assn.

Chavez announced the decision Dec. 28 at a military academy in Caracas, saying RCTV owners would have to "pack your bags, turn out the lights."

He accused the network of promoting the coup in April 2002 that briefly knocked him from power, and of committing unspecified ethical lapses. The Ministry of Communications and Information later specified that the license would not be renewed when it expired in May.

In a radio interview Thursday, Chavez, who was reelected last month in a landslide, said the decision was "irrevocable" and was made because RCTV "didn't pass the test to receive a renewal of a concession from a state that is serious, responsible, committed and respectful of the people."

RCTV General Manager Marcel Granier denied that his network had promoted the coup and merely covered it as a news event. He said in an interview that the network executives had not been presented with a formal notice or complaint that they could contest in court or at a public hearing.

"The only coup plotter is Chavez, who as everyone knows tried to overthrow the government in 1992, years before he was elected," Granier said. "We have a democratic tradition and we have been a model of that tradition.

"Not renewing our license is like President Bush one day announcing that NBC is going off the air because it was involved in a conspiracy against the United States," Granier said.

Orlando Ochoa, a risk analyst and economic consultant in Caracas, said that shutting down the nation's most popular TV network would "increase social polarization and destroy harmony at a time when Chavez has such a mandate to fight crime, inflation and eliminate corruption."

"Yes, RCTV had a critical attitude toward Chavez during the attempted coup more than four years ago, but so did all of the other big stations in Venezuela," Ochoa said. "The difference is that others have become more bland while RCTV maintains its attitude."

RCTV is a privately owned company whose largest shareholders are the Bottome and Phelps families. The network produces news and prime time programming, including 1,000 hours of telenovelas, or soap operas, each year. It owns 40 radio and television stations across Venezuela.

Granier said RCTV had "earned a place in Venezuelan society and we want to continue working as we have done." Asked whether the owners would sell if appeals failed, Granier said the market might be limited.

"Who is going to want to buy such a business in a country where there is a president in a military uniform saying which media can exist and which can't?" Granier said. "People want to invest in a country where there is rule of law."

DOJ_NMG_0113872

Menem Preaches His Free Market Gospel (FT)

By Jude Webber

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

Carlos Menem polarises Argentines like few other politicians. His economic policies during a corruption-tainted government in the 1990s are blamed by many for sowing the seeds of the calamitous debt crisis that erupted five years ago, but a quarter of voters were still prepared to have him back in the past elections – and he is betting more will give him another chance now.

The former president, now 76, is bidding for his third term in office in elections next October, preaching a return to the free-market gospel he says will restore to Argentines their lost prosperity and put an end to President Néstor Kirchner's "out-of-control populism".

"I think I have a very good chance...I wouldn't be here otherwise," he told the Financial Times from his spacious office in the Hotel Presidente, his pied-á-terre in Buenos Aires.

Mr Menem scored a slim first-round lead over Mr Kirchner in the 2003 elections but pulled out of a runoff when it became clear he was heading for a "suicidal" defeat. That will not happen this time, unless pending charges over allegedly irregular arms sales thwart his plans.

"I'm determined to run. I won't withdraw," he vowed.

Argentina has been through the mill since Mr Menem left office in 1999, but he denies his policy of shackling the peso to the dollar caused the economy to implode and describes himself as "an angel" compared with the current government. Dollar parity made Argentines wealthy and stabilised an economy ravaged by inflation of 100 per cent a month at the start of Mr Menem's term in 1989. But foreign debt ballooned and the currency peg crumbled, sparking the biggest debt default in history, deadly street riots and the spectacle of five presidents in a fortnight in 2001-02.

Of the one-to-one exchange rate, Mr Menem said: "It worked very well...it made Argentina grow and the poverty rate was below what we have now." Indeed, he would consider bringing it back: "We'd have to see what state the country is in a year from now," he said. "I don't rule it out. Everyone is demanding it."

Mr Menem pledged an immediate end to what he called Mr Kirchner's "economic terrorism". He said was causing "an explosive social situation" in which a third of the population is below the poverty line and 16 per cent indigent, despite growth expected to be nearly 9 per cent this year, for a fourth straight year.

He vowed to scrap the price controls that Mr Kirchner introduced to try to rein in inflation, now running at 10 per cent; to abolish a freeze on energy tariffs that companies blame for a failure to invest to improve infrastructure or boost dwindling oil and gas reserves; to do away with "distortive" export tariffs and taxes on bank transactions; and to rein in runaway provincial budgets.

He had no quick fix for inflation, promising only that prices would realign themselves in a market economy. Untied from price controls and encouraged by a renewed government commitment to privatisation, companies would also be able to boost salaries, Mr Menem said, reckoning on a minimum wage of about $650 (€500, £337) a month, triple the current level.

Unlike Mr Kirchner, Mr Menem offered hope to the holders of $20m in defaulted Argentine debt who are suing for full reimbursement after they turned down the government's offer of a 70 per cent write-down. "I'd try to reach a deal," he said, without giving details. "The only way of fixing this is directly between the Argentine government and the creditors...And when I say fixing it, you don't fix things with words but with cash."

Mr Menem brushes off criticism of his government's scandals, lingering corruption allegations he calls "total infamy" and recent health problems, claiming to have up to 15 per cent support already.

But after controversial former leaders in Peru and Nicaragua were voted back to power in the past year, Mr Menem says simply: "Why not me?"

Kirchner Critic Seeks Argentine Presidency (FT)

By Benedict Mander

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

Roberto Lavagna, the former economy minister who is widely credited with engineering Argentina's rapid economic recovery since its collapse in 2001, has announced that he will run for president in elections due in October.

Mr Lavagna, who was sacked from the cabinet in November 2005 because of disagreements with President Néstor Kirchner, has criticised the government's "shift to the left" in the past year. He also warned of increasing signs of authoritarianism and an economic policy that deters foreign investment.

By challenging the presidency, Mr Lavagna has ended months of speculation, although the centre-left Mr Kirchner has yet to make clear if he will seek re-election. Mr Kirchner's high approval ratings, which some pollsters put above 70 per cent, mean that he is widely expected to win the elections. If he does not run, it is likely that he will be replaced by his wife, Cristina Fernández, an influential senator who would also be expected to win.

DOJ_NMG_0113873

It remains to be seen whether the weak and fragmented opposition will unite behind Mr Lavagna against the formidable popularity of the government. Mr Lavagna told the daily La Nación that "it would be a mistake" to have several opposition candidates.

Without a united opposition, Mr Lavagna stands little chance of winning, says Sergio Berensztein, a political analyst based in Buenos Aires.

A key ally for Mr Lavagna, who claims to represent the "progressive centre", would be the main centre-right candidate, Mauricio Macri, who owns Boca Juniors football club. They have been in talks for several months, although Mr Macri reacted coolly to Mr Lavagna's announcement on Friday.

"If Lavagna and Macri run separately that will basically assure the president a victory in the first round of voting," said Mr Berensztein. If they pooled resources they might be able to push the elections to a second round of voting, which would be held if the winner gets less than 45 per cent of the vote without a 10-point lead. "The only way the opposition has a chance is with a solid coalition."

According to a recent poll by Graciela Römer, if there were elections now Mr Kirchner would win with 55 per cent of the vote, while his wife would get 39 per cent. Against Mr Kirchner, Mr Macri would come second with 11.8 per cent, while Mr Lavagna and Elisa Carrió, a centre-left candidate, would both receive more than 5 per cent.

In The Global Energy Rush, Nuclear Gets A Resurgence (WP)

By Doug Struck, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Sixty miles outside Buenos Aires, construction crews soon will be swarming over a partially built concrete dome abandoned 12 years ago, resuming work on Argentina's long-delayed Atucha II nuclear power plant. They will be in the vanguard of surging interest in nuclear power worldwide.

Faced with evidence that coal- and oil-fired electric plants are overheating the planet, and alarmed by soaring demand for electricity, governments from South America to Asia are turning once again to a power source mostly shunned for two decades as too dangerous and too costly.

Globally, 29 nuclear power plants are being built. Well over 100 more have been written into the development plans of governments for the next three decades. India and China each are rushing to build dozens of reactors. The United States and the countries of Western Europe, led by new nuclear champions, are reconsidering their cooled romance with atomic power. International agencies have come on board; even the Persian Gulf oil states have announced plans for nuclear generators.

"Energy and climate changes can't remain tied to carbon or hydrocarbon," the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, said in October. "They are polluting, and we'll have to find substitute energies, including nuclear energy." It creates heat through nuclear reactions rather than combustion, giving off no carbon dioxide, the most important of the so-called greenhouse gases that trap heat in the Earth's atmosphere.

Utilities are dusting off plans for nuclear plants even though most of the problems that shelved those projects remain. Critics say governments have forgotten the crises of Three Mile Island and Chernobyl. The costs and time to build the concrete-encased plants far exceed those of conventional plants. There still is no safe permanent storage for the used fuel that will remain radioactive for a million years. Added to these problems are the newly realistic worry of a terrorist attack on a nuclear plant.

"It can be very controversial," Mexican Congressman David Maldonado said of his country's plans to build a $4 billion nuclear plant in Veracruz. "The things that have happened in years past, going back to Chernobyl, have created a lot of fear here."

In the United States, the Bush administration has strongly pushed nuclear power and backed a 2005 energy bill offering subsidies to utilities to go ahead with projects in a shortened, streamlined regulatory process. The industry talks enthusiastically of 10 to 30 new nuclear plants being started in the next two decades.

Critics say those predictions will stall without long-term subsidies, and they scoff at the administration's explanations that nuclear plants will help battle global warming and reduce dependence on foreign oil. "The Bush administration doesn't believe climate change is a threat unless it is arguing for nuclear power," said Edwin Lyman, a senior staff scientist at the Union of Concerned Scientists in Washington.

Skeptics contend that the nuclear resurgence is still just talk. In the United States, they note, not a single reactor has been ordered. The high costs and long delays that vexed nuclear construction -- Argentina's Atucha II was 14 years in construction before it was halted -- soon will diminish the atomic ardor in other countries, they say.

DOJ_NMG_0113874

"Even with all the respective subsidies, nuclear power plants are still too expensive," Lyman said. "We need to move faster to really take a bite out of greenhouse emissions, and there aren't any scenarios in which nuclear power can do that."

At present, 442 nuclear plants are operating in more than 31 countries, according to the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna. The United States has the most -- 103, which provide about 19.3 percent of the country's electric power. Next is France, with 59, and Japan, with 55. Worldwide, atomic energy accounts for 16 percent of electrical production; the vast majority of electricity is generated by burning coal, oil and natural gas.

But carbon emissions from conventional plants bring "higher global temperatures, rising sea levels that would threaten to submerge coastal regions, prolonged droughts and more frequent violent storms," IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei warned in Jakarta, Indonesia, in December.

The world's energy needs will rise 51 percent by 2030 because of industrialization and population growth, the International Energy Agency in Paris predicts. Add up the carbon-dioxide emissions from all the oil and coal plants that would be built to meet that need, and scientists see an environmental nightmare in the making.

Natural gas is a cleaner fuel for making electricity, but the price has soared. Hydropower from dams has largely topped out at less than 20 percent of the world's electric supply. Alternatives such as solar, thermal and wind power remain a tiny contributor in most countries and would require dramatic economic changes to become substantial sources. To many policymakers, that leaves nuclear.

In Britain, such calculations led to a striking reversal in policy. In 2003, a government white paper called nuclear power an unattractive option; in May, Prime Minister Tony Blair declared that nuclear power is "back on the agenda with a vengeance."

Blair argued that the technology is a way to ensure British energy security in an unstable world and to combat global climate change -- a top priority of his government. Twenty-three nuclear plants now provide almost 20 percent of the United Kingdom's power, and Blair has called for a new mix of non-polluting sources, including nuclear plants and renewable alternatives.

"In the future, energy security will be almost as important as defense," Blair said in October.

Similar jitters about the reliability -- and price -- of traditional fuels are adding to the rush to nuclear. Japan, as host to the 1997 Kyoto conference that mandated a global reduction in greenhouse gases, is building three and planning 10 more nuclear plants in the next decade. Its plans are spurred by Japan's wariness over neighboring China's campaign to lock up oil and gas supply contracts with foreign countries.

"The timing of Kyoto Protocol coming into effect and the timing of China endeavoring in its mission to secure natural resources in the world coincide," said Tadao Yanase, director of nuclear energy policy at Japan's Agency for Natural Resources and Energy.

China's plans call for 15 to 30 new nuclear plants by 2020 and even more conventional plants, most of them coal-fired. Its researchers are working on creating smaller, less-expensive nuclear plants. India, with 16 nuclear plants, is building seven more plants and has been promised U.S. help to triple its collection by 2020.

Some nuclear construction will merely keep the status quo. The first big wave of nuclear plants, built in the 1970s and 1980s, are near their planned obsolescence; six have been shut down. Regulators in the United States have extended licenses to 60 years, but other countries are replacing aging plants to make sure the nuclear component of their base supply does not disappear.

Proliferation of nuclear material remains a worry. And another disaster like the Soviet Union's at Chernobyl in 1986 or a near-disaster like that at Pennsylvania's Three Mile Island in 1979 would likely freeze the plans for nuclear construction.

"The industry is sticking its head in the sand," said Jim Riccio, a policy analyst at anti-nuclear Greenpeace in Washington. "They haven't gotten close to addressing safety or security."

Because nuclear fission emits no greenhouse gases, some environmental groups have grudgingly concluded that nuclear power is preferable to global warming. Others still argue that aggressive conservation and a dramatic increase in solar, wind, thermal and biofueled production can meet future electric needs.

"The voices of opposition have drastically decreased," Yanase said in his office in Tokyo. "They obviously won't say they totally support" nuclear power, "but they are giving a tacit consent."

Industry advocates say the old complaints about nuclear technology have been addressed with simpler and cheaper designs, faster regulatory review, improved security and more operating experience.

"Things have changed," said Adrian Heymer, director of new plant deployment for the Nuclear Energy Institute in Washington. The industry expects U.S. companies to apply for 11 construction permits by the end of the decade. "When you put it all together, nuclear becomes an attractive package," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0113875

Companies and countries that build nuclear plants are riding that pitch. Westinghouse Electric Co., which has made about half the world's reactors, signed a deal with China in December to help in construction of four nuclear plants there.

"There is a lot of opportunity now -- in Southeast Asia, in the Near East and Europe," Valery Arabkin, an official at Rosenergoatom, the Russian entity that competes with Westinghouse, said in an interview in Moscow. "These are good markets for Russia."

Russia is building two reactors in China, two in India and one in Iran. It just signed a $5.1 billion deal to build two reactors in Bulgaria and is sniffing out business in Finland, Indonesia and Egypt.

Russia's own nuclear industry is rebounding after years of neglect. President Vladimir Putin wants to sell the country's natural gas abroad and offset the exported energy by increasing nuclear power production, now provided by 31 reactors. That involves an ambitious program to build 42 more reactors in Russia by 2030, Sergey Kiriyenko, director of the Federal Nuclear Agency, or Rosatom, said in testimony before parliament last month.

"I don't think it can be done," said Vladimir Slivyak, co-chairman of Ecodefense, which has been urging the government to use more of the country's natural gas at home and develop wind and hydropower.

Critics say that when the emissions from uranium mining and plant construction are counted, nuclear power is not "carbon-free," as advocates assert. Such environmental concerns have put Germany on an opposite course from most European countries. Six years ago, Germany committed to shutting down all of its 17 nuclear power plants by 2021, prodded by the Greens party, then part of the government.

The most populous country in Western Europe, Germany will be hard-pressed to compensate for loss of its nuclear power while also meeting promises to reduce greenhouse gas emissions and cut back on gas and oil deliveries from its chief supplier, Russia. Some people are calling for an extension of the nuclear deadline.

But nuclear power remains unpopular among Germans, who often express strong pride over the giant windmills that are an increasingly common sight on the country's plains.

"There really is no support in Germany to rely on nuclear energy as a means to help get rid of fossil fuels," Reinhard Buetikofer, co-chairman of the Greens, said in an interview. "We would have to build another 50 to 60 nuclear power plants in Germany. This is unthinkable."

The EU's Ugly Little Challenge (LAT)

By Colum McCann

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

Adding Bulgaria and Romania may force it to confront a reflexive hatred of Gypsies.

ON NEW YEAR'S day, the European Union swelled by another 28 million people. The inclusion of Romania and Bulgaria in the European fold is cause for celebration in the streets of Bucharest and the courtyards of Sofia. For two of Europe's poorer countries, inclusion in the EU brings innumerable benefits, not the least roads, recognition, grants, travel access and a sundering of the Soviet past.

Yet for many Europeans — in Paris, in Dublin, in Brussels and perhaps even in Bucharest and Sofia — it spells the inclusion of 3 million potential problems: yet more Gypsies.

In a week that also heralds 2007 as "The European Year of Equal Opportunities for All," the word "Gypsy" still holds negative freight, even among those to whom it applies: the Roma. With ethnic and cultural roots stretching back to ancient India, the Roma are a diaspora community to rival the Irish and the Jews. Nonterritorial, they number anywhere from 12 million to 14 million worldwide, of whom roughly 10 million are found in Europe.

Yet European newspaper editors are stumped by how they should address the largest minority on the continent. Town mayors all over Eastern Europe often avoid the term altogether and talk instead of "whitening out" their inner cities.

If a society recognizes itself, and ultimately critiques itself, on how it treats its most downtrodden, then surely the acid test for the EU is its ongoing treatment of the Roma. They can be found living in the housing projects of Paris, the toxic dumps in Kosovo, the ruined outskirts of villages in eastern Slovakia, the warren of backstreets in old Polish towns and the gray flatlands of Dublin. Each place has its own — sometimes tiny — community. But when taken together, these groups form a giant cultural mosaic, one that leans overwhelmingly toward poverty.

There are, of course, Romani doctors, psychologists, poets and scholars who have called for a new era of consciousness. They point to Romani contributions to the world of arts, politics and music by figures of Gypsy descent as diverse as Pablo Picasso, Django Reinhardt, Bob Hoskins, Charlie Chaplin, flamenco legend Carmen Amaya and even President Clinton.

But the old cliches of lying, cheating, stealing and breaking curfew with violin endure.

DOJ_NMG_0113876

"The persistent, relentless portrayal of Roma as rootless, lawless, immoral, childlike thieves … will ensure that anti-Gypsy prejudice will remain firmly a part of Euro-American attitudes," says Ian Hancock, a Romani scholar at the University of Texas.

In Bratislava one afternoon — while I was researching the situation of the Roma in Slovakia — a young intellectual engaged me in a debate on civil rights in the U.S. He knew of Martin Luther King Jr., of Stokely Carmichael, even the poetry of Daniel Berrigan. He was a staunch and eloquent defender of the marginalized, but when I asked him about contemporary issues of sterilization, school discrimination and burnings of Romani houses in his own country, he said without rancor: "Of course, yes, but they're just Gypsies." Malice is sometimes another name for silence.

The young girl paddling through the polluted streambed in Kosovo isn't likely to have heard of the "Year of Equal Opportunities." The boy huffing glue in the broken elevator of the Saint-Denis project is probably not aware that the decade from 2005 to 2015 is supposed to be "The Decade of Roma Inclusion."

It is important, of course, not to turn any culture into a list of sorrows and benedictions. The Roma themselves have a deep ambivalence about their identity. Although they are as internally diverse as any other group, it's the roving gangs, the scams, the illiteracy, the violence — and the silence — that often get the headlines.

"If I were a Chechen or a Palestinian, I'd be out there throwing rocks," one activist told me in Hungary. "When you don't have a voice, you sing into the bottle."

Scholars such as Ian Hancock have called on governments, poets, journalists, activists and the general public to remember that the Roma, like African Americans, were enslaved in Central Europe only 150 years ago. The Holocaust sent Gypsy ash up the chimneys. This, and other bedrock history, is the story that must unfold into a larger understanding if, this week, the 3 million Roma from Bulgaria and Romania are not to be considered "just Gypsies."

"The struggle of man against power is the struggle of memory against forgetting," says Czech novelist Milan Kundera.

The European call for inclusion is decent and right. The politicians and bureaucrats behind the sound bites mean well. Why not be in the habit of hoping for a better world?

Yet so much about Romani history is still wrapped up in a willful forgetfulness. It is not that Europe or America doesn't care — dozens of conferences and nongovernmental agencies confront "the Roma question" in capital cities each year, and 2007 promises to be a bonus year — but the prevailing attitude still echoes the old Slovakian joke: "What is small, dark, filthy and knocking on the door?" The answer is not just the future, but the past as well.

COLUM MCCANN's new novel, "Zoli," will be published Tuesday by Random House.

With Friends Like These... (WSJ)

By Fania Oz-Salzberger

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

An Israeli gal like me cannot afford to be too picky about her friends, certainly not in Europe. Recent European polls proclaimed Israel the single most dangerous country on earth, the guiltiest monger of global conflict, and, to crown it all, the least desirable place to live. Most Israelis, busy with their thriving economy under a warm Mediterranean sun, tend to forgive such pronouncements coming from dismal Düsseldorf and snowbound Stockholm. But a new challenge has now cropped up. We seem to have gained new European friends, and not quite for the right reasons.

These new pro-Israel voices base a love of Jews upon the hatred of Muslims. Last September the European Coalition for Israel convened in Brussels, its most prominent speakers lamenting the loss of European Jewry alongside the rise of European Islam. The tone was belligerent, the linkage crude: "The enemies of Israel are also a threat to Europe," delegates were told. And also: "In only two generations, most parts of Europe will be under Islamic law." Other self-declared friends grimly speak of Londonistan and augur the coming of the European Caliphate. Such statements may reflect genuine concern, but are disconcerting when made on European soil.

Unlike the late Oriana Fallaci, whose commitment to the Jews stemmed from her heroic anti-Fascist youth, and whose harsh critique of Islam came from an enraged liberal soul, many of these new friends are Muslim-bashers first and Israel-backers second. Their blanket condemnation of Muslim communities on their continent rings eerily familiar. Their sweeping verdict against a whole civilization has that strange déjà-vu feel. And their rather sudden nostalgia for Europe's lost Jews is, I'm sorry to say, far too late and somewhat suspect. As the Mishna wisely warns, "Any love that depends upon some thing, when that thing is no more, the love is no more." You see, we have a very long experience with human relationships.

I, for one Israeli, would be grateful to my newfound buddies if their sympathy for me did not rely on the trashing of another religion. Unlike them, I'm touched by the sight of young Muslim women in European university campuses. They remind my of my own grandmother, a student in Prague who had to flee after the Nazi rise to power, and of all the other young and hopeful Jews whose dreams and lives were shattered by the European culture they so admired. I will therefore not solicit support based on unqualified dislike of other human groups, least of all on the continent that kicked out my grandparents.

DOJ_NMG_0113877

To be sure, Israelis could use more friends in Europe: sober, reliable, critical friends. And Europeans who care to look find some of their own best ideas well-implemented in Israel, from the rule of law to the bright application of technology for human well-being. They can trace their own literary, artistic and musical traditions flourishing among the country's diverse cultural origins. Most important, they may realize that gaining Israel's ear can yield political fruit and bring Europe closer to Middle Eastern peacemaking: Ask the German government, whose sensitive involvement in the aftermath of the second Lebanon war makes good footing for future diplomacy.

Jewish people have a long memory, whereas the European Union often seems short of the asset. It may be our role to remind today's Europeans of the medieval past, the great centuries when Islam was young, tolerant to minorities and philosophically minded. There would be no Maimonides, no glorious Sephardi Jewish tradition, without the Arab world. Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad may be threatening the existence of Israel today, but no Muslim power has ever dealt the Jews such calamities as brought upon them by Europe.

Israelis probably deserve a better European opinion, warranted by our history, culture, science and freedom. Not for being the targeted foes of Islam. Beware of Islamophobes bearing gifts.

Ms. Oz-Salzberger is director of the Posen Research Forum for Political Thought and senior lecturer at the Faculty of Law and School of History at the University of Haifa.

DOJ_NMG_0113878

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Judge Grants Delay In Mental Exam For Padilla (AP) 4

Homeland Response:

Spy Pick: Low-key But "Rock Solid" (LAT) 4
Bush Names New Spy Chief With Iraq Speech Looming (AFP) ... 5
Profile: Michael McConnell (BBC)..... 6
DHS To Boost 6 Cities' Share Of Anti-Terror Funds (WP) 7
New York, New Jersey To Split Security Funds (NSDY) 8
Federal Funds May Now Pay Police Salaries In Terror Fight (NYT) 8
Area In Highest Tier Of Terror Funding (HC)..... 9
Democrats Backpedal On 9/11 Commission (WT)..... 10
FBI Probing Death Threat To Muslim (CCT) 11
Sen. Boxer Rescinds Award To Islamic Activist (LAT) 11
Editor's E-Mail May Be Used In Suit Against The Times (NYT) .. 13
N.Y. Times Urges Judge To Dismiss Hatfill Suit (WP) 14
Hatfill Lawyer: Times Editor Warned Columnist On Anthrax Piece (AP)..... 15
Katrina Victims Find A Solution: Modular House (NYT) 15

War News:

Pelosi, Reid Urge Bush To Begin Iraq Pullout (WP)..... 17
Bush Facing A Deep Divide With Democrats Over Talk Of Increasing Troops In Iraq (NYT) 19
Critics Slam Possible Iraq Troop Boost (AP) 20
Reid, Pelosi Rip Iraq Buildup (WT) 22
Reid And Pelosi Warn Bush Against "Surge" (RC) 23
Democrats Blast Bush's Iraq "Surge" Policy (HILL)..... 23
Democrats Step Up Iraq Pressure (BBC)..... 23
Top Democrats Balk At Troop Surge (BOS)..... 24
Senators Back Call For More Troops In Iraq (FT) 25
Troop Surge Can't Be Brief, Backers Insist (LAT) 26
Iraqi Politicians Divided Over U.S. Envoy (WP)..... 28
Zalmay Khalilzad, On To A New Trouble Spot (NYT) 29
Ryan Clark Crocker, A Diplomat Used To Danger (NYT) 30
A New Commander, In Step With The White House On Iraq (NYT) 31
Pace Future In Doubt After Shake-up (WT) 32
Images Of Hanging Make Hussein A Martyr To Many (NYT) 33
Baghdad Initiative To Go Door To Door (AP) 34
American, 2 Iraqi Interpreters Kidnapped (LAT)..... 36
Insurgents Elude Forces In Eastern Iraqi Province (LAT) 36
Death In Haditha (WP)..... 38
Lawmaker: U.S. Catching, Releasing Top Terror Targets (CNN) 41
Army Asks Dead To Sign Up For Another Hitch (AP) 42
How Do You Repay A Hero's Sacrifice? (WSJ)..... 42
With Each Fallen Soldier, A Field Of Flags Grows (NYT) 46
White Small-town America Pays Highest price For Going To War (FT)..... 47
Chirac Says Time Proves France Was Right To Resist War (NYT) 48

Corporate Scandals:

Appeals Court Reverses Convictions Of 2 Westar Energy Executives (AP) 48
Ex-Merrill Lynch Analyst Sentenced In Insider Trading Scheme (AP)..... 49
BANKER SLAMMED (NYPOST)..... 49
Jail For Merrill Analyst In Insider Trading Scam (NYDN) 50
Ex-Merrill Analyst Gets 37 Months In Insider Case (Update4) (BLOOM)..... 51
A Misdated Option Aided ACS's Deason (WSJ) 52
Inside Jobs (WSJ)..... 52

Criminal Law:

News Media Seek Audio Of Libby Trial (AP)..... 53
The Villains Of Currency (WSJ)..... 54
SAN FRANCISCO Challenge To Law On Officer Killings Convicted Man's Attorney Calls It Unconstitutional (SFC) . 55
Documents Give New Details Of SunCruz-linked Bribe To Ex-Ohio Lawmaker (MH)..... 56
DOJ Pushes FBI To Broaden Data Sharing With Outside Agencies (COMPWRLD)..... 57
Ken Wall, Crystal Russo Sentenced In Orange Beach Case (MR) 58
Ex-councilman Pleads Guilty In Orange Beach Corruption Case (AP)..... 59
Pellicano Allowed To Defend Himself (LAT)..... 59
D.C. Police To Target Each Area's Safety Needs Individually (WP)..... 60
Archdiocese Settles Sex Suits (DENP) 62
Just Days Into The Year, Killings Toll Hits 8 In New Orleans (NYT) 62
A Spate Of Killings Opens New Year In New Orleans (WP/AP) . 63

Civil Law:

Supreme Court To Rule On Whistle - Blowing (AP) 64
Former Acute-care Service Settles Suit For $7.5 Million (HC) 65
Judge Clears Delphi Debt Refinance Plan (AP) 66

Civil Rights:

EEOC Says Prosecutor Wrongly Fired (BN) 67
Alleged Jail Beating Spurs Suspensions (CHIT) 67
6 Guards Suspended After Alleged Jail Beating (NWTIMES) 68
Lake County Jail Guards Suspended After Beating (AP) 69
Federal Lawsuit Claims Racial Discrimination In Police Department (WP) 69
Teel Given Copy Of Tape (BSH) 70
Gastonia Man Dies After Police Use Taser To Restrain Him (CO) 71
US Supreme Court Agrees To Hear Coca-Cola's Appeal In A Race Discrimination Case (AP) 71
Questionable Mission (WP) 71

Antitrust:

Brooks Unit Sale Gets Antitrust Scrutiny (BOS) 72
A Buyout Duo Reads Potential In Newspaper (WSJ) 72
Mercy 'no' To Proposal For Joint Hospital (DMR) 73

Environment:

Feds Drop Waste-water Inquiry (HTRIB) 74
6 Ohio Cities Rush To File Suits Against Makers Of Lead Paint (NYT) 75
Bill Would Permanently Bar Drilling In Alaskan Refuge (AP) 75
Drill Ban Sought For Alaskan Park (BBC) 76
DuPont Drops Plan For Nerve Gas Wastewater (NYT) 77
Mercury "Hot Spots" Identified In U.S. And Canada (WP) 78
The Senate's Task On Warming (NYT) 78
The Navy's War On Whales (LAT) 79

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

New Agent Named To Lead FBI's Miss. Operations (BSH) 80
Brink To Become New FBI Chief In Miss. (JCL) 80
Former FBI Top Agent Gets Prison Sentence (ELPT) 80
Former El Paso FBI Chief Sentenced To 6 Months In Prison (DMN/AP) 81
Drug Agents Mishandled Seized Cash, Audit Finds (DCEX) 82
Federal Agencies To Help Fight Violence (FLSUNSEN) 82
FBI Seeks Information On Device At Church Advocate Westside Bureau (BRADV) 83

Immigration:

Troops Flee From Border Outpost (WT) 83
Hockey-Coach Quota (WSJ) 84

Congress-Administration:

House Tightens Disclosure Rules For Pet Projects (NYT) 85
Everybody Will Know If It's Pork (LAT) 86
House Changes Rules On Pork-barrel Projects (CHIT) 87
House's "Pay-Go" Rule Makes AMT Relief Harder (WSJ) 89
House Adopts Pay-as-You-Go Rules (WP) 89
House OKs Budget Rule Changes (WT) 91
Dreier Shifts Gears In A Hurry (LAT) 91
Democrats Rename Key House Panel (WT) 92
Home Town Paves The Way For Pelosi (WP) 93
Pelosi Visits Hometown On Victory Tour (AP) 94
Partying Dead Wake Up The Democrats (WP) 94
Giddy Sea Of Fresh Faces In The Capitol, United By A Serious Mission (NYT) 95
New Congress Brings Along Religious Firsts (WP) 96
Bush's Tax Legacy (WSJ) 98
Monkey On A Tiger (NYT) 98
Can Bush's Tax Cuts Survive? (WSJ) 99
A Heckuva Claim (WP) 100
Bill On Medicare Drug Cost Is Called Weak Medicine (LAT) 101
Strong Medicine (WSJ) 102
Boxer To Chair Ethics In Johnson's Absence (RC) 103
Memo Says White House Visitors Can't Be Named (AP) 103
Court Was Once Cloistered; Now Its Chief Does "Nightline" (WP) 104
Race Discrimination Case Added To Docket (WP/AP) 105
Justices To Consider School Sports Rules (LAT) 105
Justices To Consider Impact Of Mental Illness On Death Penalty (NYT) 106
White House Seeks Lawyer Wise To Ways Of Congress (NYT)107
Safe As Milk? (NYT) 108
Let Them Eat Clones (LAT) 108

Other News:

Jobs Data Brighten Economic Picture (WSJ) 109
Strong US Job Gains Dash Rate Cut Hopes (FT) 110
Workers, Wages Add To Growth (WP) 110
Jobs, Income Gains Bright Spots In 2006 (WT) 112
Job Growth Is Strong, Surprising Economists (NYT) 112
Minutes Show Fed Focus On Jobs Data (FT) 113
Bernanke Defends Fed Banking Supervision (FT) 114
Surge In Jobs Sends Markets Lower (NYT/AP) 115
Treasury Prices Hit By US Labour Report (FT) 116
Dollar Jumps To 6-Week High Against Euro On Jobs Data (WSJ) 116
After The Dow's 2006 Rise, Investors Ponder A Correction (WSJ) 117
Dow's Dogs Still Having Their Day (NYT) 118
Lower Oil Prices Slow In Reaching Pump (WP) 119
Gauging The Demand (WP) 119
Outdated And Inefficient (WSJ) 121
Republican Sen. Sam Brownback Set To Move Forward With Presidential Run (AP) 122
Owens To Join Romney Presidential Team (DENP) 122
Leaked Notes On '08 Show Giuliani Without The Spin (NYT) .. 122
Obama To Headline Big Fundraiser (WP) 123
Former Democratic Party Boss Lambasts Kerry Campaign (AP)124
Goal Is To Look Good, Writer Of Democratic Memoir Admits (NYT) 125
Buckley Quits Race For State Dem Chair (NHUL) 126
At Inauguration, Governor Praises The Central Path (SFC) 127
Schwarzenegger Adopts "Centrist" Line (WT/AP) 129

DOJ_NMG_0113880

Glitterati, Gawkers Shrug Off Second Inauguration (LAT) 129
Schwarzenegger Opens In A Sequel (NYT)..... 130
Patching Up What's Broken? (WP)..... 131
O'Malley To Travel State To Thank His Supporters (WP)..... 132
Making No Small Plans (NYT) 133
"Embryo Bank" Stirs Ethics Fears (WP) 133
Texas Firm First To Offer Ready-made Embryos (HC)..... 135
Texas Company Sells Ready-made Embryos (DMN)..... 136
Reagan Bust OK'd For Hill (WT)..... 137
C. William Verity Jr. Former Commerce Secretary, 89, Dies (NYT/AP)..... 138
Remember Cindy Sheehan? (WSJ) 138
A Meeting With Gerald Ford (NYT)..... 138
Mr. Ford Gets The Last Laugh (NYT)..... 139
Rice Calls For Denuclearization Moves From North Korea (AFP)140
Rice Cautions N. Korea (AP) 141
Nuclear Talks With N. Korea Expected To Resume (WP) 141
Policy Pat With Diplomat's Death (WT) 142
China Advises "Serious Response" By Iran To U.N. Sanctions (WP)..... 142
Report: China Prods Iran To Answer U.N. (AP) 143
American Diplomat To Visit Strife-Torn Somali Capital (NYT) .. 144
Iraq-style Insurgency Urged On Somalis (FT) 145
Islamist Stragglers Vow Guerrilla Tactics, Suicides (WT/AP).... 146
Quick Deployment Of Peacekeepers Urged For Somalia; Aid Pledged (WP)..... 146
In Somalia, Confusion Remains In Command (WP) 147
Day After Killings, A Hamas Leader Calls For A Truce (NYT) .. 148
Cleric Shot In Gaza After Plea For Calm (FT) 150
Tanzanian Woman Is Chosen For U.N.'s 2nd Highest Post (NYT) 150
UN Chief Picks Tanzanian Deputy (BBC)..... 151
Tanzanian Woman Chosen For No. 2 Post At United Nations (LAT) 151
U.N. Chief To Open Financial Records (WP) 152
A Status Quo Secretary General (NYT)..... 153
China Moves To Tighten The Money Supply (NYT)..... 153
China Currency Near Parity With Hong Kong's Dollar (NYT).... 154
China Media Battle Hints At Shift On Intellectual Property (NYT)155
White Farmers Given Leases In Zimbabwe (WP) 156
Ties To Communist Secret Police Snare Polish Bishop (NYT) . 157
Polish Archbishop Admits Signing Communist Pact (WP/AP) .. 159
Chavez Denounced For Canceling TV License (LAT)..... 159
Menem Preaches His Free Market Gospel (FT)..... 160
Kirchner Critic Seeks Argentine Presidency (FT) 161
In The Global Energy Rush, Nuclear Gets A Resurgence (WP)161
The EU's Ugly Little Challenge (LAT) 164
With Friends Like These... (WSJ) 165

DOJ_NMG_0113881

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Grants Delay In Mental Exam For Padilla (AP)

By Curt Anderson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, January 6, 2007

MIAMI — A federal judge on Friday gave prison officials another week to complete mental examinations to determine if alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla is competent to stand trial.

Bureau of Prisons officials sought an even longer delay until Jan. 30. They said in court papers that Padilla is not "compliant with psychological testing" and must be observed by staff members to complete the evaluation. The documents provided no further details.

The tests were originally supposed to be completed by Friday.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke insisted that the examinations be finished before the scheduled Jan. 22 trial date so she can rule on a number of other outstanding issues, including Padilla's claim that the case should be dismissed because he was tortured during 3½ years in military custody as an "enemy combatant."

"This court cannot proceed to trial until these motions are adequately resolved," Cooke said in a two-page order Friday.

Justice Department and Pentagon officials have repeatedly denied the torture allegations.

Cooke gave prisons officials until next Friday to finish the evaluation of Padilla and until Jan. 16 to deliver a competency report to her. Two mental experts hired by defense lawyers have concluded that Padilla suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder and is unable to adequately assist his attorneys.

Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen, is charged along with two others in the U.S. with being part of a support cell that provided money, recruits and supplies to violent Islamic extremists around the world. All three have pleaded not guilty. Two others charged in the case are in custody overseas.

Padilla was arrested in 2002 at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport for what U.S. officials originally called a plot to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in the United States. President Bush designated him an "enemy combatant" and he was held without criminal charge at a Navy brig in South Carolina until he was added to the Miami terror support case in late 2005.

The "dirty bomb" allegations are not mentioned in the Miami indictment.

Aside from the competency issue, the Jan. 22 trial date is in jeopardy because federal prosecutors have appealed Cooke's dismissal of a key terrorism count in the case. The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals is scheduled to hear oral arguments on that issue Wednesday in Atlanta, and Cooke has said the trial will not go forward until that question is settled.

The dismissed count carries a potential life prison sentence, while the two remaining terror support counts carry possible 15-year sentences each. Cooke ruled that the dismissed count improperly duplicated other parts of the same indictment.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Spy Pick: Low-key But "Rock Solid" (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

President Bush's nominee to be the next director of national intelligence is a spy agency veteran who is a master of the intricacies of the trade, from the technology of intercepting electronic signals to the financial sleight-of-hand of hidden, or "black," budgets.

The main question surrounding J. Michael McConnell's nomination to be the next intelligence chief is whether he is forceful enough to keep an already ill-defined job from sliding into irrelevancy.

When the position of national intelligence director was created two years ago, even lawmakers who drafted legislation that created the job acknowledged that its actual authority is not clear.

A key national commission said the position had more responsibility than institutional power. And high-profile intelligence veterans, including new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, turned down a chance to fill the job in part because of concerns about how it was structured.

DOJ_NMG_0113882

John D. Negroponte, a longtime government official who became the first occupant of the position, spent much of his tenure trying to consolidate his control over the intelligence community, said Gregory Treverton, an analyst at Rand Corp. and former vice chairman of the National Intelligence Council, which represents all U.S. intelligence agencies.

"Negroponte had the reputation for being a savvy operator with no shortage of razor blades on his elbows," Treverton said. The fact that Negroponte is vacating the position 18 months into his tenure, Treverton said, "may be a commentary on just how hard it is."

Others in Washington were more blunt. In turning to McConnell, the White House "went from Negroponte, who was a pretty significant figure, to a less significant one," said a senior government official involved in creating the director's post.

If McConnell is not able to impose his will on the 16 intelligence agencies that fall under his responsibility, "it could be the beginning of the end of the DNI's office," the official said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

McConnell, 63, is known for his courtly manner and soft South Carolina drawl. A retired Navy vice admiral, he is part of an influx of national security officials who first came to prominence during the administration of President George H.W. Bush.

During the 1991 Persian Gulf War, McConnell was a senior intelligence advisor to then-Defense Secretary Dick Cheney and former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Colin L. Powell. In that position, he also established relationships with Gates and Condoleezza Rice, who then worked at the National Security Council in the White House.

McConnell later served as director of the National Security Agency, which is the nation's largest intelligence agency and is responsible for eavesdropping on electronic communications around the world.

During McConnell's tenure, from 1992 to 1996, the NSA is widely viewed as having struggled to keep up with emerging technologies, including the Internet. Even so, McConnell was seen as an effective leader who pushed to improve the agency's ability to confirm the authenticity of intercepted e-mails and other communications.

McConnell "is rock solid," Treverton said. "He knows intelligence, and he's a steady pair of hands."

After retiring, McConnell, a graduate of Furman University in South Carolina, joined the consulting firm Booz Allen Hamilton, where he has spent the last 10 years serving as an advisor to companies as well as government agencies on intelligence and technology issues.

If confirmed by the Senate, McConnell is widely expected to follow the course set by Negroponte and continue pushing for better information sharing among intelligence agencies, rather than launch a major shake-up.

McConnell is invariably described as low-key, causing some to question whether he is the right pick for a job that would seem to require an appetite and aptitude for bureaucratic infighting.

But supporters note that McConnell will not have to contend with former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who opposed the creation of the position and was widely seen as pushing the military to encroach on spy agency turf. Rumsfeld stepped down as Defense secretary last month.

Because of his long-standing ties to Cheney, Gates and others, McConnell also has built-in allies.

"McConnell is very quiet," said Mark M. Lowenthal, a former senior CIA official. "But he has a lovely touch, and he's well-known to a lot of people in the community who are still in senior positions in a way that Negroponte was not."

Bush Names New Spy Chief With Iraq Speech Looming (AFP)

By Olivier Knox

AFP, January 5, 2007

US President George W. Bush named a new spy chief and filled a critical diplomatic vacancy as he put the last touches on a retooled Iraq strategy that critics charge may escalate the war.

Bush, expected to unveil his new plan as early as Wednesday, nominated director of national intelligence John Negroponte to be US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's deputy -- a key post vacant since July 2006.

"I have asked John Negroponte to serve in this vital position at this crucial moment," Bush said, stressing the former ambassador's responsibility to help ensure "that America speaks to the world with one voice."

And Bush announced that he had chosen vice admiral Michael McConnell, a former head of the National Security Agency, to replace Negroponte at the head of all 16 US spy agencies, officials said.

"Mike will report directly to me. And I am confident he will give me the best information and analysis that America's intelligence community can provide," the US president said.

The reshuffle -- begun when he dumped defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld after opposition Democrats captured the US Congress in November elections -- came days before Bush was to reveal his plans for the unpopular war in Iraq.

"It is vital they take up their new responsibilities promptly," Bush said in a message aimed at shaping their Senate confirmation. "I would hope that they would be confirmed as quickly as possible."

DOJ_NMG_0113883

The embattled US president, his job approval numbers in the cellar, was to unveil his new Iraq approach as early as Wednesday, after consultations with key world leaders and US lawmakers, the White House said.

The president has left untouched his other core national security aides -- Vice President Dick Cheney, Rice and national security adviser Stephen Hadley -- leaving doubts about how far-reaching his Iraq overhaul would be.

In addition to shifting Negroponte -- the first US ambassador to post-Saddam Hussein Iraq -- Bush was to nominate the current US ambassador there, Zalmay Khalilzad, to be US ambassador to the United Nations, a top aide said.

That announcement, filling another key vacancy left by controversial diplomat John Bolton's recent departure, was expected to be announced on Friday.

Replacing Khalilzad in Baghdad would be Ryan Crocker, 57, the US ambassador in Pakistan since November 2004. Crocker is one of the State Department's most experienced Middle East experts and a fluent Arabic speaker.

On the military side, Bush was to change the head of the US Central Command and the top US military commander in Iraq, both of whom have expressed skepticism about escalating the war, US media reported.

Admiral William Fallon, currently head of US forces in the Pacific, would replace retiring General John Abizaid, 55, at the Central Command, which manages the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq.

In Iraq, Lieutenant General David Petraeus would replace General George Casey as the man in charge of all US and coalition forces, according to the reports, which went unchallenged by the White House.

On Thursday, Bush did not directly address a wave of media reports that he plans to boost the US troop level in Iraq, but stressed, "One thing is for certain: I will want to make sure that the mission is clear and specific and can be accomplished."

Bush, who held a nearly two-hour videoconference with Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki on Thursday, said that the Iraqi leader "has the will necessary to make the tough decisions. That's one of the things I learned today."

But The Washington Post reported Friday that the US president's top aides are still deeply divided over Maliki's reliability and over whether to escalate the war by sending more US troops to Iraq.

The advisers fear Maliki's government may not provide the military support and implement the political reforms necessary for US forces to eventually withdraw, the Post reported, citing officials familiar with the debate.

Profile: Michael McConnell (BBC)

BBC.com, January 5, 2007

Michael McConnell's nomination as head of Washington's 16 spy agencies tops a long career serving the many instruments of US intelligence gathering.

President Bush is looking Mr McConnell to steer the spy agencies

He is seen as a committed, capable official - broadly respected by the spy community and well known to senior figures in the Bush administration.

Naming him as the new Director of National Intelligence, President George W Bush said he had "decades of experience, ensuring our military has the intelligence it needs to fight and win wars".

A courteous man with a soft South Carolina accent, Mr McConnell became a naval intelligence officer after serving in Vietnam.

He came to prominence during the 1991 Gulf War, delivering intelligence about Iraqi forces to the military and political leadership of the time, including Defence Secretary Dick Cheney and Gen Colin Powell.

A tribute offered to him in the US Congress in 1996 said he had been "instrumental in saving US and coalition lives and directly contributed to bringing about a quick and decisive victory" in the first Gulf conflict.

'Candour and openness'

After the war, Mr McConnell was promoted to the rank of Vice Admiral and appointed head of the National Security Agency (NSA).

He led the agency from 1992 to 1996 - an era of rapid technological advances and drastic budget cuts.

Encryption technology developed during his tenure has been used to protect sensitive US electronic communications from enemy hackers.

Mr McConnell's deputy at the NSA, William P Crowell, told the New York Times newspaper he was a "consummate professional".

Another former colleague, Ronald D Lee, told the paper he was "an exceptionally gifted leader who was completely devoted to the rule of law and the constitution".

The Congressional tribute from 1996 praises his "candour and openness" in keeping Congress informed of the NSA's work.

'Hands-on'

DOJ_NMG_0113884

Mr McConnell left the NSA to join the board of Booz Allen Hamilton, a management consulting firm, and stayed out of government for the next 10 years.

The firm has been a major recipient of intelligence outsourcing contracts offered by the Pentagon, according to federal records cited by the USA Today newspaper.

Ralph Shrader, Booz Allen Hamilton's chairman and CEO, told the paper Mr McConnell was a "hands-on" official, who can "solicit lots of opinions" and produce something that takes the needs of the entire country into consideration".

However, some officials have questioned whether his gentle touch will be suited to co-ordinating the diverse arms of US intelligence.

W Patrick Lang, a former intelligence official interviewed by the New York Times, said Mr McConnell's "competent but compliant" reputation meant he may not want to challenge his bosses on critical issues.

DHS To Boost 6 Cities' Share Of Anti-Terror Funds (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

D.C., New York Among Those to Share $411 Million

Chastened by complaints about poor federal cooperation and by controversy over its slashing of aid to New York and Washington last year, the Department of Homeland Security will reserve about $100 million of the $747 million it will dole out to U.S. cities this year to pay for police counterterrorism operations in six metropolitan areas, officials said yesterday.

In announcing changes in style and substance to the Urban Area Security Initiative (UASI) program, Secretary Michael Chertoff cited a "secretary's prerogative to sometimes inject common sense" to grant calculations based on the risk of terrorism and a subjective rating of the effectiveness of local anti-terrorism programs. The process was ridiculed by Congress and private analysts last year for slighting the two areas struck in the 2001 terrorist attacks.

"This is going to be an amazing admission for a public official in Washington: We actually listen to people," Chertoff said, adding that DHS will collaborate more closely with applicants in the distribution of $1.7 billion in state and local grants in 2007.

For the first time, DHS designated six high-risk urban areas -- New York and northern New Jersey; the Washington region; Los Angeles-Long Beach; Chicago; the San Francisco Bay area; and Houston -- which will be allowed to spend as much as 25 percent of their grants for personnel and operations, not just for overtime during heightened national terrorism alerts. Chertoff cited the threat of "homegrown terrorism" in encouraging the funding of law-enforcement-led domestic intelligence "fusion centers."

The six will compete for $411 million, or 55 percent of the UASI funds. An additional 39 cities will compete for the remaining $336 million.

Repeating past assertions, Chertoff said the change reflects risk, not politics. The high-risk areas will receive nearly $30 million more than last year, but their percentage of the UASI budget will remain about the same.

Chertoff declined to say if specific cities would get a boost when grants are announced by summer, saying only that he is confident that New York will "do well" because it has worked closely with DHS.

Senate leaders were critical, noting that DHS will still use subjective peer grading of recipients.

"Amazingly enough, DHS insists on using the same process again," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), the chamber's third-ranking Democrat. He added that New Yorkers "have every reason to be skeptical" of the results because the city is now joined with suburban New Jersey for grant award purposes.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), the chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, said DHS also made "ill-advised" changes to a $509 million state grant program, down $19 million from last year, by eliminating population density as a factor and changing the minimum amount each state can receive.

"I am committed to passing a permanent funding formula so that the guidelines are not arbitrarily rewritten each year," Lieberman said.

Defending the program changes, Chertoff said DHS officials no longer engage in excessive "bean counting" -- using mathematical programs to analyze huge databases listing non-vital facilities such as apartment buildings, small-town popcorn stands and petting zoos.

Urban areas were chosen, Chertoff said, based on population size and density, economic significance, and proximity to critical infrastructure, such as borders and key military assets. They were vetted by Pentagon, Commerce Department and intelligence officials.

DHS winnowed a database of 80,000 assets into a classified list of about 2,100 targets of national or regional importance, he said, such as nuclear, chemical and energy facilities, dams and transportation systems.

DOJ_NMG_0113885

New York, New Jersey To Split Security Funds (NSDY)

By Carol Eisenberg, Newsday Washington Bureau

Newsday, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As part of a new regional approach to combatting terror, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced Friday that New York and northern New Jersey would be considered a single area for homeland security planning.

The homeland security chief, who came under withering criticism last year for slashing antiterror funds to New York City, denied that linking two states and 15 counties (including Nassau and Suffolk) would mean less money for New York.

"There is nothing about this to suggest New York is going to get a grant cut," he said.

"I can tell you from the first World Trade Center investigation, a lot of the planning for that bombing took place in Jersey City. So who bore the security responsibility there? Was it New York? Well, New York didn't have the ability to get into Jersey City. Was it New Jersey? Well, the attack took place in New York. ... If you look at the risk, the risk is combined."

In addition, Chertoff said the department is guaranteeing for the first time that the six highest-risk areas -- including New York-northern New Jersey -- will split 55 percent of the $747 million earmarked for the 45 highest-risk urban areas. A total of $1.7 billion will be awarded for all counterterrorism programs next year.

Specific grants won't be announced until the spring, after municipalities have submitted proposals that will once again be judged by secret peer-review panels.

Chertoff vowed that the grant process would be more user-friendly and publicly transparent. He said grants would still be channeled through each state, which will disperse them to localities, "because that's what the law requires."

But not everyone was convinced the process had been sufficiently improved.

"Based on last year's ridiculous allocations, and DHS's indication that once again it will use the peer review process, New Yorkers have every reason to be skeptical," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.).

"If DHS gives out money based on a combined New York and New Jersey area, it better be two full loaves, not a half for each. ... DHS simply cannot direct fewer dollars to the highest-risk area in the country."

New York City officials said they were cautiously optimistic -- in large part because of another significant change in how the program will work. For the first time, high-risk cities may use up to a quarter of their antiterror money to defray the cost of "boots on the ground" -- that is, personnel devoted exclusively to counterterror work.

Until now, the federal government has resisted the city's requests for help defraying the cost of its 1,000-strong counterterror force, insisting instead that the money go to purchase technology.

"We have been advocating for this policy change for several years," said New York City Deputy Mayor Edward Skyler. "Overall, the devil will be in the details, but we are optimistic that our concerns are being heard by Secretary Chertoff and that we will receive more funding than last year."

Rep. Peter King (R-Seaford), ranking member of the House Homeland Security Committee and a leading critic of last year's cuts, was also cautiously optimistic.

"I was assured that the New York-northern New Jersey designation certainly won't hurt New York, and the inference was it should help," he said.

King also called the department's agreement to allow cities to use federal money for dedicated counterterrorism forces "incredibly significant."

"Last year, that was the real philosophical divide," he said. "DHS was consumed by a desire for high-tech gadgetry and New York said it had as much of that as they needed. Their main need is boots on the ground. This will definitely favor communities like them."

Federal Funds May Now Pay Police Salaries In Terror Fight (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — New York City will be able for the first time to use federal grant dollars to pay basic salaries of police officers assigned to counterterrorism tasks, like guarding city bridges and subway tunnels, the secretary of homeland security, Michael Chertoff, said on Friday.

The rules change will apply to six metropolitan areas considered at highest risk for attack: New York, Chicago, Houston, Los Angeles, Washington and San Francisco.

These six urban areas will share $411 million in antiterrorism grants this year, while 39 other areas from Atlanta to Tucson will compete for the remaining $336 million in available grants, or 45 percent of the total, Mr. Chertoff said.

DOJ_NMG_0113886

New York City officials welcomed the rule change, for which they had lobbied over several years. Previously, while some use of grant dollars was allowed for overtime, federal officials pushed cities to use the money to buy antiterrorism equipment like gas masks or surveillance systems rather than for salaries.

In New York, nearly 1,000 officers, at a cost of about $200 million a year, are assigned to antiterrorism tasks, and city officials have argued that the federal government should foot a bigger chunk of the bill. Under the new rules, the city will be able to use up to 25 percent of its federal grant to cover these salaries.

“Our Police Department is essentially a first line of defense again terrorist attacks; that is serving the nation as well as the city,” Deputy Mayor Edward Skyler said. “These are the boots on the ground.”

But there is still a good chance that when the actual urban-area grant awards come out later this year, city officials will be disappointed.

That is because with an overall pool of just $441 million for these six urban areas, it remains unlikely that the New York City area will get anywhere close to the nearly $230 million it received two years ago — before a cut in the grant last year outraged New York City politicians.

The problem, Mr. Skyler and Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York said, is that too much of the overall $1.7 billion in antiterrorism grants — only a piece of which is set aside for cities, with much of the rest going directly to states — is still being distributed based on politically driven formulas that ensure that every state gets a cut.

Legislation that Democrats have introduced in the House would change the way these grants are awarded — to comply with a 9/11 commission recommendation that they be based on risk.

“You should make it all threat-based,” Senator Schumer said. Mr. Chertoff said that regardless of any action by Congress, he hoped to steer as much of the money as he could to those cities with the greatest needs.

Homeland Security is also trying to simplify the evaluation process, to avoid the same criticism as last year that its complicated formula — which includes considering potential targets as obscure as a popcorn factory, a flea market and a petting zoo — was irrational if not comical.

“Speaking for myself, I don’t believe that I’m infallible or that I have nothing to learn from anybody,” Mr. Chertoff said, admitting that last year’s grant process was flawed.

Area In Highest Tier Of Terror Funding (HC)

By Michael Hedges, Houston Chronicle Washington Bureau

Houston Chronicle, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON — Houston will be eligible for a larger chunk of federal grant money for local security as one of six U.S. metropolitan areas most likely to face a terrorist attack, the Department of Homeland Security announced Friday.

Houston's energy industry and port system are considered prime potential targets for terrorists, officials said, and the area's population size as well as its location relatively close to an international border were also considered by federal officials.

It was the first time the federal government identified so-called Tier One potential terrorism targets. The other metro areas are New York, Los Angeles, Washington, Chicago and San Francisco.

The six will split $411 million in urban-area security grants in 2007, or 55 percent of the total allocated directly to all metro regions.

Department of Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff said the economic consequences to the country of a successful strike on an area such as Houston were also weighed.

"The more sophisticated we become at weighing these variables ... the better we've become at targeting resources to address and mitigate those risks," he said.

The Houston area consists of Harris, Montgomery and Fort Bend counties.

"We've done a good job of getting the folks in D.C. to recognize there is a real threat here," said Doug Adkinson, deputy chief of staff to Harris County Judge Robert Eckels. "We've convinced them that the Ship Channel is a real target and — God forbid — a successful attack there would impact the whole country economically."

Equipment and trainingHigh on Houston's wish list for federal funding is an upgrade of the city's aging radio system for police and firefighters, which is not compatible with the high-tech system used in the rest of the region, Adkinson said.

This week, Chertoff cited the 16-year-old UHF radio system in Houston as a potential vulnerability if a terrorist attack required local agencies to coordinate their responses.

The region also is expected to seek funding for training police in counterterrorism techniques, video cameras for surveillance of potential targets, a marine fire-fighting task force for the Ship Channel, bomb disposal equipment, a building collapse response team, generators, and salaries for intelligence experts working in the city, Adkinson said.

DOJ_NMG_0113887

Tier Two targetsThree other Texas locales — Dallas/Fort Worth, San Antonio and El Paso — were among 39 urban areas designated as Tier Two targets. The areas will divide up the remaining $336 million in federal grants.

It was the first time that El Paso became eligible for anti-terrorism funding, a consequence of it being on the Mexican border, Chertoff said.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-El Paso, said he had pushed for the city's inclusion since 2003.

"El Paso is a major metropolitan area along an international border with a major military presence," Reyes said. "I have long argued that it is imperative that our community be included in this grant program, and we should have received these funds years ago."

A separate grant program makes another $2.5 billion in homeland security money available to the states. Texas allocated $17 million to Houston last year.

No precise dollar figure has been set for Houston under the urban grant program.

Its funding application will be weighed against proposals from the other Tier One areas, Chertoff said.

In recent years, New York and Washington officials lobbied for a disproportionately larger share of the money, citing the 9/11 attacks as evidence that they were especially vulnerable targets. The cities ended up complaining that their funding levels were too low.

The feedback was part of the reason DHS divided metropolitan areas into two threat tiers, Chertoff said.

Democrats Backpedal On 9/11 Commission (WT)

By Brian Debose, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

House Democrats campaigned on a promise to implement the recommendations of the September 11 commission, but now say they will not enact all of them.

The recommendation to place all intelligence agencies under the Defense Department "is not on the table," said Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat.

Another obstacle to enacting all the commission reforms as promised is the formula by which federal anti-terrorism money is distributed across the country.

House Democrats are confident they can pass a bill in which funds would be distributed based on risk. Under that plan, the area around New York City and San Francisco would get much more funding than, for example, the area around Topeka, Kan., or Searchlight, Nev.

But such a plan almost certainly will be killed in the Democratic-controlled Senate. Lawmakers there almost always find it difficult to part with money for their police and fire departments or the Coast Guard, regardless of terrorism-risk assessments.

"I suspect the Senate will pass a different version than ours, and we will have to work it out in a conference," said Rep. Bennie Thompson, Mississippi Democrat and chairman of the Homeland Security Committee. "We should have a baseline funding of 25 percent for first responders in all 50 states and the rest should go to the areas with the greatest need and that have the most risk of a terrorist attack."

Another recommendation unlikely to be fully implemented is tasking one House committee with the responsibility of overseeing both intelligence operations and funding. However, Mr. Hoyer said, the plan to create a new subcommittee comprising members from the appropriations and intelligence committees will help.

"The 9/11 commission wanted a single authorizing body for intelligence, and I think the substance or the spirit of the recommendations will be achieved," he said.

Details are still to be finalized.

"It hasn't been worked out how the members would be chosen," said Rep. Silvestre Reyes, Texas Democrat and chairman of the intelligence panel. Whether the chairmen of the two committees or House Speaker Nancy Pelosi would pick the members has yet to be decided, he said, but there will be a new panel in some form.

"As I understand it, it's a final deal. The rest is still being determined," said Rep. Chaka Fattah, Pennsylvania Democrat and a member of the Appropriations Committee.

Some Democrats oppose the hybrid idea from the outset.

"The question is what impact will it have on the intelligence committee, and it seems it will gut the committee's authority," said one Democrat, who did not wish to be named.

Mr. Hoyer said the intelligence panel would still have oversight and responsibility to ensure that intelligence operations are "effective and accountable."

The Senate will have few problems deciding who will oversee intelligence because "only the Senate intelligence committee can authorize spending for intelligence agencies," said its chairman, Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, West Virginia Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0113888

"Our biggest problem is getting the spending authorization done," he said. "It's been two years since we have and we want to do the 2007 as soon as possible and then work on 2008."

The indecision in the House could become a problem for Democrats' hopes of convincing the public that they are just as capable of protecting the country from terrorist attacks as Republicans.

And Republicans are eagerly waiting to see whether Democrats will finally concede that many of the remaining September 11 commission recommendations shouldn't be enacted.

"I think what Democrats are finding in some of the 9/11 recommendations we didn't implement, looking closely at them ... these are not good ideas," said Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican and his party's ranking member on the intelligence panel.

He said the hybrid committee is unnecessary if both the Appropriations Committee and the intelligence panel chairmen pledge to have the same budget priorities.

"That is what I did with Representative Jerry Lewis [California Republican] when I was intelligence chair and he was appropriations chair in the last Congress, and it worked fine," Mr. Hoekstra said.

FBI Probing Death Threat To Muslim (CCT)

By Steve Lawrence

The Contra Costa Times, January 6, 2007

SACRAMENTO - The FBI said Friday it is investigating a death threat sent to the leader of a local Muslim group after U.S. Sen. Barbara Boxer rescinded a certificate her office had awarded to him.

Special Agent Karen Ernst said the bureau launched an investigation after Basim Elkarra reported receiving a threatening e-mail.

Elkarra, executive director of the Sacramento chapter of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, received a certificate of accomplishment from Boxer's office in November recognizing his "outstanding service."

Elkarra said the award reflected his group's efforts to establish good relations with Christians, Jews, minority groups and the FBI.

After the certificate was awarded, Boxer read a Web log linking her to the council and accusing it of pro-terrorist activities, including refusing to condemn Osama bin Laden by name.

Boxer asked her staff to investigate, and her office sent a letter withdrawing the certificate Dec. 21, her communications director, Natalie Ravitz, said Thursday.

Ravitz said two of the council's former members were sentenced to prison for crimes related to terrorist groups. She also said CAIR had refused to label Hamas and Hezbollah as terrorist organizations.

CAIR's national leaders denied that the group had terrorist ties or sympathies and accused Boxer of caving in to anti-Muslim extremists.

"By acting on smears, distortions and guilt by association, Senator Boxer has failed her Muslim constituents and has betrayed the progressive values of her party and state," Parvez Ahmed, CAIR's chairman, said in a statement.

Nihad Awad, CAIR's national executive director, thanked the FBI for investigating and urged Boxer to "examine the agendas of those who seek to marginalize and disenfranchise American Muslims."

Elkarra said the death threat was sent Dec. 30, the day after an article about Boxer rescinding the certificate appeared on Newsweek magazine's Web site. He said he also received another e-mail he described as hate mail when CAIR announced the award.

He said he still has the certificate but doesn't display it. He said he hopes Boxer will reconsider her decision.

"If she went to our Web site, it probably would have taken her two minutes to see all the (positive) campaigns we've launched in the past," he said, adding that his group was "willing to work with Senator Boxer and other officials who seek to build a more tolerant America."

Ravitz said Boxer asked her staff to contact the FBI and urge it to investigate the death threat.

Sen. Boxer Rescinds Award To Islamic Activist (LAT)

By Ashraf Khalil, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

The man represents a group some contend is extremist. Supporters say right-wingers are just trying to silence American Muslims.

DOJ_NMG_0113889

Sen. Barbara Boxer has rescinded an award her office gave to a Sacramento Islamic activist after criticism that the group he represents — the Council on American-Islamic Relations — holds extremist views and has ties to international terrorist organizations.

"I'm saying the four words that every elected official hates to say: 'I made a mistake,' " the California Democrat said in a telephone interview Friday. "I hope they won't believe that I did this to hurt the Muslim community…. We just have to be more careful when we reach out."

The U.S. senator's office rescinded a "certificate of achievement" awarded in November to Basim Elkarra, head of the council's Sacramento office. The rare public reversal follows charges from right-wing activists that Boxer was courting Muslim extremists by associating with the group.

The controversy highlights the complexities facing leading American Muslim groups in their dealings with elected officials — and vice versa.

It recalls a similar dispute surrounding a decision by the Los Angeles County Human Relations Commission to give an award to Dr. Maher Hathout last fall. A senior advisor to the Muslim Public Affairs Council, Hathout also faced charges of extremism. After a bitter two-week public battle, Hathout narrowly avoided having the award rescinded. In a rare revote, only four of the commission's 14 members voted to reaffirm Hathout, with the majority either absent or abstaining.

Council on American-Islamic Relations officials say they and other Muslim organizations have been targets of an ongoing, and sometimes effective, campaign to silence and marginalize American Muslim voices.

"There is a market for Islamophobia right now," said Hussam Ayloush, head of the council's Southern California office. "It's the same group of right-wing extremists who are interconnected and feed off each other and keep recycling the same allegations."

The controversy started when Joe Kaufman, a Florida-based activist and longtime critic of the group, posted an online article attacking the award to Elkarra. Kaufman, who runs a website called CAIRwatch.com, has long contended that the council actively encourages and supports groups such as Hamas and Hezbollah — both of which are on the U.S. government's terrorism watch lists.

"We believe this organization should be shut down and that no elected leaders should have anything to do with them," Kaufman said.

One of the largest American Muslim political groups, the council has seen its profile and membership soar in the last five years. The group had only eight offices as of Sept. 11, 2001. It now has 32, along with an active lobbying arm based in Washington, D.C.

Founded in 1994, the council describes itself as the country's leading Muslim civil rights and advocacy organization. Its local chapters have tax-exempt nonprofit status, and its leaders deny any ties to Hezbollah or Hamas.

Boxer, who said she was unaware of the initial decision by her office to honor Elkarra, said independent research by her office later revealed troubling information about the organization.

"It's the volume of things, not any one thing," she said. "There's a long list."

That list includes several individual council members who have been indicted on terrorism-related charges, as well as harsh criticism of the organization by some of Boxer's congressional colleagues. In 2003, Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) said the council was "unusual in its extreme rhetoric and its associations with groups that are suspect."

In recent years the council has drawn a carefully calibrated line on terrorism — strongly criticizing individual attacks and suicide bombings but refusing to label Hamas or Hezbollah as terrorist organizations.

It's also quick to condemn Israeli attacks in Lebanon and the occupied territories and label them as terrorism against civilians.

That criticism of Israel, council officials say, is what's really fueling the campaign against their group. Nothing short of endorsing Israeli policy, they say, will spare them from allegations of extremism.

"The minute we criticize Israel, then we become a nonmoderate group," Ayloush said. "You become public enemy No. 1."

The group also has a complicated relationship with federal law enforcement agencies. Former FBI counterterrorism chief Steven Pomerantz once said the council's activities "effectively give aid to international terrorist groups."

But council representatives say they frequently meet with senior FBI officials, and the group has helped train FBI agents in how to interact with the American Muslim community.

Kaufman, who regularly contributes to the influential website frontpagemag.com, denies assertions that he's seeking to defame all Muslim groups. But he also said that none of the major American Muslim organizations qualify as moderates in his view. The website touts a variety of publications, such as "Big Lies: Demolishing the Myths of the Propaganda War Against Israel" and "The Truth About Muhammad, Founder of the World's Most Intolerant Religion."

DOJ_NMG_0113890

The council has responded to Boxer's snub by demanding a meeting with the senator — an option Boxer said she would welcome — and rallying supporters of various faiths. Among those supporters is Elizabeth Sholes, director of public policy for the California Council of Churches, who has worked personally with Elkarra in Sacramento.

"They've issued multiple declarations against extremism and violence both in the Middle East and in the America Muslim community," Sholes said of the Muslim council. "I have found them in every instance to be absolutely dedicated to the issues of peace and justice."

The Muslim council is also encouraging supporters to contact Boxer's offices to protest the decision. A spokeswoman for Boxer said that as of Friday afternoon, the senator's offices in Washington and California have received 19 calls on the issue — 15 of them against the decision to rescind the award.

But Ayloush acknowledged that the situation represents a setback for the group's attempts to make inroads into American government and society.

"For us, the award has little value," Ayloush said. "It's the symbolism of a progressive Democrat giving in to pressure from right-wing Islamophobes."

ashraf.khalil@latimes.com

Editor's E-Mail May Be Used In Suit Against The Times (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

ALEXANDRIA, Va., Jan. 5 — A lawyer for a former government scientist who is suing The New York Times for defamation over a series of columns about the deadly anthrax mailings of 2001 said Friday in court that he was prepared to introduce an internal e-mail message from a senior Times editor that raised questions about one of the columns.

The lawyer, Mark A. Grannis, said the columns written by Nicholas D. Kristof about the federal investigation of the mailings unfairly damaged the reputation of his client, Dr. Stephen A. Hatfill, a former germ warfare scientist.

Dr. Hatfill's lawyers have said the columns wrongfully suggested that he was responsible for the attacks.

Mr. Grannis told Judge Claude M. Hilton of Federal District Court here that if the trial proceeded he would introduce evidence including a May 23, 2002, message from Philip Taubman, then deputy editor of the editorial page, raising questions about a draft of a column by Mr. Kristof.

Beginning that spring, Mr. Kristof wrote a series of columns about a government scientist whom he initially referred to as Mr. Z., saying the scientist had become the overwhelming focus of the investigation. That August, Mr. Kristof wrote that Dr. Hatfill had acknowledged that he was Mr. Z. at a news conference in which he said the news media had mistreated him.

Mr. Grannis said he would introduce evidence of questions about the column posed by Mr. Taubman and others. The evidence from Mr. Taubman, the lawyer said, was a message saying the as-yet-unpublished column "pointed pretty much at the guy" and encouraging Mr. Kristof to take out some of the material that did that.

Mr. Grannis made his disclosure of the information that he has obtained in the discovery phase of the suit in a hearing on a Times motion to seek dismissal of the complaint.

The trial is scheduled to start Jan. 29. Judge Hilton did not say when he would rule.

The Times has argued that the columns were aimed at prodding the Federal Bureau of Investigation to pursue the anthrax case more vigorously and did not accuse Dr. Hatfill of being the person responsible for the mailings.

In writing about the investigation, Mr. Kristof's ire was directed against federal officials for not moving swiftly to decide whether the scientist was guilty or innocent, the paper's lawyers have said.

"His intent was to focus on the F.B.I.," a lawyer for The Times, Lee Levine, told Judge Hilton.

Mr. Levine, of Levine Sullivan Koch & Schulz, told Judge Hilton that Mr. Hatfill was a public figure, or as someone recognized in libel and defamation law as a limited-purpose public figure, because of his involvement in the public debate about preparedness for a bioterrorist attack.

Mr. Levine said Dr. Hatfill had "voluntarily thrust himself into the vortex of that controversy" through his writings and speeches, confirmed by Dr. Hatfill's complaints that he was easily identified as Mr. Z by many people in the field.

As a public figure Dr. Hatfill would have a far greater burden in his effort to win a defamation suit. To prevail, a public figure has to prove that the material was published with "actual malice," that is with the knowledge that the statements were false or with reckless disregard as to whether they were false.

Lawyers for The Times also argued that neither Mr. Taubman's message nor any other evidence put forward by Mr. Hatfill's lawyers was proof that Mr. Kristof had acted with reckless disregard for the truth, the standard that Mr. Hatfill must meet if he is found to be a public figure.

DOJ_NMG_0113891

The Times said that even if all of Mr. Hatfill's assertions were true, he would not prevail and that therefore the judge should dismiss the case before trial. The message from Mr. Taubman, now Washington bureau chief for The Times, was released Friday afternoon by the lawyers for The Times. It read: "Nick, you're still pointing pretty much at the guy. I think you need to lose the material I've marked in boldface."

Mr. Taubman had marked two paragraphs referring to a middle-age American scientist with experience in producing bioweapons. The column, which appeared May 24, included the first of those two paragraphs but dropped the second, the messages showed. Although the essence of that message was pretty much as Mr. Grannis represented it in court, two other e-mail messages he cited were more ambiguous.

He said messages from Nicholas Wade, a former science editor at the paper and then a special projects writer, and Gail Collins, the editorial page editor, were critical of a column prepared for publication in July. Those messages, as disclosed by lawyers for The Times, raised more generalized suggestions.

Mr. Grannis said Mr. Wade's message had said the column made it plausible to a reader that Mr. Kristof was pointing at Mr. Z as the culprit. But the message said it was plausible that Dr. Hatfill might have been involved in an earlier anthrax scare that was a hoax.

In her message, Ms. Collins said the column "looked fine to me" and asked how an anthrax mailing to The National Enquirer in Florida fit in.

Five people died in the attacks. Although federal authorities identified Dr. Hatfill as a "person of interest" in the case, he was not charged with any crimes. No one has been charged in the attacks.

N.Y. Times Urges Judge To Dismiss Hatfill Suit (WP)

By Jerry Markon, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

The New York Times Co. yesterday urged a federal judge to throw out a defamation suit filed by a former Army scientist, saying that columnist Nicholas D. Kristof did not intend to implicate the scientist in the 2001 anthrax attacks.

In a series of columns that explored whether Steven J. Hatfill was responsible for the anthrax-spore mailings that killed five people and sickened 17, Kristof was trying "to focus attention on the FBI, to get it to jump-start the investigation . . . not to point a finger at Mr. Hatfill," said Lee Levine, a Times company lawyer.

But attorneys for Hatfill accused Kristof of deliberately ruining Hatfill's reputation and said Kristof's editor warned him that one of the columns could be read as implicating Hatfill in the attacks. The editor, Philip Taubman, said in an e-mail to Kristof that the column was "pointing pretty directly at the guy" and urged Kristof to take some passages out before publication, said the lawyer, Mark A. Grannis. Kristof declined, Grannis said.

"He was implicating Dr. Hatfill in a notorious act of terrorism," Grannis said. "To pretend otherwise is to just ignore the reality of this case."

Taubman, now the Times's Washington bureau chief, referred questions to a company official yesterday. David McCraw, assistant general counsel for the Times company, said Taubman was not Kristof's editor "for column content. Nick had sent draft columns to Phil and other colleagues seeking their opinion and advice on them." Kristof declined to comment.

U.S. District Judge Claude M. Hilton in Alexandria did not rule yesterday on the Times's request for a dismissal. Hatfill sued the Times company in 2004, contending that the paper defamed him in a series of Kristof columns that identified him as a "likely culprit." A trial is set for Jan. 29.

The legal maneuvering comes in advance of a trial that lawyers say is expected to shine new light on the government's investigation of Hatfill and possibly on the overall anthrax probe itself. No one has been charged in the investigation of anthrax-tainted letters mailed to media and government offices.

Hatfill, a former researcher at the Army's infectious disease research laboratory at Fort Detrick in Frederick, has been trying to clear his name ever since then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft publicly called him a "person of interest" in the investigation in 2002.

In the 2002 columns, Kristof criticized the FBI, saying it had failed to aggressively pursue a scientist he first identified as "Mr. Z." He wrote that the biodefense community had called Mr. Z a "likely culprit," partly because the scientist was familiar with anthrax.

Kristof later acknowledged that Hatfill was Mr. Z. He also wrote that Hatfill deserved the "presumption of innocence."

Attorneys for the Times said yesterday that Kristof was only trying to focus attention on the failure to solve the case. "The larger issue in the columns was the nation's preparedness to handle biological attacks," Levine said.

DOJ_NMG_0113892

Hatfill's attorneys contended that Kristof had deliberately fingered their client as the anthrax killer. "Dr. Hatfill was a purely private citizen, as innocent as anyone in this courtroom and as deserving of the protection of his reputation as anyone in this country," Grannis said.

Hatfill Lawyer: Times Editor Warned Columnist On Anthrax Piece (AP)

Associated Press

AP, January 6, 2007

ALEXANDRIA, Va. -- Lawyers for a former Army scientist suing The New York Times for libel said Friday that an editor at the paper warned columnist Nicholas Kristof to remove incriminating passages from a column that raised suspicions that Steven Hatfill was involved in the 2001 anthrax attacks.

Kristof left the passages in the May 2002 column despite the warning, said lawyers for Hatfill, who claims that a series of Kristof columns that year falsely implicated him as the culprit in the anthrax mailings that left five people dead. An elderly Connecticut woman was among the victims.

The editor's warning to Kristof was voiced in an e-mail uncovered during the extensive pretrial discovery process, said Mark Grannis, one of Hatfill's lawyers. Grannis did not give specifics on the passages at issue outside court; he said some details of the case have been sealed.

The accusation came as a federal judge again heard arguments on whether to dismiss the lawsuit. The newspaper's lawyers argued that under federal libel law, Hatfill should be considered a public figure. The law makes it more difficult for public figures to prevail in libel cases.

Hatfill's lawyers dispute that their client should be classified as a public figure. But even if he were, they said, they have uncovered flaws in Kristof's reporting that are so flagrant that Hatfill would still win his case.

Grannis said that in addition to the editor's warning, several of Kristof's sources testified in pretrial depositions that they did not provide the information Kristof has said they did.

"Mr. Kristof made things up," Grannis said. "What Mr. Kristof reported was not just false, it was embarrassingly false. It was outrageously false."

Five people were killed and 17 sickened by anthrax that had been mailed to lawmakers on Capitol Hill and members of the news media in New York and Florida just weeks after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

The victims include Ottilie Lundgren, 94, of Oxford, Conn., who investigators say died after opening anthrax-contaminated mail that passed through a Connecticut mail distribution center.

The case remains unsolved.

Kristof's columns initially referred to Hatfill only as "Mr. Z"; Hatfill was identified by name only after he held a news conference in August 2002 to denounce rumors that had been swirling around him.

Kristof has said his purpose in writing the columns was to prod a dawdling FBI investigation and that he said in several columns that Mr. Z enjoys a legal presumption of innocence.

Hatfill claims that Kristof's columns revealed enough details for people to figure out who he was despite withholding his name.

Times lawyer Lee Levine said Hatfill is being hypocritical when he argues that he is not a public figure. On the one hand, Hatfill contends he was so well known that people could piece together his identity from the clues in Kristof's "Mr. Z" columns. On the other hand, they argue that he was essentially an unknown when it comes to his status as a public figure under libel law.

"You can't have it both ways," Levine said.

Levine said Hatfill qualifies as a public figure because he had injected himself into the national debate about bioterrorism years before the anthrax attacks. He had occasionally been quoted as an expert in the media, and even once donned a chemical suit for a magazine photo.

U.S. District Judge Claude Hilton said he will rule on the newspaper's motion soon. The trial is scheduled to begin Jan. 29.

Hilton previously ordered Kristof to disclose his confidential FBI sources so Hatfill could pursue his claim. Kristof refused, and in response Hilton barred Kristof from relying on any information provided by those sources in his defense.

Hatfill's lawsuit was dismissed by Hilton in 2004 but reinstated by a federal appeals court. Hatfill is also suing former Attorney General John Ashcroft, the Justice Department and others in U.S. District Court in Washington claiming they violated Hatfill's civil rights.

Katrina Victims Find A Solution: Modular House (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113893

PASS CHRISTIAN, Miss. — Of the hundreds of houses swept away by Hurricane Katrina in this small Gulf Coast town, only a fraction have been replaced. The price of building materials has skyrocketed, and the services of even mediocre contractors can be hard to come by.

But on East North Street recently, a swarm of workmen put the final touches on Gwen and Rudy Cardreon's new home, a tan ranch house that sprang up, on 11-foot piling, in a matter of days. Constructed in three pieces in a factory hundreds of miles away, the house came equipped with carpets, curtains, even ceiling fans, but looks as if it were custom built in the Cardreons' yard.

"Isn't it gorgeous?" Mrs. Cardreon exclaimed, standing in her new kitchen as construction workers hammered on the wooden staircase outside.

Before the August 2005 hurricane, so-called modular houses like the Cardreons' were almost unknown in Mississippi, where houses tended to be the traditional "stick built" on site or mobile homes. Modulars have been popular until now mainly in Northern states with short building seasons and high labor costs.

But since the storm, modular houses, which range from simple shotgun-style cottages to fancy minimansions, are starting to appear across the Gulf Coast, as public officials and private citizens search for ways to speed the slow pace of recovery and begin experimenting with new forms of shelter.

Modular houses have a number of advantages over conventionally built houses, their advocates said. For example, once they are delivered, modular homes can sometimes be completed in days, rather than months. They are relatively easy to perch up on stilts to comply with flood zone rules. They require less local labor in a region where there is more than enough construction work to go around. Some are less expensive than conventional houses — they range from $50,000 to $500,000 — and manufacturers say some can withstand 160-mile-an-hour winds.

The number of modular houses on the Gulf Coast is still small; perhaps 400 have been installed in Mississippi in the last year, said Fred C. Hallahan, a consultant in Baltimore who tracks the modular business.

But Mr. Hallahan and other experts expect the trickle of modular housing to grow rapidly this year, and perhaps lead to even bigger changes.

"Really, if we look back 20 years from now, we could see a dramatic shift in the way houses get built," said David W. Hinson, a professor of architecture at Auburn University in Alabama.

In Mississippi, Hurricane Katrina destroyed 70,000 houses and apartments, according to state estimates; more than 30,000 families in the state still live in the small trailers supplied by the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Though Mississippi is widely considered to be far ahead of Louisiana in terms of recovery, only 2,480 building permits had been issued by the end of November for new home construction in the hardest-hit counties along the coast, according to the governor's office.

Officials cite many reasons for the slow going, including insurance issues, wetlands regulations, permit backlogs and infrastructure problems. And, of course, money: many people are still fighting with their insurance companies, and over the summer, Mississippi's grant program to help homeowners rebuild ran into some of the same bottlenecks that still plague Louisiana's Road Home program.

But after several adjustments, the Mississippi program has distributed more than $500 million to more than 8,000 homeowners, said Donna Sanford, who supervises the program for the Mississippi Development Authority. Last month, the federal Department of Housing and Urban Development approved a second phase of the program, to help low-income applicants and those who lived in the flood zones.

With the prospect of money finally starting to flow to housing, experiments are going on across the Gulf Coast as people look for ways to build more quickly, more cheaply and with more resistance to hurricanes.

Builders are exploring houses made of steel or concrete, and are considering putting housing above stores, as they do in concentrated urban areas like New York City. Volunteer groups have been ordering house-in-a-box kits from New Hope Construction, a nonprofit supplier in Tennessee that often works closely with churches.

Lowe's, the big building supply chain, says it will be selling everything necessary to build a Katrina Cottage, designed as a low-cost, high-quality alternative to trailers.

[Directed by Congress, even FEMA has gotten into the act, awarding about $400 million on Dec. 22 to various state-sponsored pilot programs to replace its travel trailers with roomier and sturdier housing.]

But the big push seems to be modular housing, which is being used not just by private developers, but also by Habitat for Humanity and Catholic Charities in New Orleans.

"It's the only answer, it is simply the only answer in Mississippi," said Fred Carl Jr., the founder of the Viking Range Corporation, who served as the Hurricane Katrina housing coordinator for Gov. Haley Barbour.

DOJ_NMG_0113894

Mr. Carl said he was trying to lure a major modular manufacturer to the state. “We need nine or ten thousand houses a year,” he said.

There is already one home-grown modular builder in Mississippi, Safeway Homes, which Buddy Jenkins and his brother started in 2005. “We’re really a stick-built house moved in component parts,” Mr. Jenkins said of his tidy houses, which are rated to withstand high winds.

At the company’s spotless plant in Lexington, a small town north of the state capital, Jackson, Joel E. Smith walks a visitor through the 16 stations where the houses are framed and insulated by about 100 workers. The ducts and plumbing are installed, fixtures added, doors and windows placed, and each half of a house is tightly screwed and glued.

Once they are delivered, a crane will lower the halves onto a foundation, where they will be joined, and a roof, also built at the plant, will be attached. The basic house costs about $58,000, company officials said, but the final cost will depend on the land, the foundation, the developer and whether the owner has chosen any extras like arched windows.

Safeway Homes has built about 250 houses, Mr. Smith said, and could make as many as three a day. But there are hurdles. Some are regulatory; building inspectors are often unfamiliar with modular housing, and customers must buy through a developer rather than from manufacturers. And some consumers still equate modular houses with mobile homes, in part because they are sold by many of the same manufacturers. That image problem is being tackled by Victor Planetta, a developer based in Louisiana who, with his son, Victor Jr., has started putting modular houses in their Mississippi developments.

Their showplace, on the main highway into Bay St. Louis, near Pass Christian, is a bright yellow, two-story house on pillars with a fountain burbling out front and a big motorboat named Beyond Belief out back in the canal.

The house, which was trucked in several pieces from a Genesis Homes plant in Lake City, Fla., and assembled on the site, has crown moldings, granite, silk flowers and tassels; there is even an elevator. More than 1,000 people have visited the house, which will sell for about $425,000, the Planettas said.

Here in the Pass, as the devastated town is known, about three dozen simple modular houses, including Gwen and Rudy Cardreon’s, have been installed though a program called Home Again. Phil Eide, who runs the program for ECD/Hope, a community development organization, said that modular housing had been harder to deal with than he had first hoped. For example, it takes 41 steps to get a permit, he said, and some suppliers make promises they do not keep.

But the program has attracted backing from James L. Barksdale, the former Internet executive and investor who served as chairman of Mississippi’s Commission on Recovery, Rebuilding and Renewal, who just bought about 35 modular houses that Home Again will place in communities.

Mr. Barksdale said he had become frustrated with the lack of progress in returning affordable housing to the Gulf Coast.

“My goal,” he said, “is to prove to people that we can do this, and then let it become a lot bigger program.”

WAR NEWS:

Pelosi, Reid Urge Bush To Begin Iraq Pullout (WP)

By Peter Baker, Robin Wright, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

President Considering Three "Surge" Options

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid declared yesterday that "it is time to bring the war to a close" and warned President Bush that sending more U.S. troops to Iraq would be unacceptable to the Democratic majorities that have just taken over Congress.

Directly challenging Bush's wartime leadership on their second day in charge on Capitol Hill, Democrats Pelosi (Calif.) and Reid (Nev.) sent Bush a letter suggesting that, instead of starting a short-term escalation, he begin a phased withdrawal of U.S. forces in the next four to six months. The mission of remaining troops, they said, should be shifted away from combat toward more training, logistics and counterterrorism.

The newly ascendant Democrats are trying to preempt the president before he announces his new strategy. As he prepares for a nationally televised address next week, officials said, Bush is considering three main options to bolster U.S. forces in Iraq: a relatively modest deployment of fewer than 4,000 additional troops, a middle-ground alternative involving about 9,000 and, the most aggressive idea, flowing 20,000 more troops into the country.

In a speech today unveiling his own revised security plan, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is expected to publicly welcome additional U.S. troops, a condition requested by the Bush administration. Maliki's cooperation is pivotal to Bush's own efforts. Bush told Maliki in a videoconference Thursday that the United States is willing to help but that Maliki has to deliver along the way, U.S. officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0113895

In preparation for the shift in strategy, Bush reshuffled his national security leadership team yesterday. He replaced the top two generals running the Iraq war, named a new Army chief of staff, moved his intelligence director over to the State Department and put a veteran officer in charge of intelligence. Officials have said he also plans to move his ambassador in Baghdad to the United Nations and replace him with a veteran diplomat.

Over the next few days before his speech, Bush is conducting intensive consultations with lawmakers, foreign allies and advisers. He met with lawmakers from both parties yesterday and plans to talk with leaders of Britain, Australia and possibly Denmark, countries that still have major military contingents in Iraq, according to U.S. officials and diplomats. The White House said he will talk with both Pelosi and Reid before announcing his new strategy.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said the sessions with lawmakers have featured "some vigorous exchanges" and have been useful. "The fact is that these meetings may not be happy-face 'Kumbaya,' but they have been very constructive in the sense that people are talking respectfully about important issues and expressing their ideas," he said. "And some of them are quite interesting. And we're taking them into account."

But some lawmakers have left the meetings unsatisfied. Sen. Ben Nelson (Neb.), a conservative Democrat needed by Bush if he hopes to have any support across the aisle, said he pressed the president yesterday to provide a clear and specific mission before ordering additional forces to Iraq. "The White House has to make the case for sending in more troops before they send the troops," he said. "We need a new direction, not just a new slogan."

Even many Republicans appear unenthusiastic about troop increases. Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said Thursday night on MSNBC's "Hardball" that he might say no to the surge. "I want to know what it all is," Lott said of Bush's overall plan. "But here's my main point: We've got to change the status quo. At some point we've got to say to the Iraqis, 'Congratulations. Saddam is dead. We've given you an opportunity for peace and freedom. It's yours.' "

The letter by Pelosi and Reid sent a signal that the new congressional leadership intends to be aggressive in voicing opposition to Bush's handling of the war. With their new majorities, they have a bigger political megaphone and more ability to bring pressure to bear. At the same time, Pelosi and Reid have eschewed using the main legislative mechanism to change policy, namely cutting off funding for the war.

"Surging forces is a strategy that you have already tried and that has already failed," Pelosi and Reid wrote. "Like many current and former military leaders, we believe that trying again would be a serious mistake. . . . Adding more combat troops will only endanger more Americans and stretch our military to the breaking point for no strategic gain."

By releasing the sternly worded letter, Democratic leaders hoped to jump ahead of Bush and set the agenda for the weekend talk shows. Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, said the party wants to address even the terminology of the White House plan, defining it not as a "surge" but as an "escalation." "People are going to know [the president] has a very critical audience in the Democratic Congress on this proposal," he said.

The prospect of increasing troop levels has been greeted with so much hostility that some lawmakers are questioning whether Bush is serious. "A surge is not a new strategy. A surge is a new tactic that does nothing to change the underlying strategy that has so clearly failed," said Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Calif.), a member of the House Armed Services Committee.

"I don't know if Mr. Bush even believes in this so-called surge," scoffed Rep. Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii), another member of the committee. "The neocons are trying to test the new Congress to see how we respond."

While the din of opposition has risen, the administration has not made a public case for why more troops would be the answer. Even senior military officers have expressed deep skepticism in public and outright opposition in private. Aside from some neoconservative scholars, virtually the only prominent voices advocating the troop increase are Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.), an independent who caucuses with the Democrats.

Bush is looking at three broad options involving one to five additional brigades, according to U.S. officials. The smallest increase would basically be limited to the brigade from the Army's 82nd Airborne Division, comprising fewer than 4,000 troops, which has already departed for Kuwait. It would eventually be deployed in Baghdad.

The second option would involve deploying another Army brigade to Baghdad and two battalions of Marines to Anbar, the volatile province that has been a battlefield for the Sunni insurgency and foreign fighters associated with al-Qaeda. The Marines could not be deployed until February, U.S. officials said. The joint Army and Marine deployment would bring the increase to between 9,000 and 10,000 troops.

The third option would supplement the first and second with additional Army brigades, bringing the total to about 20,000, largely deployed in the Iraqi capital. But U.S. officials said this would take considerable time -- possibly three or four months, with a complete deployment as late as May -- because of the difficulty of assembling additional troops through accelerating planned deployments and remobilizing reserves, U.S. officials said.

The Bush administration is also considering a troop increase that would play out in phases and in response to the performance of the Iraqi government in following through on its promises to go after illegal militias and crack down on sectarian violence. Maliki has in turn requested more operational control over Iraqi troops, which Washington is tentatively prepared to give him, U.S. officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0113896

Bush installed new U.S. figures yesterday to manage efforts in Iraq. As expected, he replaced Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, head of U.S. Central Command overseeing Middle East operations, with Navy Adm. William J. Fallon, and replaced Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the Iraq commander, with Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who would be given a fourth star. Bush also confirmed that John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence, will become deputy secretary of state and be replaced by Navy Adm. John M. McConnell.

Snow said the generals are not being replaced because of their resistance to increasing troop levels, calling Casey "magnificent" and Abizaid "an extraordinary officer." Casey will become Army chief of staff, and Abizaid is retiring.

Democrats signaled that they will start closely examining administration decisions on Iraq next week. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee announced a schedule for four weeks of hearings on Iraq featuring witnesses such as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; members of the Iraq Study Group, which recommended a new course in Iraq; a slew of former secretaries of state and defense; current and retired generals; and Middle East scholars.

"Our purpose is not to revisit the past," said Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), "but to help build a consensus behind a new course for America in Iraq."

Bush Facing A Deep Divide With Democrats Over Talk Of Increasing Troops In Iraq (NYT)

By David E. Sanger, Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — The new Democratic leaders of the Senate and the House warned President Bush on Friday against sending additional troops to Iraq, setting the stage for what could become a major confrontation over a new war strategy.

Mr. Bush is expected to call for more troops in a speech as soon as Wednesday, as part of a renewed effort to secure Baghdad. But Nancy Pelosi, the new speaker of the House, and Harry Reid, the new Senate majority leader, dismissed that approach as a strategy “that has already failed.”

“Adding more combat troops will only endanger more Americans and stretch our military to the breaking point for no strategic gain,” Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Reid wrote in a letter to Mr. Bush. “We are well past the point of more troops for Iraq,” they added, urging Mr. Bush to begin a “phased redeployment,” or gradual withdrawal.

Not all Democrats agree with the position their leaders staked out in the letter on Friday, just days before Mr. Bush is expected to announce a broad strategy involving more troops, accelerated training of Iraqi forces and a large increase in economic and reconstruction aid to Iraq. But the release of the letter suggests that a major political battle may be brewing.

Mr. Bush appeared to be trying to head off any confrontation when he invited 13 Democratic and Republican senators to the White House Friday for what administration officials called a “consultation” on Iraq.

At a later meeting, Mr. Bush met with the former chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, who cautioned that Congress would want to take time to consider the strategy before Mr. Bush began implementing it.

“The president has had this opportunity now for some weeks, and I think Congress is entitled to an opportunity to independently look at the situation,” Mr. Warner said.

Mr. Bush has begun to put parts of his plan in place, making official on Friday some changes that will insure new faces are associated with a new approach.

He announced the nomination of Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus as the new commander in Iraq, to succeed Gen. George W. Casey Jr., whom Mr. Bush said he intended to elevate to Army chief of staff.

Mr. Bush praised General Casey, who spent much of 2006 pressing for a gradual withdrawal of troops, as “strong and effective”; he hailed General Petraeus, who has reportedly backed an increase, as “a soldier of vision and determination.”

Mr. Bush is also remaking his diplomatic team, nominating John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, to be deputy secretary of state.

Ryan C. Crocker is expected to be nominated ambassador to Iraq. His nomination would for the first time place an Arabist with experience in sectarian conflicts, mostly in Lebanon, at the head of the embassy in Baghdad.

Administration and Congressional officials said they expected the military and diplomatic nominations to receive Senate approval, though senators might use the hearings to air dissent about any troop increase and draw attention to the perceived failings of Iraq strategy.

The bigger question is whether Congress will seek to stop the troop increase. In theory, it could cut off financing, the only way it could actually interfere with the commander in chief’s plans. But Democrats have said they would not take such a step, largely out of fear of being accused of undercutting the troops.

DOJ_NMG_0113897

That leaves them with only one option: holding a series of hearings, which start next week, immediately after the president's speech, that are intended to expose the divisions within the military over the wisdom of increasing troops. Many senior officers, including General Casey, have argued that adding American troops will undercut the effort to get the Iraqi government to defend itself.

Some Republican leaders insisted that Congress should not go down that path. "I don't think that we should be dictating military strategy in Iraq from Capitol Hill," said Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the Republican minority leader in the House.

In addition to the 13 senators, Democrats and Republicans, invited to the White House on Friday afternoon, those attending the meeting included Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, the Joint Chiefs chairman, Gen. Peter Pace, and Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser.

Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, who both are considering a presidential candidacy, arrived at the White House at nearly the same time. After the meeting, Mrs. Clinton did not issue a statement, while Mr. Obama spoke to reporters about his conversation with Mr. Bush.

"I personally indicated that an escalation of troop levels in Iraq was a mistake and that we need a political accommodation, rather than a military approach to the sectarian violence there," he said. "I think he recognizes that the status quo is unacceptable and has to change."

Senator Mary L. Landrieu, a Louisiana Democrat, said she would consider supporting an increase in troops for a short time if the president could articulate "specific opportunities for success," particularly cities that troops would be dispatched to and how long they would stay. Ms. Landrieu also said she would need to be convinced that there was a broader solution to limit American involvement in Iraq.

"The American people's patience is wearing thin with the vagueness," she said, speaking to reporters as she left the White House.

In interviews after the meeting, several senators said they could not tell whether Mr. Bush had made a decision whether to call for a troop increase. The senators described the meeting as frank but not confrontational. But even those who have supported the administration's Iraq policy said it was time for a change of course.

"I don't know that the American people will see the surge as a new direction," said Senator Ben Nelson, a Democrat from Nebraska. "The American people want to see a change in direction, not just a change in slogans."

Senator Blanche Lincoln, an Arkansas Democrat at the meeting, said an increase in troops would face considerable scrutiny in Congress from Democrats and Republicans.

"I asked the president, 'Where would that surge come from?' " Ms. Lincoln said. "He said that was a very good question."

Critics Slam Possible Iraq Troop Boost (AP)

By Jennifer Loven,

AP, January 6, 2007

Days from announcing an overhaul of Iraq strategy, President Bush on Friday encountered a wall of criticism of the U.S. troop escalation that is expected to be the centerpiece of his new war plan.

Bush also reshuffled his war commanders, installing a new team to support the policies he will announce next week. Democrats and Republicans alike took aim at the expected increase in U.S. forces.

"It has to be significant and sustained. Otherwise do not do it," said Sen. John McCain, a Republican presidential hopeful and Vietnam veteran who has been advocating a troop increase.

Those for going in the opposite direction spoke out, too.

"We are well past the point of more troops for Iraq," new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., wrote in a letter to Bush a day after their party took the reins on Capitol Hill. Instead, Pelosi and Reid urged Bush to begin pulling troops out in four to six months.

The criticism underscored that Bush, preparing his new policy for an increasingly unpopular and costly war, will face a Congress that is not only controlled by Democrats who could challenge him at any turn but also populated with Republicans looking toward the congressional and presidential elections of 2008.

The president spent much of the day in last-minute consultations with members of Congress from both parties, by all accounts soliciting their input while giving few hints of his own plans. But doubts about dispatching more soldiers to Iraq — which Democratic Sen. Ben Nelson called "the elephant in the room" at the White House — were expressed to the president's face and before various audiences around Washington.

Rep. Heather Wilson, R-N.M., an Air Force veteran and member of the House Intelligence Committee who had just returned from Iraq, lambasted Bush's war leadership as lacking "a clarity of mission."

DOJ_NMG_0113898

She spoke at a news conference against sending more Americans, saying the U.S. should be focused only on hunting for al-Qaida terrorists and ensuring Iraq does not become a source of regional instability.

"We're talking about goals in lofty terms that are not vital American national interests," she said.

CBS News reported that Defense Secretary Robert Gates has recommended that the president order an immediate 10,000 additional troops to Iraq with an option to double that number by spring under a plan in which five additional brigades of troops could eventually help in Baghdad and two battalions in troubled Anbar Province. Asked for comment, a senior defense official told The Associated Press that parts of the CBS report were incorrect but declined to say which parts or to comment on any recommendations Gates might have made to Bush.

Bush, meanwhile, announced more changes in his team of military and diplomatic advisers.

He said Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander overseeing the theater that includes Iraq, will be succeeded by Adm. William Fallon, now Abizaid's counterpart in the Pacific. Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus is the president's choice to be the new chief commander in Iraq, replacing Gen. George Casey. The nominations must be approved by the Senate.

Petraeus led the 101st Airborne Division during the 2003 Iraq invasion and later headed the effort to train Iraqi security forces.

Both Abizaid and Casey already had been expected to rotate out of their jobs. Both also had publicly expressed skepticism about a troop increase, and when Bush began devising a new Iraq plan their timetable appeared to move up.

Also, Ryan Crocker, a veteran American diplomat who is now U.S. envoy to Pakistan, was expected to replace Zalmay Khalilzad as U.S. ambassador to Iraq. Bush nominated Khalilzad, a subject of criticism in Iraq as favoring his fellow Sunni Muslims, to become the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

In a White House that prides itself on discipline, there was much confusion about the personnel changes. There was a torrent of news leaks, unsuccessful efforts by the White House to control the flow of information and messy shifts in how the announcements would be made.

The president's talks Friday with several groups of lawmakers included moderate Democrats and loyalist Republicans but also some of the president's biggest critics, such as Democratic Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama.

"He did say he has not made up his mind yet," said Rep. Chris Carney, a freshman Democrat from Pennsylvania who is in the Navy Reserve and served as a Pentagon intelligence analyst.

Republican Sen. Norm Coleman, part of a later meeting with over a dozen senators of both parties, said the skepticism about whether a burst of troops could achieve anything was nearly universal.

"I don't think there was a sense that case had been made," said Coleman, from Minnesota.

Several senators said Bush promised an increase would be done only in concert with greater efforts by the Iraqi government, which has failed to rein in the Shiite militias and to supply the promised amount of Iraqi forces to work alongside Americans.

Nelson, who said he walked away with no doubt Bush is planning to boost troops, said the president suggested there would be "the expectation of the Iraqis carrying out their part of the deal or else." But, said the Nebraska Democrat, the president did not define the consequences.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, set to unveil his own revamped strategy within days, is himself uneasy about more American troops, preferring that the U.S. presence be pulled back to Baghdad's outskirts.

During a nearly two-hour discussion Thursday, Bush told al-Maliki he was ready to send additional U.S. forces. But the Iraqi leader replied "he would have to talk that over with his senior military officers to see if they were needed," Sami al-Askari, an al-Maliki political adviser, told The Associated Press.

Sen. Joe Lieberman, meanwhile, agreed with McCain that a small, temporary force boost would not be enough. Neither of the senators, appearing together at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, would put a precise number on how many more troops might be necessary.

However, they said that — at minimum — it should be another three to five brigades for Baghdad, where Shiite militias are terrorizing the minority Sunni population, and one brigade for western Anbar Province, the center of the mostly Sunni anti-American insurgency. With about 3,500 troops in each brigade, that would total 14,000 to 21,000 additional troops.

A letter from 28 House Republicans urged Bush to divert some of the 21 Iraqi battalions operating in peaceful provinces to Baghdad and other dangerous areas, to spare U.S. troops.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Bush's meetings with lawmakers were more than just window dressing.

He said, "The fact is, these meetings may not be happy-face, kumbaya, but they have been very constructive."

___

Associated Press writers Deb Riechmann, Anne Flaherty, Liz Sidoti, Kimberly Hefling, Jennifer Talhelm and Frederic J. Frommer and Pauline Jelinek contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0113899

Reid, Pelosi Rip Iraq Buildup (WT)

By Stephen Dinan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

Top House and Senate Democrats yesterday said they oppose boosting the number of troops in Iraq, giving them a jump on President Bush's speech next week detailing a new war strategy and setting a roadblock in front of one of the major options he is considering.

"Surging forces is a strategy that you have already tried and that has already failed. Like many current and former military leaders, we believe that trying again would be a serious mistake," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid wrote in a letter designed to frame the debate as Mr. Bush tries to devise what the White House calls a new way forward in Iraq.

Meanwhile, in a shake-up in advance of the speech, Mr. Bush nominated a new deputy secretary of state, director of national intelligence, commander of U.S. forces in Iraq and head of Central Command, the post that oversees the broader war on terrorism in the Middle East.

"It makes sense to go ahead and make sure that you're going to have your command team that is going to be in place as you're working on this new way forward and enacting it," White House press secretary Tony Snow said, adding that some of the outgoing military commanders' jobs would have expired in the middle of implementing the new strategy.

Mr. Snow said the president is "moving in a direction" toward a revamped strategy, but is still listening for ideas.

Now, though, he is facing a challenge from Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, and Mr. Reid, Nevada Democrat, at the beginning of the new Congress.

Their letter puts them out in front of Mr. Bush's speech next week, filling the vacuum created as the president works out his new strategy and earning them part of the discussion on the Sunday political talk shows.

But it also comes on the heels of criticism that Democrats are ignoring the concerns of the anti-war faction of their party, and just days after an anti-war demonstration led by activist Cindy Sheehan drowned out a Democratic press conference on Capitol Hill.

Asked about the leaders' letter, Mr. Snow said the administration shares some of the Democrats' goals, such as renewed diplomatic efforts, and chose to focus on the section where the leaders said they "want to do everything we can to help Iraq succeed in the future."

"The ultimate objective here is not to engage in sparring, but to engage in an open dialogue with people on both sides of the aisle," Mr. Snow said.

In their letter, the two leaders pointed to Gen. John Abizaid, the head of Central Command, who said in congressional testimony that bringing in more troops would run counter to trying to get the Iraqis to do more.

Gen. Abizaid lost his job in yesterday's shake-up -- his retirement was announced by the Pentagon -- though Mr. Snow said the administration still values his counsel. Adm. William J. Fallon will replace him at Central Command.

Meanwhile, Gen. George Casey will be moved from commander of U.S forces in Iraq to become Army chief of staff. He will be replaced in Iraq by Lt. Gen. David Petraeus.

The letter is just one part of the Democrats flexing their newfound muscle on foreign policy and the strategy in Iraq.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat and chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, announced a schedule of four weeks of hearings to look at U.S. strategy in Iraq, while Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and chairman of the Judiciary Committee's immigration and refugees subcommittee, will hold a hearing on Iraqi refugees.

If Mr. Bush does choose to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq -- something Mr. Snow said had not been decided yet -- he will have the backing of two prominent senators: Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent.

Speaking together at the American Enterprise Institute, the two lawmakers endorsed a strategy of increasing troops and shifting from training Iraqi security forces to protecting the Iraqi people. Mr. McCain said that the increase must be significant and sustained, and that Americans must be prepared for more casualties, but that the fight is necessary.

"There is somehow the belief, that I don't quite comprehend, that we just come home and then it's over," Mr. McCain said.

Mr. Lieberman warned that leaving Iraq at this juncture would lead to a complete collapse of the country, chaos that would spread across the region and inflame greater Islamic extremism.

Both men also endorsed the change in military leadership.

The military shake-up was coupled yesterday with Mr. Bush nominating John D. Negroponte to become the deputy secretary of state, and nominating retired Vice Adm. Mike McConnell to fill Mr. Negroponte's current slot as director of national intelligence.

DOJ_NMG_0113900

Reid And Pelosi Warn Bush Against "Surge" (RC)

By John Stanton

RollCall.com, January 5, 2007

Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) today rejected an expected Bush administration proposal to sharply increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq and called on the administration to drop the "surge proposal."

In a letter to President Bush, Pelosi and Reid called the plan little more than a retread of the administration's previous failed attempts to quell the violence in Iraq. "Surging forces is a strategy that you have already tried and that has already failed," Pelosi and Reid wrote in the letter, adding that, "like many current and former military leaders, we believe that trying again would be a serious mistake. They, like us, believe there is no purely military solution in Iraq. There is only a political solution. Adding more combat troops will only endanger more Americans and stretch our military to the breaking point for no strategic gain. And it would undermine our efforts to get the Iraqis to take responsibility for their own future. We are well past the point of more troops for Iraq."

The sharply worded letter — the first formal communication between the two new leaders of Congress and Bush — comes as the president is preparing for a major address to the nation on the Iraq War and his plans for overhauling his administration's approach to prosecuting the conflict.

Democrats Blast Bush's Iraq "Surge" Policy (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 5, 2007

Democratic congressional leaders Friday issued a warning to President Bush on his publicly signaled plans to escalate the U.S. troop presence in Iraq, presaging four weeks of Senate hearings that promise to bring sharp scrutiny and criticism for the White House's war policy.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) sent a letter to Bush requesting he abandon plans for a troop "surge" in an all-out bid to stabilize Iraq, calling the strategy one "you have already tried and that has already failed." Reid and other Senate Democratic leaders reiterated their strong disapproval of the Bush gambit during an all-day retreat at the Library of Congress.

"The people of this country no longer support the war in Iraq," Reid told reporters, adding that Democrats are willing to work with the president but "we believe the tactic would be a serious mistake."

Reid had previously voiced tentative openness to the surge proposal, telling ABC News' "This Week" on Dec. 17 that he could back temporary military escalation if it were part of a strategy to withdraw from Iraq by next year. The majority leader, who supported last year's Democratic call for an immediate start to withdrawal, said he heeded the words from U.S. commanders in Iraq who also rejected the surge.

"The president said he was going to listen to his commanders," Reid said. Referring to the pending arrivals of a new chief of U.S. Central Command and a new senior commander in Iraq, Reid added: "I know he's going to shuffle some of them out, obviously because they're not telling him what he wants to hear."

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee Tuesday will begin four weeks of in-depth hearings on the war, starting with a closed briefing from intelligence officials and featuring testimony from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, committee Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.). Sen. Richard Lugar (Ind.), the panel's ranking Republican, fully endorsed the ambitious schedule, but Reid and Pelosi's letter earned criticism from one Senate GOP leader.

"In less than 24 hours after opening the new Congress, with calls of working together in the sprit of bipartisanship and putting aside divisive rhetoric, it is disappointing, and more than a touch ironic, that the Democratic leadership has decided to start criticizing this new approach even before it is announced," Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), Republican conference chairman, said in a statement.

Kyl harkened back to Thursday's bipartisan Senate caucus, which emphasized bipartisanship and comity: "In the spirit of national unity, we should at least hear what the president proposes before we criticize it; and once we hear him out, work together in giving his proposals an opportunity to work."

Democrats Step Up Iraq Pressure (BBC)

BBC.com, January 5, 2007

US Democrat leaders have urged President George W Bush not to increase troop levels in Iraq, days before he is expected to announce such a move.

DOJ_NMG_0113901

The Democrats, in control of Congress for the first time in 12 years, stepped up pressure ahead of Mr Bush's new policy initiative on Iraq.

The administration has confirmed it is replacing two top US military leaders in Iraq as part of the new strategy.

Mr Bush also announced a new national intelligence director.

'Political battle'

On the first full day of Democratic control of Congress, the new leaders of both Houses called on Mr Bush not to raise troop levels in Iraq.

Correspondents say the president's policy initiative could include a deployment of 10,000 to 20,000 fresh troops in and around Baghdad to disarm militia groups there.

Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid called for a phased withdrawal of forces

But in a letter to the president, Senate Democratic Leader, Harry Reid, and House of Representatives Speaker, Nancy Pelosi, said adding more combat troops would stretch the US military to breaking point with no strategic gain.

They instead urged a phased redeployment of US forces, starting in four to six months, with a re-emphasis on training, logistics and counter-terrorism operations in Iraq.

The BBC's Justin Webb in Washington says this is an aggressive move from the Democrats, setting the stage for a huge political battle.

Mr Bush cannot be prevented from sending more troops, our correspondent says, but he may pay a big political cost if the deployment is carried out amid fierce congressional opposition.

Top Democrats Balk At Troop Surge (BOS)

By Bryan Bender, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 6, 2007

Pelosi, Reid send warning to Bush

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's anticipated decision to increase troop levels in Iraq set off a pitched battle yesterday as newly empowered Democrats warned the White House against an escalation of an unpopular war while two influential senators who want to send more forces drew hundreds of anti war protesters when they appeared at a conservative Washington think tank.

To preempt Bush's scheduled announcement of a new Iraq strategy on Wednesday, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate majority leader Harry Reid told the president that sending thousands more troops into combat is a bad idea, declaring that "no issue is more important than finding an end to the war in Iraq."

The increase, described as a "surge" of forces, "is a strategy that you have already tried and that has already failed," the Democratic leaders wrote in a letter delivered to the White House yesterday. "Like many current and former military leaders, we believe that trying again would be a serious mistake."

Several House committee chairmen agreed with the letter and vowed to fight such a decision.

Meanwhile, anti war demonstrators -- chanting and carrying "No Escalation in Iraq" placards -- stood in the rain outside the American Enterprise Institute in downtown Washington, where proponents of the surge plan convened at a forum featuring Senators John McCain of Arizona and Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut. McCain, a Republican, and Lieberman, an independent, agree with the idea of sending more troops to Iraq.

"Escalating the number of troops is only going to escalate the violence," said protester Tim Goodrich , co founder of Iraq Veterans Against the War, standing near the American Enterprise Institute yesterday. The liberal grass-roots organization MoveOn.org had enlisted Goodrich and others to demonstrate.

Democrats believe Bush is about to dispatch up to 40,000 more troops to the war, an attempt to stem the rising violence in Baghdad. Despite taking both houses of Congress on an antiwar platform, party leaders worry they can't do much to stop the president -- short of the politically unpalatable move of ending funding for the war.

"We don't have many options," said Representative Solomon Ortiz , a Texas Democrat set to oversee military readiness issues. "If the president decides he is not going to wait for us to have hearings and the troops are going there, we are going to be criticized by the American public if we don't support them."

"He is going to send them," Ortiz added, "and we're going to have to pay for it."

Some congressional aides raised the prospect that lawmakers could place conditions on war funding, such as refusing to pay for additional military brigades. But they doubted such measures would have any effect: As a wartime commander in chief, Bush can simply ignore them.

Skepticism of the surge plan has come from a variety of quarters, including the top military brass.

DOJ_NMG_0113902

General John Abizaid , commander of US forces in the Middle East, has testified in the Senate against more troops. The senior commander in Iraq, General George Casey, has warned that additional troops could further inflame the situation.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have reportedly expressed reservations about the surge plan in recent meetings with the president and his national security team. Senator Richard Lugar, a Republican of Indiana and former chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has also questioned the logic of sending more troops.

"This is a political decision, not military strategy," said Representative Neil Abercrombie , a Democrat of Hawaii who is set to chair a key House subcommittee on the military. "There is simply no reasonable expectation that an additional 15,000 to 20,000 US troops in Baghdad is going to suddenly and miraculously stop Iraqis from killing Iraqis. In fact, there is a great deal of evidence and judgment to the contrary."

Still, there is growing support for one last show of military force to clamp down on the violence in Baghdad. And McCain and Lieberman, the primary supporters of that strategy, were the key participants at the AEI forum yesterday.

The institute has released an updated blueprint for salvaging the Iraq mission, chiefly through a larger US military commitment. The escalation plan is the brainchild of American Enterprise Institute scholar Frederick W. Kagan , and retired Army General Jack Keane , a member of the Pentagon's Defense Policy Board who has recently briefed Bush on the need for additional troops.

Because AEI was the intellectual breeding ground for many of the Bush administration neoconservatives who originally championed the war, some were puzzled by AEI's continued influence on White House policy. Bush "appears to be taking advice from the very same people who advised him in 2002 and 2003," said Chris Preble , director of foreign policy studies at the libertarian Cato Institute.

Yet the AEI plan appears to be at the forefront of administration deliberations.

"Victory is still an option in Iraq," the AEI report declares. "The strategy of relying on a political process to eliminate the insurgency has failed. Rising sectarian violence threatens to break America's will to fight. This violence will destroy the Iraqi government, armed forces, and people if it is not rapidly controlled."

The report called for adding a total of seven Army brigades and Marine regiments as partners with Iraqi forces in Baghdad and "clear high-violence Sunni and mixed Sunni-Shia neighborhoods" of the city. The authors acknowledged the strategy will take "a national commitment to victory in Iraq," including longer tours for ground troops for the foreseeable future.

Achieving such a commitment, however, seemed a longshot.

"It is a profoundly bad idea on so many levels," said Ortiz. "More troops mean more targets for all sides in this expanding civil war."

Representative Marty Meehan , a Lowell Democrat and senior member of the House Armed Services, said yesterday he is drafting a resolution to express congressional disapproval of any major increase in US force levels. "The time for a surge in troops was three and a half years ago," he said. "It's too late."

In sizing up the surge debate, several observers used the Vietnam War as an analogy, noting that even though support for that war plunged after the Tet Offensive in January 1968, President Lyndon Johnson continued to send troops. They remained in Vietnam for seven more years.

"I don't know what they can do," one congressional aide said of the Democrats' prospects to influence the president's decision, noting that Johnson was known as a stubborn president. Bush "is at least as headstrong as LBJ."

Senators Back Call For More Troops In Iraq (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

John McCain, the leading Republican presidential hopeful, on Friday strongly endorsed a neo-conservative think-tank report that many see as the basis for the “new way forward in Iraq” strategy that George W. Bush will unveil next week.

Mr McCain, who shared a platform with Joe Lieberman, the independent Democratic senator and former vice-presidential candidate, said Mr Bush’s expected “surge” of US forces to Iraq should persist until the job of stabilising the security situation has been achieved.

The report, “Choosing Victory: A Plan for Success in Iraq”, was sponsored by the American Enterprise Institute and authored by Frederick Kagan. The senators on Friday strongly rejected last month’s findings of the Iraq Study Group, which eschewed the word “victory” in its report.

“The troop surge must be substantial and it must be sustained,” Mr McCain told an audience at the AEI. “It will mean extra hardships for our men and women in uniform and the violence will get worse before it gets better.”

DOJ_NMG_0113903

The two senators strongly rejected the Democratic leadership's call for a timeline for the phased withdrawal of US troops from Iraq, which they said would play into the hands of the insurgent groups and militias which would simply await the expiry of the deadline.

Nancy Pelosi, the new Democratic speaker of the House of Representatives, and Harry Reid, the Democratic Senate majority leader, on Friday issued a statement urging Mr Bush to pull back from announcing the expected "surge".

They said it would cut against the verdict of the US electorate in last November's midterm elections.

"Rather than deploy additional forces to Iraq, we believe the way forward is to begin the phased redeployment of our forces in the next four to six months," they said.

However, officials say Mr Bush will base his strategy on conviction rather than opinion polls or the views of the Democratic party.

On Friday Mr Bush appointed David Petraeus, a widely respected general, to replace George Casey in charge of US forces in Iraq.

Gen Petraeus has twice served in Iraq as head of the 101st Airborne division and is considered the person best suited to head a strategy that would focus US forces primarily on "clear, hold and build" operations aimed at winning the confidence of the Iraqi population.

The main target areas would be Baghdad, the capital, and the primarily Sunni al-Anbar province.

Troop Surge Can't Be Brief, Backers Insist (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel, Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

Some GOP senators facing reelection want conditions on Iraq.

The leading advocates of an increase in U.S. forces in Iraq warned President Bush on Friday that any buildup lasting less than 18 months was doomed to fail, and urged the White House to avoid compromises that would scale back the plan.

The hard line taken by such backers as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz) and retired Army Gen. Jack Keane comes as the Bush administration continues to debate the size and the scope of an expected troop increase. White House spokesman Tony Snow said Bush has "not entirely" made up his mind, even as he reorganized his top war advisors and began meeting with key members of Congress in advance of a major address next week.

Bush faces growing unease about an extended buildup among some congressional Republicans, who are concerned that it could stretch into the 2008 election season and doom their reelection chances. In the Senate, there are about five to 10 such Republicans, according to GOP aides, who are expected to push for time limits or firm conditions in return for backing the increase.

"For any kind of a surge, they would have to show that the surge itself was limited," said one senior Republican leadership aide. "It would have to be 6 months or a year, tops."

However, a strategy advocated by McCain and Keane, who has advised Bush on Iraq policy, calls for about 30,000 additional troops who would remain in Iraq from 18 months to two years. About 140,000 U.S. troops are now in Iraq. The plan has heavily influenced administration thinking and has strong advocates within the Pentagon and White House, setting up tension between those advocating a broad troop buildup and supporters of a more limited increase.

"The worst of all worlds would be a short, small surge of U.S. forces," McCain said at a forum on the final version of the plan, developed by Keane and Frederick Kagan, a military analyst at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative Washington think tank. "This troop surge [must be] significant and sustained; otherwise, don't do it."

Advocates of the plan say a large, sustained increase is needed to hold and rebuild pacified Baghdad neighborhoods, which have seen a return of sectarian violence once overstretched U.S. troops move onto other parts of the capital. A short-term or limited troop increase would allow insurgents and sectarian death squads to wait out the U.S. offensive, advocates argue.

"The enemy always expects us to surge and leave," said Kagan, a former faculty member at the U.S. Military Academy. "If we surge for 3 or 6 months and then pull our forces back, the enemy will be right there waiting."

But a more substantial buildup appears to be running into opposition from some within the president's own party. The senior Republican leadership aide said that GOP skeptics in the Senate either oppose or have significant reservations about a troop increase.

"We have people on all sides of this. We're all over the map," the aide said, speaking on condition of anonymity while discussing internal party deliberations.

Only three of those Republican skeptics have gone public so far — Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.), Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.). All three are Republicans in states with a large Democratic electorate and are facing reelection in 2008. Some Republicans fear the buildup will be seen as an escalation of the current policy.

DOJ_NMG_0113904

"Some are calling this 'staying the course — super-sized,'" said a senior staffer for a skeptical Republican moderate.

McCain said he believed any Republican fence-sitters would rally around the president once the plan is announced, which could come as soon as Wednesday.

"Most of my Republican colleagues are waiting to hear the president," McCain said. "I think you'll see, at the end of the day, most Republicans will support the president's proposal."

The new Democratic leadership in Congress came out forcefully Friday against any increase in troops, calling on Bush in a letter to reject calls for escalation, arguing it would allow the Iraqi government to delay taking over responsibility for their own security.

The letter, signed by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), said their views were shared by senior military leaders and warned that an increase could overstretch U.S. ground forces.

"We're willing to work with the president on a new way forward, but the surge is not the way forward," Reid said at a news conference. "The president said he was going to listen to his commanders, but if he listens to his commanders he can't do this. I know he's shuffling some of them out, I've been told it's because they're not telling them what he wants to hear."

Other leading Democrats, however, appeared to be more open to the proposal.

Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich), chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee and a backer of plans to gradually withdraw troops from Iraq, said he could support an increase in troops as long as the Iraqi government took concrete steps to achieve political reconciliation within the country before new forces were sent.

"That at least puts pressure on Iraqis," Levin said. "That's what I would call 'hard conditionality.'"

Bush continued his reorganization of his Iraq team ahead of next week's strategy announcement. In the latest shift, Bush named Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the U.S. ground commander in Iraq for the last two years, as the Army's new chief of staff, taking over from Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, whose term expires in August.

The move was widely anticipated while Donald H. Rumsfeld was Defense secretary, but there had been speculation within the Pentagon that Casey would retire, given the administration's shift away from his strategy in Iraq.

Bush also confirmed reports he would replace Casey in Iraq with Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, believed to be an advocate of a more complex counterinsurgency campaign, and would nominate Navy Adm. William J. "Fox" Fallon as the new head of U.S. Central Command, the military's Middle East headquarters being vacated by retiring Army Gen. John P. Abizaid.

Bush also formally nominated retired Navy Vice Adm. J. Michael McConnell as the new director of national intelligence, replacing John D. Negroponte, who is moving to become the No. 2 official at State.

There were hints that even more moves were in the works. John Hillen, the State Department assistant secretary in charge of political and military affairs who played a key role in the agency's efforts in Iraq, has made plans to leave the department this month. His departure comes after only 15 months in the job.

Bush is also expected to name Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, to become the new envoy to the United Nations, to be replaced by Ryan Crocker, currently the U.S. envoy to Pakistan. Khalilzad will take the place of John R. Bolton, who left the job at the end of a recess appointment when it became clear he did not have Senate backing to remain in the post. As part of his ongoing consultations in advance of his announcement next week, Bush and members of his national security team met Friday with a group of 15 senators to discuss Iraq policy.

According to senators in attendance and White House officials, Bush did not disclose any details of his thinking. Congressional aides said the White House did not intend to brief their leaders on specifics of his plan until Wednesday, just hours before Bush delivers the nationwide speech, a move that has angered Reid.

Despite the lack of details, Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), one of those who attended the meeting in the Cabinet Room, said in an interview that Bush's plan appeared likely to include a substantial buildup.

"I did walk away believing that a surge of some sort will be part of any plan," Nelson said. "But I do believe ... another part would be a set of conditions for the Iraqis to go through, for Prime Minister [Nouri] Maliki to go through."

Other senators in attendance said there was widespread skepticism among both Democrats and Republicans about the troop increase. Many advocated inclusion of strict guidelines and benchmarks to prod the Iraqi government into action.

"I would say that they were all opposed to it unless he come up with some spectacular idea and a way to measure that idea," said Sen. Blanche Lincoln (D-Ark.), another participant. "They weren't unequivocally against it, but most would say ... the burden of proof was on the president."

Added Nelson: "I don't think there was anything partisan about the skepticism. But the message was, tell us more and when you tell us more we can make up our minds."

Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) told the president that "he has the burden of proof" if he wants to send more troops.

"He has to show the American people what we do next," Pryor said.

DOJ_NMG_0113905

The assertion by Snow, the presidential spokesman, that Bush has yet to make up his mind on the plan was echoed in other parts of the government, and there are indications the White House is considering options short of a full-scale, long-term buildup.

Although the most likely scenario includes an increase of 20,000 troops, another option is a gradual increase of forces, which could see a portion of new forces sent into Iraq while other brigades are kept in the U.S. or Kuwait as backup forces.

Iraqi Politicians Divided Over U.S. Envoy (WP)

By Joshua Partlow, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Khalilzad's Expected Departure Pleases Shiites, Worries Sunnis

BAGHDAD, Jan. 5 -- The news of the expected departure of U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad split Iraqi politicians along sectarian lines, with members of the ruling Shiite alliance voicing eagerness for him to leave and minority Sunnis expressing concern at the loss of an ally.

Members of the U.S.-backed government in Iraq have grown increasingly frustrated with what they see as Khalilzad's efforts to reach out to Sunni groups, and many argue that the U.S. military confronts Shiite militias more aggressively than it does Sunni insurgents.

With both Iraqi and U.S. governments considering new strategies to stem the violence in Baghdad, including increasing the number of U.S. troops, the time seems right for new leadership, Iraqi politicians said Friday.

"Lately there has been a lot of criticism by the Shiites against [Khalilzad], saying he is pro-Sunni. A new face with this new strategy, possibly that would be more effective," said Mahmoud Othman, a senior Kurdish legislator who is regarded as independent.

U.S. officials have said they expect Khalilzad to be replaced by Ryan C. Crocker, the current U.S. envoy to Pakistan, who worked in Iraq earlier in his career. President Bush also picked Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who is credited with reducing sectarian violence in the northern Iraqi city of Mosul, to replace Gen. George W. Casey Jr. as the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

Shiite officials have been critical of some U.S. military operations targeting the Mahdi Army, the vast militia led by Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. Khalilzad said in March that the militias posed the greatest threat to Iraq's stability.

In October, the Iraqi government ordered the United States to remove blockades around Sadr City, the Baghdad slum that is home to many Mahdi Army militiamen.

"Obviously, they're not great fans of Khalilzad," said an official in Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government who spoke on condition of anonymity. Khalilzad's efforts have "failed in reducing the number of attacks, either on Iraqis or Americans, and at the same time it created a negative attitude toward the Americans amongst the Shia."

U.S. Embassy officials have said that they do not favor one sect over the other and that reducing the violence requires difficult compromises for all parties.

Sunni lawmakers said Khalilzad's deep knowledge of Iraq's complex political landscape and his openness to Sunni concerns will be missed. Khalilzad is a Sunni Muslim of Afghan descent.

"It is an American decision, and we respect the American decision," said Alaa Makki, a leading Sunni legislator. "But nevertheless, we want those people to be close consultants to the Iraqi field, people who have lived the problem -- they didn't read or hear about the problems."

Mithal Alousi, a secular Sunni lawmaker who considers the ambassador a friend, said Khalilzad's expected appointment as U.S. envoy to the United Nations could help attract more international support for Iraq.

The replacement of top U.S. officials would be a "very good tactical move," Alousi said. "We're talking about a new state and a new strategy, and I think it will be very useful to have a fully new team."

But in the fourth year of violence in Iraq, and with the continuing presence of U.S. troops, some Iraqi leaders express resignation about whether new U.S. leaders on the ground can make a difference.

"I think it all depends on the Iraqis, the political leaders and the religious leaders," Othman said. "I don't think outside countries could solve their problem."

"The American strategy is fixed and obvious and doesn't change by the changing of personnel or leaders," said Nassar al-Rubaie, the leader of a bloc in parliament loyal to Sadr. "While they were counting on the American forces and were not giving wide authority to the prime minister, the security situation was deteriorating, and this will keep happening even if they increase the forces to 10 times the ones that already exist."

A U.S. Embassy spokesman in Baghdad declined to comment on Khalilzad's plans.

The violence in Iraq continued on Friday. A 28-year-old Associated Press photographer, Ahmed Hadi Naji, was found shot in the head several days after he went missing in Baghdad, the news service reported.

DOJ_NMG_0113906

Also, a U.S. citizen was reported kidnapped Friday morning in northern Basra, a city in the south of Iraq. U.S. Embassy officials said they were looking into the reports.

Zalmay Khalilzad, On To A New Trouble Spot (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — In successive tours in Afghanistan and Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad earned a reputation as a high-flying, independent, smooth operator — an Afghan-born problem solver who worked with two fragile countries recently invaded by the United States to try to cobble together stability.

Now, as President Bush's choice to become the next ambassador to the United Nations, Mr. Khalilzad is headed to another American trouble spot, though his record would suggest that he is less likely to ruffle bureaucratic feathers than his predecessor, John R. Bolton, who often seemed to regard the organization as a foe.

Mr. Khalilzad joined the Bush administration as a well-known, neoconservative hawk, in the style of Paul D. Wolfowitz, the former deputy defense secretary. Born in Afghanistan and educated in Beirut and the United States, Mr. Khalilzad, as a policy planner in President Reagan's State Department during the 1980s, argued that the United States should arm Afghanistan's mujahedeen.

He was America's first ambassador to Afghanistan, where he became known as the "viceroy," a term evocative of colonialism. He became known for his ability to weave through warring tribal factions and his ability to quickly get senior Afghan officials on the phone or to summon them to his office, including President Hamid Karzai.

In 2005, he was sent to Iraq, where he failed the task of bringing stability, but succeeded in helping Iraqis to agree on a Constitution. Arriving in Baghdad, he quickly recognized that his marching instructions from Washington — that Iraq's Constitution should reflect a strong central government with strong control over the country's oil resources — were not achievable. Mr. Khalilzad advised his bosses that any deal on an Iraqi Constitution would have to provide for greater regional control over the country's oil fields, a key demand of Iraq's Kurdish population.

"He was pragmatic to see that the instructions he had were not achievable, and he had enough clout in Washington to get them changed," said Peter W. Galbraith, the former United States ambassador to Croatia and the author of "The End of Iraq."

Mr. Bolton, the fiery former ambassador, could not have done that, Mr. Galbraith and other current and former diplomats said, because Mr. Bolton seemed to view the world in starker terms of black and white, and shied away from compromise, even though that approach is prized at the United Nations. The blunt-spoken Mr. Bolton's confrontational style often conflicted with the understated ways of the United Nations.

Mr. Khalilzad is no shrinking violet but he is less confrontational, people who have worked with both men at the State Department said. "I think he will be welcomed and will get a good response at the U.N., because of his experience, but also simply because he's following John Bolton, who broke a lot of crockery," said Mitchell B. Reiss, a former policy and planning director at the State Department who is now vice provost at the College of William and Mary.

Zalmay Mamozy Khalilzad, known as Zal to his colleagues and friends, was born on March 22, 1951, in Mazar-i-Sharif, Afghanistan, to an urbanized, highly educated and outward-looking Kabul family. During his high school years, Mr. Khalilzad attended the Ghazi Lycée in Kabul, a rigorous, elite school, and went out for the Afghan national basketball team.

He attended the American University of Beirut and then the University of Chicago, where he studied under Albert Wohlstetter, the innovator in strategic nuclear doctrine. Mr. Khalilzad received his Ph.D. in 1979, taught political science at Columbia University and joined the State Department in 1984. He is married to Cheryl Bernard, a political analyst with the RAND Corporation. They have two children, Alexander and Maximilian.

Mr. Khalilzad, a Sunni Muslim, is known at the State Department for his staunch — some say, swaggering — belief that he is a deal broker who can solve any problem. State Department staffers sometimes joked that Mr. Khalilzad, who has advocated talking to Iran, might one day go off script, personally meet with Iran's ruling mullahs and return to inform his bosses that he had worked everything out in American-Iranian relations.

During his time as the United States ambassador to Iraq, Mr. Khalilzad received permission from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to hold talks with Iran about the deteriorating security situation in Iraq. But those talks never happened, although Ms. Rice has consistently referred to "the Zal channel" as an option that the United States could use at any time if Bush officials decided they wanted to talk to Iran.

Mr. Khalilzad speaks Arabic and Persian and often fingered worry beads during long sessions with Sunni and Shiite leaders in Iraq. The fact that he is a Sunni Muslim did not always play well among Iraq's majority Shiite population, and he was sometimes viewed with suspicion and sometimes accused of favoring Sunnis.

DOJ_NMG_0113907

In recent months, he has told colleagues that he was ready to leave Iraq. He was considered for the position of Ms. Rice's deputy, the job for which John D. Negroponte has been nominated.

State Department officials said they expected Mr. Khalilzad would get along better with bureaucrats at the United Nations than did Mr. Bolton, but noted that they still expected him to carry on America's agenda for change.

Ryan Clark Crocker, A Diplomat Used To Danger (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — When Ryan C. Crocker was trying to improve his Arabic in the late 1970s, he traveled to Jordan, made contact with a desert tribe and settled in for some hands-on training a little different from the standard State Department regimen.

"He wound up being a shepherd for a week or two, chasing down stray sheep and living with the Bedouin," said Frederic C. Hof, a retired Army officer and author on the Middle East who recalls reading Mr. Crocker's official report on the trip when they were in language training.

Mr. Crocker, President Bush's choice as the new ambassador to Iraq, has brought the same intensity to his three-decade diplomatic career, amassing a record of Middle East and South Asia experience possibly unrivaled in the United States Foreign Service.

He has served as ambassador to Lebanon, Kuwait, Syria and, since 2004, Pakistan. He reopened the American Embassy in Afghanistan after the fall of the Taliban. And he knows Iraq well; he worked there in the 1970s, led the State Department's Iraq-Kuwait task force during the Persian Gulf war in 1991 and returned to Baghdad for four months after the 2003 invasion as director of governance for the Coalition Provisional Authority.

In confronting Iraq's sectarian mayhem and the baffling mix of religious, political and tribal interests, he will be able to draw on many years of immersion in trouble spots with similar problems, including Beirut, where he survived the embassy bombing in 1983.

"He's an absolutely first-rate professional who will manage the job with skill and sensitivity," said Edward S. Walker Jr., president of the Middle East Institute and a former American ambassador to Egypt and Israel. "He has the cultural understanding that's so important to working in that region and that country."

Still, Mr. Walker said, the situation in Iraq is so intractable that it may prove impossible for any envoy to affect events decisively. "We're facing a division in Iraq that may be beyond anyone's capacity to heal," he said.

Assuming he is formally nominated and confirmed by the Senate, Mr. Crocker, 57, will succeed three men who had very different approaches to the job of top American representative in Baghdad. L. Paul Bremer III, who led the Coalition Provisional Authority, had little experience in the region and exercised control over emerging Iraqi leaders that critics found heavy-handed.

John D. Negroponte, the first ambassador to the new government, took the opposite approach, encouraging Iraqis to take on responsibility and trying to remain in the background. Zalmay M. Khalilzad, who succeeded Mr. Negroponte, has taken a far stronger hand in pressing for reconciliation between the Shiite majority and the Sunni minority.

Former colleagues say Mr. Crocker is likely to be a less public presence in the Iraqi capital than Mr. Khalilzad, though they say he will work assiduously behind the scenes for the political accommodation necessary to reverse the slide to civil war.

They describe Mr. Crocker as a tough boss who drives himself as hard as he drives his staff. An accomplished marathon runner, he runs several miles early every morning, even in such danger spots as Beirut, where he was trailed by burly security guards who sometimes had to hop on bicycles to keep up.

Robin L. Raphel, a senior diplomat who worked with Mr. Crocker in Baghdad in 2003, said he was responsible for helping to put together the Iraqi Governing Council, the provisional government that oversaw the country for a year after the fall of Saddam Hussein.

"He's a very good persuader and negotiator," Ms. Raphel said. "He has the background on a lot of the important figures in Iraq, and he's very good at sussing out who's who."

A former colleague who agreed to speak of Mr. Crocker candidly on condition of anonymity called him "incredibly hard-working, very serious, a little introverted."

"I'd say he's more respected than loved in the State Department," the colleague said, "but he certainly is respected. He's done the dirtiest, hardest assignments you can imagine."

In Pakistan, Mr. Crocker has proved to be an "old school" ambassador who has put only limited pressure on President Pervez Musharraf, the military ruler who has sometimes frustrated the Bush administration by failing to act decisively against Al Qaeda and other militant groups, said Husain Haqqani, professor of international relations at Boston University.

DOJ_NMG_0113908

"He's not somebody who will come up with a new grand strategy to change the world," said Mr. Haqqani, a former Pakistani government official. "But attempts to craft grand strategy have caused a lot of upheaval in American diplomacy."

Born June 19, 1949, in Spokane, Wash., Ryan Clark Crocker grew up in an Air Force family and attended school in Morocco, Turkey and Canada, as well as the United States. He graduated from Whitman College in Walla Walla, Wash., in 1971 and took his first Foreign Service assignment to the American Consulate in Khorramshahr, Iran, in 1972. He later worked in the embassies in Qatar, Iraq and Egypt. Because he prefers working overseas, he has rarely worked in Washington, but did hold a few posts there, including deputy assistant secretary of state for near eastern affairs.

He is married to Christine Barnes, a retired Foreign Service secretary, whom he met in Baghdad in 1979. Friends say they own property in the Willamette Valley of Oregon, where a friend said they discussed retiring before Mr. Crocker was named to his current post.

Now Mr. Crocker will face what is likely to be the most demanding assignment of his long career. "He's capable of doing the juggling act required in Iraq," Mr. Haqqani said. "Let's hope he does it well."

A New Commander, In Step With The White House On Iraq (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — The selection of Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus to serve as the senior American commander in Iraq signals an important turn in United States strategy.

As a supporter of increased forces in Iraq, General Petraeus is expected to back a rapid five-brigade expansion, in sharp contrast to his predecessor, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who has been openly skeptical that additional troops would help stabilize the country.

Having overseen the recent drafting of the military's counterinsurgency manual, General Petraeus is also likely to change the American military operation in Baghdad. American forces can be expected to take up positions in neighborhoods throughout the capital instead of limiting themselves to conducting patrols from large, fortified bases in and around the city.

The overarching goal of the American military operation may be altered as well. Under General Casey, the principal focus has been on transferring security responsibilities to the Iraqi security forces, so American troops could gradually withdraw. Now, the emphasis will shift to protecting the Iraqi population from sectarian strife and insurgent attacks.

Since his appointment was disclosed Thursday, General Petraeus has not spoken publicly about his plans for Iraq. But the doctrine he has advocated suggests that he will want all five of the combat brigades slated to go to Iraq as quickly as possible instead of waiting for them to be phased in.

Before the selection of General Petraeus, there was some doubt about whether the top Iraq commander would be an enthusiastic executor of the new strategy President Bush is preparing to unveil next week — one that could send 20,000 new troops to Iraq. Now, the White House will have an articulate officer to champion and shape that strategy, an important asset for an administration that has decided to buck the tide of public opinion by deepening the American military involvement in Iraq. While some Democratic lawmakers have insisted that any increase be limited to a few months, neither the While House nor General Petraeus would support such a deadline.

To many civilians, the military seems monolithic. But in fact, there has been a lively debate behind the scenes about the best way to achieve the United States' objectives in Iraq — or at least to preserve a measure of stability as sectarian passions threaten to engulf the country.

At one end of the spectrum have been General Casey, Gen. John P. Abizaid, the head of the United States Central Command, and Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, who is in charge of training Iraqi security forces.

They have advocated plans to hand over security responsibilities to the Iraqis while gradually reducing American forces and shrinking the number of American bases in Iraq, as conditions permit. Their argument has been that a lengthy expansion of American forces in Iraq will simply put off the day when Iraqis take more responsibility for their security.

Taking a different view, other officers have argued for sending more troops while stepping up economic efforts, the better to apply the military's new counterinsurgency doctrine. Progress in stabilizing Iraq, they argue, will come only when the Iraqi public does not feel that it needs militias or insurgent groups to ensure its security, and when it concludes that its basic economic needs are being met.

Training and advising the Iraqi forces should continue to be an important priority, these officers have argued, but the Iraqis cannot be expected to shoulder the brunt of the security effort so quickly.

General Petraeus has been squarely in this camp, as was reflected in the military's new counterinsurgency field manual.

DOJ_NMG_0113909

The United States has sought to apply the basic lessons of counterinsurgency operations in Baghdad before — most notably during Operation Together Forward II, the second phase of an effort begun over the summer to reduce violence in Baghdad.

But that effort foundered when the United States and Iraqi authorities failed to marshal sufficient forces to hold neighborhoods after they were cleared of insurgents and militias, and when the Iraqis failed to follow through with the job and reconstruction programs that were intended to win over Iraqi citizens.

By all accounts, Mr. Bush plans to announce an expanded military and economic push. But the United States will still have to contend with the political realities in Iraq, including a Shiite-dominated government that has often seemed more sectarian than inclusive, and may not prove enthusiastic about a larger and more visible role for the Americans.

At 54, General Petraeus has a long Army record and a diverse array of contacts and supporters. Having earned a Ph.D. in international relations from Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School, he invited experts from Harvard, nongovernmental organizations and policy groups to review an early draft of the counterinsurgency manual.

During the invasion, he led the 101st Airborne Division, which sought to emphasize economic and political reconstruction efforts in northern Iraq.

When L. Paul Bremer III, the second American civilian administrator of Iraq, formally abolished the Iraqi Army without announcing a plan to pay the former soldiers, General Petraeus approached one of Mr. Bremer's aides and delivered a clear message. The decision to leave Iraqi soldiers without a livelihood was prompting angry protests and putting the lives of American soldiers at risk. Mr. Bremer later decided to pay the Iraqi troops.

In June 2004, General Petraeus was charged with training the new Iraqi Army, a position he held for more than a year. It is a mission that is critical to American efforts in Iraq but which is as yet a mixed success.

As the senior American officer in Iraq, General Petraeus will work with Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, a subordinate who has day-to-day command of the forces and who also supports a troop increase.

Instead of immediately confronting the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia led by the cleric Moktada al-Sadr, the initial strategy is likely to be more subtle: by trying to tamp down sectarian killings, American troops — and the Iraqi forces they are partnered with — will try to reduce the population's reliance on militias for security, making it easier for the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to take the long-promised step of limiting the role of the militias.

Whether a modicum of stability can be achieved amid the violence and sectarian agendas in Iraq is uncertain at best. But General Petraeus seems determined to give the military's new counterinsurgency plan its most ambitious field test.

Pace Future In Doubt After Shake-up (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

With President Bush replacing his two top field generals for Iraq, speculation has arisen in the Pentagon about the long-term future of his principal military adviser, Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace.

From the start, no other four-star general has had more to do with Iraq war policy than Gen. Pace, the Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman handpicked by former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Mr. Rumsfeld chose the highly decorated Marine as vice chairman in 2001. He promptly gave the disciplined Vietnam combatant a front-row seat in his Pentagon office as strategy was set for the war on terror and the 2003 invasion that toppled Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Rumsfeld then elevated Gen. Pace as the first Marine to head the Joint Chiefs in September 2005. Unlike the four service chiefs who get four-year terms, the Senate confirms chairmen for two years at a time. The question some are asking inside the Pentagon this week is whether the president will nominate Gen. Pace later this year for a second term, as has been the tradition for chairman.

"Is the president going to root out all his Iraq advisers?" is the way a defense source described speculation in the Pentagon.

A White House spokesman said yesterday he does not know the president's plans regarding Gen. Pace.

The speculation comes as the Pentagon yesterday announced Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates' first major changes for the Iraq war since taking office.

Adm. William J. Fallon, the combatant commander for the Pacific region, will succeed Army Gen. John Abizaid, who is retiring, as head of U.S. Central Command. The command is the center of the war on Islamic extremists, encompassing Afghanistan, Iraq, Iran and the Horn of Africa.

Gen. Fallon's Pacific Command has principal missions of watching Stalinist North Korea and communist China.

DOJ_NMG_0113910

Navy admirals have overseen ground operations in the Pacific, but Adm. Fallon will be the first naval officer to run wars in the Persian Gulf region, which is home to a large sea component headquartered in Bahrain.

Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq, will be replaced by Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who now heads the U.S. Army Combined Arms Center. Gen. Casey will succeed Gen. Peter Schoomaker as Army chief of staff.

Gen. Petraeus led the 101st Airborne Division in the original invasion. He later took command of training an emerging Iraqi army and police force. He received high praise for making progress in the difficult job of building an Iraqi security force virtually from scratch.

Mr. Bush announced the resignation of Mr. Rumsfeld in November, saying he wanted a "fresh perspective" on an Iraq war that has seen more than 3,000 American troops killed amid extremely violent sectarian fighting.

Pentagon officials say they expect Mr. Bush to order a "surge" of 5,000 to 20,000 soldiers who would focus on quelling violence in Baghdad. There would also be a new economic package in addition to the more than $30 billion approved by Congress for reconstruction and redevelopment.

Gens. Casey and Abizaid had both been expected to leave later this year. Gen. Abizaid, an Arabic speaker seen perfectly suited for the Arab-dominated region, was in his fourth year of command, longer than the normal two-to-three-year shift for combatant commanders. Gen. Casey has been mentioned frequently as Gen. Schoomaker's successor.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said yesterday it made sense to change commanders now and have them in place to implement Mr. Bush's new Iraq strategy.

Images Of Hanging Make Hussein A Martyr To Many (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Jan. 5 — In the week since Saddam Hussein was hanged in an execution steeped in sectarian overtones, his public image in the Arab world, formerly that of a convicted dictator, has undergone a resurgence of admiration and awe.

On the streets, in newspapers and over the Internet, Mr. Hussein has emerged as a Sunni Arab hero who stood calm and composed as his Shiite executioners tormented and abused him.

“No one will ever forget the way in which Saddam was executed,” President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt remarked in an interview with the Israeli newspaper Yediot Aharonot published Friday and distributed by the official Egyptian news agency. “They turned him into a martyr.”

In Libya, which canceled celebrations of the feast of Id al-Adha after the execution, a government statement said a statue depicting Mr. Hussein in the gallows would be erected, along with a monument to Omar al-Mukhtar, who resisted the Italian invasion of Libya and was hanged by the Italians in 1931.

In Morocco and the Palestinian territories, demonstrators held aloft photographs of Mr. Hussein and condemned the United States.

Here in Beirut, hundreds of members of the Lebanese Baath Party and Palestinian activists marched Friday in a predominantly Sunni neighborhood behind a symbolic coffin representing that of Mr. Hussein and later offered a funeral prayer. Photographs of Mr. Hussein standing up in court, against a backdrop of the Dome of the Rock shrine in Jerusalem, were pasted on city walls near Palestinian refugee camps, praising “Saddam the martyr.”

“God damn America and its spies,” a banner across one major Beirut thoroughfare read. “Our condolences to the nation for the assassination of Saddam, and victory to the Iraqi resistance.”

By standing up to the United States and its client government in Baghdad and dying with seeming dignity, Mr. Hussein appears to have been virtually cleansed of his past.

“Suddenly we forgot that he was a dictator and that he killed thousands of people,” said Roula Haddad, 33, a Lebanese Christian. “All our hatred for him suddenly turned into sympathy, sympathy with someone who was treated unjustly by an occupation force and its collaborators.”

Just a month ago Mr. Hussein was widely dismissed as a criminal who deserved the death penalty, even if his trial was seen as flawed. Much of the Middle East reacted with a collective shrug when he was found guilty of crimes against humanity in November.

But shortly after his execution last Saturday, a video emerged that showed Shiite guards taunting Mr. Hussein, who responded calmly but firmly to them. From then on, many across the region began looking at him as a martyr.

“The Arab world has been devoid of pride for a long time,” said Ahmad Mazin al-Shugairi, who hosts a television show at the Middle East Broadcasting Center that promotes a moderate version of Islam in Saudi Arabia. “The way Saddam acted in court and just before he was executed, with dignity and no fear, struck a chord with Arabs who are desperate for their own leaders to have pride too."

DOJ_NMG_0113911

Ayman Safadi, editor in chief of the independent Jordanian daily Al Ghad, said, "The last image for many was of Saddam taken out of a hole. That has all changed now."

At the heart of the sudden reversal of opinion was the symbolism of the hasty execution, now framed as an act of sectarian vengeance shrouded in political theater and overseen by the American occupation.

In much of the predominantly Sunni Arab world, the timing of the execution in the early hours of Id al-Adha, which is among the holiest days of the Muslim year, when violence is forbidden and when even Mr. Hussein himself sometimes released prisoners, was seen as a direct insult to the Sunni world.

The contrast between the official video aired without sound on Iraqi television of Mr. Hussein being taken to the gallows and fitted with a noose around his neck and the unauthorized grainy, chaotic recording of the same scene with sound, depicting Shiite militiamen taunting Mr. Hussein with his hands tied, damning him to hell and praising the militant Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, touched a sectarian nerve.

"He stood as strong as a mountain while he was being hanged," said Ahmed el-Ghamrawi, a former Egyptian ambassador to Iraq. "He died a strong president and lived as a strong president. This is the image people are left with."

Daoud Kuttab, a Palestinian media critic and director of the online radio station Ammannet.net, said: "If Saddam had media planners, he could not have planned it better than this. Nobody could ever have imagined that Saddam would have gone down with such dignity."

Writers and commentators have stopped short of eulogizing the dictator but have looked right past his bloody history as they compare Iraq's present circumstances with Iraq under Mr. Hussein.

In Jordan, long a bastion of support forMr. Hussein, many are lionizing him, decrying the timing of the execution and the taunts as part of a Sunni-Shiite conflict.

"Was it a coincidence that Israel, Iran and the United States all welcomed Saddam's execution?" wrote Hamadeh Faraneh, a columnist for the daily Al Rai. "Was it also a coincidence when Saddam said bravely in front of his tormentors, 'Long live the nation,' and that Palestine is Arab, then uttered the declaration of faith? His last words expressed his depth and what he died for."

Another Jordanian journalist, Muhammad Abu Rumman, wrote in Al Ghad on Thursday: "For the vast majority Saddam is a martyr, even if he made mistakes in his first years of rule. He cleansed himself later by confronting the Americans and by rejecting to negotiate with them."

Even the pro-Saudi news media, normally critical of Mr. Hussein, chimed in with a more sentimental tone.

In the London-based pan-Arab daily Al Hayat, Bilal Khubbaiz, commenting on Iranian and Israeli praise of the execution, wrote, "Saddam, as Iraq's ruler, was an iron curtain that prevented the Iranian influence from reaching into the Arab world," as well as "a formidable party in the Arab-Israeli conflict."

Zuhayr Qusaybati, also writing in Al Hayat, said the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, "gave Saddam what he most wanted: he turned him into a martyr in the eyes of many Iraqis, who can now demand revenge."

"The height of idiocy," Mr. Qusaybati said, "is for the man who rules Baghdad under American protection not to realize the purpose of rushing the execution, and that the guillotine carries the signature of a Shiite figure as the flames of sectarian division do not spare Shiites or Sunnis in a country grieving for its butchered citizens."

In Saudi Arabia, poems eulogizing Mr. Hussein have been passed around on cellphones and in e-mail messages.

"Prepare the gun that will avenge Saddam," a poem published in a Saudi newspaper warned. "The criminal who signed the execution order without valid reason cheated us on our celebration day. How beautiful it will be when the bullet goes through the heart of him who betrayed Arabism."

Mr. Safadi, the Jordanian editor, said: "In the public's perception Saddam was terrible, but those people were worse. That final act has really jeopardized the future of Iraq immensely. And we all know this is a blow to the moderate camp in the Arab world."

Baghdad Initiative To Go Door To Door (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst And Qassim Abdul-Zahra, Associated Press Writers

AP, January 6, 2007

Iraqi forces backed by U.S. troops will begin a neighborhood-by-neighborhood assault on militants in the capital this weekend as a first step in the new White House strategy to contain Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads, key advisers to the prime minister said Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0113912

The first details of the plan — a fresh bid to pacify the capital — emerged a day after President Bush and Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki spoke for nearly two hours by video conference. Both leaders were expected to detail their vision of a new strategy in the coming days.

The al-Maliki aides would not address the scope of the planned assaults nor where specifically they were planned.

The Iraqis did, however, signal continuing disagreement on key issues, including al-Maliki's unease over the introduction of more U.S. troops.

Another point of contention has been the Iraqi leader's repeated refusal of U.S. demands to crush the militia of anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, one of the prime minister's most powerful backers.

Any serious drive to curb the extreme chaos and violence in the capital would put not only American forces but al-Maliki's Iraqi army in direct confrontation with al-Sadr's Mahdi Army.

The militants are gaining more and more ground as they kill Sunni residents of the city and drive others from their neighborhoods. The explosion of vengeance began after the Feb. 22 bombing by al-Qaida in Iraq militants of an important Shiite shrine, the Golden Dome mosque in Samarra north of the capital.

Sami al-Askari, an al-Maliki political adviser, told The Associated Press on Friday that al-Maliki had not acquiesced to the reported White House plan to send as many as 9,000 more U.S. troops to Baghdad alone.

"President Bush told the prime minister he was ready to send additional troops, but al-Maliki said he would have to talk that over with his senior military officers to see if they were needed," al-Askari said.

Bush reportedly wants to increase troop strength as part of his developing plan to shake-up the U.S. military effort in Iraq, now in its fourth year.

Without a substantial U.S. troop increase there were questions about the success of any new drive to curb violence.

Last summer the U.S. military and Iraqi army flooded the capital with 12,000 additional troops for the same purpose. By October, the U.S. military spokesman said the operation had not met expectations and the situation was disheartening. The last half of 2006 was one of the most violent periods in the center and west of the country since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion to topple Saddam Hussein.

In his discussions with Bush, al-Maliki continued to press for a rapid U.S. withdrawal from the capital to bases "on the outskirts of Baghdad," al-Askari said. The prime minister has claimed his forces will be ready to assume control of security for the whole country by summer. The Americans, perhaps optimistically, hope that can happen by year's end.

Al-Askari and Hassan al-Suneid, another top al-Maliki aide and lawmaker from his Dawa Party, said the fresh security push would be open-ended once initiated this weekend.

"The Iraqi Interior, Defense and National Security ministries will take part using information we have gathered from a new intelligence network," al-Suneid said. "There will be no time limit, and there will be many stages to the operation."

Al-Suneid said American forces would take part in a supporting role.

As forces apparently began to get ready, the powerful Association of Muslim Scholars voiced Sunni agitation and claimed the coming drive was really a joint operation by Interior Ministry commandos, the Iraqi army and the Mahdi Army to further cleanse mixed neighborhoods. Iraq's security forces are dominated by Shiites.

Sheik Mohammed Bashar al-Fayadh, a spokesman for the organization, claimed residents had seen 150 vehicles massing Friday in the Shula region in northwest Baghdad in advance of the assault.

"We fear a huge attack," al-Fayadh said on Al-Jazeera satellite television.

Throughout Iraq on Friday, at least 31 people died violently or were found dead, including two beheaded victims of the sectarian slaughter found floating in the Tigris river.

The body of an Associated Press employee was found shot in the back of the head Friday, six days after he was last seen by his family leaving for work. Ahmed Hadi Naji, 28, was the fourth AP staffer to die violently in the Iraq war and the second AP employee killed in less than a month. He had been a messenger and occasional cameraman for the AP for 2 1/2 years.

"All of us at AP share the pain and grief being felt by Ahmed's family and friends," said AP President and CEO Tom Curley.

The circumstances of Naji's death were unclear. Dozens of Iraqis are found slain almost every day in Baghdad, many believed to be victims of sectarian death squads.

An American contractor was abducted Friday along with his driver and translator, and the two Iraqis were later found dead near a stadium in the southern city of Basra, police said. The fate of the American was unknown.

"The two victims were the translator and a driver," said a Basra police official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release the information.

Basra's police chief, Gen. Mohammed Humadi, confirmed that a U.S. citizen had been kidnapped and said he was an American of Iraqi origin. The contractor's name and the company for which he worked were not disclosed.

DOJ_NMG_0113913

French President Jacques Chirac, meanwhile, said the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq destabilized the entire Middle East and caused terrorism to spread, adding that the problems in Iraq justified France's strong opposition to the war.

"As France foresaw and feared, the war in Iraq caused upheavals whose effects have not yet finished unraveling," Chirac said in a speech to French ambassadors.

___

AP Military Writer Robert Burns in Washington and AP reporter Christine Ollivier in Paris contributed to this report.

American, 2 Iraqi Interpreters Kidnapped (LAT)

By Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

BAGHDAD — A U.S. civilian contractor and two Iraqi interpreters were kidnapped Friday near the southern city of Basra, Iraqi police officials said.

Police Col. Kareem Azaidi in Basra said witnesses saw gunmen in a civilian car, a pickup and two police vehicles cut off the captives' car and take them hostage.

U.S. Embassy spokesman Lou Fintor declined to identify the victims. "We're aware of reports that an American citizen was kidnapped," he said. "And we're looking into them."

The fate of the American contractor was unknown, but the two Iraqis were later found dead, the Associated Press reported.

The abductions came a day after a videotape emerged showing four kidnapped Americans and an Austrian.

The five men in the video said they were contractors for Crescent Security Group, a Kuwait-based firm, abducted near Basra in November. The men identified themselves as John R. Young, 44, of Kansas City, Mo.; Jon Cote of Buffalo, N.Y.; Josh Munns, 23, of Redding, Calif.; Paul Johnson Reuben of Buffalo, Minn.; and Bert Nussbaumer of Austria.

"I'm well; my friends are well. We've been treated well," Young said. Reuben said the video was recorded Dec. 22.

Meanwhile, in the first Friday prayers since Saddam Hussein was hanged, Shiite Muslim clerics called the death of the former Iraqi president — whose regime favored minority Sunnis — a "breakthrough" and condemned those who opposed the recording of the execution.

"The execution of Saddam is a turning point not only in the history of the Iraqi people but in the whole area," Shiite cleric Sadruddin Qubanchi said in the holy city of Najaf. "We foresee a new breakthrough in the region, and this explains the anger of some Arab countries…. Libya, Algeria and Yemen — all these governments are tyrannical too."

Sunni Arabs throughout the Middle East complained about the way Hussein was executed. A cellphone camera recorded supporters of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr taunting and jeering Hussein as he stood on the gallows.

Qubanchi accused the critics of hypocrisy. "When Saudi Arabia shot dead in the streets 400 Iranian Shiite pilgrims after they held a demonstration, no one protested," he said. "But today those who pretend to grieve over Saddam are really grieving only because they fear the wind of change will move people in their countries."

At Baghdad's Bratha Mosque, Sheik Jalaluddin Saghir, a Shiite cleric and parliament member, said that whatever pain Hussein experienced paled in comparison to the atrocities he committed.

"Executing Saddam on the first day of Eid made the Baathists and Sunnis angry," Saghir said, referring to the Islamic holiday of Eid al-Adha. "That is all pretense. Saddam used to execute leaders and prominent figures anytime he liked — even during Eid."

Sheik Harith Obeidi, a prominent Sunni cleric and parliament member, avoided discussing Hussein's execution and focused instead on religious matters.

Many sermons emphasized the failure of the government to provide security and services.

At least 18 bodies were discovered Friday in Baghdad, some with gunshots to the head and wounds suggesting torture.

Mortar fire killed at least 10 other Iraqis in the capital, and at least five people, including a police officer, were shot to death.

Police officials said 30 gunmen drove 18 Shiite families out of their west Baghdad homes.

Insurgents Elude Forces In Eastern Iraqi Province (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

Villagers deny knowledge of the rebels -- except for a teen who describes their getaways.

FONTIMIYA, IRAQ — U.S. and Iraqi forces trudged through waterlogged fields, crawled down tunnels and went house to house Friday in a painstaking search for Sunni Arab insurgents, combing a remote rural region east of Baghdad that has been a training and logistics base for Al Qaeda in Iraq and other militant groups.

DOJ_NMG_0113914

But for the second day of the 1,000-troop operation, in home after home, they found only women, children and men too old to fight.

Time and again, U.S. forces in Iraq have staged major assaults on known insurgent hide-outs only to have key individuals melt away. As with other operations, the military is attempting to dislodge insurgents from their hiding places in Diyala province, then sweep them into known escape routes where they can be intercepted.

But the area's sunken irrigation canals, vast agricultural fields, seldom-traveled back roads and widely scattered hamlets have given guerrillas innumerable ways to avoid capture.

"We are hardly finding any military-aged males," U.S. Army Sgt. 1st Class Pete Johnson said as he directed a truckload of Iraqi fighters into position outside a village in an icy downpour. "They have all pushed away somewhere. Either they have run away or they are waiting for us."

If the insurgents are preparing to make a stand, Johnson said, "we can definitely take the fight to them."

"But if they disappear and hide," he said, "there is no way we can establish positive identification and get them."

U.S. field commanders have struggled to keep pace with guerrillas' movements. Officials say the rebels use spotters, infiltrators in Iraqi security forces and contacts on or near U.S. bases to stay abreast of American troop movements.

The Bush administration is considering sending more troops to Iraq, which in November numbered about 140,000, to quell sectarian fighting in places such as Diyala. Proponents of the idea say 20,000 or more additional troops would enable the military to conduct more operations and train Iraqi forces more quickly. But critics say earlier troop surges have failed to stem the fighting and led to more American casualties.

Since the battle for Fallouja in 2004, when hundreds of insurgents faced off against U.S. soldiers and Marines in close block-to-block combat, the outgunned guerrillas have rarely amassed platoon-sized attacks against the Americans. Rather, they hit and run. Snipers fire at troops from darkened rooms. Triggermen detonate bombs remotely. Rocket-propelled grenades blaze from thick palm groves.

When U.S. troops do learn of large gatherings of insurgents, they often arrive too late — weapons have been stashed and the rebels have scattered among the populace.

After the U.S. eventually withdraws, the insurgents often return.

In Al Anbar province in western Iraq, Col. Brian Beaudreault, commander of the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit, said he was attempting to reestablish a police force in Rutbah, a town of 30,000 between Ramadi and Syria. At least three waves of recruits have come and gone in many Al Anbar towns. Iraqi soldiers brought in to provide security in the absence of police have also been plagued by battle losses and attrition.

Perhaps the most publicized failure of the "clear and hold" tactic has been Operation Together Forward in Baghdad. U.S. commanders announced the plan to clear neighborhoods of insurgents and Shiite death squads with great fanfare, but since the operation began in August, sectarian violence and U.S. casualties in the capital have steadily increased.

In Baqubah, Diyala's capital, guerrillas had virtually destroyed the police force by November. The virulence of the insurgency led Col. David W. Sutherland, the U.S. commander in charge of the province, to take stronger action against the Sunni militants.

But the region, a vast area of farmland dotted with palm groves about 40 miles northeast of Baghdad, is laced with canals and tunnels that insurgents use to evade U.S. aircraft and ground forces.

In addition to intelligence, the offensive has yielded a number of weapons stores, including mortar rounds, antitank mines and two vans rigged with rocket equipment, the military said.

About 600 U.S. and 400 Iraqi troops are participating in the operation, which has drawn in attack helicopters, tanks, fighting vehicles and Humvees.

U.S. Capt. Stephen Dobbins, who commands Bravo Troop, 5th Squadron, 73rd Cavalry, said the current sweep was using what some military officials call a "hammer and anvil" tactic, to push insurgents into waiting troop positions.

Fighter jets dropped a 500-pound bomb on six armed men as they crept through canals toward U.S. and Iraqi troops overnight, the military said. In the morning, troops found a 30-foot tunnel at the site with a store of food, blankets and religious texts. It was destroyed.

At least two suspected insurgents were killed when they were spotted digging in a road, apparently to plant a bomb. The Iraqi army said two of its soldiers were killed in a roadside bombing the previous day.

But fighting so far has been minimal compared with a November offensive in the area, when U.S. soldiers said they faced bands of highly trained and well-disciplined insurgents.

Two roadside bombs wounded two Iraqi soldiers and a U.S. soldier Friday. A disabled vehicle delayed a convoy for several hours, as did wind and rain, which further degraded Diyala's poorly maintained dirt roads and vexed air support operations.

DOJ_NMG_0113915

In each village, U.S. and Iraqi troops are moving house to house, separating out military-aged men, swiping their hands for explosives residue and questioning them about insurgent activity in the area.

In Fontimiya, one of the larger wheat-farming communities, 20 men sat cross-legged in a windblown field, eyes downcast and some shivering in the cold, as U.S. soldiers barked out questions.

But the village was otherwise deserted, many of its mud-brick homes reduced to rubble. Residents said the once mostly Shiite Muslim hamlet had been racked by sectarian violence that sent many families fleeing. Just two Shiite families remain in what has become a mostly Sunni Muslim community, they said.

Most denied any knowledge of insurgents. But a detained teenager told troops that the community included a number of fighters who fled on motorcycles through the canal network at the first sound of U.S. helicopters. The boy also said residents received regular visits from masked men on motorcycles who warned them which roads were mined.

U.S. forces said they had positioned troops to block the insurgents' escape.

"The enemy is reacting the way we expected them to, and that will ultimately lead us to triumph and prevail," squadron commander Lt. Col. Andrew Poppas told superiors in a radio call later Friday night, as a sandstorm closed in and wailing winds buffeted their vehicles.

But Poppas has said that long-term success depends on the cooperation of the mostly Shiite Iraqi forces, who until recently had refused to patrol the area, which they consider a death trap. He plans to build them a new patrol base in the area.

Now, U.S. forces say, they must hold the Iraqis back. Iraqi soldiers, used to sprinting through attacks, have expressed frustration at the deliberate approach of the Americans.

"We want to kill Wahhabis," an Iraqi soldier complained to his U.S. counterparts in a joking exchange as they sifted through piles of receipts, letters, identification cards and other documents at a suspect's residence. He referred to followers of the fundamentalist form of Sunni Islam practiced by Al Qaeda, which has spread in the region.

A U.S. soldier assured him he would get his chance.

zavis@latimes.com

Times staff writers Solomon Moore in Baghdad and Molly Hennessy-Fiske in Kirkuk contributed to this report.

Death In Haditha (WP)

By Josh White, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

U.S. Marines gunned down five unarmed Iraqis who stumbled onto the scene of a 2005 roadside bombing in Haditha, Iraq, according to eyewitness accounts that are part of a lengthy investigative report obtained by The Washington Post.

Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, the squad's leader, shot the men one by one after Marines ordered them out of a white taxi in the moments following the explosion, which killed one Marine and injured two others, witnesses told investigators. Another Marine fired rounds into their bodies as they lay on the ground.

"The taxi's five occupants exited the vehicle and according to U.S. and Iraqi witnesses, were shot by Wuterich as they stood, unarmed, next to the vehicle approximately ten feet in front of him," said a report by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service on the incident that runs thousands of pages.

One of the witnesses, Sgt. Asad Amer Mashoot, a 26-year-old Iraqi soldier who was in the Marine convoy, told investigators he watched in horror as the four students and the taxi driver fell. "They didn't even try to run away," he said. "We were afraid from Marines and we saw them behaving like crazy. They were yelling and screaming."

The shootings were the first in a series of violent reactions by Marines on the morning of Nov. 19, 2005 that left 24 civilians -- many of them women and children -- dead, in what some human rights groups and Iraqis have called a massacre by U.S. troops.

The report, which relied on hundreds of interviews with Marines, Iraqi soldiers and civilian survivors conducted months after the incident, presents a fragmented and sometimes conflicting chronicle of the violence that day. But taken together, the accounts provide evidence that as the Marines came under attack, they responded in ways that are difficult to reconcile with their rules of engagement.

Four Marines were charged with murder last month in connection with the civilian deaths in Haditha: Wuterich, who faces 13 counts of unpremeditated murder; Sgt. Sanick P. Dela Cruz; Lance Cpl. Justin L. Sharratt; and Lance Cpl. Stephen B. Tatum. Each faces the possibility of life in prison if convicted.

Through their lawyers, three have argued that they behaved appropriately while taking fire on a chaotic battlefield, and that the civilian deaths were a regrettable but unavoidable part of warfare in an especially dangerous area. Dela Cruz's attorney has declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0113916

The Marine Corps also has charged four officers with failing to investigate and fully report the slayings: Lt. Col. Jeffrey R. Chessani, Capt. Lucas M. McConnell, Capt. Randy W. Stone and Lt. Andrew A. Grayson.

The Marines told investigators that they believed they were authorized to fire freely inside two houses they raided in the minutes following the taxi shootings, after concluding that insurgents were firing on them. After an officer ordered them to "take" one of the homes and Wuterich commanded them to "shoot first, ask questions later," the Marines considered the houses "hostile," according to sworn statements to investigators.

Marine officials have accused the troops of failing to identify their targets before using grenades and guns to kill 14 unarmed people in the houses, including several young children in their pajamas, in a span of about 10 minutes, according to the documents.

Safah Yunis Salem, 13, who said she played dead to avoid being shot, was the only person to survive the Marine attack on the second house. Her sister Aisha, 3, was shot in the leg and died; her brother Zainab, 5, was killed by a shot to the head. She said she lost five other members of her family in the room, including her mother.

"He fired and killed everybody," Safah said. "The American fired and killed everybody."

Numerous Marine officers in the chain of command in Iraq -- including a major general -- knew about the civilian deaths almost immediately but did not launch an investigation for months, according to interview transcripts. Some lower-level officers did not believe that the Marines had done anything inappropriate, while high-ranking officers had limited information about the incident and did not inquire further.

Neal Puckett, one of Wuterich's attorneys, declined to comment on the case yesterday, saying he is "deeply disturbed that any media have access to what sounds like the entire investigation."

Wuterich told investigators in a February interview: "I want to make clear that we did not go in intentionally to spray everyone we saw. We were taking fire."

Marine Corps and NCIS officials declined to comment on details of the case because it is ongoing.A Routine Mission Turns Violent

The report provides a detailed narrative of the events leading to the violence in Haditha. The day began about 6 a.m., when Lance Cpl. Salvador A. Guzman Jr. awoke at Firm Base Sparta and members of his squad learned they would be bringing fresh Iraqi troops to a traffic checkpoint in Haditha. He bumped into Lance Cpl. Miguel "T.J." Terrazas, who joked that "we were going to get hit by an improvised explosive device one day because we travel so much," Guzman told investigators.

The Marines left the base at about 6:45 a.m. and made the personnel changes by about 7 a.m.; then they turned their four-vehicle convoy around and headed back. Sharratt, in the turret of the first Humvee, waved a white sedan over to the side of "Route Chestnut," and as it slid to the south shoulder a blast rocked the neighborhood.

Terrazas, who was driving the fourth Humvee, was killed instantly by the remotely detonated propane tank, which shredded the front of the vehicle and launched it into the middle of the road. Another Marine, severely injured, was trapped in the wreckage.

Marines who rushed to help told investigators they took enemy rifle fire from several locations on the north and south sides of the road. Navy Hospitalman Brian D. Whitt said he could see bullet impacts near his feet and noticed men with rifles disappearing from atop a house to the north. Some of the fire appeared to be coming from behind the white taxi.

The Marines concurred that they were under fire from all sides, indicating that the incident was part of a complex insurgent attack that lasted much of the day.

One Marine and two Iraqi soldiers told investigators that the men who had been in the taxi were standing in a line outside it, some with their hands in the air, when Wuterich began to fire on them.

Wuterich said the men got out of the car, and he shot them because he considered them a threat. But Dela Cruz said the men were standing in a line when they started to fall.

"As I crossed the median I saw one of the Iraqi civilians, who was standing in the center of the line, drop to the ground," Dela Cruz told investigators. "Immediately afterwards another Iraqi standing by him raised his hands to his head. I then heard other small arms fire and looked to my left and saw Sgt. Wuterich kneeling on one knee and shooting his M16 in the direction of the Iraqi civilians."

Dela Cruz told investigators that he pumped bullets into the bodies of the Iraqi men after they were on the ground and later urinated on one of them.

Minutes later, a Quick Reaction Force arrived from the Marine base, bringing Lt. William T. Kallop, the first officer on the scene. Kallop told investigators he began to receive enemy fire almost immediately. About that time, Cpl. Hector A. Salinas spotted a man firing at the squad from the corner of a house on the south side of the road.

"Salinas then stated that he could see the enemy so Kallop told them to 'take the house,' " according to an NCIS summary of an interview with Kallop. The interview provides the first evidence that an officer ordered the attack.

DOJ_NMG_0113917

Richard McNeil, a lawyer who represents Kallop, declined to comment about him or his role, but he warned that "typically in an NCIS investigation, the narratives are always slanted to the interpretation of the government."

Wuterich, Salinas, Tatum and Lance Cpl. Humberto M. Mendoza formed a team to attack the house, launching grenades first and then busting through the door.

"I told them to treat it as a hostile environment," Wuterich told investigators. "I told them to shoot first, ask questions later."

Defense attorneys have argued that the men were following their "rules of engagement" when they shot into the homes, using effective techniques in a difficult environment.

The Marine division's rules-of-engagement card in effect at the time in western Iraq instructed Marines to "ALWAYS minimize collateral damage" and said that targets must be positively identified as threats before a Marine can open fire. It also told Marines that "nothing on this card prevents you from using all force necessary to defend yourself."

After entering the first house through a kitchen, Tatum told investigators, he heard what he believed was an AK-47 rifle being "racked," or readied to fire, around a corner. He and Salinas tossed grenades into the room, according to the documents. Waleed Hasan, 37, was killed. Khamisa Ali, 66, was shot dead in the hallway before four others were killed in a bedroom by grenades and rifle fire.

Nine-year-old Eman Hamed told investigators that a grenade landed near her grandfather's bed and exploded, sending shrapnel through the room. Her mother and 4-year-old brother were killed as she huddled, injured, with another brother, Abid, 6, who survived. "All rooms," Abid told investigators. "They were shooting in all rooms."

Several Marines said they quickly cleared the home by fire, shooting through the dust, debris and darkness to eliminate what they believed was a threat.

From there, Wuterich, Mendoza and Tatum said, they moved to a second house after suspecting that insurgents might have escaped. Mendoza told investigators that the Marines approached the second house the same way they did the first, treating it as hostile, according to his sworn statement. Mendoza said he shot a man, 43-year-old Yunis Rasif, through the house's glass kitchen door.

"I fired because I had been told the house was hostile and I was following my training that all individuals in a hostile house are to be shot," Mendoza told investigators. The Marines then entered the house and tossed grenades before firing into a back bedroom, which they later found was filled with women and children.

"Knowing what I know now, I feel badly about killing Iraqi civilians who may have been innocent, but I stand fast in my decisions that day, as I reacted to the threats that I perceived at the time," Tatum said. "I did not shoot randomly with the intent to harm innocent Iraqi civilians."

Jack Zimmerman, Tatum's attorney, declined to comment yesterday but decried the publication of the documents. "The ethical rules that govern lawyers prohibit me from even discussing the matter," he said.

Mashoot, the Iraqi soldier who was with the Marines, said he thought the attack on the houses was warranted because the entire convoy was taking fire. Investigators noted that he believed the Marines "had justification" because they were "defending themselves."

Another group of Marines, including Dela Cruz, simultaneously went to the north side of the road and found a dwelling that they believed was the "trigger house" for the roadside bomb. They took several Iraqis into custody, according to the documents, but did not shoot anyone in a search of several houses. Another man was shot after Marines observed him running along a ridgeline.

A few hours later, Sharratt, Wuterich and Salinas approached a third and fourth house after noticing men they said were peering at them suspiciously.

The investigative reports show that what happened there is unclear. Iraqi witnesses said the Marines angrily separated men and women into two lines before marching the men into the fourth house and shooting them. The three Marines told investigators they were searching for the men they had seen and separated the women into a safe area before Wuterich and Sharratt entered the house.

Sharratt told investigators that he saw a man raise an AK-47 rifle as if to shoot him. Sharratt said his gun jammed, but he grabbed his 9mm handgun and shot the attacker. He told investigators he saw another man with a rifle and shot him and two others because he "felt threatened." Wuterich also shot at the men, he said.

Sharratt has been charged with unpremeditated murder in three of the slayings.

Gary Myers, a lawyer representing Sharratt, declined to comment yesterday.At First, No Inquiry

The military did not launch an inquiry of the Haditha deaths until a Time magazine reporter began to inquire about the incident two months later. Marine officers told investigators the reason was simple: Nothing in the reports they received from the field caused them to believe that a probe was warranted.

DOJ_NMG_0113918

Investigators appear to have found little evidence that Marines on the ground or at headquarters tried to conceal the day's events. But Dela Cruz told investigators that Wuterich asked him to back up claims that the men in the taxi were trying to flee before they were shot.

Puckett, Wuterich's lawyer, challenged Dela Cruz's assertion: "Staff Sergeant Wuterich adamantly denies asking anybody to lie or change their story."

The documents show that Marines in Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, reported the incident to their base as it was happening and made clear that there were a significant number of civilian casualties. Though at first the Marines classified eight of the civilians as insurgents, they quickly reported that at least 15 civilians had been killed in what they called "crossfire" with the enemy.

The events came amid heavy insurgent attacks in Haditha that day that ultimately prompted Marines to call in airstrikes on suspected insurgent homes. The hectic nature of the day caused some early reports to be confused and inaccurate, Marines told investigators.

The Kilo Company commander, McConnell, told his Marines on the day of the attacks that they had done a good job, according to an investigative summary in the NCIS report. Investigators wrote that McConnell did not want to question his Marines on a day they lost a comrade but that he informed his superiors about the civilian deaths.

"There was never a hint whatsoever that these kids did anything improper. Not one," said Kevin McDermott, a lawyer who represents McConnell.

Marine officers said Chessani, the Marines' battalion commander, informed his superior, the regimental commander, of the civilian casualties the day they occurred and was told by that officer, Col. Stephen W. Davis, that no investigation was needed.

"There was nothing out of the ordinary about any of this, including the number of civilian dead, that would have triggered anything in my mind that was out of the norm," Davis told military investigators, according to a transcript. "There is nothing about this incident that jumped out at any point to us."

Maj. Gen. Richard A. Huck, the division commander, told investigators he learned about the civilian casualties on the day they occurred and believed that they were the result of a roadside bomb and the ensuing gunbattle between Marines and insurgents. Huck visited Haditha three days later and was briefed on the incident.

"Nothing in the brief caused any concern to me," Huck told investigators. "I do not recall if the brief discussed the number of Iraqis killed that day, but I do recall the brief discussing Marines clearing houses following the IED attack."

McConnell and Chessani have been charged in the case; Huck and Davis have not. Attempts to reach Chessani or an attorney for him were not successful.

In December 2005, the Marines authorized $38,000 in condolence payments to the families of the civilians killed in the first two houses, and Chessani, in early February, explained the payments in a memo. "The enemy chose the time and place of his ambush. Without callous disregard for the lives of innocent bystanders, the enemy would not have chosen to fight from the bedrooms and living rooms of civilian-occupied houses," he wrote.

The official inquiry began two weeks later, after the Time reporter sent a list of questions about the incident to Marine officials in Iraq. In his e-mail, the reporter raised the possibility that Marines had massacred civilians and executed the men from the taxi, based in part on a videotape made by an activist a day after the incident.

Huck told investigators he dismissed the allegations, believing they were part of an insurgent campaign to smear the Marines. Other Marine officers, such as Davis, also believed that the allegations were outlandish.

But Maj. Samuel H. Carrasco, then a battalion operations officer, said he and the battalion executive officer suggested an investigation to Chessani. Carrasco told investigators that "Lt. Col. Chessani then shouted, 'My men are not murderers.' "

The first investigation, by Army Col. Gregory Watt, ordered by Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, then the top field commander in Iraq, essentially supported the Marines' accounts of events. Watt determined that the troops had reason to be suspicious of the men in the white car and concluded that while they did not positively identify targets in the houses, it might have been "unrealistic to expect" on the battlefield that day.

He also found no indication that the Marines "intentionally targeted, engaged and killed noncombatants," but he suggested a criminal investigation nonetheless. The NCIS investigation began March 12, leading to last month's charges.

Lawmaker: U.S. Catching, Releasing Top Terror Targets (CNN)

CNN.com, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The U.S. military already knows what half of its most-wanted terrorist targets look like because they have been apprehended and photographed in the past, a Republican congresswoman said Friday.

The United States is operating "a catch and release program for al Qaeda in Iraq," said Rep. Heather Wilson, a member of the House intelligence committee.

DOJ_NMG_0113919

In remarks at the National Press Club, the New Mexico lawmaker said a senior official told her that the U.S. military already has photographs of "fully half of the high-value al Qaeda targets in Iraq" presently being hunted.

"They're wearing orange jumpsuits in the mugshots we took of them when we captured them the first time," Wilson recalled the official telling her.

"We are operating a catch and release program for al Qaeda in Iraq. This is inexcusable and frustrating ... for the young men and women in the military who are in the fight," she added.

Wilson also joined a congressional chorus Friday calling for President Bush to reject a reported proposal to send another 20,000 to 40,000 troops to bolster the force of 140,000 already deployed in Iraq.

Top Democrats have called the idea a strategy "that has already failed," and Wilson said quelling sectarian violence in the war-ravaged nation is a task best left to the Iraqis.

"I am not a supporter of a surge to do for the Iraqis what the Iraqis will not do for themselves," Wilson said.

"I also have not seen a clarity of mission, and I think that's the greatest weakness that we have right now."

Wilson's remarks came as the U.S. military announced that Iraqi special forces caught four suspected leaders of a terrorist cell during a raid in Baghdad's Sadr City. Three other suspects were detained for questioning.

The men are suspected of being involved in the kidnapping and murder of civilians, the military said.

"They are also suspected of organizing and directing sectarian-based mortar attacks on neighborhoods surrounding Sadr City," a military statement said.

Sadr City is a stronghold of the Mehdi Army, a Shiite militia led by radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.Execution backlash

A day after Bush said he wished Saddam Hussein's execution had "gone in a more dignified way," violent protests erupted in India and Indian-controlled Kashmir over the Iraqi leader's hanging.

Like Bush, the protesters objected to the release of a cell phone video showing Shiite guards taunting the Sunni dictator before his death.

The protests, which have been going on for four days in India's only majority Muslim state, prompted police in Srinagar to use tear gas and batons to control the crowd. Muslim protesters pelted police and troops with heavy stones after Friday prayers.

The protesters also chanted anti-American slogans and torched effigies of Bush.

In the northern town of Agra, home to the Taj Mahal, two men were arrested for allegedly hurling stones at tourists Friday. It was at least the second such incident since Saddam's execution, police said.

U.S. tourist Karen Maini said she "was in great danger" after a man threw a brick at her car while she was stuck in traffic in Agra.

"It was so loud and noisy and scary," she said of the protest. "My driver saved my life." (Watch how the Iraqi government is reacting to footage of Hussein's execution)Other developments

· Police found 12 bodies, most showing signs of torture, strewn across Baghdad on Friday.

· The driver for Iraqi Minister of Agriculture Yaarub Nadhim al-Aboudi was shot to death Friday in the Dora district of southern Baghdad, an Interior Ministry source said. Al-Aboudi is one of al-Sadr's followers.

· Mortar rounds fell in residential areas of eastern and western Baghdad, killing four people and wounding 16. Four civilians were wounded after mortar rounds landed in the city's al-Amil neighborhood, and four people were killed and another 12 wounded when mortar rounds struck a market and apartment complex in Zafaraniya.

· Unidentified gunmen attacked police officers in western Baghdad's Adel neighborhood, killing one and wounding another.

Army Asks Dead To Sign Up For Another Hitch (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Army said Friday it would apologize to the families of about 275 officers killed or wounded in action who were mistakenly sent letters urging them to return to active duty.

The letters were sent a few days after Christmas to more than 5,100 Army officers who had recently left the service. Included were letters to about 75 officers killed in action and about 200 wounded in action.

"Army personnel officials are contacting those officers' families now to personally apologize for erroneously sending the letters," the Army said in a brief news release issued Friday night.

The Army did not say how or when the mistake was discovered. It said the database normally used for such correspondence with former officers had been "thoroughly reviewed" to remove the names of wounded or dead soldiers.

"But an earlier list was used inadvertently for the December mailings," the Army statement said, adding that the Army is apologizing to those officers and families affected and "regrets any confusion."

How Do You Repay A Hero's Sacrifice? (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

EUREKA, Calif. -- Kelly Miller has the dream once or twice a week.

He's on patrol in Iraq, searching a white Toyota Land Cruiser. The driver lunges out and grabs Cpl. Miller's squad leader, Jason Dunham, around the neck. The Iraqi and Cpl. Dunham tumble to the ground in a ferocious hand-to-hand struggle. Cpl. Miller beats the insurgent with a police baton. Another Marine races over to help. The Iraqi drops a hand grenade.

The force of the explosion lifts Cpl. Dunham into the air, his back arching before he falls back toward the brown-dirt road.

Cpl. Miller wakes up.

Almost three years have passed since that grenade exploded for real. But the images are never far from his mind -- the insurgent, the explosion and the friend who intentionally took the brunt of a live grenade and gave his own life to save Cpl. Miller's. The adrenalin of combat, the pain of hot shrapnel, the guilt of making it home alive.

At the White House on Thursday, President Bush will present Cpl. Dunham's parents with the Medal of Honor, the nation's highest award for military valor, the first such award for a Marine since Vietnam. The ceremony will enshrine Jason Dunham for posterity as one who loved his brothers more than himself.

In the audience will sit Cpl. Miller, a 23-year-old still struggling with what it means to receive that much love.

When American forces rolled into Baghdad in April 2003, Kelly Miller was living with his parents in Eureka in their modest shingled home, within sight of the smoky columns rising from the local paper mill. His mom, Linda, was an energetic doctor's-office manager with practical short hair. His dad, Charlie, was a quiet man who delivered mail for 31 years, then retired to care for his grandchildren.

Kelly Miller, sandy-brown-haired and six-foot-one, spent his days with friends, fishing for crabs and racing his car by the beach. On weekends he managed the night crew at the local supermarket.

But the news from Iraq made him wonder about his own courage. How would he perform in combat? One morning after his shift ended, he walked into the Marine recruiter's office at the strip mall and enlisted in the infantry.

So just after noon on April 14, 2004, he found himself a grunt in the Fourth Platoon of Kilo Co., Third Battalion, Seventh Marines -- and Cpl. Dunham's point man on a patrol through a trash-strewn Iraqi neighborhood near Karabilah, on the Syrian border.

HE WAS STILL what the Marines called a boot, a private first class fresh out of boot camp. Many senior enlisted men made life miserable for the boots. But Cpl. Dunham was different. When the boots had to fill sand bags in the hot sun, Cpl. Dunham filled sand bags beside them. Cpl. Miller and other boots loved him for it.

The insurgents had already gotten the jump on the patrol that day, firing a rocket-propelled grenade at the squad's Humvees. The grenade had missed its mark, and Cpl. Dunham's men climbed out of the vehicles to hunt down the shooter.

As point man, it was Cpl. Miller's job to spot roadside bombs and ambushes before it was too late. The responsibility weighed on him as he moved carefully past stone walls and silent, half-built homes. He worried that any mistake would get his friends killed.

The patrol stopped to search a line of vehicles that seemed to be fleeing. Cpl. Miller and Cpl. Dunham approached the white Land Cruiser, where Cpl. Miller saw a rifle poking out from under the rear floor mat. He looked up just in time to see the driver attack Cpl. Dunham.

The insurgent's hand grenade sprayed Cpl. Miller and Cpl. Bill Hampton, the other Marine who rushed to Cpl. Dunham's aid, with jagged pieces of metal. Cpl. Miller heard a ringing in his head, the echoes of a burst ear drum. His face flushed hot, and his mouth tasted of blood. A red stream dripped off his left hand, and he was confused to find that he couldn't pick up his rifle. Pieces of shrapnel burned in his face and arms.

"My mom is going to be … pissed," he told another Marine as he wandered away from the scene, according to both men.

Despite the shrapnel that peppered Cpl. Hampton, he, too, was able to stagger away. But Cpl. Dunham lay still, a fragment embedded deep in his brain. He would die eight days later at a Naval hospital in Bethesda, Md., with his parents at his bedside.

Cpl. Dunham's commanders soon figured out that he had placed his helmet over the grenade to protect his friends, an act of bravery described in a front-page story in The Wall Street Journal on May 25, 2004.

The Marines sent Cpl. Miller to recuperate in Eureka, where he became withdrawn and quick to anger. He couldn't get it out of his head that, as point man, he was supposed to protect the Marines behind him. He was the first one to get to Cpl. Dunham's side, but instead of saving Jason, Jason saved him.

He had a tattoo artist ink a helmet-and-rifle memorial honoring Cpl. Dunham on his right arm with the words: Remember the Fallen 4-14-04. When he was well enough to play softball, Cpl. Miller taped his wrist to give him strength to swing the bat and wrote "Cpl. J.D. USMC" on the wrap.

"Mom, goddammit," he told Mrs. Miller after a couple of beers one night, "I should have done more to save Jason."

Mrs. Miller, now 59, became long-distance friends with Cpl. Dunham's mom, Deb, a 46-year-old with shoulder-length red hair. Mrs. Dunham taught home economics at the only school in tiny Scio, N.Y., patiently coaching students in such survival skills as child-care and bachelors' cooking. At home she baked pies, made fudge and did battle with three dogs.

When she first dated Dan Dunham, a farmhand, the locals thought them an unlikely pair. She was a self-described good girl; he took pride in being a hard-drinking bad boy who gave the local police headaches. He had already been married once and was raising two young boys, Jason and Justin, on his own on $600 a month. She fell in love as much with the boys as she did with Dan, and ever after raised them as her own. The Dunhams had two more children together. For years, Mrs. Dunham couldn't rest until she knew all four children were safe in their beds.

Mrs. Dunham wasn't surprised that Jason had given his own life for his friends; she would have been surprised if he had done anything else under the circumstances. In a letter to Cpl. Hampton's mother, Mrs. Dunham wrote: "When you next get a chance to hug your son please give him one from me. He does not need to know it is from me, but I would appreciate if you would do that for me."

Far from begrudging Cpls. Miller and Hampton their survival, Mrs. Dunham felt that their lives added meaning to her own son's death. Soon Deb Dunham and Linda Miller began referring to Cpl. Miller as "our son."

"We believe that Kelly and William are both very special," Mrs. Dunham wrote to Mrs. Miller. "I do not know what is in their futures but I (we) firmly believe that Jason did what he had to do and they have some important purpose here and he has his to do in Heaven."

But for months Cpl. Miller couldn't get himself to talk to Jason's parents. When they finally met at the Marines' desert base in Twentynine Palms, Calif., Cpl. Miller spoke with them for 15 awkward minutes, unsure whether to thank them or apologize.

AS HE REGAINED STRENGTH and sensation in his arms, Cpl. Miller returned to Twentynine Palms obsessed with trying to rejoin his old platoon mates before they shipped out for their next tour of Iraq in the second half of 2005. It troubled him that his friends had finished their full seven months in the combat zone, while he had not.

Cpl. Miller's commander allowed him to resume light duty as Kilo Co.'s clerk, but even in Iraq that would be a rear-echelon job without the camaraderie of the front lines. So several times a day Cpl. Miller pestered the captain to allow him to rejoin Fourth Platoon as a rifleman, doing five quick pull-ups outside the office for emphasis.

The captain would allow Cpl. Miller back into a rifle platoon only with permission from his surgeon, his physical therapist, the battalion medical officer and his mother. Cpl. Miller collected the letters, including one from a very reluctant Mrs. Miller.

In March 2005, the captain cleared him to rejoin Fourth Platoon, and Cpl. Miller traveled home to Eureka to break the news. Mrs. Miller was in her room, folding clothes on the bed, when he told her that he would soon return to Iraq.

"Why do you feel you need to go back?" she asked him. "You don't have to."

"I have to finish something I started the first time," Cpl. Miller told her. He left the room, returning a few minutes later. "I have to go and finish what Dunham started, and bring my guys home," he said.

SOON ENOUGH, Cpl. Miller found himself in Ramadi, the most hostile city in the Sunni Triangle, for what proved to be months of grueling cat-and-mouse games with the insurgents. The Marines of Kilo Co. hid in abandoned buildings to ambush bomb makers. They manned an isolated, bomb-gutted outpost that was a frequent target for mortar and rocket attacks. They watched as Iraqis in civilian clothes casually dropped explosives on the main road through the city.

On three occasions Cpl. Miller called home from Iraq to report that he had been hurt. Once he injured his ankle playing basketball on base. Another time he stepped into a hole while on patrol. And another, his Humvee was destroyed by a roadside bomb. Each time he called, Mrs. Miller would report back to Mrs. Dunham, and they would fret together.

After he returned from Ramadi, Cpl. Miller decided he had had enough of the Marine Corps, and on his Web page he put a clock that counted down to the end of his enlistment in June, 2007. When the clock hit zero, he hoped to join his older brother as a sheriff's deputy back home in Eureka. He liked the idea of uniformed service, but without the long overseas deployments that made it hard to raise a family as a Marine.

Over the years, Cpl. Miller grew more comfortable around the Dunhams, and made a habit of calling Mrs. Dunham on holidays, such as Christmas and Mother's Day, when he knew that Jason would have called. They'd chat about his dating life and the doings of the Dunham family. He had long talks with Jason's younger brother and sister. Mrs. Dunham noticed the brotherly, teasing tone of their conversations, as if Kelly were trying to fill the gap left by Jason. He talked to Kyle, then 15, about the pros and cons of enlisting in the Marines, reminding him that going to college first would give him more options in life. Enlisting meant a four-year contract.

DOJ_NMG_0113922

One night last summer, Mrs. Dunham hit a low spot, home alone and desperate to talk to Jason. In tears she phoned Cpl. Miller. He had friends over, but kept her talking until she was laughing again.

On his Web page, Cpl. Miller wrote, "Who I'd like to meet: The most Honorable Man I have ever had the privilege of meeting: Cpl. Jason Dunham. To have a chance to talk to him one more time would be priceless."

At the same time, Mrs. Miller felt that her son's personality had darkened. Her Kelly had been such a happy-go-lucky kid; now he seemed at ease only with other Marines or with two Eureka friends who served in the Army. His voice-mail message was a droning monotone: "You've reached Kelly. Whatever."

On his Web page, he posted a photo of himself in Ramadi, aiming a rifle at the photographer. He described his Nissan sports car and wrote: "I love to pitch it sideways or scream through a windy mountain pass."

One weekend last September, Cpl. Miller left base and drove to Eureka to see his girlfriend, Kellyn Griffin, a 21-year-old junior at Humboldt State University. On Saturday night, they went to the apartment of one of his Army buddies to play a movie-trivia game. Ms. Griffin drank rum and Cokes. Cpl. Miller drank Maker's Mark bourbon. They left just after midnight.

Cpl. Miller made it about a mile before he lost control of the Nissan and flipped it over at a "high rate of speed," according to the police report. The car took to the air, sheared off a wooden utility pole 20 feet above the street and came to a rest on the driver's side, crunched up like a paper napkin after a dinner party.

Ms. Griffin was found in a pool of blood fifty feet away from the Nissan, with a broken arm, a lacerated liver and a concussion that dulled her thinking for days.

Police found Cpl. Miller walking in circles in a nearby parking lot. When a state trooper interviewed him, the corporal volunteered that he "(messed) up and am screwed for drunk driving" and said he had to take responsibility for his mistake, according to the police report. The officer arrested him at 2 a.m. after a test that police say revealed a blood-alcohol level above the legal limit.

The crash broke Cpl. Miller's nose, a front tooth and his left shoulder blade and socket. At the hospital, Cpl. Miller was frantic for news of Ms. Griffin. Blood still covering his face, he found her hospital bed, felt his head spin and stumbled out of the room.

Cpl. Miller was released a few hours later. That night Mrs. Miller called Cpl. Dunham's mom. "Well, our boy did it," Mrs. Miller said.

A few days later, Mrs. Dunham called back and laid into Cpl. Miller. "You need to stop, Kelly," she recalls saying. "You need to learn to like yourself because Jason gave you a gift. Your mom and I can't lose anybody else."

"I know," he said. "I'm sorry."

"Whether you do something spectacular or not, you still haven't completed your purpose in this life," she continued. "Whether it's you or your child or your great-great-grandchild who does something phenomenal, you have a purpose here, and your destiny isn't done yet."

Cpl. Miller was on heavy painkillers at the time and soon forgot the details of the conversation. But later he remembered how angry Jason's mother had been, and how ashamed he had felt.

The police charged Cpl. Miller with two drunk-driving felonies that carry a maximum combined penalty of six years in prison. A felony conviction would kill any chance of joining the sheriff's department.

Shortly after doctors removed the staples closing the wound on her back, Ms. Griffin and Cpl. Miller lay in bed in his childhood room. "I feel really bad, because in essence someone gave his life for me, and then I turned around and instead of making use of it, I quite possibly put it to waste," he told her.

Near the bed was a photo of Cpl. Miller in his dress blues and Purple Heart medal, a reminder of Cpl. Dunham's sacrifice. "I have to do good by more people and live up to the potential of both of us," Cpl. Miller told her.

THE CORPORAL'S FELLOW GRUNTS have rallied to his side. When Maj. Trent Gibson, commander of Kilo Co. when Cpl. Dunham was killed, heard about the car accident, he felt he had let Cpl. Miller down. Even though the major had changed jobs in the Marine Corps, he knew that Kelly had been having nightmares about the grenade attack. He knew Kelly had been getting reckless.

He wished he had said something earlier. Now, he emailed his men:

Kilo Brothers,

For those of you who haven't heard, Cpl Miller had another near-death experience this last Sunday. He's goddamned lucky. Let's all give him a phone call...or shoot him an email...and let him know that we care about him and that he's got to keep his head on straight if he's going to make good on the gift that Cpl Dunham gave him....

Semper Kilo.

DOJ_NMG_0113923

Marines who had served under Cpl. Miller in Ramadi sent letters and emails to the judge who would hear his case. "This Marine has only to begin his life," wrote LCpl.Robert B. Bullard. "To rob him of what he has done for me, my platoon, and country would not only be morally incorrect but a criminal act against a mistake."

Mrs. Dunham wrote a lengthy letter telling the judge how Cpl. Miller had rushed to her son's side that day in Iraq. She described how he had since stepped in as a surrogate brother to her youngest children.

She also described how Kelly "has been chasing his personal demons" since Jason sacrificed himself. "I wish you would consider that Kelly is an honorable young man who volunteered to serve and protect those weaker than himself," she wrote.

On Nov. 10, at the opening of the Marine Corps museum in Quantico, Va., President Bush announced his decision to award Cpl. Dunham the Medal of Honor. Leaving the ceremony, Mrs. Dunham talked about the legacy of her son's death. "I'm worried about Kelly," she said. "It's a gift. Strings aren't attached to it. Guilt shouldn't be attached to it. They should just do the best they can with their lives."

The Dunhams have invited dozens of Kilo Co. Marines to Thursday's Medal of Honor presentation in the East Room of the White House. The award, they say, isn't just for their son; it's for all of the young men who served beside him.

Two weeks later, Cpl. Miller is due back in court . His lawyer is trying to persuade the judge and prosecutor to reduce the felony charges to misdemeanors, which would probably allow the corporal to avoid prison. If they agree, and he keeps his record clean for a few years, he could still apply to be a sheriff's deputy.

On his Web page Cpl. Miller writes: "I can't wait for the time to come for a new chapter in my life."

With Each Fallen Soldier, A Field Of Flags Grows (NYT)

By Fernanda Santos

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

MIDDLE GROVE, N.Y., Jan. 4 — The flags are cut from rolls of yellow plastic tablecloth, then woven onto thin wire rods. Each is about as long as a man's size 7 shoe, as wide as an outstretched hand.

They stand on a sloped corner field framed by a row of conifer trees in this upstate hamlet, spreading in concentric circles like ripples on still water.

From afar, the flags look like clumsily painted dots, an amateur installation of elusive meaning. A closer look yields a clue: a laminated sign with bold black numbers that match the number of flags on the field, numbers that climb almost by the day.

On Sunday, there were 3,000 yellow flags on the ground. By Thursday, five more.

"Just imagine if instead of flags, there were soldiers standing here," Caren Crootof said as she walked across the field, replacing flags torn or toppled by rain and wind.

Mrs. Crootof, 54, makes the flags, cutting the plastic with scissors at her kitchen table. She plants them most mornings before going to work as a midwife, on the one-acre plot next to the 19th-century farmhouse where she and her husband raised three children. First, she checks a Web site that provides a daily tally of the number of American soldiers killed in the war in Iraq. Then she takes to the field, updates the sign and plants the flags.

It started in July 2004, with 877 flags.

"We all grieved the losses of 9/11, we all shared the pain of those families that lost loved ones in the attacks," Mrs. Crootof said. "But here we were, losing all this potential, losing heroes who threw their bodies on grenades to save other troops, and I felt that we, as a nation, were doing so little to acknowledge them.

"I just felt compelled to do something," she added, "and this is what I could do."

The field of flags is at once poignant and terrifying, plain yet powerful for those who have taken notice in this out-of-the-way town of 2,300 in northeastern New York State. The Crootofs' field sits at the end of Middle Line Road, which slices through a landscape of rolling hills, silos and grazing cattle. It is just off Route 29, next door to Saratoga Springs.

One recent morning, a truck driver passing by flashed a thumbs-up sign to Mrs. Crootof, who stood in the field like a dark speck on a yellow-gold sea. A few minutes later, a van rolled past the field and its driver honked twice as he steered around the bend.

Just as the van disappeared, Bruce Houser pulled up in a sport utility vehicle and snapped a picture. He first spotted the flags some months ago, while traveling the road on business, but drove back this week, 30 miles from his home in Speigletown, to mark the milestone of 3,000 dead soldiers.

"These flags here, they're a stark reminder of what the war really means," Mr. Houser said.

Ankie Meuwissen, 30, who lives opposite Mrs. Crootof, said people often stopped and stared for a moment — mothers with children in tow, working men, couples young and old.

"I don't know if wonderful is the most appropriate word to describe it," Ms. Meuwissen said, "but it's nice that somebody is doing something to remind us what we're giving up in this war."

DOJ_NMG_0113924

Last Memorial Day, Mrs. Crootof's daughter, Rebecca, 25, heard taps being played as she was eating breakfast on the sun porch. She stepped outside to find a man playing the piece on a trumpet while standing atop a knoll overlooking the field.

What started as a simple exercise in remembrance has become a vast daily vigil for Mrs. Crootof, a self-professed leftist who has taken part in boisterous antiwar protests in New York City and more subdued ones among her neighbors here.

She abhors the war, but sees the flags as nothing more than a heartfelt way of honoring the troops and sharing the grief of their families.

It is a laborious, tedious task of bending, of burying the rods in the ground. Mrs. Crootof often has help — from her children, who come home during college breaks; from her aging parents, who live nearby; from friends and strangers.

Her husband, Mark, a veterinarian, and their son, Aaron, 18, mow the field in the warm months to keep the wild grass from obscuring the flags; a local 4-H club has offered to take on that task come spring. In the summer of 2005, nine girls from Girl Scout Troop 299 in Ballston Lake, about 15 miles to the south, made 100 flags to replace tattered ones.

"The thing is, we all tend to just go along with our everyday life and forget what's going on in Iraq," said Suzanne DeVito, the troop leader at the time. "But when you look at this field and when you step on it and you walk around it, the war becomes very real because you remember that it's not about bombs and tanks. It's about people like you and I."

White Small-town America Pays Highest price For Going To War (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

Every night at the end of Jim Lehrer's NewsHour on America's PBS channel, there is a roll call of American soldiers who died in Iraq that day. Apart from their tragic fates, most of the dead have something else in common: they come from places of which few people have heard.

Obscure towns such as Hollidaysburg, Pennsylvania, Wolfeboro Falls, New Hampshire and Thermopolis, Wyoming, dominate the listings rather than the big cities.

"It is like watching a different reality," says Larry Wilkerson, a former colonel who was chief of staff to Colin Powell. "Nothing could better illustrate the alienation of America's armed forces from the college-going Americans for whom the Iraq war has meant tax cuts, SUVs and nice holidays."

During the week since the 3,000th American soldier was killed in Iraq - by a roadside bomb in Baghdad - Washington's attention has turned to speculation over President George W. Bush's reported plans to order a "surge" of US troops to Iraq.

What is often missing from America's increasingly recriminatory debate on Iraq is how isolated the communities are that bear most of the human cost. The Pentagon does not disclose the socio-economic background of the 25,000 US soldiers who have been killed or wounded in Iraq. But a breakdown of their ethnicity and states of origins shows they are overwhelmingly white and from small towns in the interior states of mid-America and the south.

For example, the ratio of dead in relation to the state's share of the national population is 221 per cent for South Dakota, 178 per cent for Nebraska and 163 per cent for Louisiana.

In contrast, the District of Columbia, which is home to Washington, the US capital, has a ratio of just 52 per cent, while Connecticut is 66 per cent and New Jersey is 60 per cent.

Charles Moskos, a military sociologist at Northwestern University, says the divorce between the social origins of most US army personnel and the character of the population as a whole is greater than ever. When he attended Princeton as a student in the late 1950s, 400 out of his class of 750 had served in uniform. Last year only nine of Princeton's class of 1,100 had been in the armed services, he says.

Even during the Vietnam war, when the well-connected, such as Mr Bush and Dick Cheney, his vice-president, were able to avoid combat in spite of a national enlistment lottery or,like Bill Clinton, dodge the draft altogether, America's middle classes were better represented.

"There is a myth that Americans respect people who have served in combat," says Mr Moskos. "But if you look at the last four presidential elections, it is the draft dodger who has been elected to the White House. They might hate to admit it, but middle-class Americans identify with the draft dodger."

As the war continues, the US military is finding it ever harder to meet enlistment targets. Spending on recruitment has risen several times to more than $1bn (€769m, £518m) in the past 12 months. Standards have been lowered too. The army is now enlisting recruits aged 40, paying recruitment bonuses of up to $40,000 and has lowered the mental threshold to "category three", which, according to Mr Wilkerson, is "one level above imbecility".

Some, including Charlie Rangel, a Democratic representative from Harlem, have even argued for a reinstatement of the draft to make recruitment fairer. Others argue for much larger incentives for graduates to enlist.

DOJ_NMG_0113925

Cindy Sheehan, the celebrity anti-war activist whose son Casey was killed in Baghdad in 2004, says she is receiving a huge volume of e-mails from mothers worried their sons should not sign up. "People are joining the military for economic reasons," says Mrs Sheehan, who is from Vacaville, California. "I call it the poverty draft."

However, according to a poll by the Military Times this week, serving US soldiers are not yet fully disenchanted: 72 per cent said they would support their son or daughter if they wished to enlist.

But their opinions on Iraq offer little comfort to Mr Bush as he contemplates whether to increase the number of soldiers in harm's way.

Almost half the soldiers polled said the Iraq war bore no relation to the "war on terrorism" - a key justification for continued fighting. And only 13 per cent said the US was "very likely to succeed" in Iraq.

Chirac Says Time Proves France Was Right To Resist War (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 5 — In a scathing attack of the American-led war in Iraq, President Jacques Chirac said Friday that his predictions that the war would spread chaos and more terrorism had come true.

"As France had foreseen and feared, the war in Iraq has sparked upheavals that have yet to show their full effects," Mr. Chirac said in his New Year's address at Élysée Palace to the foreign diplomatic corps.

"This adventure has worsened the divisions among communities and threatened the very integrity of Iraq," he said. "It has undermined the stability of the entire region, where every country now fears for its security and its independence. It has offered terrorism a new field for expansion."

As President Bush prepares to unveil next week a new military strategy in Iraq, Mr. Chirac added that "the priority, more than ever, is to restore full sovereignty to the Iraqi people."

The single paragraph on Iraq in a speech that addressed many crises and problems around the world was one of Mr. Chirac's most pointed justifications for France's decision to oppose the invasion of Iraq in 2003.

In a sense, the attack was surprising. France's opposition to the war set off a crisis in French-American relations that has since eased, thanks to close cooperation between the United States and France to resolve the summer's Israeli-Hezbollah war and to curb Iran's nuclear program.

As the violence and chaos in Iraq steadily worsened, despite the presence of American troops, the 74-year-old French president tended to avoid reminding the United States of its failures there.

After Mr. Bush's re-election, for example, Mr. Chirac sent him a handwritten "Cher George" letter of congratulations. He also gave a speech expressing hope that 2005 would be a year of "trust" with Mr. Bush, and congratulated him again after elections took place in Iraq.

In Mr. Chirac's last speech to the foreign diplomatic corps, a year ago, he expressed hope that Iraqi elections would help unify Iraqis.

But as Mr. Chirac seems unlikely to run for a third term in presidential elections this spring, he may feel he has little to lose in being blunt in defending what some French political analysts call the high point of his foreign policy in his 12-year presidency.

In Friday's speech, Mr. Chirac also attacked "the pitfalls of unilateralism," a veiled criticism of the Bush administration for going to war in Iraq without the backing of the United Nations Security Council.

He repeated his approval of the emergence of a "multipolar world" as countries like China, India and Brazil assume "the status of global powers." The term enrages the Bush administration because it seems to envision a power that competes with American interests and influence.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Appeals Court Reverses Convictions Of 2 Westar Energy Executives (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 6, 2007

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Jan. 4 (AP) — An appeals court on Friday overturned convictions against two former executives of Westar Energy who were accused of "looting" the Kansas utility and said the most serious charges cannot be retried.

The United States Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit said the case against the former chief executive, David Wittig, and the former chief strategy officer, Douglas Lake, "hung by a thin legal thread," based on claims that the men tried to hide their personal use of corporate aircraft from securities officials.

DOJ_NMG_0113926

Those claims led jurors in September 2005 to convict Mr. Wittig on 39 counts of conspiracy, wire fraud, money laundering and circumventing of internal controls, and to convict Mr. Lake on 30 counts. Mr. Wittig was sentenced in April 2006 to 18 years; Mr. Lake received 15 years.

But the three-judge panel said prosecutors did not provide evidence that the two men failed to comply with federal regulations.

Without that evidence, the court said, Mr. Wittig and Mr. Lake are not guilty of wire fraud and cannot be retried on those counts. In addition, the panel threw out the money laundering counts, which were based on the wire fraud, and said those cannot be retried. The court sent back the remaining conspiracy and circumvention counts for trial.

The decision was a blow to federal prosecutors, who have now failed twice to convict the two men. Their first trial ended in a mistrial.

Ex-Merrill Lynch Analyst Sentenced In Insider Trading Scheme (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 6, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-A former analyst at Merrill Lynch & Co. Inc. who pleaded guilty to insider trading was sentenced Friday to 37 months in prison for his part in a sprawling scheme that used chatty investment bankers and leaked copies of a market-moving magazine.

Stanislav Shpigelman, 24, had admitted tipping other participants who made more than $6.7 million (â‚¬5.1 million) from October 2004 to August 2005. At the time, he worked in Merrill Lynch's mergers and acquisitions division.

In a plea deal he signed with prosecutors, Shpigelman admitted to a single count of conspiracy to commit insider trading in return for a recommendation that he serve between three and four years in prison.

His lawyer, Mary Mulligan, and family members asked U.S. District Judge Kenneth M. Karas to sentence Shpigelman to less than three years in prison.

Karas, though, called Shpigelman the "critical component" in a scheme that could make others millions of dollars, though Shpigelman conceded receiving only $10,000 (â‚¬7,643) for providing tips to several mergers and acquisitions.

The judge noted that Shpigelman sometimes sought out secret information about deals from others at his company and did so repeatedly.

"It is unfortunately a classic insider trading scheme," Karas said.

The case originated after regulators noticed unusually high trading volume before a merger announcement and discovered that a 63-year-old retired seamstress in Croatia - the aunt of one of the defendants - had made more than $2 million (â‚¬1.5 million).

Investigators soon realized they had found a beehive of inside trading activity that seemed to rely on any method its participants could dream up. At one point, they even discussed getting exotic dancers to coax stock secrets from investment bankers, the government said.

The case also resulted in the arrests of a Milwaukee forklift operator who allegedly obtained early copies of a market-moving column in BusinessWeek magazine and a New Jersey grand juror who supposedly fed the conspiracy secrets about an accounting fraud probe.

But at the heart of the scandal was David Pajcin, a former Goldman Sachs Group Inc. analyst who is cooperating with the government, prosecutors said.

Prosecutors say Pajcin and Eugene Plotkin, 26, a Harvard-trained former Goldman Sachs analyst who has pleaded not guilty to charges in the case, made more than $6.7 million (â‚¬5.1 million) through inside trades. Plotkin is awaiting trial.

Investigators said Plotkin introduced Pajcin to Shpigelman in November 2004 at a Russian day spa and sauna in Manhattan.

The forklift operator, Nickolaus Shuster, 25, has pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit insider trading and awaits sentencing.

BANKER SLAMMED (NYPOST)

By Janet Whitman

The New York Post, January 6, 2007

January 6, 2007 -- A former junior banker at Merrill Lynch was sentenced yesterday to three years and a month behind bars for leaking secret details on pending mergers to the ringleaders of an audacious scheme that also ensnared a stripper, a retired Croatian seamstress, spies in a Business Week print shop and a New Jersey mailman.

DOJ_NMG_0113927

Stanislav Shpigelman, 24, pleaded guilty to the insider-trading charges in July, admitting that he passed on confidential information on deals, such as Reebok's acquisition by Adidas, to the scam's two masterminds, who racked up $6.4 million in ill-gotten gains by trading on the tips.

"I realize my actions are inexcusable," Shpigelman told a Manhattan courtroom yesterday, as his parents, sister, other family members and friends sat behind him. "I should have walked away from the situation, but I didn't have the strength."

The promising young investment banker, who lives with his parents in Sheepshead Bay, Brooklyn, has been working for a moving company.

His family begged the judge for leniency.

"I know my son," his mother, Jane, told U.S. District Judge Kenneth Karas. "I am afraid the stress of prison may break him."

Judge Karas said he imposed the jail term with a "heavy heart" because Shpigelman had one of the most supportive families he had ever come across.

But the judge added that the stiff sentence was necessary to send a strong signal to other young bankers on Wall Street.

Shpigelman has asked to do his time at the Otisville Federal Correctional Institution in Otisville, N.Y., or the Schuylkill Federal Correctional Institution in Minersville, Pa.

The plot's architects, former Goldman Sachs bankers Eugene Plotkin and David Pajcin, recruited Shpigelman in November 2004 at a Russian bathhouse in lower Manhattan called Spa 88.

Shpigelman, who had earlier got help from Plotkin in securing an internship at Merrill, said he felt pressured to cooperate. He netted less than $12,000 for providing inside info on six pending mergers.

Investigators were tipped off to the trading ring in late 2005, when the FBI got word of a suspicious trade ahead of news that Reebok was being acquired.

A retired underwear seamstress in Croatia bought $130,000 worth of Reebok options, a trade that turned into a $2 million profit in only two days.

The seamstress turned out to be the aunt of Pajcin, who controlled her account from New Jersey.

Investigators later learned of other plots hatched by Plotkin, 27, and Pajcin, 29, including the planting of forklift operator moles inside a BusinessWeek print shop to steal prepublication copies.

Pajcin also persuaded his friend, former New Jersey mailman Jason Smith, to divulge secret information while he served on a grand jury. Smith got a sentence of two years and nine months in prison.

Plotkin, who has pleaded not guilty, is out on bail awaiting trial. Pajcin is in a Brooklyn jail and is cooperating with investigators.

Shpigelman must report to prison on March 9.

janet.whitman@nypost.com

Jail For Merrill Analyst In Insider Trading Scam (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, January 6, 2007

The inside man in a $6.7 million Wall Street trading scam that envisioned using strippers to pry stock tips from drunken bankers was sentenced yesterday to three years and a month in prison.

"My actions were foolish and I regret considerably what I have done," Stanislav Shpigelman told Manhattan Federal Judge Kenneth Karas.

Karas called the Brooklyn-reared Merrill Lynch investment analyst a "classic overachiever," but said prison time was necessary to deter others from trying the same thing.

Shpigelman, 24, leaked details of several pending deals, including the 2005 merger of Adidas and Reebok, to accomplices who traded on the information.

Shpigelman met co-conspirator Eugene Plotkin, a Harvard grad, at a Russian day spa in the financial district where they traded stock tips between steams, prosecutors said. In November 2004, Plotkin introduced him to David Pajcin, and Shpigelman promptly filled him in on the pending merger between Procter & Gamble and Gillette, the feds said.

Shpigelman, a SUNY-Binghamton alum whose family lives in Sheepshead Bay, got just $10,000 for his role in the scheme.

The defendants hoped to employ strippers to glean stock tips from bankers over drinks, but that plan never materialized. They did, however, get advance copies of a popular Business Week stock tips column by getting an associate a job as a forklift operator at the Wisconsin plant where the magazine is printed.

Plotkin goes on trial in April. Pajcin is cooperating with the feds.

"Shpigelman did this for the oldest reason in the book," prosecutor Benjamin Lawsky said. "Greed and the desire to make bundles and bundles of money."

But Shpigelman's lawyer, Mary Mulligan, said greed was not a factor for a client who still lives with his parents in the same bedroom he had in high school.

"He sits before you a humble, repentant man," she said, noting that he now works for a moving company and does charity work.

Ex-Merrill Analyst Gets 37 Months In Insider Case (Update4) (BLOOM)

By David Glovin

Bloomberg, January 6, 2007

Jan. 5 (Bloomberg) -- Former Merrill Lynch & Co. analyst Stanislav Shpigelman was sentenced to 37 months in prison for leaking secret information on a pending deal, the first analyst jailed in the million-dollar insider-trading scheme.

Shpigelman, 24, a former analyst in Merrill's mergers-and- acquisitions division, told U.S. District Judge Kenneth Karas today he was ``sorry" for giving secret information about pending mergers to two junior employees at Goldman Sachs Group Inc., Eugene Plotkin and David Pajcin, who allegedly bought shares in companies targeted for takeover.

``I realize what I've done is inexcusable," Shpigelman said in Manhattan federal court. ``I do beg for leniency."

Today's sentencing is the second in a case that has led to criminal charges against Plotkin, Pajcin and others. Last month Jason Smith, a former mailman in New Jersey, was sentenced to 33 months in prison for leaking secret information from a grand jury he served on to Plotkin and Pajcin to use in insider trading.

Shpigelman was a ``mole inside Merrill Lynch," Assistant U.S. Attorney Benjamin Lawsky told Karas. ``On any one of these deals, a savvy trader could make millions of dollars." New York-based Merrill fired Shpigelman after the scheme came to light.

Shpigelman, who lives in Brooklyn, New York, faced from 37 to 46 months in prison under federal sentencing guidelines.

Secret Information

Prosecutors said Shpigelman leaked secret information on six pending transactions in 2004 and 2005, including Procter & Gamble Co.'s $61 billion purchase of Gillette Co. Shpigelman admitted in his guilty plea in July that he tipped the others about a single deal, Adidas-Salomon AG's $3.67 billion purchase of Reebok International.

Shpigelman was a student at the State University of New York at Binghamton when he befriended Plotkin, who helped him prepare for Wall Street job interviews, prosecutors said. Plotkin and Pajcin, a 2000 University of Notre Dame economics graduate, met at Goldman.

Shpigelman worked as a summer intern at Merrill from 2000 to 2002 before graduating with a degree in business management in 2004, the Securities and Exchange Commission said in April in a related civil suit.

Plotkin and Pajcin, who is now cooperating with prosecutors, recruited Shpigelman for the insider-trading scheme in a meeting at Club 88, a Manhattan day spa and Russian sauna, the SEC said. Prosecutors said Plotkin and others tried to recruit sources at other investment banks to leak them information.

`Bundles of Money'

Lawsky disputed Shpigelman's claim that he was ``pressured" to leak information that helped others earn at least $2.5 million in illegal profits. ``Mr. Shpigelman did this for the oldest reason in the book -- greed -- and his desire to make bundles and bundles of money," Lawsky said.

Karas called Shpigelman an ``overachiever" who became a ``critical component" in a ``classic insider-trading case." Karas said he wanted the sentence to send a stern message to Wall Street.

``This is the kind of case that comes along that people talk about," Karas said.

Defense attorney Mary Mulligan said the safe-deposit box Shpigelman opened soon after the scheme began was for his poker winnings, a claim Karas rejected.

``Greed was not his motivation," Mulligan said of Shpigelman, who now works for a moving company and must report to prison on March 9. Mulligan asked unsuccessfully that her client be allowed to serve part of his sentence at home. Shpigelman's mother and sister also requested leniency.

Business Week

Separately, Plotkin and Pajcin are accused of illegally obtaining the names of stocks mentioned in Business Week magazine before issues were mailed to subscribers.

Nickolaus Shuster, who worked at a Wisconsin printing plant, pleaded guilty in October to charges that he leaked the names of companies set to appear in the magazine. Prosecutors said Shuster stole copies for Plotkin and Pajcin. Charges were filed against another plant worker, Juan Renteria, who has pleaded not guilty.

If convicted, Plotkin may face up to 15 years in jail because he allegedly helped organize the scheme.

Merrill shares fell 9 cents to $91.95 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading at 1:44 p.m. Merrill is a passive minority investor in Bloomberg LP, the parent of Bloomberg News.

The case is U.S. v. Shpigelman, 06-CR-586, U.S. District Court, Southern District of New York (Manhattan).

A Misdated Option Aided ACS's Deason (WSJ)

By James Bandler

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

Affiliated Computer Services Inc. for the first time said its chairman, Darwin Deason, benefited from a wrongly dated stock option, adding that a portion of the 2002 award would be repriced to cut its potential value by $655,000.

But the company said the repricing is being done for tax reasons, and repeated its earlier insistence that an internal probe didn't find evidence that Mr. Deason's 2002 option grant had been improperly backdated.

The Dallas-based technology outsourcing concern forced its chief executive and top finance official to resign their posts in November, after the internal investigation uncovered rampant backdating.

In a filing late Friday, the company detailed a series of past option grants to Mr. Deason and other top officials that it is repricing to avoid having individual executives suffer tax penalties associated with mispriced option grants. Except for the 2002 grant received by Mr. Deason and several others, the company didn't say whether the particular grants being repriced were backdated, or merely carried incorrect dates because final approval hadn't yet occurred.

Fortunate Timing

In Mr. Deason's case, the fortunately timed 2002 grant came at the bottom of a steep trough, on a late July date when the stock hit a quarterly low. The company said yesterday its internal probe found "evidence, though inconclusive" that there had been an "informal" selection of that date for Mr. Deason's grant. But formal approval, it said, didn't occur until five days later, when the stock had risen 5%.

Repricing the entire grant of 600,000 shares would have wiped $1.1 million from its potential value. ACS repriced only a portion of the award to the higher exercise price, because there is no tax penalty associated with already vested options. The company has already repriced all options for individuals found to have engaged in misconduct.

The company offered no more details Friday about a 1998 grant to Mr. Deason and other executives that was dated at a yearly low.

Nearly a Month Off

The repricing of other grants to ACS top executives show that the company misdated grants by close to a month on occasion. One grant, originally dated July 11, 2000, to current CEO Lynn Blodgett among others, was priced at $16.44, just ahead of a steep run-up in the company's stock. The company said the actual price should have been $23.47, or 43% higher. The stock next reached that level on August 10, 2000.

The ACS spokesman, Michael Buckley, said the company is reimbursing Mr. Deason and other executives for any financial loss or tax penalties associated with the misdated, repriced options. He said Mr. Deason is being treated like all the other employees whose grants have been repriced.

Write to James Bandler at james.bandler@wsj.com4

Inside Jobs (WSJ)

By Lucian Bebchuk

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

Apple Computer announced a week ago the conclusions of a special board committee that examined the "improper dating" of over 6,000 option grants during 1997-2002. The committee found no basis for having less than "complete confidence in [CEO] Steve Jobs and the senior management team," placing full responsibility for past problems on the company's former CFO and general counsel. But the company's report fails to dispel concerns about Apple's governance.

In reviewing past grant awards, the report discusses separately grants awarded to directors and to Mr. Jobs, but it lumps grants to senior managers other than Jobs together with all other grants. The company is surprisingly silent on whether any of these senior managers received "improperly dated" grants.

The report indicates that Mr. Jobs "was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates," but states that "he did not receive or financially benefit from these grants." But even though Mr. Jobs did not personally benefit from these grants, it turns out that he did benefit from other improperly timed grants.

In particular, Mr. Jobs received in 2002 an award of at-the-money options to buy 7.5 million Apple shares, roughly 2% of the total shares then outstanding. The grant was backdated by two months, which significantly increased the award's value. Surprisingly, Apple did not disclose the backdating of this large CEO grant in October when it announced the committee's "key findings."

DOJ_NMG_0113930

When reporting about this grant in 2003, Apple noted that the grant comprised 32% of the total options awarded to Apple employees during 2002, and explicitly stated that the grant's exercise price was equal to the stock price on the grant date. Apple's report does not provide any insight into why the special committee found as fully acceptable the failure by Mr. Jobs and all other directors to notice the erroneous recording and reporting of this significant grant.

The special committee concluded that Mr. Jobs did not appreciate the "accounting implications" that the improper dating of grants had for Apple's financial statements. But improper dating may be viewed as wrong for reasons other than the accounting consequences. Thus, it is unfortunate that the report says little about what Mr. Jobs and others current senior managers knew and believed about the improper dating beyond noting Mr. Jobs's failure to appreciate the accounting implications.

Finally, the account suggested by Apple's report leaves readers wondering what incentive the former CFO and general counsel had to engage in improper dating. CFOs and general counsels commonly do not have primary responsibility for attracting and compensating employees. Why would these two former executives engage in massive backdating of thousands of grants without at least tacit support from other members of senior management? Why would they act to increase the compensation of a CEO who was unaware of their having done so? These mysteries add to the questions posed by the company's report.

Steve Jobs's great accomplishments have well earned him a place in the pantheon of high-tech leaders and visionaries. And Apple's senior management has undoubtedly done very well for shareholders during the past several years. All of this, however, clearly does not compel the conclusion that Apple's governance has performed adequately with respect to option grants. And the company's report falls far short of providing a basis for accepting such a conclusion.

Beyond Apple Computer, there are many other apples in the barrel of companies whose past option grant practices raise serious questions. In a recent study, "Lucky CEOs," Yaniv Grinstein, Urs Peyer and I estimate that 12% of public firms were involved in lucky grants awarded at monthly lows that cannot be explained by sheer luck. In a subsequent study, "Lucky Directors," we further show that outside directors received lucky grants not produced by sheer luck in an estimated 7% of public firms.

We also find evidence linking lucky grants with governance problems. CEO lucky grants were more common when the board lacked a majority of independent directors. In contrast to claims that gains from backdated grants served as an efficient substitute for other forms of compensation, CEOs getting lucky grants received more, not less, total reported compensation. Lucky grants to outside directors were more common in firms with entrenching arrangements that protect incumbents from removal. And outside directors' luck was correlated with CEO luck.

For corporate America to improve its governance going forward, boards should face up to -- and fully share with shareholders -- past governance problems in their companies.

Mr. Bebchuk, director of Harvard Law School's program on corporate governance, is co-author of "Pay without Performance: The Unfulfilled Promise of Executive Compensation" (Harvard University Press, 2004).

CRIMINAL LAW:

News Media Seek Audio Of Libby Trial (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON - Fifteen news organizations and five other groups are asking a federal judge to release audio recordings each day in the upcoming criminal trial of Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff.

The Supreme Court releases audio recordings of arguments in major cases, and lower federal courts have "started to follow the Supreme Court's lead," lawyers for the news organizations said in filings this week in U.S. District Court.

Cheney is expected to testify for his former aide, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, and other witnesses will include NBC Washington bureau chief Tim Russert.

"Most of the key witnesses are public figures who regularly appear in the media," the organizations said in documents filed late Thursday with Judge Reggie Walton. "Knowledge that their testimony might be released on audiotapes will not make them feel awkward or uncomfortable, and certainly no more so than testifying in front of a courtroom filled with reporters."

The Libby trial is scheduled to begin Jan. 16. He is accused of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI about his conversations with journalists regarding outed CIA officer Valerie Plame.

"If there were ever a case where release of audio recordings is unlikely to have any impact on the proceedings - other than the beneficial one of more fully informing the public - it is this one," lawyers for the news organizations stated.

The organizations are ABC, The Associated Press, Bloomberg News, CNN, CBS, Dow Jones, E.W. Scripps, the Hearst Corp., the Los Angeles Times, the McClatchey Co., NBC, National Public Radio, USA Today, the Washington Post, the

DOJ_NMG_0113931

American Society of Newspaper Editors, the Newspaper Association of America, the Radio-Television News Directors Association, the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press and the Society of Professional Journalists.

The Villains Of Currency (WSJ)

By Joanna Slater

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

Investors' Excitement Allows Fraudsters To Get Even the Savvy

Cashing in on the volatile world of buying and selling currencies just became riskier.

Scam artists are increasingly using currency-trading schemes to ensnare even experienced investors, regulators say. The scams take many forms, soliciting individuals over the telephone or wooing them at hotel presentations.

One widespread scheme promises investors fat profits if they jump in on a time-sensitive opportunity to trade currencies. The money then disappears or gets eaten up in unprofitable trades.

Such frauds exploit a growing awareness among the investing public that the global foreign-exchange market -- worth roughly $2 trillion a day -- is an important financial arena. They also benefit from a legal loophole: Not all of the people who solicit investors to trade currencies are regulated, making them difficult to monitor.

Schemes like these are "the fraud du jour," says Michael Dunn, a commissioner at the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, the government body responsible for regulating a portion of currency trading. In recent years, foreign-exchange fraud cases have expanded to take up 28% of the body's current litigation. "This is a real problem out there," says Mr. Dunn.

Over the past five years, more than 25,000 investors have been burned by these frauds, which employ a variety of tactics to lure individuals. Some firms set up booths at investor fairs or rely on printed brochures or pitches over the telephone. Other schemes target particular ethnic groups or spread by word of mouth.

That's how Vicki Myers learned about White Pine Trust Corp., a San Diego foreign-currency fund. Before deciding whether to invest, Ms. Myers visited the company's office. The firm had trading screens, glossy brochures, and, it claimed, an outstanding track record. Impressed, Ms. Myers and her husband invested $58,000 in retirement funds and other savings.

After the fund's Web site stopped working and no one returned her calls, she drove back to the office in 2004, only to find it abandoned. The money was likely gone, she realized. The fund's founder is now in prison after pleading guilty to wire fraud.

"It made me sick," recalls the 57-year-old, who is a marketing director at a residence for the elderly. She estimates that about half of her husband's retirement savings disappeared in the fraud.

The scams tap into an increasing curiosity among individuals about the world of currencies, long the domain of banks, companies, and other institutions.

"The strength and weakness in the dollar is being talked about in the headlines on a daily basis," says Muhammad Rasoul, chief operating officer of Global Forex Trading, a registered foreign-exchange firm based in Michigan that caters to individual customers. "You're going to have people trying to take advantage of those who aren't as familiar" with currencies.

To combat such practices, Mr. Rasoul advocates closing the loopholes that allow some currency-market players to escape regulation and help unscrupulous operators to thrive.

Knowing how to identify legitimate foreign-exchange players is particularly important since the number of firms catering to individual investors has exploded in recent years. Increasing numbers of small investors are trying their hand at buying and selling actual money, thanks to electronic-trading platforms that require low minimum investments.

It's a risky proposition that features unpredictable swings in prices that can wipe out gains. The scams rarely mention such hazards. They target not only financial novices and the elderly, but also investors with an advanced grasp of how markets work.

A good example is the con that ensnared Ms. Myers, which managed to solicit more than $30 million from investors.

The fund's founder, Richard Matthews Jr., pleaded guilty to wire fraud in 2005 in federal court in San Diego, and is in prison while a receiver liquidates the ill-gotten gains from the scam, which included a 12-acre island in Belize, property in California, and a yacht.

Investors in the scheme may recover approximately 20% of their original investment, according to the receiver.

The frauds themselves differ in type and scope. A garden-variety scam might work like this: Fraudsters rent a telemarketing "boiler room" complete with phones and cubicles, and start cold-calling numbers from a list of leads available for purchase. They promise large guaranteed returns, hail their track record, and ask that a minimum investment be wired to a particular bank. If an investor bites, the calls continue, saying more money is needed to take advantage of an urgent trading opportunity.

When the investor asks for the money back, the response is that the market has shifted; then a month or two later the company closes. "The next day they're up and running under a new name," says Mr. Dunn of the CFTC. Florida is a particular hotspot for such schemes, he says.

DOJ_NMG_0113932

Another tactic is to target members of a particular community. In San Francisco, for example, a firm placed a classified ad in a local Chinese-language newspaper -- promising well-paid work with health insurance. People who responded to the ad were given a minimal amount of training in how to trade currencies. Then they were asked to invest $20,000 of their own money and to encourage friends and relatives to open accounts. Nearly all of the $1.78 million invested by at least 45 people was lost.

One fact that helps to explain the prevalence of such currency scams is that they sometimes slip through the regulatory cracks. The CFTC has the authority to crack down on fraud in futures contracts, which are agreements to buy or sell a given commodity (or in this case, a particular currency) on specific dates. Futures contracts are a basic way to speculate on currencies. In a recent foreign-exchange case, CFTC v. Zelener, in the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Chicago, the judges ruled that although customers were defrauded, the contracts involved weren't explicitly futures. As a result, the judges said the carefully worded contracts in the case put the wrongdoers beyond the mandate of the CFTC. "In effect, it gave a blueprint for fraudsters on how to escape our jurisdiction," says Mr. Dunn of the CFTC.

Last year, Congress examined ways to close the Zelener loophole and is expected to reconsider the issue soon.

Another issue exploited by fraudsters relates to how currency contracts get sold to the average investor. The current law provides a fair degree of latitude for companies selling over-the-counter currency futures: for example, they don't have to register with a regulatory body, as long as they're affiliated with a company that has done so. Their employees can also escape regulatory scrutiny.

The result, at times, is high-pressure sales tactics by people who were previously involved in other forms of commodity fraud, says Daniel Roth, president of the National Futures Association, a self-regulating body for the industry.

"Essentially you have a completely unregulated sales force that is in some cases preying on retail customers," says Mr. Roth. "I can't believe that's what Congress intended."

Some registered firms take steps to protect themselves. Mr. Rasoul of Global Forex Trading says his firm won't take customer referrals from unregulated agents who may be using questionable practices to bring in business. "We're not interested in dealing with people who don't have some kind of responsibility over them," he says.

Write to Joanna Slater at joanna.slater@wsj.com1 Unmasking Fraud ...

If you're considering investing in currencies, some resources to protect yourself:

· Visit the CFTC's currency fraud site: www.cftc.gov/enf/enfforex.htm2

· Contact the National Futures Association at (800) 676-4NFA and ask if a company is a member of the NFA or registered with the CFTC, and to check the disciplinary record of a particular company or salesperson. The NFA has a site to check a firm's record (www.nfa.futures.org/basicnet3).

· Check if the company has attracted the attention of other authorities, like your state's securities commissioner (www.nasaa.org4) or Attorney General's consumer protection bureau (www.naag.org5).

... And Getting Into Forex

There are several ways to invest in foreign-currency movements:

· Mutual Funds. Several "hard currency" funds invest in a variety of currencies. Foreign-bond funds also derive a portion of returns from currency movements. Morningstar's Web site is a resource to research such funds.

· Online Accounts. A large number of companies offer online trading accounts to retail investors where they can speculate directly on currency movements.

· ETFs. Certain exchange-traded funds track the performance of individual foreign currencies against the dollar. Sites such as www.etfconnect.com6 offer information.

Sources: CFTC; WSJ data

SAN FRANCISCO Challenge To Law On Officer Killings Convicted Man's Attorney Calls It Unconstitutional (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 6, 2007

(01-05) 20:57 PST -- The lawyer for the man convicted of second-degree murder for killing San Francisco police Officer Isaac Espinoza said Friday he will ask the sentencing judge to declare unconstitutional a state law requiring his 23-year-old client to spend the rest of his life in prison.

The law may violate the right to equal protection because it punishes second-degree murder of a police officer more severely than first-degree murder of someone who isn't an officer, said Martin Sabelli, attorney for defendant David Hill.

District Attorney Kamala Harris disagreed, saying it was both legal and just that "this defendant should die in prison."

DOJ_NMG_0113933

A San Francisco jury convicted Hill on Thursday of shooting Espinoza to death in April 2004. The 29-year-old officer, an eight-year police veteran, and his partner, Barry Parker, both in plainclothes, stepped out of their unmarked car on Newhall Street in the Bayview district and ordered Hill to stop because they thought he might be concealing a weapon, according to Parker's testimony.

The defense argued that Hill thought he was being threatened by rival gang members when he opened fire, killing Espinoza and wounding Parker. But jurors found that Hill had known both men were officers, though they acquitted him of premeditated first-degree murder.

Second-degree murder, a killing that is deliberate but not premeditated or planned in advance, is normally punishable by 15 years to life in prison, or 20 to life if a gun is used. But the sentence is longer if the defendant knew, or should have known, that the victim was an on-duty law enforcement officer.

Under a law that the Legislature passed in 1997, and voters reaffirmed in a 1998 ballot initiative, second-degree murder of a peace officer carries a mandatory sentence of life in prison without possibility of parole, if the killer used a gun or other dangerous weapon, or intended to kill or seriously injure the officer. If none of those circumstances is proved but the defendant knew the victim was an officer, the punishment is 25 years to life.

First-degree murder of a law enforcement officer is punishable by death or life without parole. Harris, fulfilling a campaign promise of opposition to the death penalty, said within days of Hill's arrest that she would not seek a death sentence.

Hill is scheduled to be sentenced Feb. 8 by Superior Court Judge Carol Yaggy.

Sabelli, Hill's lawyer, said he would base his constitutional challenge on the fact that the law requires a harsher sentence for second-degree murder of a police officer, life without parole, than the sentence for first-degree murder of a non-officer, 25 years to life.

"It's a more serious punishment for what appears to be a lesser crime, based on the status of the victim," Sabelli said. "There may be a constitutional issue, an equal-protection issue."

He also said there appeared to be "a tension, if not a contradiction," in the jury's findings that Hill had known the victims were police officers but had not acted with premeditation when he shot them.

But Harris said the nature of a police officer's job justifies a more severe punishment for their murder.

"It's absolutely necessary to have a law that gives more of a penalty when someone harms a person who is fulfilling a duty to keep us safe," Harris said.

E-mail Bob Egelko at begelko@sfchronicle.com.

Page B - 1

Documents Give New Details Of SunCruz-linked Bribe To Ex-Ohio Lawmaker (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, January 6, 2007

One-time powerful lobbyist Jack Abramoff gave a $10,000 campaign bribe to an Ohio congressman for his public words of praise for Abramoff's business partner in the purchase of a South Florida fleet of gambling ships more than six years ago.

Specific details of the political bribe linked to the SunCruz Casinos sale were disclosed for the first time this week in court papers filed by Justice Department lawyers for the upcoming sentencing of convicted former Republican Congressman Bob Ney.

Ney, 52, pleaded guilty to corruption charges in October and faces sentencing in Washington on Jan. 19. He's trying to downplay the scope of the corruption conspiracy in hopes of receiving a two-year prison sentence. Prosecutors counter that he should be imprisoned for at least two years and three months.

Abramoff, who is at the center of the ongoing corruption investigation in Washington, turned himself in last November to serve about six years in prison for lying to lenders to obtain a $60 million bank loan to buy the SunCruz fleet, based in Dania Beach.

Abramoff and his SunCruz business partner, Adam Kidan of New York, who is serving the same prison sentence, used that money to buy the gambling fleet for $147 million from Fort Lauderdale tycoon Konstantinos "Gus" Boulis in fall 2000.

Boulis would be slain months later, but Abramoff and Kidan have not been implicated in any way in that case.

The SunCruz case against Abramoff and Kidan gave Justice Department officials the leverage to pressure Abramoff to turn on other colleagues, congressional aides and politicians last year.

The charges against Ney are based primarily on his behind-the-scenes work for Abramoff's Indian tribal clients in exchange for a golf trip to Scotland, campaign money and professional sports tickets. Ney also took tens of thousands of dollars in casino chips and cash from a foreign businessman seeking political favors. But the charges also include the former lawmaker's unusual tactics to help Abramoff buy the SunCruz gambling fleet.

During negotiations in the SunCruz deal, Abramoff asked his lobbying partner, Michael Scanlon, who had once worked for ex-GOP leader Tom DeLay, to do him a favor. That's when Ney entered the picture.

Scanlon contacted Ney's chief of staff, Neil Volz, to arrange to have Ney disparage Boulis and his company in the Congressional Record. Scanlon drafted a statement that Ney put into the Record in March 2000, saying: ``There are a few bad apples out there who don't play by the rules and that is just plain wrong. One such example is the case of SunCruz Casinos, based out of Florida."

The motive: "To soften the negotiating position" of Boulis and "secure a better deal" for Abramoff and his business partner Kidan, according to the court documents filed Wednesday.

Scanlon, who also pleaded guilty to corruption charges, told investigators that Abramoff and Kidan asked for another favor from Ney after the SunCruz sale that September. "Abramoff and Kidan wanted a second statement, this time praising Kidan as the new manager of the business," according to the court documents.

That October, Scanlon discussed the plan in e-mails with Abramoff -- including a payoff to the congressman.

And in a phone call with Ney and Volz, "Scanlon offered them a $10,000 contribution to the National Republican Campaign Committee in return for [Ney's] agreement to insert the second statement into the Congressional Record," the documents say.

In late October 2000, Ney inserted these remarks: ``I have come to learn that SunCruz Casinos now finds itself under new ownership and, more importantly, that its new owner has a renowned reputation for honesty and integrity."

Ney predicted that Kidan ``will easily transform SunCruz from a questionable enterprise to an upstanding establishment that the gaming community can be proud of."

On Nov. 1, 2000, Abramoff and Kidan tapped SunCruz's coffers to donate $10,000 on Ney's behalf to the GOP campaign committee.

The following year, the partners ran the business into the ground.

DOJ Pushes FBI To Broaden Data Sharing With Outside Agencies (COMPWRLD)

By Todd R. Weiss

Computerworld, January 6, 2007

It plans to use a central database to make crime info widely available

January 06, 2007 (Computerworld) -- The U.S. Department of Justice is pushing the FBI and its other operating units to speed up and expand their efforts to share a wide array of information with outside law enforcement agencies via a centralized database called OneDOJ.

In a Dec. 21 memo, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty also directed CIO Vance Hitch to work with the DOJ's component agencies to develop "an aggressive but practical plan" for increasing their information-sharing capabilities. The plans, which must be submitted to McNulty's office by Feb. 9, will include steps that can be taken within the next 180 days to enable the units to participate more fully in seven ongoing data-sharing initiatives.

In addition, McNulty assigned Hitch to a new committee that will coordinate the DOJ's information-sharing program. And he said in the memo that the coordinating committee and his staff will work with Hitch's office to develop plans for implementing the Unix-based OneDOJ technology internally in 15 high-priority metropolitan areas and other regions.

The plan to expand the use of OneDOJ by other law enforcement authorities at the federal, state and local levels has raised the hackles of some privacy and civil rights advocates, who said last week that the DOJ will need to work hard to ensure that the increased information sharing doesn't infringe on the rights of law-abiding Americans.

"The problem is the ease with which the information held by multiple agencies can be accessed in one place," said Allison Knight, staff counsel at the Electronic Privacy Information Center in Washington. Any inaccurate data stored in OneDOJ could be quickly disseminated to a large number of law enforcement officials, she said, adding that the DOJ should enable people to correct erroneous information.

Knight also said that the centralized database could become a big target of hackers and other unauthorized users. DOJ officials need to ensure that deep security and safety mechanisms are in place to prevent breaches, she said.

OneDOJ is "far more than just bringing together all the information they have," said Barry Steinhardt, director of the technology and liberty program at the American Civil Liberties Union. "Once you put all the information in one place, it enables the kind of data mining that's not possible by traditional law enforcement."

One problem, Steinhardt added, is that the DOJ, and the FBI in particular, have been "notoriously inept at managing [their] computing resources."

For example, the FBI in 2005 scrapped a three-year, $170 million effort to develop an automated case management system and now is pursuing a project called Sentinel that isn't due for completion until late 2009. And the DOJ received a "D" grade for computer security on an annual report card issued by a congressional committee last March.

Ken Wall, Crystal Russo Sentenced In Orange Beach Case (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), January 6, 2007

A real estate investor escaped a lengthy prison sentence Friday for his role in a wide-ranging corruption case in Orange Beach, while the wife of that city's former mayor avoided prison altogether.

Federal prosecutors in Mobile urged U.S. District Judge Kristi DuBose to send Ken Wall to prison for more than two years for mail and wire fraud in a case centering on Steve Russo, who had served as mayor of the resort city before resigning last year following his indictment on corruption charges.

Instead, DuBose sentenced Wall to a year and a day in prison -- less than the minimum recommended by advisory guidelines -- and fined him $250,000.

DuBose sentenced Russo's wife, Crystal Russo, to 180 days of home confinement and two years' probation for obstruction of justice. As part of a plea bargain in September, she admitted that she helped her husband try to hide money that prosecutors had targeted for forfeiture.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven

Butler objected to the "insufficiency" of Wall's sentence and indicated prosecutors might appeal.

"This case, like any public corruption case, strikes at the core of our democratic process -- which is the right to honest government by our elected officials," U.S. Attorney Deborah Rhodes said in a statement.

A jury in September found Wall, 55, guilty of conspiracy, two counts of mail fraud and three counts of wire fraud in connection with a real estate deal that netted Steve Russo $400,000.

The charges arose from one of a number of corrupt schemes that prosecutors contended the mayor ran to enrich himself. Russo and former City Attorney Larry Sutley, who also were convicted in September, will be sentenced next month.

DuBose earlier this week overturned Wall's conspiracy conviction, ruling that there was insufficient evidence to support it. But she let the other counts stand.

At the trial, developer Jim Brown -- who cut a deal with prosecutors for his testimony -- told jurors that he financed Russo's $1.2 million purchase of property on Gulf Bay Road along Wolf Bay in August 2005 in order to ensure support for his development projects. The mayor sold the property the same day for $1.6 million to Deck Investments -- a partnership that included Wall, who had teamed with Brown on a controversial proposal to build a $300 million condominium-hotel and retail project called The Water Club.

Brown is scheduled to be sentenced in June for conspiracy.

Testimony during the trial indicated that Wall had never disclosed to his Deck Investments partners that Russo was the owner of the property, and Brown told jurors that Wall wanted Russo to know that Wall had made the deal work.

The initial calculation of advisory sentencing guidelines by the U.S. Probation Office for Wall called for a minimum prison term of 6½ years in prison. That was based partly on the $400,000 profit Russo made on the "land flip."

But defense attorneys Bill Baxley and David McKnight argued Friday that no one lost any money. Although Russo undoubtedly profited, McKnight said, he pointed to testimony from Brown that the Gulf Bay property was worth at least $2 million. And he also noted that Deck Investments was searching for property in the area anyway.

DuBose agreed.

"There was no bribe given. There was no gratuity given," she said. "There was an obvious conflict of interest."

DuBose said the adjusted guideline range of 21 to 27 months was not appropriate and cited several factors that supported the defense request for probation, including Wall's spotless criminal record, his lack of danger to the community and the likelihood that he will not commit more crimes. But she said some prison time was necessary to reflect the seriousness of the offense.

"The public deserves complete and infallible honesty from its public officials," she said.

Given a chance to address the court, Wall continued to maintain his innocence, reasserting that he would have bought the Gulf Bay Road property "from the man on the moon" because it was in the best interest of Deck Investments.

Wall also told the judge that the criminal charges have wrecked him financially. He said he earned no regular income in 2006 and had to sell assets to pay loans that lenders called as a result of the indictment. He said his bank has given him a 90-day extension to pay the mortgage on his own home.

Turning to face 40 or so friends and relatives who packed the small courtroom, a visibly emotional Wall said, "The only joy I felt in the last 10 months is the love and support and shoulder that you folks have offered to me."

DOJ_NMG_0113936

Crystal Russo's sentencing came after a plea by her lawyer and her father for leniency. A federal grand jury indicted her in June after investigators alleged that she had opened a bank account in her maiden name at the behest of her husband, who then transferred $95,000 from his own account.

Defense attorney Gordon Armstrong asked the judge to sentence his client to straight probation, arguing that she was entitled to leniency under a federal rule available to otherwise law-abiding defendants who commit an aberrant and spontaneous crime.

Armstrong said his client, who was 19 years old and working at Russo's store when she met him, was "very young, very inexperienced and very naive."

But Butler, the prosecutor, argued that to qualify for a break under the "aberrant behavior" rule the crime must be of limited duration and not include subsequent acts. He pointed out that Russo opened the account over the phone on a Friday afternoon, went to the bank the following Monday to submit the required paperwork and then tried to take money out two days later.

DuBose agreed that restricted probation was appropriate. While on home confinement, Russo will have to wear an electronic monitoring device and pay its $3.26 daily expense. She will not be allowed to leave her home unless she gets advance permission from the U.S. Probation Office.

"Sorry would not even describe the remorse I feel ... that you even have to know who I am," she told the judge.

As she left the courthouse, Russo focused on the positive.

"I'm going home," she said.

Ex-councilman Pleads Guilty In Orange Beach Corruption Case (AP)

AP, January 6, 2007

BAY MINETTE, Ala. (AP) — Former Orange Beach City Councilman Joseph F. McCarron Jr. pleaded guilty Friday to 15 misdemeanor ethics law violations related to his votes on construction projects in the Alabama Gulf Coast resort.

McCarron has agreed to testify in the state prosecution of former Orange Beach Mayor Steve Russo and former city attorney Larry Sutley, Attorney General Troy King said in a statement announcing the guilty plea.

As part of McCarron's plea agreement, he has committed to pay fines of $2,000 for each of the 15 counts, King said. Sentencing is set for March 21.

King said McCarron admitted to five instances of "unintentional violation" of three different sections of the state ethics law, through his votes to rezone properties for his business clients, for which he later sold them insurance.

The votes were for rezoning properties including Terry Cove Marina, Phoenix on the Bay II, Turquoise Place, Turquoise Place East, and Caribe Planned Unit Development.

Unintentional violation of the ethics law is a misdemeanor.

Russo is charged in two state indictments with accepting bribes while in office in exchange for supporting construction projects.

Russo, Sutley and developer Ken Wall were convicted by a federal jury on numerous public corruption counts after a two-week trial in September. A federal judge later overturned Wall's conspiracy conviction but upheld his mail and wire fraud convictions. Developer Jim Brown pleaded guilty in June to federal charges of bribing Russo to curry favor at City Hall. Wall was charged for his role in separate schemes to enrich the mayor.

Pellicano Allowed To Defend Himself (LAT)

By John Spano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

The private investigator facing racketeering and wiretapping charges dismissed his attorney because the courts wouldn't pay him.

Tossing a legal hand grenade into an already-contentious case, celebrity sleuth Anthony Pellicano on Friday demanded and won the right to act as his own lawyer in his upcoming trial on wiretapping and racketeering charges.

U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer tried to talk Pellicano out of his plan, but he would not relent.

"I urge you to let me appoint counsel for you," Fischer implored in federal court in downtown Los Angeles.

"You're very kind, your honor, but no, thank you," Pellicano said.

The ruling added another unexpected turn to a case that has rocked Los Angeles' legal and entertainment communities. Pellicano was once one of the city's most successful private detectives and for years had worked on behalf of marquee names in Hollywood and legal circles, gathering secrets to help sway court and business affairs in his clients' favor.

DOJ_NMG_0113937

The specter of an untrained self-advocate in a complex, high-profile case raised sharp concerns among some court observers. One cited the trial of Lynette Alice "Squeaky" Fromme, who insisted on exercising her constitutional right to defend herself on charges of trying to shoot President Ford in 1975, only to turn the courtroom into a circus.

"It's a very foolish thing to do," said Peter Keane, former dean of Golden Gate University School of Law in San Francisco. "Usually you're consigning yourself to failure. It creates nightmares for judges. Judges and prosecutors hate it."

Most lawyers for Pellicano's six co-defendants declined to comment on the record. But while some saw catastrophe, others cited the defendant's stellar career as a private detective in suggesting he might be effective.

"It affects the whole case," one lawyer said. "You have to address his silly motions. If the government is taking up time answering frivolous motions, it's time they are not spending providing your discovery."

"I don't know what happens with Anthony when he gets up to do his opening statement," another lawyer said. "Does he waive his 5th Amendment privilege [against self-incrimination]? I don't know which way it cuts, in terms of benefit to the prosecution or the defense."

Pellicano, one of seven defendants in the complicated federal case, had been represented by San Francisco attorney Steven F. Gruel without charge. Pellicano wrote to Fischer that he released Gruel because he believed it was unfair for him to continue working gratis.

Pellicano has already been declared indigent and qualifies for court-paid counsel, which is normally selected from a list of qualified lawyers maintained by each federal trial court in California. Lawyers familiar with the case said Gruel is not on the list, and Fischer was reluctant to appoint him.

The judge cleared the courtroom and held a 15-minute closed-door session with Pellicano and Gruel before publicly allowing the former private detective to represent himself.

Lawyers uniformly praised Gruel as a top attorney and said his loss would be difficult. Several lawyers and observers suggested other defendants may decide to seek separate trials, adding to delays. The trial is scheduled for this summer.

Several suggested Pellicano will find it impossible to review all the evidence before trial. Massive amounts of electronic records were seized from Pellicano's computer system before his arrest. Being incarcerated, his options are limited, lawyers said.

Keane said that while Pellicano has "assured his own conviction," the effect on other defendants "could go in a number of directions."

"If Pellicano is an abrasive, arrogant, obnoxious person, it could be a godsend for the other defendants. He could deflect all the antipathy towards himself," Keane said.

Half a dozen defendants have pleaded guilty in the broad Pellicano investigation, including a Hollywood filmmaker and a former record executive, both of whom admitted lying to the FBI about hiring Pellicano to wire-tap rivals.

Gruel said he would rejoin the defense if and when Pellicano asks. In the meantime, he said his former client "could do a pretty darn good job. He knows the issues and he knows the facts better than anyone."

"After 40 years of experience, he has a practical knowledge of how the legal system works," Gruel said.

On Friday, Fischer ended the hearing by telling Pellicano, "If you change your mind, let me know."

"Yes ma'am," responded Pellicano. "I know exactly what you mean."

If convicted of all 108 counts in the federal indictment — including wire fraud, identity theft, computer theft and possession of wiretapping devices — Pellicano could get up to 625 years in prison and $26.75 million in fines.

john.spano@latimes.com

D.C. Police To Target Each Area's Safety Needs Individually (WP)

By Allison Klein, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Mayor and Chief Emphasize Community Input, Foot Patrols

D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty and Acting Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier yesterday outlined a new crime-fighting strategy that calls for customized actions to address safety needs in each region of the city.

Officers in each of the city's 46 police service areas will meet with residents and elected officials in coming weeks and create initiatives that will be launched in March, Lanier said. At her urging, patrol commanders have started programs, including one that has officers adopting specific neighborhood blocks or parks where they will personally keep track of any emerging concerns.

"Our overriding goal is to reduce crime and the fear of crime in every neighborhood," said Lanier, who last week succeeded Charles H. Ramsey as chief. She has the job on an acting basis pending confirmation from the D.C. Council.

DOJ_NMG_0113938

Fenty and Lanier have emphasized increased officer visibility and foot patrols. The city plans to add 100 officers to the 3,800-member department, and Lanier has said patrols will be her priority. She envisions a force that goes beyond reacting to crimes by building and sustaining safe neighborhoods.

The new mayor and chief outlined their plans at a news conference yesterday -- the second day in a row that Fenty has promoted his early agenda. On Thursday, he proposed a dramatic restructuring of the D.C. public schools that would give him ultimate authority over the troubled system.

Fenty (D), who was sworn in Tuesday, said he moved quickly on schools and police because he believes they are twin vital components to a healthy city.

"We very much view our record of service intertwined with our ability to make our streets safer," said Fenty, who as a council member frequently criticized the police department's direction.

Fenty's approach drew praise from one of his predecessors, council member and former mayor Marion Barry (D-Ward 8). "I commend the mayor to move public safety parallel with education because there's no way you can educate young people when they don't feel safe going to school or in school," Barry said.

Lanier, a 16-year member of the department, is taking a team approach to policing. She told patrol commanders in the seven police districts to have open dialogues with their officers, who in turn are supposed to cull ideas from the community.

In the 3rd District, which encompasses neighborhoods such as Shaw, Adams Morgan, Columbia Heights and the U Street corridor, Cmdr. Larry McCoy came up with the adopt-a-block program. His district has the biggest volume of crime in the city, driven by robberies, burglaries and assaults.

With 467 officers, he does not have enough officers to assign one to each block, but he will cover the district strategically.

"The idea is that's their baby," McCoy said. "That's their place to make a difference."

In choosing to increase foot patrols, McCoy said, he and other commanders will have to strike a balance to ensure that officers are able to arrive quickly when someone calls for help. "We'll always have the capability to respond; that won't be a problem," McCoy said. "Sometimes it will be a matter of officers going back to their cars and responding."

Since the initiative was announced this week, comments have been popping up on the 3rd District e-mail group from people such as Columbia Heights resident Winnie Huston, who said that it reminds her of growing up in a small town. "It brings a small-town sensibility to the city in a way that makes a lot of sense," Huston said.

Cmdr. Robin Hoey has carved the 6th District, the northern section of the city east of the Anacostia River, into 34 small areas and will cover them with foot, bike and motor patrols. He emphasized foot beats -- "going back to the old days," he said.

His plan focuses on getting guns off the streets in his communities, which have some of the highest homicide rates in the city. And he will initiate anti-bullying programs in schools.

"We're looking at youth gun violence," Hoey said. "There are some crooks out there, but there are other kids who are arming themselves to protect themselves."

In the 1st District, which includes Capitol Hill and the RFK Stadium area, Cmdr. Diane Groomes said she is encouraging citizens to ride along with officers on patrol, and she will have every officer become involved in a community-based program, such as reading in schools, taking the elderly on errands and youth midnight basketball.

She said the benefit is twofold: It assists people, and it often helps solve cases. "You get a lot of information that way," Groomes said.

Lanier also is changing the way homicide detectives are assigned cases. Detectives, who now get cases from throughout the city, instead will be on regional teams to become more familiar with criminals, witnesses and sources in specific areas and neighborhoods.

Over the years, various chiefs have tried decentralizing the homicide unit instead of having detectives report to one command. Lanier did not go that far.

Detectives will work out of the same building and report to a centralized chain of command. But they will be assigned to one of three regional operations commands. The east command, which has the majority of the city's homicides, will have the most detectives, said C.V. Morris, head of the Violent Crimes Branch.

Council member Phil Mendelson (D-At Large), chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said the shift to regional homicide detectives is a sound decision because "a lot of homicide is territorial."

Lanier said she will reevaluate some strategies now in place, such as targeting crime hot spots, to see what's working well and what's not. Overall, she has gotten a positive response from officers.

"We're very optimistic," said Officer Kristopher Baumann, chairman of the D.C. police union, who had a strained relationship with Ramsey. "The officers on the streets know what the problems are, and they have ideas about how to solve them."

DOJ_NMG_0113939

Archdiocese Settles Sex Suits (DENP)

By Eric Gorski, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, January 6, 2007

The Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Denver has settled clergy abuse lawsuits with 15 plaintiffs for a total of $1.58 million, the law firm representing the litigants said today.

"We are pleased with the settlements," said Adam Horowitz, an attorney in the Miami law firm Herman and Mermelstein. "Any time can give a client an opportunity to resolve something at an early stage, that's a good thing for the client."

In a statement, Archbishop Charles Chaput said he was grateful to those who had worked to achieve the settlement. "I sincerely hope that each of the..individuals who participated begin to truly heal," he said.

Last year, Chaput announced the 24-county northern Colorado diocese had hired mediator Richard Dana, a former federal judge, in an effort to reach settlements with plaintiffs who had sued the archdiocese for clergy sex abuse.

The settlements announced today do not mean the clergy abuse scandal that hit the Denver archdiocese starting in 2004 is resolved, however. At least 20 lawsuits are still pending in Denver District Court.

Today Chaput appealed to those who have yet to settle, asking that they continue to work with the mediation outreach panel, and making himself available to talk with them personally. "We will continue to try to be proactive, both spiritually and otherwise, to help anyone who has ever been hurt during his or her childhood by any member of our clergy," he said.

Four of Herman's clients declined to settle. None of the clients represented by lawyer Jeffrey Anderson of St. Paul, Minn., agreed to settlements. Anderson rejected the mediation process, saying the archdiocese should open its personnel files also.

The archdiocese declined to say how much money was available through mediation except to call it a "substantial sum."

News of some settlements with Herman clients has trickled out in recent months. It was unclear whether the announcement today means Dana's work is done.

The settlements range anywhere from $30,000 to $150,000 per case, the law firm said. All settlements involving allegations of sexual abuse with minor boys exceeded $100,000, it said.

Ten of the settled suits targeted the Rev. Harold Robert White, who was defrocked in 2003. White died late last year of an apparent heart attack while vacationing in Mexico. He was 73.

Among the White accusers who settled lawsuits: his godson, Delbert Nielsen, whose agreement is for $150,000. Four other White accusers are named, and the others are John Does. One is a Jane Doe - the only female to file suit accusing White.

The Denver Post reported a single allegation against White in 2004, and many more followed. At least three times, the Denver archdiocese was told of allegations against White but allowed him to serve, moving him from parish to parish for years before taking steps to remove him, according to interviews with alleged victims, one of his former superiors and church documents obtained by The Denver Post.

Five of the settled cases involve lawsuits naming the Rev. Leonard Abercrombie, who died in 1994.

The Herman law firm blamed the lack of settlements in its remaining cases primarily on the archdiocese's refusal "to voluntarily release the contents of the offending priests' personnel files..." The archdiocese has said such files are private and confidential.

Just Days Into The Year, Killings Toll Hits 8 In New Orleans (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 5 — A surge in murders since the new year has residents on edge and has raised new fears that officials here remain helpless to contain a lethal combination of guns, drugs and jobless young men.

The worries are particularly acute as this city struggles to repopulate 17 months after Hurricane Katrina.

Eight people have been found dead since Jan. 1, seven of them shooting victims, with the most recent being a young woman found lying on her bed in the Uptown section Friday morning, shot in the head.

As the police were scrambling to investigate that killing and the others, mostly of young men gunned down in high-crime areas, grief-stricken neighbors gathered outside the house of Helen Hill, an independent filmmaker, and her husband, Dr. Paul Gailiunas, who were shot by an intruder early Thursday morning in the Faubourg Marigny section, the authorities said.

Ms. Hill, 36, well known in the local film community and the recipient of several awards, was killed; Dr. Gailiunas, who specialized in treating the city's poor, survived his wounds. The police found him kneeling by the front door, bleeding and holding the couple's 2-year-old son in his arms. His wife lay nearby, shot in the neck. The child was not hurt.

That crime, breaking the typical pattern of drug-related shootings, helped prompt a front-page headline in The Times-Picayune on Friday: "Killings bring the city to its bloodied knees."

DOJ_NMG_0113940

The spate of murders came after a New Year's Day statement by the city's police superintendent, Warren J. Riley, that New Orleans had been made safer because the 2006 murder total was the lowest in 30 years.

But the assertion was questionable even before these killings started. On a per-capita basis, because of the city's drastically reduced population after Hurricane Katrina, the murder rate of at least 81 per 100,000 people in 2006 easily makes New Orleans one of the most violent cities in the nation.

On Friday, flowers and scribbled remembrances fronted the modest duplex of Ms. Hill and her husband on North Rampart Street, in a picturesque neighborhood of old Creole cottages frequented by tourists and local residents escaping the crowds of the nearby French Quarter.

Both were remembered as outsiders — Dr. Gailiunas is from Canada, friends said, and his wife from South Carolina — with a fervent commitment to the city's culture and its underclass.

"You know what, it's horrifying: you kill my wife, you shoot me while I'm holding my baby," said Darlene Wright, who said Dr. Gailiunas had treated her two sons at the low-cost clinic he started on Esplanade Avenue. "He was different from the other doctors. It didn't matter what your color or culture. He cared about the people."

Friends said Dr. Gailiunas had been released from the hospital Friday afternoon and that he planned to return to Canada. The police said his wounds were not life-threatening but they could not confirm his release.

Ms. Hill, a Harvard graduate and recipient of a Rockefeller Foundation fellowship, had shown her films at numerous festivals in Canada and the United States.

"Things didn't matter to them, their whole focus was on people and partaking in the culture of what was happening in New Orleans," said Carlton Charles, Dr. Gailiunas's landlord at the Esplanade clinic.

Previously, the doctor had worked in the high-crime, impoverished Central City area.

"He wanted to reach out to the poor and the underprivileged, people he felt had a lot of needs," Dr. Henry Evans, a colleague there, said.

On Friday, David Jones, the owner of a bed-and-breakfast near the couple's home, described how, shortly before the shooting, a lanky gun-wielding intruder — possibly the same one who shot the couple — had forced his way into his establishment, but apparently fled after panicked guests called the police.

The other recent killings followed a depressingly familiar pattern. Earlier Thursday, the police found a young man with gunshot wounds lying face-down in a Central City alleyway; on Wednesday evening, they responded to a report of gunshots in the same neighborhood and found another young man dead; that afternoon, Louisiana National Guardsmen found the body of a man shot in the head in the Desire area, in the Ninth Ward; and on Wednesday morning, they found the body of a woman wrapped in a rug in the Lower Ninth Ward.

The National Guard is patrolling several sections of the city at the request of the Police Department, which is still low on manpower. Superintendent Riley, who has been out of town, and other senior police officials did not respond to requests for comment on the violence.

Compounding residents' fears here is the apparent inability of the criminal justice system to successfully prosecute the murderers. A study by the Metropolitan Crime Commission of New Orleans, a foundation, found that from October 2003 to September 2004, only 12 percent of those arrested for murder were incarcerated.

"You know, there are people in this neighborhood trying to bring it back," said Mr. Jones, the bed-and-breakfast owner. "I'm tired of this. I'm ready to torch the whole neighborhood."

A Spate Of Killings Opens New Year In New Orleans (WP/AP)

By Janet McConnaughey, Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Filmmaker Among the Latest Victims

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 5 -- A young woman shot to death in her home Friday morning became at least the seventh New Orleans homicide victim of the new year.

The victim, whose identity was not released, was said to be in her early 20s. Her house in the Uptown section of New Orleans had been ransacked; police did not know whether anything had been taken.

Five of the shootings, all unrelated, occurred within a 14-hour span Wednesday night and Thursday morning. Also, a body with signs of physical trauma was found Wednesday wrapped in a rug. That death has not been classified.

The spate of killings dashed hopes that the city's police chief was right on New Year's Day when he said he believed the violence that has plagued parts of the city for months had been brought under control.

One of Thursday's victims was independent filmmaker Helen Hill; her husband, Paul Gailiunas, a physician who treats the city's poor, was wounded.

DOJ_NMG_0113941

Police did not release the names; they were identified by weeping friends and neighbors who gathered in front of the little white house where the killing occurred. They had moved to the Faubourg Marigny neighborhood near the French Quarter about a year after Hurricane Katrina wiped out their home in the Mid-City neighborhood.

Police said both were shot at their front door about 5:30 a.m. Thursday. No other details were available. A friend said family members from Columbia, S.C., were on their way to New Orleans on Thursday after learning of the shooting.

"They were wonderful people. Two bright spots in New Orleans. They gave us hope that people could live together. And they'd do anything for anybody," said Sheri Branch, who was taking care of the couple's 2-year-old son while Gailiunas was hospitalized.

Hill made short films; her experimental animation shorts had been shown at a number of festivals in the United States and Canada.

Gailiunas, who was in stable condition Thursday, opened a clinic for poor people in the Treme neighborhood in 2004. It was flooded by Katrina a year later.

No witnesses to any of the killings have come forward, police said Thursday, appealing for help to solve the most recent cases.

Assistant Superintendent Steven Nicholas described the recent killings as brazen acts, often committed in broad daylight and, in one case, within a block of police officers.

At a news conference earlier this week, Police Superintendent Warren J. Riley said homicides in the city spiked in April, May and July but had become less frequent -- something he credited to police initiatives.

Police spokeswoman Bambi Hall said that, after 19 killings in October and another 19 in November, December's total was 15. There were 161 homicides in the city in 2006. New Orleans's murder rate was seven to 10 times the national average for cities of its size in 2005, the latest period for which complete data are available.

National Guard troops and state police were brought in to help patrol some neighborhoods after five teenagers were killed in one night in June 2006. The Guard has focused on areas most devastated by Hurricane Katrina so police could focus on higher-crime areas. Their patrols are expected to continue this year.

Nicholas said Riley and New Orleans District Attorney Eddie Jordan have spoken and are working to target violent criminals and to get them off the street. "Those partnerships are well established," he said.

CIVIL LAW:

Supreme Court To Rule On Whistle - Blowing (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 6, 2007

Filed at 3:24 a.m. ET

WASHINGTON (AP) -- After 17 years, James Stone has perhaps a few more months to wait before he learns whether he will collect up to $1 million for exposing fraud by a government contractor at a now-closed nuclear weapons plant.

A court ordered Rockwell International, now part of aerospace giant Boeing Co., to pay the government nearly $4.2 million for fraud connected with environmental cleanup at the Rocky Flats plant northwest of Denver. Stone, a former employee at the facility, could be entitled to as much as one-quarter of the payment under the federal False Claims Act.

The 81-year-old retired engineer filed his whistle-blower lawsuit in 1989, the year Rocky Flats shut its operations after nearly 40 years of production. He has survived legal challenges by Rockwell to dismiss the claim or deprive him of his share. The government joined the suit as Stone's partner 10 years ago.

The Supreme Court now has the case. The ruling could affect an anticipated crush of fraud suits if the high court makes it harder for whistle-blowers to share in the proceeds.

If Rockwell wins, "it's going to be much more difficult for whistle-blowers and there are going to be fewer cases," said James Moorman, president of the Taxpayers Against Fraud Education Fund, an advocacy group.

Rockwell must pay the entire penalty no matter how the Supreme Court rules, although it would not have to pay Stone's attorney fees. The only question before the court is whether Stone will get his cut.

The company, backed by defense, energy and pharmaceutical interests, wants the justices to restrict when an individual can collect for suing on the government's behalf.

The Bush administration is on Stone's side even though the government collects more money if Rockwell wins.

"It might be natural for the court to wonder why would it be in the government's interest to advocate that a share of the money damages in this case should be given to a private party," Justice Department lawyer Malcolm Stewart told the justices during the oral argument in early December. "In our view, Stone is precisely the type of relator that Congress intended to encourage." A relator is an individual who sues under the False Claims Act.

DOJ_NMG_0113942

The False Claims Act allows individuals, acting on the government's behalf, to file fraud suits against companies that do business with the government. If they prevail, they receive a portion of what the contractor must pay the government.

During World War II, Congress amended the Civil War-era law to make whistle-blower suits more difficult. Since Congress changed the law again in 1986, such suits have returned $11 billion to the government. Recent high-profile cases include settlements with leading pharmaceutical manufacturers.

Sen. Charles Grassley, who led the fight to reinvigorate the False Claims Act in 1986, urged the court to rule in Stone's favor.

Grassley, R-Iowa, said provisions in the law that authorize whistle-blower suits are "essential to the government today to confront fraud in government programs from reconstruction in Iraq to aid for victims of Hurricane Katrina."

The issues before the justices are:

--How much independent knowledge of wrongdoing must someone have to file a False Claims Act suit?

--Does that information have to be part of the case that eventually convinces a jury that a government contractor committed fraud?

Once alleged improprieties are disclosed publicly, often by the media, individuals face a higher hurdle in bringing fraud suits on the government's behalf. Otherwise, people could read a newspaper account or an indictment and then rush to the courthouse to file suit.

The major exception to this rule is if an individual is an original source of the information. That is what Stone claims; several courts have agreed.

Stone did not file suit until after problems at Rocky Flats became public. He did, however, approach federal investigators with information about environmental issues before news accounts were published.

At trial, the jury found Rockwell submitted false claims in 1987 and 1988 saying it was meeting goals of treating low-level radioactive wastes at the former atomic weapons plant. Rockwell laid off Stone in 1986.

Maureen Mahoney, representing the company, told the justices it is implausible for Stone to claim he had independent knowledge of any fraud. "His claim by his own admission starts in 1987, after he was gone," Mahoney said.

Yet both the trial and appeals courts, as well as the government, say Stone has shown he provided information on which the allegations of fraud were based.

A ruling by the Supreme Court is expected before July.

Rocky Flats is designated by the Environmental Protection Agency as a Superfund cleanup site. It is an Energy Department-owned cleanup and closure site.

In nearly four decades, some 70,000 plutonium triggers for nuclear bombs were made at Rocky Flats. Production was halted in 1989 because of chronic safety problems, prompting a raid by FBI agents. The Cold War ended before production could resume. In 1993, the Energy Department announced that the facility's mission was over.

State and federal regulators signed an agreement in 1996 on the cleanup, including demolition of what was termed "the most dangerous building in America" because of leaks, spills and a fire that drove radiation levels off the charts.

The case is Rockwell International v. U.S., ex rel Stone, 05-1272.

^------

On the Net:

Supreme Court: http://www.supremecourtus.gov

Taxpayers Against Fraud Education Fund: http://www.taf.org/

Energy Department: http://www.energy.gov/

Boeing: http://www.boeing.com/

Former Acute-care Service Settles Suit For $7.5 Million (HC)

By Armando Villafranca, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, January 6, 2007

Ex-workers and contractor alleged Medicare fraud at SCCI Corp.

A former long-term acute-care service based in Dallas has paid the federal government $7.5 million to settle allegations of fraudulent Medicare claims, the U.S. Department of Justice announced on Friday.

The settlement resolves a civil lawsuit filed in 1999 by four former employees and an independent contractor who worked for SCCI Houston, a 40-bed long-term acute-care hospital.

DOJ_NMG_0113943

SCCI Houston was part of SCCI Health Services Corp., which operated six acute-care facilities in Texas and others outside the state.

The lawsuit was filed under whistleblower provisions of the False Claims Act, which authorizes private individuals to file lawsuits on behalf of the United States.

The government filed its own complaint in March 2003.

The allegations claim that from 1996 to 1999, SCCI entered into illegal financial relationships with three physicians and paid the doctors in violation of self-referral statutes, and submitted or caused false claims to be submitted to the Medicare program.

SCCI Corp. was acquired by Triumph HealthCare in 2005. None of the whistleblowers nor any SCCI employees involved in the fraud were part of the acquisition, said Tanya Snodgrass, vice president of professional relations for Triumph HealthCare.

"We are very happy that it is officially over and we can finally move forward without this distraction," Snodgrass said.

She said Triumph worked with the Justice Department to resolve the lawsuit.

Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said the whistleblowers, Daryl Kaczymarczyk, Patricia Rocha, Michelle Pate, Michael Brigle and Theresa Taylor, shared $1.7 million of the settlement.

Under the whistleblower provision, anyone who reports fraud can reap between 15 and 25 percent of a settlement, Miller said.

The case was handled by the Justice Department's Civil Division and the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Texas, with the assistance of the FBI.

Judge Clears Delphi Debt Refinance Plan (AP)

By Vinnee Tong, Ap Business Writer

AP, January 6, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-A federal bankruptcy judge on Friday approved a plan by auto parts maker Delphi Corp. to borrow $4.5 billion to refinance debt and lower its monthly interest expenses.

Lawyers for Troy, Mich.-based Delphi said the refinancing, expected to close next week, would save the company $8 million a month.

The debt refinancing proposal was announced on Dec. 18, along with a plan by private equity investors to buy shares worth up to $3.4 billion in a reorganized Delphi.

Delphi lawyers say that the debt and share purchase plans represent "significant milestones in the debtor's reorganization and another major step forward towards emergence."

Judge Robert Drain, who approved the debt refinancing proposal on Friday, will consider the equity purchase plan next Thursday.

The company said it will also seek an extension of the deadline for filing its reorganization plan at a hearing next Friday. If approved, the company would have until July 31 to file its plan and Sept. 30 to solicit acceptances.

The current deadline to file a plan is Feb. 1 and to seek acceptances is April 2.

JP Morgan Chase Bank, which administers the company's current debtor-in-possession loan, would be joined by another lender group led by two investment banks to do the refinancing.

Lawyers said in court papers that JP Morgan Chase Bank offered the best terms and would save time for the debtor since a new lender would need to examine the borrower's books.

In the separate equity investment plan, affiliates of three private equity investors, Appaloosa Management LP, Cerberus Capital Management LP and Harbinger Capital Partners Master Fund I, as well as Merrill Lynch & Co. and UBS Securities LLC, would buy shares in a restructured Delphi at a cost of between $1.4 billion and $3.4 billion.

The equity investment plan has been approved by the company, the investors and General Motors Corp., and would give the investors a minimum of 30 percent and up to 72 percent of the restructured company. The plan depends on consensual resolution of Delphi's labor agreements by Jan. 31.

GM was Delphi's parent company until the auto parts supplier was spun off in 1999. The automaker remains Delphi's biggest customer and has had a prominent role in negotiations. Delphi and its affiliates filed for bankruptcy protection in October 2005 under financial duress from a declining American auto industry.

Several parties in the case have objected to the equity investment plan, including Highland Capital Management LP, which has submitted a rival bid to buy shares it has said is worth $4.7 billion, and the acting U.S. Trustee in the case. The company's second-largest union, the official committee of equity security holders and the official committee of unsecured creditors also object.

The union representing the largest number of Delphi employees, the United Auto Workers, has not objected.

DOJ_NMG_0113944

The investment agreement depends on Delphi and its unions reaching agreement on changes to their collective bargaining agreements. They have been the subject of out-of-court negotiations since early summer and representatives will hold a chamber's conference with the judge next Friday.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

EEOC Says Prosecutor Wrongly Fired (BN)

By Val Walton, News Staff Writer

The Birmingham News (AL), January 6, 2007

The federal government has ruled that U.S. Attorney Alice Martin wrongly fired a former assistant prosecutor in 2002.

Martin fired Assistant U.S. Attorney Deirdra Brown-Fleming on grounds that she was "not a team player." The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission found the reason was "simply unworthy of credence." Instead, the EEOC found that Brown-Fleming's firing was retaliatory.

The EEOC said it is unclear whether Martin harbored a racist or sexist attitude toward Brown-Fleming, but found that Martin's assessment of Brown-Fleming's relationship with co-workers was tainted with the racist and sexist prejudices of Brown-Fleming's co-workers.

Brown-Fleming was described as rude and condescending, documents show.

The EEOC is requiring that the Department of Justice reinstate Brown-Fleming to her former job, with full back pay and other benefits. The amount of back pay was not announced. The commission also ordered the reinstatement of Brown-Fleming's former supervisor, Victor Conrad, who took steps to correct acts of racial hostility against Brown-Fleming and filed his own discrimination claim against the agency. He also is to be reinstated with back pay.

Brown-Fleming worked in the U.S. attorney's Huntsville office from 1998 until her May 2002 firing. Martin serves as U.S. attorney for the 31 northern counties and has offices in Birmingham and Huntsville.

In a Friday statement, Martin said the decision to remove Brown-Fleming was "not grounded on impermissible considerations."

She said the Department of Justice takes allegations of discrimination very seriously.

"We firmly support equal employment opportunity and combating illegal discrimination in the federal workplace," Martin said.

Martin's statement said the department will file a request for reconsideration. She declined further comment.

Brown-Fleming said that as the first black woman to be hired in the Huntsville office, she became aware of racially hostile activities against her as early as August 1998. She shared her concerns with Conrad, who is white.

Martin became U.S. attorney for Alabama's Northern District in 2001, replacing Doug Jones, who is now in private practice.

The EEOC found that the office took immediate and appropriate corrective action to address Brown-Fleming's hostile environment after learning of her allegations.

Brown-Fleming said Thursday what happened to her was not an isolated event.

Brown-Fleming maintained during her five-year legal battle against the Justice Department that she was fired in retaliation for helping Conrad with a discrimination claim against the office.

Brown-Fleming detailed instances of where she endured racially derogatory comments by an administrative assistant and a paralegal. Brown-Fleming said the paralegal sabotaged her work.

The EEOC agreed with Brown-Fleming, who lives in Huntsville, that reinstating her as a Justice Department employee in the northern district is "tantamount to placing her into a very antagonistic work environment." If Brown-Fleming chooses not to accept the reinstatement, the Justice Department is ordered to provide her the pay she would receive if she worked there.

Brown-Fleming said Thursday she expects to go back into the practice of law full time, but declined to give specifics.

The EEOC also requires the U.S. attorney's office to provide training related to anti-retaliation, discrimination and preventing and remedying harassment to all staff in Huntsville and Birmingham.

E-mail: vwalton@bhamnews.com

Alleged Jail Beating Spurs Suspensions (CHIT)

By Emma Graves Fitzsimmons, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 6, 2007

FBI probes 6 guards in Lake County, Ind.

DOJ_NMG_0113945

Six guards at the Lake County Jail in Indiana were suspended Friday while local and federal officials investigate allegations that an inmate was beaten, officials said.

Lake County Sheriff Roy Dominguez said he believes a cover-up took place over the incident, which occurred Dec. 26. The inmate's injuries were severe enough that he was taken to a hospital and placed in intensive care, Dominguez said.

The inmate, Tommy Ford, 40, lashed out verbally and physically at guards who were escorting him to see a visitor, according to an incident report filed later that day. In their report, the guards said Ford "was taken to the ground" and restrained after he struck one officer in the forehead and spit on another.

"This went above and beyond what is required to restrain an individual," the sheriff said. "This was abuse."

The sheriff said he was angry that he did not learn of the incident until Thursday.

The FBI is conducting a civil rights investigation of the alleged beating, said FBI spokesman Drew Northern. It is being handled as a "color of law" case, which looks into abuses of authority, he said.

The sheriff did not release the names of the correctional officers, who were suspended with pay, but said many were seasoned officers trained to deal with aggressive inmates.

Dominguez would not disclose the extent of Ford's injuries. He said only that Ford was hospitalized for several days and is now in the medical unit of the jail.

Ford's lawyer, Joann Price, said his family is planning to pursue legal action. Ford had "physical marks and signs of injury on his face" when she interviewed him, Price said.

Ford was being held in the Lake County Jail while waiting to be transferred to prison. In October, he was sentenced to 50 years in prison for the murder of a 15-year-old boy.

Dominguez said his office is looking into the possibility of a cover-up because the incident report did not contain information about the alleged beating.

The sheriff's office expects the investigation to last about a week.

---

efitzsimmons@tribune.com

6 Guards Suspended After Alleged Jail Beating (NWTIMES)

By Patrick Guinane

Northwest Times, January 6, 2007

CROWN POINT | Lake County Sheriff Roy Dominguez suspended six jail guards Friday accused of beating an inmate and sending the man to a local hospital's intensive care unit, the sheriff reported.

Tommy Ford, who is awaiting transfer to state prison to serve a 50-year sentence for murder, was hospitalized for "a few days" following the Dec. 26 incident, the sheriff said. He now is housed in the jail's medical unit.

Dominguez said he did not find out about the alleged assault until Thursday and that the investigation would explore whether officers attempted to cover up the incident.

The sheriff declined to discuss the extent of Ford's injuries, citing federal medical privacy law. Dominguez also would not name the jail officers, who were suspended with pay. He said the officers will remain suspended pending investigations by the sheriff's department and possibly the FBI.

"The allegations are very serious, and I intend to pursue them in an objective, timely and professional manner,"

Dominguez said. "The victim was assaulted and was taken to the hospital, treated and days later released."

Ford, who lists Gary addresses in court and jail records, is contemplating a civil lawsuit against the county, the sheriff's department and the individual officers, said Joann Price, an attorney with the Gary firm of Freeman-Wilson & Lewis-Shannon LLC.

"His injuries were quite severe. He still is experiencing a great deal of pain, and there is still some evidence of the extent of his injuries," Price said. "(The beating) was with implements (and) certainly with fists."

Dominguez said he requested an independent investigation Thursday and planned to meet Friday with local FBI officials. Commander Kathy Hrebenyak is leading the sheriff's department investigation, which Dominguez intends to forward to Lake County Prosecutor Bernard Carter.

Dominguez would not describe the actions the guards took against Ford, but said, "If they believe that somehow they can conduct themselves in this type of fashion and nothing's going to occur to them, they're sadly mistaken."

An incident report released by the sheriff's department shows that Ford became combative while being escorted to the visitation area of the jail at 1:40 p.m. Dec. 26. Ford called one officer a homosexual slur and -- when uncuffed for visitation -- punched another officer in the face after threatening to kill his mother, the report states.

Once back at his cell, Ford spat at one guard and tried to attack others, at which point three officers restrained him, the report states. Eleven responding officers are listed on the incident report.

Lake County Jail Guards Suspended After Beating (AP)

AP, January 6, 2007

CROWN POINT, Ind. - Lake County's sheriff on Friday asked the FBI to investigate allegations that several jail guards severely beat a convicted murderer and then tried to cover it up.

Six jailers have been suspended with pay during the investigation, said Sheriff Roy Dominguez, who did not release the names of the guards.

The beaten prisoner, Tommy Ford, 40, was hospitalized in intensive care following the Dec. 26 attack in the county jail.

Dominguez would not disclose the extent of Ford's injuries or information about the beating. He would only say Ford that was hospitalized for "several days" and was in the jail's medical unit on Friday.

Dominguez said up to six jail staffers attacked Ford after he cursed guards who were escorting him to see a visitor.

"This went above and beyond what is required to restrain an individual," the sheriff said. "This was abuse."

Ford was convicted of murder in October and sentenced to 50 years in prison. He was being held at the jail awaiting transfer to a state prison.

Dominguez said his office was looking into the possibility of a cover-up because a report on the incident did not contain information about the beating.

He said he personally requested that the FBI investigate the attack.

"They will conduct an independent investigation," he said. "I want to assure members of the public that no stone will go unturned."

Federal Lawsuit Claims Racial Discrimination In Police Department (WP)

By Tom Jackman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Pay Practices, Hostile Work Environment Cited

Three black officers and one black civilian employee of the Falls Church Police Department have filed a federal civil rights suit against the city, claiming racial discrimination in the department's pay and promotion practices and a hostile work environment for black employees.

One officer alleged that a captain told her last year, "Do you know why the boundaries of Falls Church are 2.2 square miles? To keep the black people out." And the civilian employee, who heads the police dispatch center, said that white commanders "purposefully ignore calls from minority officers for help when on patrol" but do respond when requested by white officers.

The suit, filed Thursday in U.S. District Court in Alexandria, adds another layer to the turmoil that has roiled the department since its officers union began complaining about internal problems in 2004. The union said that officers were evaluated on how many traffic tickets they wrote and that their weapons were faulty.

Over the summer, then-Chief Robert T. Murray fired the union president, Scott Rhodes. Last month, after the city was forced to rehire Rhodes, pay him a settlement and allow him to retire with full benefits, Murray retired. The city is searching for a new chief.

Acting Chief Harry W. Reitze said he had not seen the suit and could not comment specifically. "I'm really trying to lead the department in positive directions . . . and to continue to provide the highest level of services and safety to the community," Reitze said. "I'm doing my best to make sure the department is a positive place to work."

The plaintiffs are the officers union's new president, Markus Bristol, Cpl. Frank D. Hicks, Officer Derrica N. Wilson and civilian employee Carolyn A. Pendleton. The suit states that there are no African Americans above the rank of corporal and that Wilson is the only black female officer in the department's history.

Of the 30 sworn officers in the department, five are black, the suit says.

Bristol, a 10-year member of the department, was suspended with pay for four months last year after he and Rhodes publicly pointed out that officers' guns repeatedly misfired in training and that Murray was taking no action to repair or replace them. The suit states he was reinstated without explanation.

Bristol, 38, alleges in the lawsuit that, in conversations with fellow officers, "he is constantly reminded of his superiors' sentiments toward African-Americans, such as: they are lazy, they don't like to work, and they take too much time off."

Hicks, on the force for eight years, said he went on leave for treatment of a brain tumor in 2001. He later found that while he was away, his approved 7 percent pay raise had been reduced to 5 percent by Murray, the suit alleges.

DOJ_NMG_0113947

In 2004, Hicks served as a trainer for new officers, without extra pay. But in 2005, Hicks said, white officers he had trained were sent to school for instruction on how to train and then replaced Hicks and were paid extra for the work.

Hicks also said he sometimes called for backup and other officers "wouldn't answer me."

Christopher E. Brown, the plaintiffs' attorney, noted that the black officers frequently filed internal complaints about such treatment. "The command staff would do nothing about it," Brown said. "They'd ignore it."

Wilson, 28, joined the department in 2002 and, among other duties, supervises the city's crossing guards and performs background checks on applicants, but she said the department refuses to pay her a supervisor's salary. She said that she endured racist comments such as the one about the size of Falls Church and that she now suffers from migraine headaches caused by the stressful situation.

Pendleton, 49, joined the department in 1982 and has supervised communications for 15 years. But when she was assigned to also oversee the records unit in 2004, she said she was paid less than the white man who had held the records job, despite having more education and more employees to supervise.

Teel Given Copy Of Tape (BSH)

By Robin Fitzgerald

Biloxi Sun Herald, January 6, 2007

GULFPORT - Attorneys for Ryan Teel have received a copy of videotaped images of the Feb. 4, 2006, assault on Harrison County jail inmate Jessie Lee Williams Jr.

The tape, however, may not be enough for defense attorneys to persuade a federal review panel against seeking the death penalty when the former deputy stands trial on May 28, attorney Jim Davis said Friday.

Davis wanted prosecutors to hand over copies of witness statements, expert reports and other types of evidence so he can prepare to defend Teel in a "mini-trial" before a Justice Department panel in Washington. The government has a deadline of Feb. 16 to decide whether Teel's alleged involvement in Williams' fatal beating merits a possible death penalty.

On Friday, U.S. Chief Magistrate Judge John M. Roper ruled against Davis' request, citing a federal rule known as the Jencks Act. The rule, considered by some to be unconstitutional, restricts a defendant's access to witness statements until the witness has testified in court against him.

"They're going to eat my lunch," said Davis, referring to the review panel and federal trial attorney John Richmond. "This is going to hinder my ability to give (Teel) the best defense possible."

Roper said he does not agree with the Jencks Act, but said he will not circumvent it.

"We're in uncharted waters here," Roper said.

Federal death-penalty cases are rare in Mississippi. They're even rarer nationwide when the defendant is a former law enforcement officer.

Davis said the videotape, compiled from surveillance cameras in the jail booking room, is of poor quality. Facing the review panel without more information puts the defense at an unfair advantage, said Davis, who wants to know what government witnesses and experts are prepared to say.

"His client should know who was there," Richmond said. "His client was the officer in charge of the booking room that night."

Roper allowed one advantage: He ordered federal prosecutors to provide the defense with a list of people who appear on the videotape within a few days before the panel review.

Roper said the defense can study plea agreements to get a better idea of how to defend Teel before the review board. Roper said he also has seen the videotape.

Richmond said the government has been generous in providing more documents to the defense than it is required to provide months in advance of trial. Davis and co-counsel Keith Pisarich have also received more than 450 pages in documents, Richmond said.

Teel, who remains in custody, is accused of two counts: using excessive force in an attempt to kill Williams under color of law in deprivation of civil rights, and destruction, alteration or falsification of records in a federal investigation.

The count involving injuries resulting in death is punishable by any number of years to life in prison. It's the count the government could use to seek the death penalty.

The other count is punishable by up to 20 years in prison.

Four former corrections officers have pleaded guilty to conspiring to deprive jail inmates of their civil rights. Two of them were on duty the night Williams, 40, was beaten in the booking room. They have agreed to testify for the government.

The Jencks Act

DOJ_NMG_0113948

A federal rule named for labor organizer Clinton Jencks allows the government to withhold witness statements from a defendant until a witness has first testified on direct examination at trial.

Jencks, who led Mexican-American mineworkers in a 15-month strike for fair treatment in the 1950s, was given a five-year sentence for allegedly falsifying a non-communist document. The Supreme Court overturned the decision because the government refused to give the defense witness statements, including those of a paid informant who later recanted.

Congress later passed a rule in Jencks' name; Jencks portrayed himself in the movie "Salt of the Earth."

Gastonia Man Dies After Police Use Taser To Restrain Him (CO)

The Charlotte Observer, January 6, 2007

GASTONIA, N.C. - A 42-year-old man died early Friday after police officers used a Taser when he wouldn't cooperate during his arrest.

Calvin Thompson, of Gastonia, was found nude running on a city street, according to Gaston County Police Department. He disobeyed officers' commands and resisted arrest, police said.

Officers used a Taser to arrest Thompson, but he became unconscious when being placed in custody, police said.

Tasers are stun guns used by law enforcement officials as a non-lethal alternative to bullet-firing weapons. The U.S. Justice Department last year announced it would study a number of cases in which people died after being stunned by the weapons.

Officers said they provided Thompson with medical attention and found what appeared to be crack cocaine in his mouth. He was taken to Gaston Memorial Hospital, where he was pronounced dead.

The North Carolina Highway Patrol believes the vehicle Thompson was driving was involved in at least four separate collisions in a Gastonia subdivision before his arrest. A substance that appeared to be crack cocaine was found in the vehicle, police said.

The State Bureau of Investigation is looking into the incident and three Gastonia police officers were placed on paid administrative leave while the department conducts an internal investigation.

US Supreme Court Agrees To Hear Coca-Cola's Appeal In A Race Discrimination Case (AP)

AP, January 6, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The U.S. Supreme Court on Friday agreed to consider a discrimination case in which a Coca-Cola bottling company fired a black employee.

Coca-Cola asked the Supreme Court to hear the lawsuit, which involves allegations that a supervisor of employee Stephen Peters was motivated by racial bias and influenced a manager to fire the worker.

Such circumstances are sometimes referred to as "cat's paw" or "rubber stamp" liability. Coca-Cola fired Peters for insubordination after he refused a request to work on a weekend during his scheduled days off.

The case was one of seven appeals the court accepted Friday.

A federal appeals court reinstated a lawsuit brought on Peters' behalf by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The appeals court said a federal judge placed too much emphasis on the fact that Peters' immediate supervisor made no express recommendation to fire him.

In asking the court to hear the case, the company asked the justices to consider when an employer may be held liable for intentional discrimination when the person who fired an employee harbored no discriminatory bias.

Peters worked at the Coca-Cola facility in Albuquerque, New Mexico.

Questionable Mission (WP)

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

A Christian Embassy campaign at the Pentagon tests constitutional boundaries.

"THERE ARE over 25,000 Department of Defense leaders working in the rings and corridors of the Pentagon. Through Bible study, discipleship, prayer breakfasts, and outreach events, Christian Embassy is mustering these men and women into an intentional relationship with Jesus Christ," a narrator explains toward the start of a promotional video for Christian Embassy, an offshoot of Campus Crusade for Christ that focuses on diplomats, government leaders and military officers. As a uniformed Air Force Maj. Gen. Jack J. Catton Jr. explains, "I found a wonderful opportunity as a director on the joint staff, as I meet the people that come into my directorate, and I tell them right up front who Jack Catton is . . . and my first priority is my faith in God, then my family and then country. I share my faith because it describes who I am."

Free exercise of religion doesn't stop at the entrance to the Pentagon or other government buildings; it's a right of those who occupy the upper rungs of government service as well as those in lower ranks. But when those in senior positions are moved to share their religious views with colleagues and subordinates, the tension between the twin constitutional guarantees -- the mandate of free exercise of and the prohibition against government establishment of religion -- comes into play. That tension is heightened in the military, with its emphasis on rank and command. It's important that both uniformed and civilian military leaders, whatever their religious views, take care that others who don't share their beliefs don't feel coerced or excluded as a result.

DOJ_NMG_0113949

The Christian Embassy video suggests that such sensitivity has not always been present. With its extensive, inside-the-Pentagon footage and interviews with senior officials and high-ranking officers in uniform, the video conveys a sense that the group's mission has been endorsed by the Pentagon; it carries no disclaimer. Robert Varney, the group's executive director, says the Pentagon chaplain's office gave permission for the filming and that it's no surprise that military officers, interviewed at work in the Pentagon, were in uniform. But following a complaint by the Military Religious Freedom Foundation, the video has been removed from Christian Embassy's Web site and the Pentagon is reviewing the matter. As it does so, it would be wise to consider not only whether the video and the Christian Embassy's other activities comply with the letter of Pentagon rules but also with the spirit of the Constitution its personnel are sworn to protect.

ANTITRUST:

Brooks Unit Sale Gets Antitrust Scrutiny (BOS)

The Boston Globe, January 6, 2007

CHELMSFORD, Mass. --Brooks Automation Inc., which supplies hardware and software to the semiconductor industry, said Friday federal antitrust regulators asked for additional information about the pending sale of its software division to chip equipment maker Applied Materials Inc.

This is the DOJ's second request for both companies.

Brooks Automation and Applied Materials both plan to respond quickly to the request from the Department of Justice's antitrust division, which extends the waiting period until 30 days after the companies have complied. Brooks said it still hopes the $125 million deal can close in the first quarter.

Brooks Automation shares fell 9 cents to close at $14.57, while Advanced Materials shares fell 13 cents to close at $18.67, both on the Nasdaq.

A Buyout Duo Reads Potential In Newspaper (WSJ)

By Gregory Zuckerman

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

Avista Likes Quality Of Star Tribune Brand; Thoughts of Rebound

Leveraged-buyout firms such as Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., Texas Pacific Group and Blackstone Group have been making news for their ambitious takeover deals.

But few of the headline-grabbing buyouts have been as gutsy as the $530 million planned purchase by Avista Capital Partners of McClatchy Co.'s Star Tribune newspaper, announced in late December1.

The deal for the nation's 15th-largest newspaper by circulation comes amid a slump in the business. The Star Tribune is especially challenged. It has been the worst-performing paper in terms of revenue for McClatchy, which paid $1.2 billion for the Minneapolis paper in 1998. The Star Tribune's ad revenue dropped about 6% last year on a circulation decline of about 4%.

Despite the ugly writing on the wall for the industry, the prospective purchase is the third-largest for New York-based Avista, a previously little-known private-equity firm that still is raising its first buyout fund and whose executives have never bought any newspaper properties.

Avista mightn't be a household name, but its founders, Thompson Dean and Steven Webster, have been well known in the buyout community for more than a decade. They ran a group that generated returns of about 50% from buyout investments for Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette, which was acquired by Credit Suisse in 2000. The pair left Credit Suisse 18 months ago to start Avista, which they hope will manage $1.5 billion.

The 48-year-old Mr. Dean, who is the son of a career foreign-service officer, was born in Taiwan and grew up in Asia, says they already have spent $850 million to make 11 buyout purchases, focusing on energy, media and health care. Mr. Webster, 55, is an energy specialist who had founded Falcon Drilling.

So what do they see with the Star Tribune deal that others in the buyout world missed? A very cheap price -- 6.5 times the paper's cash flow -- a respected brand and an industry that may be bottoming out and poised for a rebound. Avista passed on bidding for the Philadelphia Inquirer, which Mr. Dean says doesn't have comparable cash flow as the Star Tribune.

DOJ_NMG_0113950

"We got a premium paper in a healthy market, and we paid a very attractive price," says Mr. Dean. "There is meaningful franchise value for top-20 papers. The risk is that readership continues its steady decline."

The Avista team, which left Credit Suisse when the bank became wary of competing with its clients for large buyouts, is comfortable making contrarian bets. "Newspapers are poised to stabilize their revenue base, and advertising rates are stabilizing," Mr. Dean says. "People will continue to read newspapers."

Mr. Dean wouldn't address whether Avista will slash costs or lay off employees. "Newspapers have to recognize that they are operating in a different environment, with different pressures, declining readership and advertising pressures," he says. "We have to get additional revenue growth and do things more efficiently, but that may not be about staff cuts."

While public investors penalize newspaper companies for their lack of growth, private-equity investors generally are more concerned with steady cash flows. And newspapers usually don't have steep capital expenditures that soak up cash.

So if the Star Tribune's circulation stops declining and Avista can generate some growth for the paper's Web site, the firm might avoid significant cost cutting.

"To generate an acceptable return, we only need modest growth because of [the paper's] impressive high free-cash flow," and the low purchase price that Avista paid, Mr. Dean says.

Avista hasn't said how much of its fund's own cash it will use for the purchase price and how much of it will come from debt it will pile on the paper.

Avista's executives don't have any newspaper experience, but they are used to betting on overlooked media sectors. In the early 1990s the Avista team scored by buying the Argyle television group, which turned out to be a profitable investment, at a time "people said no one will watch network TV," Mr. Dean recalls. They also scored on radio purchases.

In May of last year, while the cable-television business was in Wall Street's doghouse, Avista bought WideOpenWest, the 13th-largest cable company in the U.S., the fund's first buyout. WideOpenWest, which focuses on cities like Detroit and Chicago, was grappling with savage competition and was sold by two buyout firms with broad media experience.

But cable stocks have taken off since the Avista purchase, WideOpenWest's cash flow is up almost 70% and people in the private-equity world describe the deal as a home run, at least so far.

Although Avista hasn't made previous newspaper acquisitions, it placed Chris Harte, a former Knight Ridder executive whose family is among the owners of San Antonio-based direct-marketing firm and publisher Harte-Hanks Inc., as the chairman of Star Tribune's holding company.

"If you analyze [the performance of Avista's team over time], you see consistent, strong investments with low volatility," says Daniel Cahill, who manages U.S. private-equity investments for Scotland's Standard Life Investments, one of Avista's first investors.

But Mr. Cahill notes that "spinning off from Credit Suisse will cause some distractions" for the group, as they continue to expand.

Write to Gregory Zuckerman at gregory.zuckerman@wsj.com2

Mercy 'no' To Proposal For Joint Hospital (DMR)

By Tony Leys

Des Moines Register, January 6, 2007

Iowa's largest health insurer, Wellmark, likes the idea, but there are worries about federal antitrust regulations.

One of Des Moines' two dominant hospital companies offered Friday to work with its rival to jointly build a single suburban hospital, but the rival declined.

The offer from Iowa Health-Des Moines comes as both that company and Mercy Medical Center move forward with plans to build hospitals next door to each other in West Des Moines.

The companies explored the possibility of a jointly owned suburban facility in 2002. Hospital leaders said they dropped the idea after federal regulators told them informally that it could run afoul of antitrust laws.

Wellmark Blue Cross/Blue Shield, Iowa's largest health insurer, suggested recently that the two companies attempt again to cooperate on a suburban hospital. Iowa Health agreed to try, but Mercy said no.

Wellmark Vice President Cliff Gold said his company believes a joint venture might be acceptable to federal regulators. "We're saying it's four or five years later, and a lot has changed," he said.

Gold said the Justice Department has been friendlier to such ideas lately. He also said his company, which is the largest private payer to both hospital companies, would help the hospitals make their case.

Wellmark fears that if two similar hospitals are built side-by-side in West Des Moines, health-care costs would be needlessly inflated. A joint venture would be a more economical option, Gold said.

DOJ_NMG_0113951

Iowa Health Chief Executive Officer Eric Crowell wrote a letter to Wellmark Friday saying that his company would agree to a renewed attempt at a joint project, with several conditions.

One condition was that the process include Broadlawns Medical Center, Polk County's public hospital. Iowa Health's current plans include giving Iowa Lutheran Hospital to Broadlawns, which would demolish its current facility.

Iowa Health also said that Mercy would have to put its suburban plans on hold, and that Wellmark would pay the legal costs of the request.

When the original joint proposal was made in 2002, Mercy Chief Executive Officer David Vellinga said the idea "just makes common sense."

But in a letter to Wellmark this week, Vellinga said Mercy was not interested now.

"This approach has been tried and, as you know, has been rejected by the (Department of Justice)," the letter said. "Our attorneys have advised us not to proceed with meetings to plan such a joint venture again as that would be contrary to the direction given by DOJ and, further, that it is extremely unlikely that the DOJ would reach a different conclusion in this matter."

Both systems have talked for years about building hospitals in the western suburbs. The jockeying has intensified in recent months, as Mercy and Iowa Health proposed closing Des Moines hospitals and replacing them with new facilities in West Des Moines. Both sides contend their plans do not need permission from state regulators, though Iowa Health has offered to seek such permission if Mercy would do the same. Mercy said no to that offer.

The Iowa Health Facilities Council, which judges large medical projects, is scheduled to meet Jan. 16 to consider whether the projects must be reviewed.

ENVIRONMENT:

Feds Drop Waste-water Inquiry (HTRIB)

By Paul Quinlan

The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida), January 6, 2007

No charges will be brought against workers involved in Venice utilities department dumping.

VENICE -- The Department of Justice will not file charges against any individuals involved in the city utilities department's 2001 waste-water dumping into Curry Creek, officials said Friday.

The announcement answers the question that lingered after the city pleaded guilty in December 2005 to a three-count felony violation of the Clean Water Act: Would those responsible for the dumping or the falsification of records during the subsequent cover-up go to jail?

Speculation centered on what court papers called the "Executive Group," a reference to the "high-level executives, managers, supervisors" who oversaw "the day-to-day operations" of the Eastside Wastewater Treatment Facility at the time of the dumping.

But the Department of Justice has closed its inquiry, leading the Environmental Protection Agency to drop its investigation.

A Department of Justice spokeswoman would not comment on why the department closed the case.

The Justice Department pulled the EPA off the case in a letter to EPA special agent Dan Green, who had handled the investigation.

"Their recommendation was not to pursue any individual defendants in this case, and the local U.S. Attorney's office went along with this," Green said.

When the city pleaded guilty in 2005, a judge imposed the minimum fine allowable, $110,000, or $5,000 for each of the 22 days that plant employees discharged waste water into the creek and sprayed it onto a field at Knights Trail.

As part of a deal with prosecutors, the city pledged its full cooperation in any further investigation of any current or past city employees.

City employees testified for months afterward.

City Manager Marty Black fumed over the Justice Department's decision to drop the inquiry Friday.

"We're very disappointed that the federal authorities have elected not to put the resources into this to finish out prosecution of the individuals who committed the crimes," said Black.

Despite the small fine that the charges carried, Black estimates the cost of the episode, including legal, consulting and engineering expenses, exceeds $2 million.

Last June, the city struck a deal with the EPA that would keep Venice off a blacklist of Clean Water Act violators.

The deal preserves the city's eligibility for federal contracts, assistance and loans for its water plant.

DOJ_NMG_0113952

According to the plea agreement, city employees knowingly dumped the treated waste water into Curry Creek and sprayed it onto the Knights Trail field even though systems designed to measure and limit the flow were not working.

City workers then submitted reports that falsified measurements of the discharge.

Members of the Executive Group later certified the accuracy of those reports.

The three utility workers who blew the whistle on the dumping later sued the city, saying they were harassed by supervisors after the incident.

The city settled, giving each $25,000 and a letter of apology.

The City Council purged the department in 2004, eliminating more than a dozen top positions and hiring a private company, Operations Management International, to run the department.

6 Ohio Cities Rush To File Suits Against Makers Of Lead Paint (NYT)

By Bob Driehaus

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

CINCINNATI, Jan. 5 — Racing against a proposed state law that would limit paint manufacturers' liability for lead poisoning in aging neighborhoods, Cincinnati has joined five other Ohio cities in filing suits that seek millions of dollars from the companies to clean up lead paint.

Ohio is the latest front in a battle that pits paint companies against cities and states struggling to overcome problems associated with lead poisoning.

The problems include learning impairment in children, high blood pressure in adults and, at high levels of exposure, seizures, comas and deaths.

Municipal and county governments in California, Mississippi, Missouri, New Jersey and Texas have also sued major manufacturers seeking what would amount to billions of dollars in damages.

Whether responsibility rests primarily with paint companies, landlords who let paint deteriorate or cities that fail to enforce housing codes remains an open question.

Rhode Island broke new ground in February by winning a jury trial that found that three paint companies had created a public nuisance and had to clean up lead-paint contamination throughout the state at an estimated cost of $1.37 billion to $3.74 billion.

The companies are seeking a new trial there and trying to fend off litigation throughout the country. They are Sherwin-Williams, based in Cleveland; NL Industries, part of Valhi of Dallas and whose predecessor National Lead made Dutch Boy paint; and Millennium Holdings of Hunt Valley, Md., a successor to a company that owned Glidden Paint, originally based in Cleveland.

"The movement is gaining steam," Jack McConnell, the lead lawyer in the Ohio lawsuits and a participant in the Rhode Island trial, said. "We've seen it both in the Rhode Island trial and in three or four appellate court decisions, all of which have ruled against the lead-paint industry."

Lawyers for paint companies say such suits unjustifiably shift responsibility from the cities that failed to enforce housing codes that would have kept lead paint from deteriorating and affecting residents.

"Did the companies know that lead was toxic?" asked Bonnie Campbell, who represents several paint manufacturers. "Sure, everybody knew that. What wasn't known was that property owners wouldn't take care of their property."

Ms. Campbell noted that most manufacturers voluntarily began removing lead from their products in 1955, when problems became apparent.

In Ohio, Gov. Bob Taft decided on Friday to allow a bill to become law without his signature that will ban future suits like those filed by the cities that are based on public nuisance grounds. Plaintiffs will instead have to rely on product liability law, which requires proof linking lead paint in a given home to a specific manufacturer. Noneconomic damages, including punitive damages, will be capped at $5,000 a consumer, instead of being unlimited.

Mr. Taft said that provision prevented him from signing the bill because the cap was too low.

Bill Would Permanently Bar Drilling In Alaskan Refuge (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Opponents of oil drilling in an Alaskan wildlife refuge are going on the offense after playing defense for a quarter of a century. They want the new Democratic Congress to make an oft-challenged drilling ban permanent.

Legislation introduced in the House on Friday would make the oil-rich 1.2 million-acre coastal strip of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge a permanently protected wilderness and end repeated efforts to open the area east of the Prudhoe oil field to energy companies.

DOJ_NMG_0113953

"The consensus is that there should not be drilling in the refuge, so the logical next step is to pass legislation which turns it into a wilderness," Rep. Edward Markey, chief sponsor of the legislation, said in an interview.

The Massachusetts Democrat has introduced similar legislation in each of the last three congressional sessions. However, the House has approved drilling in the refuge a half dozen times, only to see the effort die in the Senate were supporters couldn't muster the 60 votes to overcome a likely filibuster.

This time, with Democrats in the majority and a number of moderate Republicans on record as opposed to drilling, Markey believe he has a good chance in the House to go one step farther and declare the refuge permanently off-limits to oil development.

A co-sponsor of the bill is Rep. Jim Ramstad, a Minnesota Republican.

Cindy Shogan, executive director of the Alaska Wilderness League, also says this time is different.

"What's changed is we won't have those daily assaults" from pro-drilling forces, she said. "We are definitely on the offense."

Environmentalists said they plan to mobilize the same people that have fought drilling proposals in past years behind the Markey-Ramstad legislation.

Two years ago, when Republicans expanded their majorities in both the House and Senate, the likelihood of opening the refuge to oil development gained new momentum. It already had been a top energy priority of President Bush since 2001.

"Many people had written the obituary for the refuge," said Melinda Pierce, legislative director of the Sierra Club. But a concerted push by pro-drilling forces fell short.

Now Markey believes the momentum is going the other way.

"We now have a majority of House members that have publicly said they oppose any drilling in the refuge. In the previous Congress we were battling the Republicans in the majority who wanted to drill."

Environmentalist know that in the Senate they will need 60 votes to get the wilderness designation, with the filibuster threat coming from Republicans this time. Sen. Ted Stevens, an Alaska Republican who has battled to open the refuge to oil drilling for a quarter century, has not given up.

The coastal strip of ANWR, as the refuge is commonly referred to, is believed to contain 10.5 billion barrels of oil, approaching the size of the Prudhoe Bay field to the west. At peak production the refuge could supply 1 million barrels a day by 2025, according to the Interior Department.

On the other hand, to environmentalists and conservationists the refuge's coastal strip represents the ultimate wild place to be protected. They compare it to the Serengeti in Africa because of the wildlife that abound: polar bears, musk oxen, caribou and millions of migratory birds that fly there as part of their annual migration.

Drilling proponents argue that modern technology can limit the footprint on the coastal tundra and develop the oil without disturbing the wildlife.

Bush, who called for opening the refuge during his 2000 presidential campaign, repeatedly has said its environment can be protected alongside oil rigs. He views the refuge's oil as essential to lessening America's dependence on foreign energy sources.

Markey disagrees.

"Our addiction to oil is real [but] drilling in the refuge would amount to a declaration that we remain in denial about this addiction," he said.

"There are some places in our world that are so rare and so special, that we have a responsibility to protect them."

Drill Ban Sought For Alaskan Park (BBC)

By David Willis

BBC.com, January 6, 2007

Legislation has been tabled in the United States aimed at making a ban on oil drilling at a wildlife refuge in Alaska permanent.

Wildlife campaigners are hoping the new Democrat-led Congress will adopt such a move, which has been rejected on several occasions in the past.

The legislation would make about 500,000 hectares of land along the Alaskan coast a protected wilderness.

It is rich in wildlife but also has more than 10bn barrels of oil.

Political shift

To many environmentalists the area represents probably the ultimate wild place in need of protection.

It has been compared to the Serengeti nature reserve in Africa because of its abundance of wildlife - polar bears, oxen, caribou and millions of migratory birds.

But it is also thought the area could supply up to one million barrels of oil a day at peak production.

DOJ_NMG_0113954

US President George W Bush has said repeatedly that he believes it is possible to protect the environment while still allowing drilling to take place.

He believes the area is essential for lessening US dependence on foreign energy sources.

Outlawing drilling in the area has been tried in the past without success.

But with Democrats now in the majority in the US Congress and a number of moderate Republicans on record as supporting the move, chief sponsor of the legislation, Representative Edward Markey, believes he stands a good chance of success.

DuPont Drops Plan For Nerve Gas Wastewater (NYT)

By Richard G. Jones

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

TRENTON, Jan. 5 — Bringing an abrupt end to a three-year fight between environmentalists and federal officials, the DuPont Company announced on Friday that it would not participate in an Army plan to dispose of wastewater from neutralized VX nerve gas by dumping it into the Delaware River.

The decision was a victory for environmentalists who questioned how placing wastewater from the neutralized form of the deadly nerve agent would affect the river. Created for use by the military, VX is considered one of the world's most toxic chemicals. Exposure to its active form can kill within minutes.

The Army plan involved bringing VX wastewater from a chemical treatment center in Newport, Ind., to a DuPont plant in Deepwater, N.J.

But, citing what was expected to be a long and contentious approval process by state environmental regulators, officials at E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Company said they would not take part in the effort.

"During our three-year evaluation of the Newport proposal, it has become increasingly clear to us that the approval process will be lengthy and arduous," Nicholas C. Fanandakis, a vice president and general manager at DuPont, said in a statement. "Therefore, we believe it is in the best interests of New Jersey and DuPont not to proceed."

The decision was hailed by elected officials and environmentalists on both sides of the Delaware, including Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey, who had questioned the plan in 2004 while he was a member of the United States Senate.

"It's now official," Mr. Corzine said in a statement. "VX will never be dumped in the Delaware River or any other New Jersey waterway. This is a decisive victory for the people of New Jersey. VX nerve agent is one of the world's most deadly chemical compounds, and dumping it in a river never made any sense."

Mr. Corzine credited the state's Congressional delegation, including Representative Robert E. Andrews, with helping to bring about the company's decision.

Mr. Andrews said that he and other members of the delegation had recently commissioned a report by the federal Government Accountability Office, to be released this month, to examine the soundness of the Army's proposal.

"I believe that forthcoming report played a role in DuPont's very commendable decision," Mr. Andrews said in a telephone interview.

Mr. Fanandakis said that DuPont abandoned the project despite endorsements for it by the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and the Environmental Protection Agency.

A spokesman for the Army's chemical materials agency said that it would continue to review other options for disposing of the neutralized VX gas.

Mickey Morales, an Army spokesman, said in a statement that although federal officials were disappointed, they appreciated DuPont's work "in this effort to rid our nation of the threat associated with continued storage of these obsolete chemical weapons."

DuPont and the Army had been working together for the last few years on the plan to dispose of the waste. Because DuPont had not formally agreed to take on the project, the two sides had not entered into a contract, and no money related to the disposal of the waste was lost because of DuPont's decision.

The plan under consideration would have shipped waste from the Army's Newport Chemical Depot in Indiana to the DuPont plant, near the Delaware Memorial Bridge in South Jersey.

Workers at the depot neutralize the nerve gas in a process that includes mixing it with hot water and sodium hydroxide to form a nonlethal, but still caustic, material known as hydrolysate. Some compare its potency to that of household cleaning products.

The Army plan called for DuPont to remove any remaining harmful chemicals from the hydrolysate before dumping it into the Delaware. Mr. Morales said that the Army had neutralized little more than a third of its total stockpile of 1,269 tons of VX gas, and that the depot in Indiana was equipped to handle all of the hydrolysate wastewater expected to be produced.

DOJ_NMG_0113955

Environmentalists had received assurances that the water would not be harmful to the Delaware, but continued to question the Army plan. Late last month, a coalition of environmental groups from Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Kentucky filed suit against the Army.

On Friday, environmentalists in New Jersey and Pennsylvania welcomed the DuPont decision.

"This is a great day for the river and the people of New Jersey, Delaware and the states that the nerve agent waste would have been trucked through," said Maya van Rossum of the Delaware Riverkeeper Network, a plaintiff in the suit. "This is the right decision by DuPont."

Jeff Tittel, executive director of the New Jersey chapter of the Sierra Club, said: "They had a lot of nerve to dump on New Jersey. I'm glad they realized this was a bad idea."

Mercury "Hot Spots" Identified In U.S. And Canada (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Two newly published scientific reports suggest that mercury contamination has created at least five "hot spots" in New England and Canada, places where the neurotoxin has accumulated in fish and wildlife to such an extent that it could harm human health and local ecosystems.

The 11 scientists, who work at institutions including Syracuse University and Vermont's Department of Environmental Conservation, analyzed how mercury has accumulated in two indicator species in the northern United States and southern Canada. In both cases, they were able to identify several regions where mercury in yellow perch and common loons was above acceptable levels.

David C. Evans, who heads a Maine-based nonprofit group called the BioDiversity Research Institute and is one of the papers' lead authors, said the study shows that some areas of the country are more susceptible to mercury pollution than others.

"You need to look at the fish and wildlife to understand what areas are problematic," Evans said. "A coal-burning plant in a wetland area would have far greater impact on human health and wildlife than a coal-burning plant in a dry, grassy area."

Taken together, the two papers, published in this month's edition of the peer-reviewed journal BioScience, represent the most comprehensive ecological analysis of mercury accumulation ever conducted in the United States. They are significant because the Environmental Protection Agency has created a system requiring electric utilities to cut their mercury emissions 70 percent by 2025 but allowing power plants to trade pollution credits in reaching that target.

Under the Clean Air Mercury Rule, power plants in some regions may emit more mercury than others, which has prompted some to question whether the new system will result in mercury hot spots across the country.

One EPA official, who spoke on the condition that he not to be identified because of agency rules, said the two papers raise questions about the system, which will begin to take effect in 2010. In the 2005 federal notice announcing the rule, the agency wrote that it would "evaluate and take appropriate action" if more information emerged about mercury hot spots.

"There's a growing body of evidence that there are places where mercury deposition is a serious problem," the official said. "This is something that needs to be looked at very carefully before putting in a cap-and-trade system."

But EPA spokeswoman Jessica Emond said the agency remains committed to the rule.

"U.S. mercury air emissions have dropped by 45 percent since 1990," Emond said. "Under the Bush administration, the U.S. is the first nation in the world to regulate mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants."

Scott Segal, a lobbyist who represents electric utilities, noted that when the nation adopted a cap-and-trade system for sulfur dioxide, the largest polluters cleaned up fastest.

"Nothing in the report establishes a basis for changing course away from trading systems for mercury control like the one found in the Clean Air Mercury Rule," Segal said. "A well-designed cap-and-trade program remains the most appropriate response to dealing with mercury emissions from power plants."

But the researchers said their findings suggest that local and regional emissions can have a serious impact on local wildlife and human health. They identified five regions as "biological mercury hot spots," including New York's Adirondack Mountains, the Merrimack River in Massachusetts and New Hampshire, Maine's Androscoggin and Kennebec rivers, and central Nova Scotia.

The Senate's Task On Warming (NYT)

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

Here are a few bulletins from planet Earth:

Dec. 12 — Exhaustive computer simulations carried out at the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colo., suggest that the Arctic Ocean will be mostly open water in the summer of 2040 — several decades earlier than expected.

DOJ_NMG_0113956

Scientists attribute the loss of summer ice largely to the buildup of carbon dioxide and other man-made greenhouse gases in the atmosphere.

Dec. 14 — Experts at NASA's Goddard Institute predict that 2006 will be the fifth-warmest year since modern record-keeping began, continuing a decades-long global warming trend caused, again, by the buildup of man-made carbon dioxide.

Dec. 27 — The Interior Department proposes adding polar bears to the list of threatened species because of the accelerating loss of the Arctic ice that is the bears' habitat. The department does not take a position on why the ice is melting, but studies supporting the proposed listing identify greenhouse gases as the main culprit, adding that if left unchecked these gases will create ice-free Arctic summers in three decades.

But we knew that.

One can only assume that the Senate's new Democratic leadership is paying attention. California's Barbara Boxer is the new chairwoman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, replacing James Inhofe, the Oklahoma Republican who regards global warming as an elaborate hoax drummed up by environmentalists and scientists in search of money. Ms. Boxer has already scheduled hearings, and there will be no shortage of legislative remedies to consider. All share one objective, which is to attach a cost to carbon dioxide through a cap on emissions.

The underlying logic is that if people and industries are made to pay for the privilege of pumping these gases into the atmosphere, they will inevitably be driven to developer cleaner fuels, cleaner cars and cleaner factories.

This is the path most developed countries have chosen. Europe has imposed caps on industrial emissions, and European companies have begun investing in new technologies and cleaner factories in places like China, partly as a way to meet their own obligations to cut emissions and partly as a way to lead China to a greener future.

These hearings need to be conducted in a thoughtful manner. There has been enough noise, from the Inhofe right and from the doomsayers who see each hurricane as a sign the apocalypse is upon us. But it is also important that Ms. Boxer and her colleagues not lose sight of a fundamental reality: Saturating the atmosphere with greenhouse gases is loading the dice in a dangerous game.

The Navy's War On Whales (LAT)

By Jean-Michel Cousteau, Michael Jasny

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

The Navy should be required to minimize whale deaths when testing sonar equipment, which can wreak havoc on marine life.

LAST JULY, with ships off Hawaii poised to begin one of the Navy's largest training exercises, a federal judge in Los Angeles temporarily halted use of a dangerous type of military sonar — called midfrequency active sonar, or MFA sonar, used to detect submarines — that has been linked to mass strandings and deaths of whales around the world. The Navy was allowed to proceed with its exercises only when it agreed to take significant, common-sense measures to protect whales and other marine species, such as staying away from the newly designated Northwestern Hawaiian Islands Marine National Monument. This outcome showed that the Navy can, if ordered to do so, achieve its training objectives while making strides to protect the marine environment.

Yet now, in training exercises planned for California's coastal waters, the Navy is proposing to abandon its commitment to safeguard whales and their habitat from high-intensity sonar. It has submitted an application to the California Coastal Commission to conduct two years of intensive MFA sonar training off Southern California without committing to measures that effectively protect the state's rich marine life. The commission is scheduled to make a final decision next week. The proposed training would take place in some of the most diverse and biologically rich waters off the continental United States — waters that host blue whales, humpbacks, gray whales, dolphins, porpoises and other sensitive and iconic California species.

That MFA sonar can cause serious injury and death to whales is beyond reasonable scientific dispute. Sonar has been associated with mass strandings off Hawaii, Alaska, the Bahamas, the Virgin Islands, Japan and numerous other sites. In 2004, at a symposium by the International Whaling Commission, more than 100 whale biologists reported that the association between sonar and whale deaths "is very convincing and appears overwhelming." The same year, an expert panel commissioned by the Navy reached the same conclusion.

Despite the proven dangers, the Navy persists in thinking that sonar training doesn't pose a significant threat to the environment, and so objects to adequate precautions. The Navy asked the commission in effect to rubber-stamp its application without any real information about steps it will or won't take to protect marine life.

The Navy should not be permitted to conduct, and the commission must not approve, dangerous sonar training without assurances that the Navy will take meaningful steps to protect whales and other marine life.

DOJ_NMG_0113957

Such steps include avoiding key whale habitats, such as the Channel Islands National Marine Sanctuary; turning off sonar if whales get too close; limiting training in low-visibility conditions, in which whales cannot be detected; and taking other common-sense measures to minimize the risk of more whale deaths. The Coastal Commission has the power to make these demands. Indeed, in a 40-page report issued last week, the commission's staff recommended such measures.

The Coastal Commission was created 35 years ago by a vote of the people to act as the state's independent voice for the conservation and management of our greatest economic and environmental resource — our coast and coastal waters. When the Navy requests permission to train in our coastal waters, it cannot reasonably refuse to protect those waters and the marine life that thrives there. The commission must insist that it do so.

JEAN-MICHEL COUSTEAU is founder and president of Ocean Futures Society in Santa Barbara. MICHAEL JASNY is a senior policy analyst with the Natural Resources Defense Council in Los Angeles.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

New Agent Named To Lead FBI's Miss. Operations (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, January 6, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - Frederick T. Brink has been appointed the special agent in charge of the FBI in Mississippi, the federal law enforcement agency announced Friday.

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said Brink replaces John G. Raucci, who left Friday for a position at the agency's headquarters in Washington.

Raucci had led the FBI's Jackson division since July 18, 2005.

Brink joined the FBI in 1985. Before that he was a military instructor and a shipboard surface warfare officer with the Naval Academy, which he graduated from in 1978.

His field office assignments have been in Tampa, Honolulu and Hawaii.

Brink has also served at the FBI's Operational Technology Division, located at Quantico, Va., and overseas at the U.S Embassy in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia.

In June 2005, Brink was promoted by Mueller to special agent in charge of the FBI's Special Operations Division in New York.

He comes to Mississippi from that post.

There are nine resident offices of the FBI in Mississippi.

Brink To Become New FBI Chief In Miss. (JCL)

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, January 6, 2007

Fred Brink, a graduate of the U.S. Naval Academy and 21-year FBI veteran, today was named the new special agent in charge of the FBI's Jackson Division.

Brink is coming to Mississippi from his post as special agent in charge of the FBI's special operations division in New York.

He succeeds John G. Raucci, who will move to FBI headquarters in Washington, D.C. next week as assistant director of the agency's human resources division. There are 34,500 FBI employees and "we still turn away thousands every year,'' Raucci said.

In his first assignment in the South, Raucci said there was excellent cooperation between the FBI and state and local law enforcement agencies throughout Mississippi.

Stephen F. Gomez will serve as acting special agent in charge for a few weeks, said FBI spokesman Jason Pack. Gomez has worked in the FBI's Jackson office.

Overseeing FBI operations in Mississippi, Raucci served in the Jackson office since July 18, 2005.

Mississippi's FBI chief oversees nine offices statewide.

Former FBI Top Agent Gets Prison Sentence (ELPT)

By Louie Gilot, El Paso Times

El Paso Times, January 6, 2007

Former FBI special agent in charge Hardrick Crawford was sentenced Friday to six months in prison, making him probably the first person of his rank to do hard time.

At the sentencing hearing, U.S. District Judge Philip Martinez said that he liked Crawford, and that seeing the government man in court had been "painful."

DOJ_NMG_0113958

But Martinez opted for a sentence at the high end of the sentencing guideline. He could have decided on probation.

"This is a sad day. It's a sad day for your family. It's a sad day for me," Martinez said.

Crawford was convicted in August of making false statements regarding gifts he received in an Office of Government Ethics Public Financial Disclosure Report submitted to the FBI.

Crawford was also found guilty of concealing material facts from the FBI about his friendship with Jose Maria Guardia, a Juárez racetrack owner.

He was acquitted of three charges, including that he made false statements to investigators looking into the friendship.

Crawford will remain free on bond until 2 p.m. March 5, when he is must surrender and start his prison sentence. Crawford did not want to comment after the sentencing and has not decided whether to appeal, said his lawyer, Mary Stillinger.

Advertisement

FBI officials said they did not recall any other special agent in charge of the FBI who was sent to prison. Retired and active FBI agents from around the country followed the sentencing outcome online. Agents even wrote some of the 70 letters submitted to Judge Martinez in Crawford's behalf.

One letter writer was former city Rep. Dusty Rhodes, who said Friday's sentence was "harsh and unnecessary."

"He's suffered enough. His career is ruined. He's broke. What else can you do to him?" Rhodes said.

Many retired law enforcement officers enjoy a second career as security consultants, a path that is now closed for Crawford, as Martinez pointed out during the hearing.

Crawford, who was the special agent in charge of the El Paso FBI office from July 2001 to November 2003, met Guardia in 2002, when Guardia was a FBI informant for a short time.

The two became as close as brothers, according to trial testimony. At one point during their friendship, Crawford vouched for Guardia's character at a news conference in Juárez after Guardia was accused of having ties to drug trafficking and money laundering.

Crawford's involvement drew the ire of Mexican officials, who saw it as meddling and triggered the U.S. investigation that led to the prosecution.

Prosecutors also accused Crawford of improperly accepting gifts from Guardia, such as a job for Crawford's wife, a membership at the Coronado Country Club and three family trips to Las Vegas.

During his trial, Crawford sought to show that he was manipulated by Guardia but that he did nothing illegal or unethical.

Friday, he addressed the court.

"I stand tall before you this morning, ... proud of my U.S. Army service, proud of my Beachwood, Ohio, (police) service and proud of my FBI service. However, I believe my love for my wife and my friendship clouded my judgment and made me vulnerable," he said.

When Martinez asked him to name something he had done wrong, Crawford said he should have "micromanaged" his wife's employment with Guardia. Crawford's wife, Linda Crawford, burst into tears during her husband's statement.

Martinez said that he had problems with some aspects of the case, including Crawford's statements that he had never heard any negative information about Guardia even though he had been briefed by some of his agents about suspicions surrounding the Mexican businessman.

Martinez also said that Crawford had been selective with information when interviewed by investigators, that he had been confusing about whether the Juárez news conference had been planned and that it wasn't clear how he supposedly repaid Guardia for the Vegas trips.

Martinez also sentenced Crawford to three years of supervised release, a $10,000 fine and 200 hours of community service.

The El Paso FBI office reacted to the sentencing of a popular boss with sadness and resignation Friday.

"We respect the federal justice system, which we in the FBI have sworn to uphold," spokeswoman Andrea Simmons said. "While we are saddened by this entire situation, we believe that justice was served."

Assistant U.S. Attorney James Blankinship said investigators did their job as if Crawford were any low-level employee, such as letter carriers or prison guards who "get in a bad situation and lie about it."

Where Crawford will serve his time had not been decided Friday. For his safety, he would not have to stay in the area where he worked, a standard rule for imprisoning former law enforcement officers.

Louie Gilot may be reached at lgilot@elpasotimes.com, 546-6131.

Former El Paso FBI Chief Sentenced To 6 Months In Prison (DMN/AP)

Associated Press

The Dallas Morning News, January 6, 2007

EL PASO – The former head of the FBI's El Paso bureau was sentenced Friday to six months in federal prison for lying to investigators about his relationship with a Mexican race track owner.

Hardrick Crawford Jr. was convicted last year of concealing information about his association with Jose Maria Guardia and of making false statements on federal financial disclosure reports about gifts he received from Guardia.

He was sentenced to six months on each count by U.S. District Judge Philip R. Martinez and will serve the terms concurrently. He also was ordered to serve three years of supervised release and fined $10,000.

Crawford, who left his job in 2003, was acquitted of three charges of lying to investigators. He faced up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Drug Agents Mishandled Seized Cash, Audit Finds (DCEX)

By Bill Myers, The Examiner

DC Examiner, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - Drug Enforcement Administration agents routinely disregarded agency rules on the handling of seized cash, jeopardizing hundreds of millions of dollars taken in drug raids, a Justice Department review found.

In an audit published Friday, Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine examined thousands of seizures between October 2003 and November 2005.

Fine's report states that drug agents rarely counted the cash they took, often didn't provide receipts for seized money, rarely recorded the seizures in agency ledgers and often didn't ask their colleagues to witness their counting and handling of the money.

DEA agents recorded more than 16,000 seizures for nearly $616 million in the period surveyed, the report states.

"Cash seized by the DEA is at risk because of the DEA's failure to consistently implement and document controls over the seized cash," Fine's spokeswoman, Cynthia Schnedar, said in an e-mail to The Examiner.

The lack of internal controls over the seized cash leads to accusations of theft by the agents, the report states.

The DEA opened internal investigations of 33 agents between 2003 and 2005, Fine's report states. In 11 of those cases, the agents didn't follow agency guidelines on handling, processing or disposing of the evidence, the report states.

"DEA takes the OIG recommendations seriously and is taking prompt actions to address them," agency spokesman Steven Robertson said.

Anyone with information on the DEA or the Justice Department's Inspector General can call 202-459-4956.

bmyers@dcexaminer.com

Federal Agencies To Help Fight Violence (FLSUNSEN)

By Jerome Burdi, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, January 6, 2007

The upsurge in gang violence in Palm Beach County is like a nightmare from 15 years ago when drive-by shootings were commonplace, officials said.

So the county Violent Crimes Task Force has turned to the same remedy it did in the 1990s: Federal prosecution, Sheriff Ric Bradshaw said Friday.

Local law enforcement and federal agencies -- including the FBI, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and the Drug Enforcement Administration -- have joined forces because criminals are more likely to do time and more of it under federal guidelines, Bradshaw said.

"You always try to bring state and federal law enforcement together and use whatever advantages are available," said Dale Armstrong, ATF resident agent in charge in West Palm Beach.

Working with federal agencies is nothing new for local departments, but since the county task force was re-formed in April, its focus has been on gangs, Bradshaw said.

"We're confident we're going to make an impact," he said.

The New Year started off with bullets and blood, the same way 2006 ended.

On Christmas Eve, a simmering battle between rival gangs left one man shot to death in the Boynton Beach Mall. On New Year's Day gunmen drove down a residential street in Riviera Beach, fired at least 37 shots and killed an 8-month-old baby strapped in a car safety seat.

On Wednesday night, a deaf man was killed in a spray of bullets in Belle Glade. His back turned to the masked gunmen, Ziatavian Griffin, 22, didn't hear everyone on the busy street scatter. Investigators said he might not have been the target.

Bradshaw said that law enforcement will take a more proactive approach to identify gang members and prevent crime, that the federal system can impose stiffer jail sentences and fines and that witnesses are protected from defendants until trial. This prevents witness tampering, one of the most common tactics used by suspected gang members to derail cases against them, he said.

"These people have no regard for life," Bradshaw said.

Anonymity helps, said Riviera Beach Assistant Chief David Harris. Harris led the task force in 1991 for about nine months, making over 300 cases against suspected gang members; about 60 were drive-by shooting cases, he said. All but one shooting case ended in conviction, he said.

"The drive-bys just stopped," Harris said. "It was the federal intervention that prosecuted these guys and kept them in jail."

Once people in the community took notice that criminals were staying in jail, witnesses started coming forward, he said. Three months into the collaborative effort one woman brought him six high-powered guns, Harris said.

"`I was afraid my boyfriend was going to kill me. Now I know he's going to jail so here's the weapons,'" he recalled her saying.

Anyone with information on gang activity should call Crime Stoppers at 800-458-8477.

FBI Seeks Information On Device At Church Advocate Westside Bureau (BRADV)

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 6, 2007

The FBI is offering a reward of up to $5,000 for information leading to the arrest and indictment of those responsible for placing an explosive device at Erwinville Baptist Church.

The device was discovered outside the church at 5:19 p.m. New Year's Eve.

The West Baton Rouge Sheriff's Office was notified, and deputies called the State Police Hazardous Materials Unit.

Deputies closed off La. 413 and the State Police team detonated the device about 9 p.m.

FBI crime scene investigators went to the location Monday to collect possible evidence, West Baton Rouge Parish Sheriff Mike Cazes said.

Debris from the detonated device, described as a pipe bomb, was sent to the FBI Crime Lab at Quantico, Va.

Jim Bernazzani, special agent in charge of the FBI's New Orleans Division, asked that anyone with information about the incident call the Baton Rouge office of the FBI at (225) 291-5159.

IMMIGRATION:

Troops Flee From Border Outpost (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

Armed men overran a National Guard observation post along the U.S.-Mexico border in Arizona this week, forcing the soldiers to retreat and prompting an investigation by the U.S. Border Patrol that has focused on the intruders' identity.

No shots were exchanged and no one was injured in the incident, which occurred shortly after 11 p.m. on Wednesday. The National Guard troops were members of an entry-identification team, assigned to monitor major illegal-alien and drug-smuggling corridors.

After forcing the soldiers to flee, the unidentified men retreated into Mexico.

National Guard Sgt. Edward Balaban said the troops did not know how many men were involved in the attack "because obviously it took place in the dark." He said National Guard officials are investigating the incident and will determine shortly whether to change any procedures for troops at the border.

The Border Patrol probe has focused on determining who the armed men were, what they were doing and why they approached the observation post, which is located near Sasabe, Ariz., in one of this country's major alien and drug-smuggling corridors. The outpost sits on a hillside overlooking the border and is covered by a tent and camouflage netting.

Several Border Patrol agents in the area told The Washington Times yesterday the armed men might have been trying to find out what the Guard troops would do if they were confronted by drug or alien smugglers. They said the increased presence of troops and additional Border Patrol agents in recent months had frustrated many of the area's drug and alien smugglers.

"I guess they got their answer," said one veteran agent. "When in doubt, the troops will run."

Earlier this year, several Border Patrol agents said they had been assigned to guard National Guard personnel, given standing orders to be within five minutes of the troops deployed along the border. The agents, who referred to the assignment as

DOJ_NMG_0113961

"the nanny patrol," said most of the Guard troops are not allowed to carry loaded weapons, despite a significant increase in violence directed at Border Patrol agents during the past year.

Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar disputed the assertions, saying only that "a small percentage" of his agents were working as "force protection" for the Guard members. He said those agents also were performing their traditional border-enforcement functions.

National Guard troops taking part in Operation Jump Start are not empowered to get involved in law-enforcement duties. They cannot detain, arrest or interdict anyone or anything coming across the border -- only report them to the Border Patrol.

The Sasabe area has been the busiest in the Tucson, Ariz., Border Patrol sector for marijuana seizures. Agents have seized 124,000 pounds of the drug there since Oct. 1, said Rob Daniels, spokesman for the Border Patrol's Tucson Sector.

"We don't know if this was a matter of somebody coming up accidentally on the individuals, coming up intentionally on the individuals, or some sort of a diversion," Mr. Daniels said, adding that the increased presence of Guard and Border Patrol personnel had made it more difficult to smuggle drugs and people and "that heightened frustration may have been connected to what took place."

About a third of the 6,000 National Guard troops now deployed along the 1,951-mile U.S.-Mexico border as part of President Bush's $760 million "Operation Jump Start" are assigned to entry-identification teams. They have been deployed from California to Texas to upgrade border security and give the Border Patrol time to recruit, hire and train 6,000 new agents by the end of 2008.

Minuteman Civil Defense Corps President Chris Simcox, whose volunteers have staked out the Sasabe area for the past two years, said MCDC will increase its activity today with dozens of members expected to stand alongside Guard troops.

"I am not at all shocked by this incursion; our president and federal government have sent these lawbreakers a message of immunity if caught and a helping hand to accomplish their criminal goals," he said. "Our nation is being overrun by the influx of illegal aliens as well as drug cartels that show no signs of fear in crossing our border."

Chief Aguilar has called the troops "a vital asset in the effort to protect America from future terrorist attacks and mitigate illegal border incursions." In addition to providing border security, the troops are building roads and fences, adding cameras and sensors, conducting aerial reconnaissance, providing medical aid and communications support, and assisting at highway checkpoints.

Hockey-Coach Quota (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

The University of Alaska Anchorage Seawolves hockey team is on a roll, and interim coach Dave Shyiak is a top candidate for coach of the year in the Western Collegiate Hockey Association.

But the team has a big problem. Mr. Shyiak was born in Canada and is working as a so-called temporary H1-B professional worker. His visa is expiring and U.S. immigration officials fret that this foreigner may be taking a job from an American citizen. So the university must comply with rules that require it to verify that there is no American worker who is "able, willing, qualified, and available to accept the job at the prevailing wage for that occupation." The university is taking out newspaper ads for the hockey team's head-coach position and hoping no one applies.

"He's a very, very good coach," athletic director Steve Cobb tells us. "He's worked hard, paid his taxes, and done everything he's supposed to do. The system doesn't make sense." No kidding. What's next? Deporting superstars Dirk Nowitzki (Germany) and Steve Nash (Canada) from the NBA?

We have here a microcosm of the lunacy of America's immigration laws, and industries a lot more vital to America's economy than sports are harmed. Nearly one-third of science and engineering Ph.D.s working in places like Silicon Valley are the top minds from foreign nations, according to a study from the National Bureau of Economic Research. Many are also here on H1-B visas. Companies are required to spend tens of thousands of dollars in legal fees, advertising expenses and long delays to secure visas for the talented people they need. And the demand for these specialty visas is two to three times higher than the 65,000 per year allotted by Congress.

This is all supposed to protect jobs for Americans, but these immigrants are job creators. A new study from the University of California Berkeley found that in 2005 talented immigrants helped start businesses, mostly in high-tech, with sales of nearly $50 billion a year and tens of thousands of new jobs. The study concludes: "Immigrants have become a driving force in the creation of new businesses and intellectual property in the U.S."

Scott McNealy, Chairman of Sun Microsystems, recently implored Congress to raise H1-B visa numbers, noting that two of Sun's co-founders were immigrants who have created tens of thousands of jobs. "Why would you have an arbitrary number of smart people?" he asks. A lot of hockey fans in Anchorage are asking the same question.

DOJ_NMG_0113962

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Tightens Disclosure Rules For Pet Projects (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — The House voted on Friday to pull the shadowy tradition of Congressional earmarking into the daylight, requiring lawmakers to attach their names to the pet items they slip into spending or tax bills and certify that they have no financial interest in the provisions.

More than any of several ethics rules adopted by the House this week, the earmark measure could prevent the kind of corruption that led to several big scandals in recent years, including former Representative Randy Cunningham's sale of earmarks to government contractors for cash, gifts and campaign contributions.

The cost of earmarks has tripled in the last 12 years, to more than $64 billion annually. Some lawmakers treated their share of that money as personal accounts to dole out to constituents or, in many cases, campaign contributors.

In what lawmakers of both parties called a recognition of the backlash against such corruption in the November elections, the earmark rule the Democrats passed extends far beyond the proposal they introduced last spring and campaigned on in the fall. That proposal applied only to earmarks that are typically already well publicized.

It also goes further than a measure the Republicans passed just weeks before the November election. As in other efforts to change the earmarking process, the Republican leaders foundered against the opposition of the powerful Appropriations Committee, which doles out earmarks as it writes spending bills.

The vote on the new earmark measure was linked to a rule known as "pay as you go" that would prohibit the House from increasing the deficit by passing any new tax cuts or entitlement spending programs without offsetting them with spending cuts or tax increases.

Republicans denounced the "pay as you go" rule as an excuse for Democrats to increase taxes. "I call it the Flip Wilson rule," said Representative Mike Pence, Republican of Indiana, referring to the comedian whose signature line was, "The devil made me do it."

Still, the changes were approved by a vote of 280 to 152, with 48 Republicans joining all 232 Democrats.

On the subject of earmarks, Mr. Pence and several other Republicans commended the Democrats as heeding the message the voters sent at the polls. "We went through an election where voters were rightfully outraged" by the practice of earmarking, said Representative Paul D. Ryan, Republican of Wisconsin.

In a signal that they, too, had heard the message, the Republican minority incorporated the same changes into the token alternative they proposed before the Democratic majority passed the new House rules.

"I'm pleased that Democrat leaders agree with Republicans that earmark reform is a critical issue," Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader, said.

Even as the Democrats were passing the strict new disclosure rules, however, at least one influential chairman suggested that he was less than fully committed to the full breadth of their application.

The rules would require lawmakers to disclose their sponsorship of not only spending earmarks but also narrowly focused tax or tariff reductions affecting fewer than 10 companies or people — something the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee had resisted just as the Appropriations Committee had for spending provisions.

After the vote on Friday on the new rule, Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York, the new Ways and Means Committee chairman, suggested that such resistance had not disappeared.

"You have to assume that everything we have done is subject to a revisit," Mr. Rangel said. "We support the speaker and her drive to get things done within 100 hours," he said, referring to Speaker Nancy Pelosi. But, he added, "These things are not locked in cement."

Mr. Rangel and other Democrats also acknowledged that the adoption of the pay-as-you-go rules would force tough choices when it came to delivering on campaign promises like new education subsidies, some of which would fall under the rules.

In particular, the rules will make it more difficult to repair the alternative minimum tax, which, thanks to inflation, penalizes millions of middle-class households as well as its original targets, the rich. Repairing the tax is estimated to cost as much as $1 trillion in lost revenue over 10 years.

DOJ_NMG_0113963

Mr. Rangel said he was determined to find $1 trillion of tax revenue elsewhere to pay for the repair, as much as possible by eliminating outdated tax loopholes. “You have to throw it right in the middle of the tax code and say, ‘We are removing this,’ and then you have to find the money,” he said.

In a meeting with reporters, Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the House majority leader, promised that Democrats would cut the number of earmarks in half in the next budget, for the 2008 fiscal year. But several Democrats emphasized that the new rules would not alone reduce the amount of earmarks, but could result in more restraint.

Lawmakers already race to take credit for earmarked projects for their districts. But it has often been impossible for outsiders to learn who sponsored earmarks no one took credit for, and unclaimed earmarks were often the ones that played a role in corruption scandals. The new rules will require disclosure of all earmarks in a bill, as well as their sponsors, their purpose and their costs. The rules will also prohibit party leaders from trading earmarks for members’ votes.

In contrast to the past opposition of appropriations chairmen, Representative David R. Obey, the Wisconsin Democrat who now leads the committee, was a driving force behind the earmark rule, several Democrats involved in the matter said.

Mr. Obey said Friday that over the last 12 years of Republican control the number of earmarks in the labor, health and education spending bill had risen to 3,000, from zero.

“I think that is a gross exaggeration of what our staffs have the ability to review,” he said. “I don’t want a single earmark in any bill that the committee staff cannot review to make certain that the reputation of this House and the reputation of the committee are protected.”

In particular, Mr. Obey added the requirement for lawmakers requesting earmarks to clarify that they had no financial interest in the project, to prevent directing taxpayer money toward projects like the beautification of a relative’s shopping mall.

Although previous rules already prohibited such self-dealing, “when a member has to certify publicly, it focuses the mind,” said Representative Chris Van Hollen, Democrat of Maryland.

The Senate is expected to take up its own earmark rules next week. The initial proposal, based on a bill that passed the Senate last year but not the House, would apply to only a small fraction of earmarks, excluding those directed to military or other federal contracts, as well as those described in legislative reports instead of bill texts. Several lawmakers, however, have said they hope to strengthen the Senate rules, too.

Everybody Will Know If It's Pork (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger, Richard Simon, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

The House adopts rules requiring lawmakers to disclose their earmarks.

WASHINGTON — Led by its new Democratic majority, the House imposed substantial new restrictions Friday on earmarking, a controversial practice increasingly used by legislators from both parties to slip narrowly tailored spending provisions into bills without public scrutiny.

The new rules will not end earmarks, but will force legislators to disclose their actions publicly and certify they have no financial stake in their earmarks.

The often secret nature of the process contributed to its explosive increase in recent years and led to scandals such as the one that ensnared former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe), who went to jail for accepting bribes from lobbyists seeking earmarks.

The adoption of new rules cracking down on earmarks was remarkable because leaders of both parties climbed to power by making extensive use of the practice, which provided them influence among their peers and leverage in raising funds from lobbyists.

The reform proposal, championed by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, herself a prodigious author of earmarks, drew praise from conservative Republicans and reform advocates who said they saw the strong measure as a sign that the new Congress may be serious about curbing the excesses of recent years.

"They had the guts to do what we didn't," said Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), a critic of taxpayer money going for such things as the National Wild Turkey Federation, cranberry-production conservation and potato research. Many of the most costly and controversial earmarks were put in bills by lawmakers at the request of defense industry lobbyists who donated to their campaigns.

The number of earmarks exploded in the last decade from 1,439 in 1995 to 15,268 last year, according to a Senate estimate. They have been blamed for spawning a troubling culture on Capitol Hill that saw a dramatic rise in the number of lobbyists and some notorious corruption scandals.

Earmarks gained wider notoriety after the $223-million "bridge to nowhere" — connecting Ketchikan, Alaska, to an island with an airport and about 50 inhabitants — was slipped into the 2005 highway bill.

DOJ_NMG_0113964

The ethics measure, which passed the House Friday on a 280-152 vote, requires that earmarks and their authors be clearly identified.

"I salute the House for attacking this problem," said Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.), who has made earmark reform a hallmark of his career. Coburn said he was uncertain whether the Senate would be as rigorous in its earmark rules when it takes up the issue next week.

The Los Angeles Times reported recently that the new Senate Majority Leader, Harry Reid, earmarked funds for a bridge across the Colorado River that could affect the value of undeveloped land Reid owns in the vicinity. The Nevada Democrat has denied any wrongdoing.

The disclosure was one of many in recent months suggesting that lawmakers, including former House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), may have profited from their own earmarks. He denied any connection between his earmark for highway construction and the rise in the value of property he owned nearby.

In some other cases, the spending provisions look like rewards for campaign contributors and other supporters. Earmarks played a role in the scandal around lobbyist Jack Abramoff and Cunningham's bribery conviction. They also led to a federal inquiry involving Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands), the former chairman of the House Appropriations Committee. The congressman has denied any wrongdoing.

The greatest power to earmark lies in the hands of appropriations committee members. Reid and Pelosi are both appropriations veterans and rose in power partly because of their ability to use earmarks as carrots or sticks with junior members of Congress. In addition, it helped them and other congressional leaders lure campaign contributions, which they then distributed to colleagues.

Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) was among those who pushed for the new rule. He said Friday that the provision requiring earmark sponsors to certify that neither they nor their spouses would benefit would "curb some of the worst abuses" and ensure that more earmarks go to "public purposes rather than special interests or anyone's personal benefit."

He and Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) had proposed similar legislation a few months ago but their idea was rebuffed — by Republicans and Democrats.

A spokesman for Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.), the chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee who is famous for bringing projects to his home state, said the senator had no comment on the House action. But Tom Gavin said, "The image of the Congress is in the mud, and Senator Byrd wants to work to pick that image up, clean it off, and restore the integrity to the Congress."

The Senate next week will consider its own ethics measure — one that also would require earmark sponsors to be identified and could include a process to allow senators to try to strip earmarks out of bills.

Byrd and Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), the House Appropriations Committee chairman, intend to ban earmarks from the unfinished 2007 spending bills.

Obey supports the new House rule and said it would "protect the integrity of the institution." But he was not happy when President Bush singled out Congress for criticism earlier this week for the proliferation of earmarks.

"If we are going to talk about earmarks, then let's talk about the guy who does the most earmarking," Obey said during Friday's debate, asserting that the president has favored Republican districts in his budget proposal.

White House Deputy Press Secretary Tony Fratto welcomed the House action but said it fell short of the president's goal of cutting in half the number and cost of earmarks. "To make them transparent is important and should have a chilling effect on new earmarks," he said, "but reducing the overall number of earmarks should be a goal as well."

All of the "no" votes were cast by Republicans, with many saying they supported earmark reform but opposed another provision of the rules requiring that any new tax cuts or spending increases be offset with tax increases or spending cuts to keep the deficit from growing. Many Republicans objected to the potential for tax increases.

Taxpayer watchdog groups praised the action. Citizens Against Government Waste called the measure a "long-overdue improvement that will shine light on the corrupting practice of earmarking."

But group president Tom Schatz cautioned: "Politicians will bend any rule or find any loophole in order to keep or conceal their pork. Taxpayers must keep the heat on Congress for these reform efforts to fully bear fruit."

Coburn, while praising the House action, cautioned that "this is a slippery cat and we are not going to catch it on the first pass."

House Changes Rules On Pork-barrel Projects (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman, Washington Bureau

Chicago Tribune, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Bye-bye, bridge to nowhere.

DOJ_NMG_0113965

In one of its first official acts under Democratic control, the House voted 280-152 on Friday to curb the middle-of-the-night, backroom deal-making that resulted in approval of embarrassing—and sometimes illegal—pork barrel projects.

Forty-eight Republicans joined 232 Democrats to require committees to disclose all sponsors of so-called earmarks. The new rules would prohibit lawmakers from trading their votes for special spending projects tacked on to legislation, and it would require members to certify that they have no personal financial stake in their requests.

Democrats said they expect the new rules to end many of the excesses that occurred under the Republican majority. The Senate is expected to consider a similar proposal next week.

During the last session of Congress, former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) wound up in prison after using earmarks to steer Pentagon contracts to a defense contractor who had bought Cunningham's home for $700,000 more than market value. Cunningham pleaded guilty to taking more than $2.5 million in bribes.

Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) and Rep. Don Young (R-Alaska) famously pushed for more than $223 million in federal funds to pay for a bridge to the isolated island of Gravina, population 50—resulting in the derisive moniker "bridge to nowhere." The proposal died after the earmark was exposed.

And Rep. Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.) earned himself the "Flushing Our Money Down the Toilet Award" from Citizens Against Government Waste. He had set aside $1 million for the Waterfree Urinal Conservation Initiative, instructing the Navy to learn more about water-free urinals, something that could have benefited a company in Ehlers' district.

"When the Republican Congress took over in 1995, throughout the entire federal budget, [there were] 1,400 earmarks," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.). "At the end of the Republican Congress, there were 13,997 earmarks."

Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Caucus, said a lobbyist once called earmarks "an ATM for lobbyists." That, he said, would now stop.

"It's not going to be an ATM machine for the special interests anymore, because this Congress, that gavel, is going to open up the people's House, not the auction house," Emanuel said.

Republicans acknowledged Friday that the increase in embarrassing earmarks gave them a bad reputation among voters when it came to fiscal discipline. And some said the earmark abuses by Cunningham and others fed into the notion that Republicans were corrupt.

"This is one of the ways we got into a heap of trouble," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), who noted he was never embarrassed or ashamed of any of the special projects for his district that he attached to legislation.

To be sure, Republicans voted for a somewhat similar proposal at the end of last year in a last-ditch attempt to improve their image with voters. It didn't appear to impress them and it didn't impress such opponents of pork-barrel projects as Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.).

"Bully for the Democrats," Flake said. "They did what we didn't have the guts to do when it matters."

Flake placed some of the blame for the runaway earmarks with President Bush. The president, he said, could easily instruct federal agencies not to enforce Congress' instructions unless they are placed inside the legislative text, rather than in an accompanying report. If Congress were forced to do that, the earmarks would be exposed and the president could veto the bill.

"Some of us have been begging him to do this for years," Flake said.

Some advocates for reining in federal spending say it's nice to shine a light on some of the silliness that passes for earmarks, but the move will do little to actually save money. Earmarks make up about 1 percent to 2 percent of all federal discretionary dollars spent each year. Where the federal budget faces its biggest challenge is in the runaway growth of entitlement programs, such as Medicare and Social Security.

"The deficit hawk in me doesn't look at it and say, 'Gosh, this is going to save a lot of money,'" said Robert Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, an organization that promotes fiscal responsibility.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said he hopes the new rules will halve the number of earmarks each year. In part, that may come from the public scrutiny implicit in attaching a name to a project.

But Bixby is skeptical that lawmakers will care.

"That assumes that somebody can be embarrassed," he said. "You go there to go to bat for your constituents and by golly, whatever you're going to bat for is going to sound like the most important thing that ever was."

Steve Ellis, vice president of programs for Taxpayers for Common Sense, agreed, pointing out that "Don Young wasn't bashful about the bridge to nowhere."

In fact, he said, lawmakers may scale back their requests so they aren't on the order of $200 million, the expected cost of the Alaska bridge.

"There may be a whole lot of little bridges to nowhere," said Ellis, whose organization is a bipartisan watchdog group. "You can never underestimate members of Congress' ability to be shameless."

DOJ_NMG_0113966

Indeed, many House members said Friday that the new rules would not stop them from helping their districts with money for a road here or a bicycle path there.

"My constituents pay a lot of tax dollars and they have got to get something back," said Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio).

Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.) pointed out that after 12 years of being in the minority, he's not really used to getting much in the way of federal assistance to bring back home. But he said he's so happy when he can get something, he wants everyone to know.

Recently, he said, he squeezed out $5 million for the Concordia Child Care Center, which runs child-enrichment programs in Chicago's Roscoe Village neighborhood. And Rep. Jan Schakowsky (D-Ill.) said she's thrilled when she can bring back money to pay for roads or sidewalks or local law enforcement and usually holds a press conference to announce it.

House leaders have imposed a moratorium on earmarks for all fiscal 2007 spending bills. But after that, Schakowsky said she'll be trying to get her fair share.

"I'm still going to be fighting as hard as I can for my district," she said.

House's "Pay-Go" Rule Makes AMT Relief Harder (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The drive in Congress to protect more middle-class Americans from the individual Alternative Minimum Tax just got a whole lot tougher.

The House Friday passed a new "pay-go" budget rule that aims to rein in the country's surging deficit by prohibiting the chamber from considering any tax-cut or entitlement legislation if the cost isn't offset by increased revenue or spending trims. For now, at least, House Democrats say they intend to abide by the rule -- even when it comes to "fixing" the AMT, a proposition that would require them to replace vast amounts of tax revenue.

The AMT was designed to prevent upper-income people from avoiding paying taxes altogether, but it wasn't indexed for inflation. Without a change to the system, that would, over time, require a growing number of middle-class families to pay higher taxes. Congress has passed temporary patches to prevent this. But without a change in law, more than 30 million taxpayers would be subject to the tax in 2010, according to the Tax Policy Center, a joint venture of the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution.

Doing away with the AMT -- as some Democrats are proposing -- would reduce tax revenue by about $1 trillion over the next decade, an amount that would be challenging and politically painful to offset. It is possible that Congress could pass a shorter-term remedy.

In either case, coming up with offsetting revenue would be tough. Passage of the pay-go rule in the House "means it's going to be with great difficulty that we find $1 trillion," said Charles B. Rangel (D., N.Y.), chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, who has made reducing the AMT's impact on the middle class a top priority. "It's not good for me to have pay-go, but it's good for the country."

In the Senate, too, a bipartisan push to repeal the AMT is on a collision course with a plan to strengthen pay-go requirements. On Thursday, Senate Finance Chairman Max Baucus (D., Mont.), along with the panel's ranking member, Iowa Republican Sen. Charles Grassley, proposed repealing the AMT. Mr. Baucus said he wants to do so in a "fiscally responsible way," but has not provided any specific plans. Meanwhile, a proposal by Senate Budget Chairman Kent Conrad (D., N.D.) for tightening pay-go rules would require revenue losses from repeal of the AMT to be offset. Or, if offsets weren't found, 60 senators would have to approve the AMT changes.

With the emphasis on fiscal restraint, Mr. Rangel said he is taking a broad look at possible changes to the tax code that could be used to offset the loss in revenue from any changes to the AMT. Certain tax breaks, such as deductions for mortgage interest and charitable contributions, wouldn't be touched, Mr. Rangel said. As for others, "I'm having them all added up," he said.

Mr. Rangel acknowledged that Democrats have to tread carefully or risk political backlash. "At the end of the day, we have to have an equitable package where nobody can say Democrats raised taxes."

Republicans criticized the new House pay-go rules as too weak, in particular because they don't apply to all spending.

House Adopts Pay-as-You-Go Rules (WP)

By Lori Montgomery, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Changes Aim to Curb Deficit Spending, Shed Light on Earmarks

On its second day under Democratic management, the House yesterday overwhelmingly approved new rules aimed at reining in deficit spending and shedding more light on the murky world of special-interest projects known as earmarks.

DOJ_NMG_0113967

Under the new provisions, the House will for the first time in years be required to pay for any proposal to cut taxes or increase spending on the most expensive federal programs by raising taxes or cutting spending elsewhere. And lawmakers will be required to disclose the sponsors of earmarks, which are attached in virtual secrecy to legislation to direct money to favored interests or home-district projects.

In recent months, with revelations that lawmakers had earmarked funds for projects with little public benefit, earmarks had became a political embarrassment and a symbol of fiscal profligacy.

The House voted 280 to 152 to approve the rules, which drew the support of 48 Republicans. Democratic leaders, in control of the House for the first time in 12 years, hailed the vote as a sign of their commitment to restore accountability to federal spending and to reduce a budget deficit and national debt that they say have been swollen by Republican tax cuts and military spending.

But even as they celebrated one of their first exercises of legislative power, key Democrats acknowledged that it will be difficult to abide by the new pay-as-you-go spending rules -- known on Capitol Hill as "pay-go" measures -- while keeping their promises to fund health-care, education and homeland-security initiatives. The rule change also jeopardizes President Bush's efforts to extend his tax cuts, most of which will expire in 2010. And it will complicate Democratic efforts to repeal the alternative minimum tax, a set of provisions in the tax code that could force millions of households to pay more this year.

"It's important that they passed a pay-go rule because they're setting a standard for themselves. This is a way of saying 'There's a new sheriff in town' and 'We're going to be fiscally responsible,' " said Robert L. Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, an advocacy group dedicated to deficit reduction. "But, now, they're going to have to figure out how to live up to that standard. And that's going to be pretty tough."

Yesterday's vote completed work on a series of rule changes proposed by Democrats to regulate operations in the House during the 110th Congress. On Thursday, the House adopted stringent new controls on the lobbying of House members, banning gifts from lobbyists and severely restricting privately funded travel. Yesterday, in addition to the rules affecting spending, the House adopted "civility" measures that grant Republican lawmakers more opportunities to offer their views and to participate in legislative debate than Democrats say they received under Republican control.

But the rules on spending drew the most animated debate, as Democrats accused the president and congressional Republicans of frittering away the large budget surpluses they inherited after the 2000 elections and of running up record budget deficits. Last year, the deficit was a relatively modest $248 billion, but the national debt is approaching $9 trillion.

"The one thing we can say about George Bush and his economic policy is: 'We are forever in your debt,' " Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) told his colleagues on the House floor. "On day number two, Democrats have said, 'Enough is enough with running up the debt of this country. We're going to put our fiscal house in order.' "

Republicans fired back, criticizing the new spending rules as a weakened, "paper-tiger" version of an expired pay-as-you-go law, which triggered across-the-board spending cuts whenever legislation increasing the deficit was passed. House leaders have promised to pursue such legislation in the coming weeks, but they note that it could not take effect without the support of the Senate and the White House. In the meantime, House Democrats say, the more limited rule, which makes budget-busting legislation subject to a parliamentary rule of order, is the best they can do.

Budget experts note that House rules are easily waived, and some predict that Democrats will be forced to abandon the new rules, at least for certain expenditures, to meet their campaign promises. For example, House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) and other Democratic leaders have vowed to halt the expansion of the alternative minimum tax, which would cost about $50 billion this year alone. Repealing the tax, as Rangel and others advocate, would cost close to $1 trillion over the next decade.

Coming up with that kind of cash is possible, budget experts say, but doing so is probably going to be politically unpalatable. For example, Leonard E. Burman, co-director of the Tax Policy Center, a joint project of the Urban Institute and the Brookings Institution, is working on options for covering the cost of a repeal. Among them: Allowing the president's tax cuts to expire and eliminating the federal deduction for state and local income taxes.

That combination would raise more than enough money to pay for repeal, Burman said, but "for somebody like Rangel in a high-tax city and high-tax state, it's going to be hard to swallow. There's no free lunch."

Democrats are already having trouble reconciling their pledge to reduce the deficit with policy changes that they promised to pursue during the first 100 hours of the new Congress. This week, for instance, senior House Democratic aides said the promise to cut in half interest rates on student loans will have to be phased in over five years instead of being passed immediately.

So far, fiscal restraint appears to be gaining the upper hand. As he left the House chamber yesterday, Rangel said he is scouring the tax code for tax breaks that benefit special interests. If the beneficiaries "don't put their hands up, it's out," he said, suggesting that the money saved could go toward paying for the repeal of the alternative minimum tax.

DOJ_NMG_0113968

"It's not good for me to have pay-go, but it's good for the country," Rangel said. "At this point, nobody . . . has convinced me that there should be exemptions from pay-go."

House OKs Budget Rule Changes (WT)

By Charles Hurt, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

House Democrats yesterday approved powerful measures to thwart new deficit spending, but Republicans warned that the new majority is paving the way to increase federal taxes.

"We simply cannot continue to run record budget deficits and debt. We must not force our children and grandchildren to pay for what we are buying," Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, said on his first full day as majority leader. "That is not only an intellectually bankrupt policy, it is an immoral policy."

While Republicans and conservatives said they applauded Democratic efforts to balance the budget, they said the "pay-as-you-go" provisions in the package of new rules will more likely encourage a tax increase than force cuts in federal expenditures.

"It doesn't reduce current spending levels or require a reduction in current spending levels," said Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican. "It is a means to justifying tax increases on working families, small businesses and family farms. In a very real sense, the American people ought to know that this proposal translates to: 'You pay as Congress goes on spending.' "

Conservatives off Capitol Hill agreed.

Tim Phillips, president of Americans for Prosperity, said the "pay-as-you-go" rules for the budget "tilt the budgetary playing field in favor of economy-killing tax hikes instead of spending restraint."

"These new rules will almost certainly lead to tax hikes, and we know that the path to prosperity is not paved with higher taxes," he said.

Those provisions, approved on a 280-154 vote, mean that any increases in federal benefit programs such as Medicare or Medicaid will have to be offset by cuts elsewhere in federal spending or be accompanied by tax increases. They also mean that it will be much harder to extend President Bush's tax cuts, most of which expire at the end of 2010.

The package of new rules also contained other reforms to limit -- or at least expose -- the ability of lawmakers to get huge federal projects for their home districts, better known as earmarks or political pork.

Under those provisions, lawmakers will be forced to publicly disclose the earmarks they request.

The earmark provisions are similar to ones Republicans approved last year. But only about a quarter of them supported yesterday's Democratic proposal because it was linked to the "pay-as-you-go" provisions.

"To their credit, Democrats have enacted stronger pork-barrel earmark reforms than their Republican colleagues were able to pass last September," said Mr. Phillips, whose group traveled the country in a bus last year highlighting outrageous federal spending. "This is a testament to the continued power of the grass-roots taxpayers, many of whom joined us on our nationwide Ending Earmarks Express bus tour last year who told their elected officials to close the earmark favor factory."

Republicans yesterday also announced their proposal to allow small-business owners to pool resources to purchase health insurance for employees.

"Republicans are committed to working with our Democrat colleagues to find innovative ways to help provide health insurance to the 46 million Americans who have no health insurance," said Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican. "The Small Business Health Fairness Act, a bill that I've brought to this floor several times myself ... would allow small businesses to join together and buy health insurance in larger pools, just like big companies and unions can do today."

Dreier Shifts Gears In A Hurry (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

The Republican was a ruthless rules panel chief. Now he cries foul. Democrats are amazed.

WASHINGTON — Democrats never expected to waltz back to power this week without a few protests from the party they ousted.

But when they brought their new ethics rules up for a vote, more than a few eyebrows arched over the congressman who cried loudest about the indignities the Democrats were already inflicting on their GOP colleagues.

As much as any Republican, Rep. David Dreier had stirred the rage of Democrats while they suffered in the minority. Wielding the chairman's gavel of the House Rules Committee, the 14-term congressman from San Dimas seemed to revel in his power as legislative gatekeeper — the man who could stop any bill from getting to the floor.

But there was Dreier this week, lecturing Democrats on the virtue of openness and professing disappointment about being left out of the legislative process.

DOJ_NMG_0113969

"I have whiplash," said Rep. Jim McGovern, a Massachusetts Democrat who seethed under Dreier's chairmanship for four years. "I thought it would take a couple of weeks before the hypocrisy bubbled up."

Dreier just smiled when asked about his new role as champion of inclusion. "I'm loving it," said the tall, polished ex-chairman after leaving a news conference in which he complained about the demise of legislative fair play.

"I got a call a few minutes ago from a former staffer who said, 'My gosh, I haven't seen you have so much fun in a long time.' And I said, 'You know what, I'd much prefer being the chairman and in the majority. But I do enjoy the role of being the loyal opposition too,' " Dreier said. "I love holding people accountable. They did it to us constantly, so that's what I'm doing."

The rapid transformation from punitive enforcer to principled rebel reflected the odd political theater that accompanies changes of power on Capitol Hill.

Dreier is actually reprising his role as indignant reformer. Before Republicans took over in 1995, Dreier was among a group of House Republicans who led the charge for more openness under the autocratic Democratic majority. But when Dreier assumed the helm of the Rules Committee in 1999, he became notorious for suppressing minority Democrats.

Meeting in an out-of-the-way room on the Capitol's third floor, the little-understood Rules Committee rarely generates headlines. But because the chairman controls which bills can come to the House floor for votes and whether they can be amended, it is immensely powerful.

"It is the most important tool that the majority in the House has," said UC Berkeley congressional scholar Eric Schickler.

As chairman, Dreier was unfailingly polite and quick with a smile. But he used his power mercilessly, calling the committee to order in the middle of the night, providing committee members little time to review legislation, and sending more and more bills to the floor that could not be amended.

"I could not think of those diabolical things," said Rep. Louise M. Slaughter, the New York Democrat who is taking over the committee after years as the ranking minority member. "We were simply at their mercy."

Slaughter and other Democrats repeatedly promised they would be different. "We have no intention of keeping our foot on your necks the way you did to us," Slaughter told Dreier on the House floor.

But when Democrats brought up their ethics rules without consulting Republicans and then scheduled votes without allowing amendments, Dreier had the target he needed.

"I am disappointed," he said Thursday on the floor of the House.

"I am concerned," he noted later.

"I am very, very troubled and saddened," he concluded.

Then Dreier urged his Republican colleagues to support the new ethics rules, which banned such perks as free sports tickets from lobbyists and trips on corporate jets. The rules, he said, were not unlike the proposals GOP leaders had crafted when they held the majority.

The performance drew raves from Dreier's GOP colleagues.

"He's doing a great job," said Rep. Adam H. Putnam of Florida, the No. 3 Republican in the House. "He's going out of his way to teach all members how to properly use House rules."

Rep. Alcee L. Hastings, a Florida Democrat who serves on the Rules Committee with Dreier and jousted with him on the House floor, chuckled at the former chairman's joyous embrace of his new underdog role.

"I'm enjoying the banter with him because of his disingenuousness," Hastings said after the debate. "He is the only person in this chamber who can take a position directly contradictory to the one he took a few minutes earlier with a straight face."

Democrats Rename Key House Panel (WT)

By David R. Sands, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

Seeking a new name to go with a new attitude, congressional Democrats announced yesterday the House International Relations Committee would be reverting to its old, pre-Republican majority moniker: the "House Committee on Foreign Affairs."

"A new sheriff has come to town, taking the reins with a purpose," incoming committee Chairman Tom Lantos, California Democrat, said. "Americans have demanded change in the way our country conducts itself in the world."

The new Republican House majority in 1994, under Speaker New Gingrich, re-dubbed the panel the International Relations Committee in part to distinguish it from its counterpart in the other wing of the Capitol, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. Lantos noted that the House panel had been known as the Committee on Foreign Affairs almost without interruption since 1822.

By whatever name, the House and Senate foreign affairs committees have both promised aggressive early oversight of the Bush administration's diplomacy, something they say was not done under Republican control.

Mr. Lantos will chair a hearing Thursday on Iraq with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, a day after President Bush is slated to outline his revised strategy on the war. The committee will hold a second hearing the same day on U.S. policy toward Iran.

Mr. Lantos said the committee also planned public sessions on the North Korean nuclear standoff and the "looming potential loss of Afghanistan" to the resurgent fundamentalist Taliban movement.

New Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, also has announced plans for a string of oversight hearings on Iraq over the next month. The Senate committee will hold a closed session with intelligence officials on Iraq on Tuesday and will hear from a group of private Iraq scholars on Wednesday.

Mr. Biden has been an early and vocal critic of an increase in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, which is expected to be a centerpiece of Mr. Bush's new strategy.

"We've tried the military surge option before and it failed," Mr. Biden said last month.

"If the president proposes escalation in Iraq, I will oppose him and so will many of my colleagues in Congress," he added.

Home Town Paves The Way For Pelosi (WP)

By Dan Morse, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Capping off a three-day celebration of her ascension as speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, Nancy Pelosi returned yesterday to her home town of Baltimore, where a street was renamed for her in front of a stage of dignitaries and a bank of TV cameras.

"She comes here today to recapture her humble beginnings," the Rev. Michael Salerno, pastor of a nearby church, told a crowd gathered at a street corner outside Pelosi's childhood home in a gritty-looking collection of rowhouses in Baltimore's Little Italy neighborhood.

The setting seemed to emphasize Pelosi's working-class roots and counter the "San Francisco liberal" image that Republicans have tried to attach to her.

When Pelosi (D-Calif.) spoke to the crowd, she mentioned her Italian immigrant ancestors, who came to the United States poor, hardworking and religious. Her own upbringing, in the Baltimore rowhouse to her left, she said, was shaped by Italian American pride, devout Catholicism, deep patriotism and staunch Democratic ideals. Her father and a brother were mayors of the city.

"I wanted to come back here and say thank you to all of you," she said. "Every step that I took to the speakership began in this neighborhood."

Tommy D'Alesandro, the brother who was mayor, spoke of growing up in the house, with people coming by needing help with jobs, housing, medical care, getting someone out of jail and, he said -- drawing the biggest laugh of the day -- getting someone into jail.

There were "thousands and thousands of favors done" in the home, he said, evoking an earlier time of machine politics.

Baltimore Mayor and Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley (D) pulled the decorative cover off a street sign outside the house. The name: Via Nancy D'Alesandro Pelosi.

But on the streets of Little Italy, aside from the facades of the old rowhouses, it's not that gritty anymore. Real estate has appreciated, young professionals have moved in and renovated their houses, and there's a Whole Foods nearby. In some ways, the neighborhood has prospered just as Pelosi has.

In 2005, she was ranked ninth among House members in net worth, which, between her and her husband, was more than $14 million, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

That year, the average home in Little Italy sold for $361,500, a 165 percent spike over two years before, according to Live Baltimore, a group advocating that people buy in Baltimore. Live Baltimore ranked about 216 Baltimore neighborhoods on property values and found that Little Italy had experienced the third-highest increase.

What's the appeal?

"You don't think it's the architecture, do you?" asked Roberto Marsili, pointing at one of the old buildings. He has lived in his rowhouse, two doors down from where Pelosi lived, since 1939.

He said people like him are dwindling in number. He remembers Pelosi as a youngster -- well-behaved and pleasant. "A very classy girl," Marsili said.

But many of the residents moved in recently, long after Pelosi left.

What Little Italy offers is prime location -- you can walk to the Inner Harbor, office buildings, a Barnes & Noble, a wine shop selling $175 bottles of cabernet sauvignon -- and the feeling that you're not living in a condo tower.

DOJ_NMG_0113971

The neighborhood is still home to people like Marsili. There are more than a dozen Italian restaurants. There's still enough of the Italian culture that newcomers, even if they're not Italian, can make it part of their own identity.

At Rocco's Capriccio, a restaurant, the owners frequently see newcomers at dinner. Some of the newcomers like to tell their visiting friends they know the owner of the place, Rocco Gargano Jr. said.

"A lot of the people who come in are caught up in living in an Italian neighborhood," Gargano said. "It's kinda like being in a movie."

"They want to be caught up in the mix," said his sister Rosa Gargano.

Rocco estimates that the neighborhood's population is 70 percent young professionals. He lives in Anne Arundel County and commutes to the family restaurant to work. At midnight, he said, he likes to walk outside and see people walking from Italian restaurant to Italian restaurant. "In a way," he said, "you kinda get caught up in it, too."

Michaelle "Mick" Stachura, who attended the event yesterday, is a newcomer to Little Italy and has embraced its remaining authenticity. She bought a rowhouse in 2002 for $135,000 and spent nearly $200,000 on renovations. She has become active in a local church and recently made cookies with older residents for an Italian street fair.

"It's just so endearing down here," she said. "It's the only place I've lived where I want to be part of the neighborhood."

Pelosi Visits Hometown On Victory Tour (AP)

By Kristen Wyatt

AP, January 5, 2007

BALTIMORE (AP) - Newly elected House Speaker Nancy Pelosi took a victory lap Friday through Baltimore, the blue-collar city where she grew up and learned politics from her father, who was mayor in the 1940s and 50s.

Pelosi, surrounded by family members, laid a bouquet of white roses beside a statue of her father, former Mayor Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., in the downtown business district.

"It is with great emotion that I come to this spot because I used to visit here every time I came to Baltimore," she said.

Pelosi then visited her childhood home in Little Italy, a tiny, close-knit community of row houses and Italian restaurants just east of the trendy Inner Harbor.

(AP) House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of Calif., joins fellow Democrats at a reception on Capitol Hill in...

Full Image"We were devoutly Catholic, deeply patriotic, extremely proud of our Italian heritage, and in our case, staunchly Democratic," Pelosi said at a ceremony to name her childhood block Via Nancy D'Alesandro Pelosi.

The Baltimore events capped off two days of victory festivities for Pelosi, who was elected the nation's first female speaker Thursday. The events also were designed to counter Republican descriptions of Pelosi as a San Francisco liberal.

Pelosi grew up the youngest of six children, and the only girl.

"We were all born and raised in politics, and we all worked the political scene," recalled Pelosi's oldest brother, Thomas D'Alesandro III, who was also mayor of Baltimore.

The family "had our doors open every day, people coming in looking for jobs, for medical assistance, for housing, to get somebody out of jail," he recalled. Pelosi "had an opportunity at an early age to be exposed to the world of politics at the precinct level, at the constituent level."

(AP) House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of Calif., center, accompanied by Rep. Jim McDermott, D-Wash., left,...

Full ImagePelosi left Little Italy after high school and never returned as a full-time resident, but neighbors here still remember the polite little girl who rode in open-top convertibles in city parades.

Giovanna Aquia Blatterman, whose husband used to dance with Pelosi at neighborhood church dances, said residents are working to add Pelosi's name to a bocce court named for her father.

"She had a lot of time to watch and absorb, and it's paying off now," she Blatterman said..

Partying Dead Wake Up The Democrats (WP)

By J. Freedom DuLac, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Do Democrats have more fun? At the end of her own triumphal celebration concert Thursday night, newly sworn-in House Speaker Nancy Pelosi asked that very question.

This being a fete for the Democrats, most of the approximately 1,200 attendees at the National Building Museum fundraiser answered affirmatively. Guess they weren't dead, after all!

Just a couple of hours earlier, several surviving members of the Grateful Dead were onstage, performing some of the psychedelic jam band's best-known songs in front of a buttoned-up audience: legislators, donors, activists, advisers, "just friends" who sat lifelessly during the first of two sets. One exception was the Deadhead who finally jumped out of his gilded seat near the back of the room and did the overbite-boogie during the shuffling hit "Touch of Grey." He was met with more than a few incredulous stares. (Turns out that fun is not a partisan concept. It might, however, be a relatively foreign idea in the starchy, scripted realm of modern national politics.)

DOJ_NMG_0113972

But it wouldn't take an act of Congress to get the guarded group to loosen up, just an irresistible polyrhythmic groove. When the Dead survivors and a few of their musician friends -- collectively dubbed Your House Band for the occasion -- performed the decades-old New Orleans anthem "Iko Iko," the crowd snapped to and the party finally felt like, well . . . a party. A strange-looking party, to be sure: the bearded counterculture icon and Dead co-founder Bob Weir sporting a coat and tie and looking like a classics professor, a most perplexing image.

Still, even Pelosi was able to let her hair down by standing up and dancing in place during "Iko Iko." No need to worry about any sort of YouTube embarrassment; Madam Speaker, at 66, can dance just fine. Certainly well enough that the producers' script noted that Pelosi and her husband, Paul, were to "remain on stage and perhaps dance" during a closing ensemble performance of the tune "You've Got a Friend." Which they did.

Though the $1,000-per-ticket fundraiser was billed as a concert -- Pelosipalooza if you will -- you do not necessarily attend such gatherings for their artistic merits. The 12-story atrium in which the concert was staged was an echo chamber, and the performances were largely predictable, with the musicians sticking to the hits and to the script. (You didn't really expect a free-form Dead show, did you? With epic drum solos and long stretches of improvisational guitar noodling and obscure songs they haven't performed since that show at Winterland way back when? And "spacecakes" at the dessert buffet?)

There was the elegant Tony Bennett crooning "I Left My Heart in San Francisco" in a nod to California's 8th District, which Pelosi represents. And the great singer-songwriter Carole King, sounding a little parched but peeling off three classics at a Steinway grand piano: "Sweet Seasons," "I Feel the Earth Move" and "(You Make Me Feel Like) A Natural Woman." (Even the hunky actor Richard Gere was spotted singing the latter's refrain.)

Some, but not all, of the songs packed political messages -- not least the two performed by Bruce Hornsby, a former Dead collaborator who sat in with Your House Band. "The End of the Innocence," co-authored by Hornsby and Don Henley in 1987, was a protest song about President Reagan, what with its reference to the "tired old man that we elected king" and allusions to military might and shrinking farm subsidies. And "The Way It Is," performed solo at a Steinway grand piano, addressed racial inequity.

In fact, there was much buzz about inclusion right up until the night ended at 10:30, with speakers -- and the House speaker -- talking about providing representation to the underrepresented, about diversity. And yet the stage was filled with white men, save for King, rapper Wyclef Jean and a few sidemen.

Jean was the lineup's lone nod to youth (most of the performers were nearly twice his age, if not older), and he was also its wild card, prone to onstage unpredictability. In that regard, he didn't disappoint, first demanding that the crowd sit down, post-"Iko Iko," and listen to an a cappella rap he'd written for the occasion. The verse probably marked the first time in hip-hop history that Pelosi, Barack Obama and North Korea were mentioned over the course of 16 bars. Jean also rhymed in Spanish, Japanese and French and Hebrew before performing three covers: the hymnal "Rivers of Babylon," Bob Marley's "Redemption Song" and the old soca smash "Hot Hot Hot."

Jean mentioned Pelosi's name repeatedly during the songs -- several dozen times in all -- and riffed on the price of oil before jumping offstage to dance with Pelosi during "Hot Hot Hot," their impromptu pas de deux captured by a house video camera and flashed onto an oversize screen behind the stage. And at least for that moment, anyway, yes, the resurgent Democrats were having more fun.

Giddy Sea Of Fresh Faces In The Capitol, United By A Serious Mission (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — Hours after casting his first votes in Congress, Representative Zack Space still beamed with excitement on Thursday, showing off the identification card that doubles as an electronic balloting device.

“I had to ask someone how to use it,” he said, proudly whisking the card out of its carrying case as he gave his family a tour of the Capitol.

Back in his office, a new receptionist apologized for hanging up on someone who called. “Sorry, second day on the job,” she chirped.

Even before his arrival in Washington this week, Mr. Space, 45, typified the incoming freshman class: A Democrat from Ohio, he campaigned hard on the issue of ethics reform in a race to succeed Representative Bob Ney, who pleaded guilty in a corruption case. Despite his political inexperience — and the fact that Democratic officials considered him one of their weakest candidates — Mr. Space beat his Republican rival, in an increasingly Republican district, 62 percent to 38 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0113973

Now, he is one of 66 new members of the 110th Congress, part of a historic Democratic tide that swept Republicans from power after a dozen years and left President Bush on the defensive.

Although Mr. Space at times exudes a certain good-natured goofiness — his campaign Web logo featured a starry rendering of outer space, and one of his mottos is a riff on his father's first name, Socrates ("being the son of Socrates, Zack Space knows a thing or two about ethics") — he has a mission of the utmost seriousness in Congress. On Thursday, his first day, before all his boxes were unpacked and his shared apartment furnished, Mr. Space was given a high-profile role in introducing his party's ethics reform package.

"The winds of change have brought me here," Mr. Space said in his first speech on the House floor, arguing in favor of the package. "The time to act is now. We have an extraordinary burden to prove to those who have given us this honor. We must make clear to them that we are representing their interests, not bartering legislative favors in order to gain gifts and trips."

On the other side of the Capitol dome, the incoming senators will not cast their first votes until next week (and the first one, a resolution honoring the late President Gerald R. Ford, will not exactly cause heartburn). Their transition will take longer in other ways: new senators are housed in temporary offices in the basement, while administrators try to establish which sitting senators intend to move.

That left freshman Senator Jon Tester, a Democrat who previously lived on an 1,800-acre ranch in Montana, squeezed into a small space in the bowels of the Dirksen Senate Office Building. In the office of Senator James Webb, Democrat of Virginia, the phone system was so problem-plagued that his line remained busy for hours on end.

But the wave of newcomers was most palpable in the House, where the dozens of arrivals circulated through welcome parties, herded their families on tours and waited in long lines to have their photographs taken with Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the new House speaker. Representative Carol Shea Porter, a New Hampshire Democrat who won an upset victory, let out an audible gasp when she set foot on the House floor the first time, said her chief of staff, Harry Gural.

"Walking in was a little bit like walking into the lights of Yankee Stadium, going out onto the field as a player rather than a spectator," Mr. Gural said.

The cable network channel C-Span chronicled even the most anonymous new members, setting up a camera position in the Cannon House Office Building to lure members of the freshman class into interviews.

"So far, so good," said Representative Mazie K. Hirono, Democrat of Hawaii (and one of two new Buddhist members of the Congress), as she concluded her 15 minutes of C-Span.

Ms. Hirono had a press schedule, but little else: unable to buy office gear until she was sworn in, the newest Democrat from the farthest state was working without computers.

Unlike earlier eras, when newcomers simply showed up in Washington and had to fend for themselves, freshmen now undergo a series of orientation programs in the weeks between Election Day and the swearing-in.

"It's much different than when I came here. You were on your own," said Representative George Miller, a California Democrat now in his 17th term.

Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts and another House lifer, offered the freshmen some advice: Learn time management, and how to resist invitations to social events.

"The default answer when people ask you to do things should be 'no,' " Mr. Frank said.

Then there is the issue of housing, always tricky for members of Congress who are in Washington on weekdays but at home in their districts most weekends. Mr. Space and his new roommate, Representative Michael Arcuri of New York, moved into their "small, subterranean" apartment earlier in the week, an arrangement prompted in part by Mr. Arcuri's fondness for Mr. Space's Greek cooking. By Friday, they still appeared to be getting along.

And Mr. Space, grinning as he wandered the halls, had not grown disillusioned by Washington, he said, nor strayed from his pledges.

"Not yet," he said, when asked if he had broken any campaign promises. Then he corrected himself. "I mean — no."

New Congress Brings Along Religious Firsts (WP)

By Jonathan Tilove, Religion News Service

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

The new Congress, for the first time, includes a Muslim, two Buddhists, more Jews than Episcopalians and the highest-ranking Mormon in congressional history.

Roman Catholics remain the largest single faith group in Congress, accounting for 29 percent of all members of the House and Senate, followed by Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Jews and Episcopalians.

DOJ_NMG_0113974

While Catholics in Congress are almost 2-to-1 Democrats, the most lopsidedly Democratic groups are Jews and those not affiliated with a religion. Of the 43 Jewish members of Congress, there is only one Jewish Republican in the House and two in the Senate. The six religiously unaffiliated members of the House are all Democrats.

The most Republican groups are the small band of Christian Scientists in the House (all five are Republican) and members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (12 Republicans and three Democrats) -- though the top-ranking Mormon is Nevada Sen. Harry M. Reid, the new Democratic majority leader.

Baptists generally divide along partisan lines defined by race. Most black Baptists are Democrats, while most white Baptists are Republicans. Notable exceptions include House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) and Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.), president pro tem in the new Senate, both white Baptists.

Because 2006 was such a good year for Democrats, they have regained their commanding advantage among Catholics, which had slipped during an era of GOP dominance. In Pennsylvania alone, five new Democrats, all Catholics, were elected to Congress in November, including Robert P. Casey Jr., who defeated Sen. Rick Santorum, a far more conservative Catholic.

In the new Congress, two-thirds of all Catholic members will be Democrats. By contrast, after big Republican gains in 1994, 44 percent of Catholic members of Congress were Republican, according to Albert Menendez, a writer and researcher who has been counting the religious affiliation of members of Congress since 1972.

"It's a thankless task, but somebody's got to do it," said Menendez, 64, who lives in North Potomac and has published his counts and analysis first with Americans United for Separation of Church and State and more recently in Voice of Reason, the newsletter of Americans for Religious Liberty. He is also the author of several books, including "Religion at the Polls" (1977), "John F. Kennedy: Catholic and Humanist" (1979) and "Evangelicals at the Ballot Box" (1996).

Menendez bases his count on how lawmakers identify themselves. When he did his first tally after the 1972 election, Congress was still much in the sway of a few mainline Christian faiths. At the time, just three mainline Protestant denominations -- Methodists, Presbyterians and Episcopalians -- accounted for 43 percent of all members of Congress, including 51 senators. Come January, those three will account for just a fifth of Congress, including 32 senators. Still, all three -- especially Episcopalians and Presbyterians -- continue to be better represented on Capitol Hill than among the general population.

Other historically important Christian denominations have suffered steep declines in Congress. Menendez said the Lyndon B. Johnson landslide of 1964 brought 14 Unitarians to Washington. In the new Congress, there are two -- Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.) and Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.). In the late 1960s, there were 29 members of the United Church of Christ in Congress, but in the new Congress, there will be only six, including Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who joined the church as an adult. (Obama's Kenyan father was from a Muslim background and his American mother's parents were non-practicing Baptist and Methodist.)

Through it all, Lutherans have maintained. Menendez said they were underrepresented relative to their population in 1972, with 16 members of Congress, and remain underrepresented today with 17. While their total numbers have held steady, their political allegiance has flipped from 2-to-1 Republican to 2-to-1 Democrat.

Evangelical Christians -- a category that cuts across denominational lines -- are even more underrepresented, according to Furman University political scientist James L. Guth, all the more so after this year's defeat of Republican incumbents such as Reps. John N. Hostettler of Indiana and Jim Ryun of Kansas.

But perhaps the most underrepresented group in Congress is the 14 percent of all American adults who, according to the 2001 American Religious Identification Survey, conducted by scholars at the Graduate Center at the City University of New York, claim no religion at all. Only six members of Congress, all Democrats, identify themselves as religiously unaffiliated: Reps. John F. Tierney and John W. Olver of Massachusetts, Earl Blumenauer of Oregon, Neil Abercrombie of Hawaii, Tammy Baldwin of Wisconsin and Mark Udall of Colorado.

Jews have continued to gain representation in Congress -- 8 percent in the new Congress -- even as their share of the national population has waned (1.3 percent in 2001). But Jewish numbers in Congress also tend to fluctuate with Democratic fortunes. In a year in which Democrats did well in unexpected places, new Jewish members of Congress were elected this fall from Tennessee, Kentucky, Arizona and New Hampshire, as well as the more familiar terrain of Florida and Wisconsin.

For Buddhists and Muslims, the 110th Congress represents their first congressional representation.

The two Buddhist Democrats -- Reps. Mazie K. Hirono of Hawaii and Hank Johnson of Georgia -- both have avoided talking about their religion, saying it is a private matter.

A spokesman for Hirono, who came to Hawaii with her mother from Japan when she was 8, would only confirm that Hirono was raised in the tradition of her mother's Jodo Shu Buddhism.

A spokesman for Johnson would only confirm that he became a Buddhist about 30 years ago and is affiliated with Soka Gakkai International, an American Buddhist association.

Like Johnson, Keith Ellison of Minnesota, the first Muslim elected to Congress, is a convert and African American. Raised Catholic, he converted to Islam at 19 while attending Wayne State University .

DOJ_NMG_0113975

"The election of this first Muslim is quite important symbolically," said John Green, director of the Ray C. Bliss Institute of Applied Politics at the University of Akron. "It may very well be the harbinger of greater acceptance of Muslims in the future."

Bush's Tax Legacy (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

In his op-ed column on these pages this week, President Bush made some news by underscoring his opposition to raising taxes. We were certainly glad to hear it, and to publish it, because by our lights the tax cuts and economic growth that has followed are his most notable domestic achievements (give or take a Supreme Court Justice).

That growth was underscored again with yesterday's buoyant jobs and income report for December. Job growth exceeding expectations at 167,000 and the jobless rate held at a very low 4.5%, despite a slowdown in manufacturing and construction. Since the Bush tax cuts on dividends and capital gains passed in mid-2003, the economy has created 7.2 million new jobs according to the survey of business establishments, and an additional 1.2 million in the more variable household survey.

As for the inevitable political complaints that these new jobs are all lousy, average hourly non-supervisory wages have now climbed 4.2% over the past 12 months, or twice the official rate of inflation. With flat or falling energy prices, and a tight labor market, real wages are also starting to show impressive gains.

Meanwhile, tax revenues continue to roll into the Treasury and state coffers. Federal receipts rose by 14.6% in fiscal 2005, another 11.8% in 2006, and kept rising by 9% in this year's first two months despite slower GDP growth. The budget deficit, in turn, has fallen by $165 billion in two years, and including state surpluses is now down to about 1% of GDP, which as an economic matter is negligible. Tax revenues as a share of the economy are also back above 18.5%, which is their modern historical norm.

This record is so impressive that liberal critics have been forced to ignore it and focus on other alleged outrages, such as "inequality," or CEO pay, or some vague prediction of future doom. And, yes, the future is unpredictable. But in the field of economics there are few more definitive tests than the results from the tax cuts of 2003. Critics predicted disaster, supporters the opposite, and the supporters can point to more than three years of prosperity as vindication -- despite $70 oil and $3 gasoline, and lately despite the worst housing slowdown in 15 years.

However, those lower tax rates are set to expire at the end of 2010, and the Democrats who now control Congress want them repealed. The "pay-as-you-go" rules that the House just passed would make their extension all but impossible. What this means is that if Congress merely fails to act, the tax cuts expire and the economy will be hit with one of the largest tax increases in history in 2010.

The dividend rate would snap back to 39.6% from 15%, the capital gains rate to 20% from 15%, and the top marginal income tax rate to 39.6% from 35%. Marginal and average tax rates for the middle class would also increase, returning to the Clinton-era levies that had driven taxes as a share of GDP to a postwar high of 20.9%.

Now in the minority on Capitol Hill, Republicans can't do much about this. But it certainly poses a dilemma for Democrats -- all the more so because they must also cope with the rising burden of the Alternative Minimum Tax. The AMT -- created by Democrats in 1969 to capture a few millionaires -- will engulf some 23 million taxpayers this year without a change in law.

This week, the new Democratic Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Montana's Max Baucus, called the AMT a "monster in the tax code" and introduced a bill to repeal it. The only catch: Under Congress's wacky "static revenue" analysis of calculating the impact of tax cuts, AMT repeal would "cost" the Treasury as much as $1.2 trillion over 10 years. Maybe they can find that much in Congressman William Jefferson's freezer.

Our guess is that Democrats will try to finesse all this in the near term. With President Bush now saying he'll oppose a tax increase, they'll be wary of voting for one that would be vetoed and provide Republicans with an issue in 2008. So perhaps they'll try a one- or two-year AMT fix to get them past 2008, while waiting for their Presidential nominee to advance a more detailed tax proposal. Most likely, that would involve a pledge to keep the lower Bush rates for the "middle class," while raising rates on "the rich."

Bill Clinton played that tune all the way to the Oval Office, only to raise taxes on everybody once he got there. It'll be fascinating to see if voters give his wife, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, the same leave if she's the Democratic nominee. In any event, what we seem headed for is a two-year national donnybrook over taxes and income that will be decided by the voters in November 2008.

Monkey On A Tiger (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

Washington

DOJ_NMG_0113976

There was a touch of parody to the giddy Democrat takeover this week: Nancy Pelosi indulging her inner Haight-Ashbury and dipping the Capitol in tie-dye, sashaying around with the Grateful Dead, Wyclef Jean, Carole King, Richard Gere, feminists and a swarm of well-connected urchins.

The first act of House Democrats who promised to govern with bipartisan comity was imperiously banishing Republicans from participating in the initial round of lawmaking. Even if Republicans were brutes during their reign, Democrats should have shown more class, letting the whiny minority party offer some stupid amendments that would lose.

Perhaps the Democrats' power-shift into overdrive is a neurological disorder, or neuropolitical disorder.

If free will is an illusion — if we are, as one philosopher put it, "nothing more than sophisticated meat machines," doomed to repeat the same mistakes over and over — that would explain a lot about the latest trend in which everyone is reverting to type.

William James wrote in 1890 that the whole "sting and excitement" of life comes from "our sense that in it things are really being decided from one moment to another, and that it is not the dull rattling off of a chain that was forged innumerable ages ago."

But in Science Times this week, Dennis Overbye advised Dr. James to "get over it," observing that "a bevy of experiments in recent years suggest that the conscious mind is like a monkey riding a tiger of subconscious decisions and actions in progress, frantically making up stories about being in control."

As Mark Hallett of the National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke told Mr. Overbye, "Free will does exist, but it's a perception, not a power or a driving force. ... The more you scrutinize it, the more you realize you don't have it."

That would explain why, after voters insisted that the president wrap it up in Iraq, he made a big show of pretending to listen, then decided to do a war do-over.

Is this just the baked-in stubbornness of one man, or is W.'s behavior evidence that he has no free will? Is the Decider freely choosing another huge blunder or is he taking instructions from his genetic and political coding, fearing that if he admits what a foul hash he's made of Iraq, he'll be labeled a wimp, as his dad was?

If W. is trapped on a tiger, he's not the only one.

John McCain can't get beyond seeing himself as a maverick now that he's become a nonmaverick, a right-wing Republican urging an escalation of a hopeless war, even though he's already lived through an escalation of a hopeless war.

"There are two keys to any surge in U.S. troops," Senator McCain told an appreciative audience at the American Enterprise Institute yesterday. "It must be substantial, and it must be sustained."

With the letter she and Harry Reid wrote to the president yesterday, warning him that "we are well past the point of more troops for Iraq," Speaker Pelosi tried to exert her free will to stop the Surge. But the Democrats aren't willing to take real action and cut off money for the Surge. They're predetermined to want to have it both ways: not to be blamed for the war and not to be blamed for pulling the plug on the war.

Iraq has become a snake pit of factions failing to escape fate. Shiites and Sunnis have been fighting and killing each other for about 1,400 years over who was the rightful heir to Muhammad, and yet the entire American high command was somehow taken aback that Shiites and Sunnis can't muster the free will to keep their country from disintegrating.

Could it have been kismet that there were Shiites taunting Saddam at his hanging? Maybe it was preordained back in the days when Alexander Graham Bell invented the telephone and the British diplomat Gertrude Bell drew the boundaries of the modern Iraq that a security guy with a cellphone would capture the spectacle.

Despite all the talk back in the 2000 campaign about a robustly experienced foreign-policy dream team, it may have been destined that the Bush administration would be asleep in the run-up to the insurgency, just as it was asleep in the run-up to 9/11, to Katrina, to the occupation and to the refugee crisis in Iraq. Either all that was predetermined, or the administration was preternaturally negligent.

Arthur Schopenhauer, the German philosopher who said a man can do what he wants but cannot will what he wants, would have understood W.'s nonsensical urge to Surge.

We don't know if human beings have free will. We just know that human beings in Washington appear not to.

Can Bush's Tax Cuts Survive? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

Can Congress balance the budget if it keeps the tax cuts in place? In the short term, maybe. But it won't be easy. White House forecasts show a $127 billion shortfall in 2011. Making the tax cuts permanent while balancing the budget will require sharp spending cuts, which likely will cause even many congressional Republicans to balk. President Bush's efforts to constrain spending in the past have had little effect, in part because of the costs of homeland security and the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, and in part because of resistance from members of Congress. Now that Democrats are in control, the resistance from Congress is likely to be greater.

DOJ_NMG_0113977

In the long term, the task gets even more difficult, due to Baby Boomers retiring and the resulting explosion in Social Security and Medicare costs. Social Security and Medicare trustees estimate the Social Security fund will go into deficit in 2017 and its trust fund will run out of money by 2040. Medicare ran a deficit in 2004 (but not in 2005 due to a surge in tax revenue) and estimates show its trust fund will be depleted by 2018.

Are there other tax cuts or tax increases being considered? On the tax-cut front, both parties have expressed support for permanent changes to repair the Alternative Minimum Tax. It was designed to prevent the wealthy from evading taxes but increasingly has snared upper-middle-class taxpayers because it was never indexed for inflation. The AMT is projected to bring in $1 trillion over the next decade. The passage of "pay-go" legislation by the House Friday could add an extra hurdle because it requires any new tax-cut or entitlement legislation to be offset by increased revenue or decreased spending to prevent the deficit from growing larger still.

As for tax increases, Democrats have proposed eliminating tax breaks for oil companies and more aggressive measures to crack down on tax evasion.

-- Nick Timiraos

FACTS

The War of 1812 prompted the first sales taxes on gold, silverware, jewelry and watches. Congress enacted the first income-tax law in 1862 to help fund the Civil War. It was eliminated in 1872, but a new income tax was created on the eve of World War I.

About half of newly elected Democratic members of congress support repealing tax cuts for the wealthiest tax bracket now rather than waiting for the provisions to expire.

When World War II ended, taxpayers with incomes of more than $1 million faced a top tax rate of 94% on each additional dollar earned. In most cases, taxable income for 2006 of more than $336,550 faced a top federal income-tax rate of 35%.

The national debt stands at $8.6 trillion and interest on that debt grew 23% last year, the fastest-growing part of the federal budget.

POINTS OF VIEW

"Now is not the time to raise taxes on the American people."

--President George W. Bush

"We are mortgaging [our children's] futures for a tax break that benefits those who need it least."

-- House Speaker Nancy Pelosi

A Heckuva Claim (WP)

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Mr. Bush is oblivious to the consequences of his tax cuts.

PRESIDENT BUSH wrote in a Wall Street Journal op-ed Wednesday that "it is also a fact that our tax cuts have fueled robust economic growth and record revenues." The claim about fueling record revenue is flat wrong, and it is shocking that the president should persist in making such errors. After all, tax cuts are the central plank of his domestic policy. How can he fail to understand the basic facts about them?

This is not just our opinion. Harvard's N. Gregory Mankiw, an economic conservative who served as chairman of Mr. Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, has tested the hypothesis on which Mr. Bush's claim is based: He looked at the extent to which tax cuts stimulate extra growth and the extent to which that growth generates extra tax revenue that offsets the initial loss of revenue from the tax cut. Mr. Mankiw's conclusion: Even over the long term, once you've allowed all of the extra growth to feed through into extra revenue, cuts in capital taxes juice the economy enough to recoup half of the lost revenue, and cuts in income taxes deliver a boost that recoups 17 percent of the lost revenue. So a $100 billion cut in taxes on capital widens the budget deficit by $50 billion, and a $100 billion cut in income taxes widens the budget deficit by $83 billion.

If Mr. Bush does not believe Mr. Mankiw, perhaps he may believe the Congressional Budget Office. In a period when it was run by Douglas Holtz-Eakin, another economic conservative who worked in Mr. Bush's White House, the CBO estimated the extent to which a 10 percent reduction in personal taxes might pay for itself. On the most optimistic assumptions it could muster, the CBO found that tax cuts would stimulate enough economic growth to replace 22 percent of lost revenue in the first five years and 32 percent in the second five. On pessimistic assumptions, the growth effects of tax cuts did nothing to offset revenue loss.

If Mr. Bush believes neither Mr. Mankiw nor the Congressional Budget Office, he should at least respect his own Treasury. Prodded by the White House, Treasury economists have calculated how much extra growth would result from making the Bush tax cuts permanent. They have concluded that economic output would rise by about 0.5 percent in the first six years and by an additional 0.2 percent in the "long term." Since the federal government collects around 18 percent of gross domestic product in taxes, enlarging GDP by 0.7 percent would result in extra tax revenue equivalent to 0.13 percent of GDP. That would offset less than a tenth of the revenue that would be lost because of the tax cuts.

DOJ_NMG_0113978

Mr. Bush's op-ed included nice statements about bipartisan cooperation. But the Democrats would be more likely to cooperate with the president if he stopped making things up.

Bill On Medicare Drug Cost Is Called Weak Medicine (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

A provision undercuts the legislation's effort to get manufacturers to offer deals, critics say.

WASHINGTON — The bill that House Democrats unveiled Friday to lower drug prices for the elderly contains a provision that could make it difficult — or maybe even impossible — to achieve its goal, some critics said.

The legislation would direct the federal government to use its huge market power to bargain for lower prices with drug manufacturers on behalf of some 23 million seniors enrolled in the Medicare prescription program.

But a provision in the bill would explicitly prohibit the government from creating a list of approved drugs, known as a formulary — thus taking away a powerful lever commonly used in such pricing negotiations. Fear of not being included on such a list of approved drugs is one of the principal reasons manufacturers agree to lower prices.

"If you don't have the power to bump a drug off the formulary, you have no negotiating clout," said Robert Laszewski, a health policy consultant to insurers and other healthcare companies. "Any good capitalist will tell you that you can't negotiate with somebody unless there is the expectation that you may not purchase their product."

Under the Medicare prescription system, benefits are provided by private insurance companies, which rely on lists of approved drugs to negotiate price cuts. Premiums that the elderly pay to the private companies are heavily subsidized by the government.

The program was designed by Republicans and passed in 2003 over bitter opposition from most Democrats, in part because it prohibited the government from negotiating price cuts. Freeing the government's hands was high on the list of actions Democrats had vowed to take when they gained control of Congress.

It's unclear how the apparent concession to industry will affect the political fortunes of the bill. It may help to blunt some arguments against it from critics who say that the government would be dictating prices and therefore reducing access to medicines. However, the concession seems unlikely to win over the drug industry.

"This is a trade-off," said a House Democratic leadership aide, who could not be identified because he is not authorized to talk to the press. "We felt we couldn't go as far as Veterans Affairs does, where they actually take drugs off the formulary."

The VA is known for driving tough deals on drug prices, but it covers many fewer medications than the typical Medicare plan.

AARP, one of the main groups supporting the Democratic bill, acknowledged Friday that the measure would bar the use of a potent bargaining tactic. "It takes one tool away, but that's not the whole story here," said David Certner, federal affairs director for the influential seniors group.

The government could use other approaches — such as higher co-pays for drugs from companies that refuse to offer discounts — to achieve much the same effect, he said. AARP is launching an advertising campaign in support of the bill.

"Arguing that the only tool you have is to say 'We're going to drop you off the list' is not correct," added Certner.

Another bill supporter defended the concession. "If that provision wasn't in there, the drug companies would probably be going nuts," added Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, a liberal group that advocates for healthcare overhaul. "It makes it politically palatable without harming the intent of giving the [administration] the obligation to bargain."

The House is scheduled to vote Friday on the legislation, whose prospects are unclear. The Senate is expected to move more slowly and draft its own legislation. Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), who leads the committee that would write the bill, has opposed allowing the government to negotiate drug prices.

If a bill emerges from Congress, President Bush might well veto it. Most Republicans consider government price controls anathema, and their party has also received strong support from the drug industry, which channeled most of its campaign contributions to GOP candidates in November's congressional elections.

Business groups were unimpressed with Democrats' no-formulary provision. "I'm not convinced it leads anywhere," said R. Bruce Josten, a top lobbyist for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, which has set defeat of the bill as one of its main legislative goals.

The bill would still put the government "in a godlike position on pricing," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0113979

The House bill would require the Health and Human Services Department to negotiate prices on behalf of the Medicare program, and report to Congress on its progress. Individual Medicare plans would be free to bargain for deeper discounts, and could restrict the number of drugs they offer.

Strong Medicine (WSJ)

By Philip K. Howard

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

Skyrocketing health-care costs are a looming national tragedy, but cannot be contained without restoring reliability to the justice system. America spends over $6,300 per person on health care each year, almost twice that of other Western countries; the overall expenditures on health care, $1.9 trillion, are rising annually at 8%. But the care here is on average no better than in countries that spend half as much.

There are a number of forces contributing to this higher cost -- including government mandates and lack of market discipline. One of the largest drivers of excess costs, however, is American justice -- or more accurately distrust of American justice. Fear of erratic jury decisions in medical malpractice cases has spawned a culture of fear, causing inefficiencies that infect every level of medicine.

Any sick person who gets sicker can drag a doctor through years of litigation -- an average of five years to resolve a claim. A jury can render a verdict that bears no relation to accepted medical standards or, indeed, the results of prior cases. It is not that most juries are unwise: Overall, according to a recent Harvard study, the error rate in this system is about 25%. But playing Russian roulette with one bullet in four chambers is not a source of comfort to most doctors. Meanwhile, payment to patients who deserve it may take years, with the attorney taking up to 40% of the award.

The direct costs of the malpractice system, about $28 billion a year, are only the tip of the iceberg. Defensive medicine -- the practice of ordering the procedures and tests that are not clinically indicated -- is ubiquitous, according to a recent study in Pennsylvania, practiced by over 90% of physicians. It's hard to calculate the total cost of defensive medicine, but estimates start at the tens of billions and go up from there.

Extra tests are not the worst inefficiency. Hospitals often operate like slow motion zones: No choice can occur without stacks of forms and disclosures with multiple witnesses -- all designed to "build a record" in case there's a bad outcome. End-of-life care is often as inhumane as it is costly, as nursing homes send the aged to die in intensive care units, poked with needles and strapped to machines sounding alarms instead of holding the hands of loved ones in quiet comfort.

Restoring trust in American justice can't be accomplished by tweaking this system. A functioning system of justice must aspire to deliberate choices, binding from one case to the next. Reliability is critical. Providers must know what's expected of them and must trust the system to distinguish good care from bad care. What's needed is something entirely new: specialized health-care courts.

This country has a long history of expert courts in areas that require technical knowledge or special expertise. At the time of the Constitution there were admiralty courts; today we have bankruptcy courts, tax courts, patent courts and a wide range of specialized tribunals in areas ranging from workers compensation to vaccine liability.

A proposal for expert health courts has been developed in a joint venture of Common Good (a nonprofit organization) and the Harvard School of Public Health. It promises to restore reliability and foster confidence by incorporating the following features:

There would be no juries. Instead, specially trained administrative judges, advised by neutral experts paid for by the court -- not by lawyers for either side -- would make decisions and write opinions on standards of care.

A liberalized standard of recovery would provide compensation to injured patients based on whether the injury should have been avoidable. Someone who comes into the hospital with pneumonia and comes out with a staph infection, for example, should be able to recover without having to prove how it happened.

An individual injured by malpractice would receive 100% of his or her actual monetary losses, including future lost income -- but damages for pain and suffering would be paid according to a preset schedule depending on the injury. This is how people are compensated in other countries. And expedited procedures, including mandatory disclosure by defendants, would ensure quick resolution or disputes, avoiding the monetary and psychological costs of drawn-out proceedings.

The advantages of a specialized health court are enormous. A court that writes opinions based on accepted medical standards can provide affirmative guidelines for improving care. The incentives for defensive medicine will be sharply reduced, and a culture of trust will restore the candor needed to avoid tragic errors. Patients will receive settlements much sooner, paying only a fraction of what they now pay in legal fees. Most importantly, reliability will provide a foundation to restore order to health care, including defending reasonable choices to contain costs.

DOJ_NMG_0113980

A broad coalition of safety experts, health-care providers and consumer groups such as AARP have come together to call for pilot projects of special health courts. Six major hospitals, including New York Presbyterian and Johns Hopkins, have volunteered to participate in the pilot. Several states are considering sponsoring an experiment, and a bipartisan bill to fund them, co-sponsored by Sens. Mike Enzi (R., Wyo.) and Max Baucus (D., Mt.) has been introduced.

The sticking point is the opposition of the trial lawyers, who insist that juries, and only juries, must make the final decision. But the civil jury was never supposed to decide standards of care as a matter of law; it is intended to resolve disputed facts. In any case, as noted, this country has a long history of special courts and tribunals without juries where the purpose, as here, is to improve the reliability and effectiveness of justice.

None of our aspirations for American healthcare -- better safety, affordability, even empathy -- can be realized as long as providers go through the day looking over their shoulders instead of doing what they think is right. The only way to overcome this distrust, and all its debilitating errors and waste, is to create a special health court that is trustworthy.

Mr. Howard, a lawyer and author, is chair of Common Good. More information on health courts can be found at www.cgood.org1.

Boxer To Chair Ethics In Johnson's Absence (RC)

RollCall.com, January 5, 2007

With Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) still recovering from brain surgery last month, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) will tap Environment and Public Works Chairwoman Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) to temporarily take the reins of the chamber's Ethics Committee, Reid said late Friday.

"Sen. Boxer will take the chair ... until [Johnson] comes back," Reid said, a move that will allow the committee to convene before Johnson returns to work. Democratic aides said Friday that Reid's decision also is being driven in part by the fact that the Senate will take up its ethics reform package next week, and while Reid and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) are the primary sponsors, the move will allow Boxer and ranking member John Cornyn (R-Texas) to help manage the debate over the next two weeks.

Under Ethics Committee rules, an even number of Republican and Democratic Members are needed to conduct business. Additionally, unlike authorizing and appropriations committees, the Ethics Committee does not allow its members to vote by proxy if they are unable to attend a vote.

Memo Says White House Visitors Can't Be Named (AP)

By Pete Yost, The Associated Press

AP, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON - The White House and the Secret Service quietly signed an agreement last spring in the midst of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal declaring that records identifying visitors to the White House are not open to the public.

The Bush administration didn't reveal the existence of the memorandum of understanding until last fall. The White House is using it to deal with a legal problem on a separate front, a ruling by a federal judge ordering the production of Secret Service logs identifying visitors to the office of Vice President Dick Cheney.

In a federal appeals court filing three weeks ago, the administration's lawyers used the memo in a legal argument aimed at overturning the judge's ruling. The Washington Post is suing for access to the Secret Service logs.

The five-page document dated May 17 declares that all entry and exit data on White House visitors belongs to the White House as presidential records rather than to the Secret Service as agency records. Therefore, the agreement states, the material is not subject to public disclosure under the Freedom of Information Act.

In the past, Secret Service logs have revealed the comings and goings of various White House visitors, including Monica Lewinsky and Clinton campaign donor Denise Rich, the wife of fugitive financier Marc Rich, who received a pardon in the closing hours of the Clinton administration.

The memo last spring was signed by the White House and Secret Service the day after a Washington-based group asked a federal judge to impose sanctions on the Secret Service in a dispute over White House visitor logs for Abramoff.

The chief counsel to another Washington-based group suing to get Secret Service logs calls the creation of the memo "a political maneuver couched as a legal one."

"It appears the White House is actually manufacturing evidence to further its own agenda," Anne Weismann, a Justice Department lawyer for 19 years and now chief counsel to Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, said Friday.

Federal courts ultimately will decide whether records identifying White House visitors and who they are going to see are public record.

DOJ_NMG_0113981

Court Was Once Cloistered; Now Its Chief Does "Nightline" (WP)

By Robert Barnes, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

The "rare public address" by a member of the U.S. Supreme Court isn't so rare anymore.

Just in the past few months, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg has invited television interrogator Mike Wallace into her chambers for a well-mannered chat. Justice Antonin Scalia has turned up at a sold-out breakfast meeting of the Northern Virginia Technology Council and mixed it up with the American Civil Liberties Union, and he has publicly debated the Constitution with fellow justice -- but not kindred spirit -- Stephen G. Breyer. Breyer has promoted his book "Active Liberty" on "Fox News Sunday" with the other television interrogator named Wallace, Chris.

And this week, the court's longest-serving justice joined the crowd, as John Paul Stevens said in what was grandly billed as his first network television interview that he considered himself the same "moderate conservative" that President Gerald R. Ford appointed 31 years ago, even though he is now considered one of the court's reliable liberals.

"I don't really think I've changed," he told ABC's Jan Crawford Greenburg. "I think there have been a lot of changes in the court."

Stevens presumably was referring to the growing conservatism of Republican appointees to the court. But there has also been a change in the way justices, now led by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., 51, see their role both in explaining what they do and in fostering a public conversation about the judiciary, according to those who most carefully monitor the court.

"Even five years ago, it would have been astonishing" to see justices interviewed on Sunday-morning news talk shows, said Thomas C. Goldstein, a Supreme Court practitioner who started the popular Scotusblog.com. "The dam has broken on the justices' desire to stay behind the red curtain."

Goldstein says the change has been building since the court's controversial 5 to 4 Bush v. Gore decision, when justices "realized they had to do a better job explaining themselves."

Others say that Roberts, now in the middle of his second term, has become a more visible symbol of the court, especially because his predecessor, William H. Rehnquist, was in poor health for his final years on the court.

"There's a new chief justice and a new court for the first time in a long time," said Orin S. Kerr, a George Washington University law professor and former Supreme Court clerk who frequently comments about the court.

Roberts is "making himself open and present in the legal world," Kerr said. "It may be that he has an effect on the other justices."

Roberts seems comfortable with reporters. In the wide-ranging "Nightline" interview with Greenburg before University of Miami students in November, he covered his childhood in Indiana and his philosophy on the court: The more narrowly tailored the decision, the better. If it can be unanimous, even better.

He was properly self-deprecating about his selection. He told of racing to his house in Maryland from Dulles Airport because he had been told to expect a call from President Bush at a certain time. "The White House was a very efficient operation, and I'm sure if I wasn't there, they'd just go down the list and take whoever was next."

Just this term, Roberts has undertaken a series of beyond-the-Beltway speeches, in New York, Vermont, South Carolina and Florida. He has two more scheduled this month, in Chicago and Dallas.

It is difficult to prove conclusively that the justices are talking more, just as it is difficult to know how much they talked in the past. Partly out of court tradition, their offices do not routinely issue their schedules or publicize their remarks. (The last speech submitted to the court's Web site is an August address by Ginsburg in Turkey.) Justices have long given speeches to law classes and legal conferences and at overseas symposiums, sometimes noticed and sometimes not.

But those who follow the court closely say they have no doubt there has been a change.

"This court is more open and accessible in terms of interviews and public conversations than the court has ever been in its history," said University of Chicago law professor Dennis J. Hutchinson.

Hutchinson and others think the change they see is born of individuals: Justice Anthony M. Kennedy promotes citizen involvement in democracy; Scalia and Breyer are willing to debate their views of constitutional interpretation; and even the quiet Stevens has a new tendency to make news. Stevens said in December that he respected the court's decision that found flag burning to be protected free speech, even though he was on the losing side of that case more than a decade ago.

And, Hutchinson said, "Justice Roberts, in my view, is trying to put a human face on the court."

Part of the perception that justices are speaking out more can be attributed to the vitality of blogs and other publications by lawyers, professors and others that take note of almost any utterance from a justice and provide instant analysis.

DOJ_NMG_0113982

Some things don't change. Justice David H. Souter limits his remarks almost exclusively to the chambers, and Justice Clarence Thomas is averse to media interviews. Scalia has always spoken frequently outside the court, but the change is that he now is open to media coverage of the events.

He and Breyer offered their competing constitutional views in the debate co-sponsored by the American Constitution Society and the Federalist Society. Breyer says that "purpose" and "consequences" must be considered; Scalia looks for the original intent of the framers. Both now are careful not to talk about current issues before the court; in 2004, Scalia recused himself from a decision on the constitutionality of the phrase "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance, after speaking out on the case at a rally in Virginia.

Such considerations are an important part of a judge's impartiality but also underscore a justice's privilege to answer only questions that are welcome.

So Ginsburg in September was abrupt when Wallace attempted to ask her about one of the court's most enduringly controversial subjects. "Stop," she said. "We're not going to talk about abortion."

Race Discrimination Case Added To Docket (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

The Supreme Court yesterday added seven cases to its docket, including a discrimination case in which a Coca-Cola bottling company fired a black employee.

The lawsuit involves allegations that a supervisor of employee Stephen Peters was motivated by racial bias and influenced a human resources manager to fire the worker. Coca-Cola fired Peters for insubordination after he refused a request to work on a weekend during his scheduled days off.

A federal appeals court said that a federal judge who dismissed the case placed too much emphasis on the fact that Peters's immediate supervisor made no express recommendation to fire him.

Coca-Cola asked the Supreme Court to consider whether an employer may be held liable for intentional discrimination if the person who fired an employee harbored no discriminatory bias.

The case is BCI Coca-Cola Bottling Co. of Los Angeles v. EEOC, No. 06-341.

The court also agreed to consider the interaction of two federal laws, the Endangered Species Act and the Clean Water Act, which set out different standards for federal agencies to protect endangered species.

The case is National Association of Home Builders et al. v. Defenders of Wildlife et al., No. 06-340.

Justices To Consider School Sports Rules (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

The high court will take up athlete recruiting, home-care worker pay and stock fraud cases.

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court agreed Friday to referee a high school sports dispute over whether coaches have a free-speech right to recruit athletes from other schools.

Last year, a federal appeals court threw out a $3,000 fine and a two-year suspension given to a Tennessee high school football powerhouse whose coach was accused of violating the state's anti-recruiting rule, which is similar to regulations around the country.

Coach Carlton Flatt of the private Brentwood Academy had sent letters and made phone calls to a dozen eighth-grade boys inviting them to spring practice at his school near Nashville.

After the state high school athletic association handed down its punishment, the academy sued in federal court alleging a violation of the 1st Amendment.

In a long-running legal battle, a federal judge as well as the appeals court sided with Brentwood Academy and said the coach's letters and calls were protected as free speech.

The Tennessee Secondary School Athletic Assn. appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that such a free-speech rule could wreak havoc in sports. Schools and coaches in sports leagues "agree to abide by the rules," and they cannot, for example, scream in a referee's face and then claim the protections of the 1st Amendment, the association said.

The justices met Friday for the first time since the Christmas holiday and voted to hear six new cases besides Tennessee Secondary School Athletic Assn. vs. Brentwood Academy.

In Long Island Care at Home vs. Osborne, the court will decide whether certain home-care workers are protected by the federal law that requires a minimum wage and overtime pay.

DOJ_NMG_0113983

Since the 1970s, the Labor Department has said home-care workers who provide companionship services to the elderly and infirm are generally not covered by the law.

But in August, a U.S. appeals court in New York rejected that exemption for home-care employees of outside companies.

The home-care industry, which appealed, said that the decision could greatly increase the cost of care for millions of people who are old, sick or disabled.

The court also will hear a potentially important discrimination case that tests whether companies can be held liable for racial bias by a low-level supervisor.

Stephen Peters, a black employee for Coca-Cola in New Mexico, sued the company after being fired, alleging he was a victim of racial discrimination.

Last year, the U.S. appeals court in Denver cleared his suit to go to trial, though its judges agreed that the regional manager in Phoenix who ordered the firing "had no idea that Mr. Peters was black." There was, however, evidence that his actual supervisor showed a bias against blacks and treated Peters unfairly.

The court agreed to hear the case, BCI Coca-Cola Bottling Co. of Los Angeles vs. the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, to clarify the law on handling discrimination complaints.

The justices also said they would consider making it harder to sue companies for stock fraud. Tellabs, a maker of telecommunications equipment, was sued by investors who said its executives had knowingly inflated its value.

A federal appeals court in Chicago cleared the suit to go forward, but the company appealed, arguing the plaintiffs lacked evidence that the executives knew their projections were wrong.

The case, Tellabs vs. Makor Issues & Rights, is the latest to test how much proof investors must produce before they can move forward with a stock fraud suit against a corporation.

The justices are to hear arguments in these cases in March or April and to issue rulings by late June.

Justices To Consider Impact Of Mental Illness On Death Penalty (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — The Supreme Court agreed on Friday to use the case of a schizophrenic death row inmate in Texas to set the standard for determining when a mental illness is so severe that execution would be constitutionally impermissible.

The question is not a new one for the court or for the criminal justice system, but it has come to the fore recently as a growing number of legal and mental health organizations have joined a call for a moratorium on executing those whose rational judgment has been significantly impaired, including their ability to appreciate why they have been sentenced to death.

The American Psychiatric Association has expressed specific concern about the competency standard used by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, which upheld the death sentence for the Texas inmate, Scott L. Panetti, in rejecting his petition for a writ of habeas corpus last May.

Mr. Panetti, convicted in 1992 of fatally shooting his in-laws in the presence of his estranged wife and their 3-year-old child, is a 48-year-old Navy veteran who was hospitalized 14 times for schizophrenia and other serious mental disorders in the decade before the crime. A jury nonetheless found him competent to stand trial, and the judge permitted him to represent himself.

The Supreme Court ruled in 1986 that the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment barred the execution of the mentally ill. But the justices who decided that case, Ford v. Wainwright, did not settle on a definition of mental illness for the purpose of determining competency for execution.

Most lower courts have adopted, as controlling, a separate opinion by Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., who said that the "retributive goal of the criminal law" was satisfied as long as defendants were aware of "the punishment they are about to suffer" and "why they are to suffer it."

The Fifth Circuit, which supervises the courts in Texas, Louisiana and Mississippi, has boiled this down to what it calls an "awareness" test. In Mr. Panetti's case, Panetti v. Quarterman, No. 06-6407, the appeals court found the test was satisfied because Mr. Panetti indicated that he understood the state's intention to execute him for killing his wife's parents. The fact that he also held the delusional belief that his execution was part of a conspiracy by which the state was trying to prevent him from preaching the Gospel was beside the point, the appeals court said.

In Mr. Panetti's appeal to the Supreme Court, his lawyers argue that the appeals court has distorted Justice Powell's meaning by failing to take the delusions into account. "The moral force of retribution is lost if an inmate believes that his execution is being carried out through a conspiracy of demonic forces rather than as a lawful punishment for a horrific crime," their brief argues.

DOJ_NMG_0113984

In a brief urging the justices to accept the appeal, the National Alliance on Mental Illness, an advocacy organization, said "this case exemplifies why mere 'awareness,' the test applied by the Fifth Circuit, is not a meaningful requirement for determining whether to execute prisoners who are severely mentally ill."

The brief said the test "makes no sense when applied to a prisoner who is plagued by delusions of grand persecution."

At his trial, Mr. Panetti was often incoherent and tried to issue subpoenas to Jesus, the pope and John F. Kennedy.

The justices' decision to hear his appeal was the latest indication of the Supreme Court's concern about the administration of capital punishment. In recent years, the court has declared unconstitutional the execution of mentally retarded defendants as well as those who committed murder before the age of 18. Some opponents of the death penalty have described mental illness as the next frontier in the debate.

Mr. Panetti's case was one of seven new appeals the court granted on a busy day as the justices returned from a four-week recess. The cases will be heard on dates yet to be determined in March and April.

Among the other new cases were appeals by the Bush administration and the National Association of Home Builders in a case that lies at the intersection between the Clean Water Act and the Endangered Species Act. The question is whether the Endangered Species Act limits the government's discretion to transfer certain authority over pollution permits from federal agencies to the individual states, as the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit found.

The twin appeals, consolidated for a single argument, are National Association of Home Builders v. Defenders of Wildlife, No. 06-340, and United States Environmental Protection Agency v. Defenders of Wildlife, No. 05-549.

With two significant environmental cases already having been argued in the last three months, the term figures to be one of the most consequential in years for environmental law.

White House Seeks Lawyer Wise To Ways Of Congress (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 5 — President Bush is seeking a new chief lawyer with credentials as a proven combatant as he and his staff prepare for a potential raft of investigations from Democrats in Congress who have promised to challenge the White House's conduct of policy and its assertions of executive power.

Republicans who have consulted with administration officials on personnel said the White House chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten, was looking for a seasoned Washington hand to succeed Harriet E. Miers, the White House counsel who announced her resignation on Thursday.

Republicans said Friday in interviews that the White House was now, in essence, seeking a politically savvy outsider with ties throughout the capital and in Congress who might be called upon to become something of a public figure in potentially high-profile fights.

"They need somebody who can sit down face-to-face with an ornery committee chairman and work out a conflict over an oversight request," said Bradford A. Berenson, a former associate counsel for Mr. Bush during his first term. "The job will require a certain minimum level of stature and a minimum level of political experience."

Several Republicans, including some former administration officials, said the new White House counsel would also need the stature to counterbalance David S. Addington, the powerful chief of staff of Vice President Dick Cheney. Mr. Addington has tended to argue against cooperating with Congressional requests for classified information, a position that may require some softening, or at least more diplomacy, in the 110th Congress.

The White House is, in some respects, seeking a figure who is the mirror opposite of Ms. Miers, who has not shown a high level of comfort being a public figure, especially since withdrawing herself from the Supreme Court nominating process in 2005 under heavy fire from liberals and conservatives.

Ms. Miers spent most of her career in Texas, and did most of her maneuvering within the White House.

Mr. Bush's choice will be in the mold of the former solicitor general, Theodore B. Olson, said Republican allies of Mr. Bush who are familiar with the administration's views. These people, speaking anonymously to preserve their access to White House officials, said they took Mr. Olson at his word that he was not interested in the position.

These Republicans said other contenders in that mold include Fred F. Fielding, the Reagan-era White House counsel who is now a corporate lawyer in Washington; Charles J. Cooper, a former Justice Department official under President Ronald Reagan, also now practicing law in Washington; Laurence H. Silberman, the retired United States Court of Appeals judge close to Mr. Cheney; and David Aufhauser, the former general counsel for the Treasury Department who is now the global general counsel for UBS, the Swiss bank. Mr. Aufhauser, who has worked with Ms. Miers, also played a crucial legal role for Mr. Bush during the recount of the presidential vote in 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0113985

Another name bandied about by some Republicans, but considered a long shot because he lacks Washington legal experience, is J. Thomas Schieffer, the ambassador to Japan who is both a friend and former business partner of President Bush. Mr. Schieffer has been overseas since 2001, having been ambassador to Australia, and may be interested in a Washington job.

The people familiar with the White House thinking said Ms. Miers's departure, coming amid a number of changes in top administration jobs, had been among the most painful personally for Mr. Bush, who has grown quite close to her over more than a decade of collaboration.

Her resignation capped months of speculation about her future at the White House. Republicans close to the White House said that, in the spring, Mr. Bolten had considered replacing Ms. Miers but that Mr. Bush had made it clear he would consider no such thing. But after the Democrats' election victories in November and the promises by some to challenge Mr. Bush's claims of executive power, Mr. Bolten had new incentive to push for change in the counsel's office, several Republicans said.

Two administration officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity to discuss a delicate personnel issue, said that Ms. Miers was ready to leave all the same, and disputed suggestions that she was forced out of the post, which they said she could have kept had she wanted to.

Safe As Milk? (NYT)

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

The Food and Drug Administration's assessment that food from cloned animals is safe to eat is a victory for biotech companies and a loss for everyone else. Like many decisions on the cutting edge of agricultural technology, it was hurried along in a way that is more sensitive to political and economic pressure than to the long-term welfare of animals, humans and the world they inhabit. Asking whether cloned meat and milk are safe is not even the right question. The right question is, why clone at all?

Approving food from cloned animals will create another food-labeling nightmare and the same aggressive litigation that usually blocks any attempt to tell consumers where their food comes from.

But cloning has much worse consequences. It marks a revolutionary shift — from the relative randomness of sexual reproduction to the apparent uniformity of asexual reproduction. Because cloning creates genetically identical animals, it will shrink the gene pool on which agriculture rests, and any drastic shrinkage in genetic diversity creates enormous health risks for a species.

Cloning isn't just a matter for the F.D.A. to decide. It is up to us as a society to decide as well. We should be asking much broader questions than the F.D.A. is able to. Who will cloning benefit? What will it do to the health of the animals themselves?

But the most important question of all may be this one: Are we willing to judge the suitability of new technologies in ways that fully address their ethical and biological complexities? Or are we doomed to give in to politics and the bottom line?

Let Them Eat Clones (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

Even if it's creepy, cloned meat is safe and tasty, says the Food and Drug Administration.

CLONED BEEF: It's what's for dinner. Or at least it will be, if the Food and Drug Administration acts on its recommendation last week to allow meat and milk from cloned animals to be sold without special labels — a position that has food-purity activists up in arms.

Cloned meat, genetically modified crops and hormone-injected milk cows do not qualify as progress to the organic food crowd, which says such advances will cause as-yet-unimaginable health and environmental damage. It would be easier to take them seriously if scientists didn't dismiss most of their concerns out of hand, after voluminous studies showing no ill effects.

Animal cloning appears to touch a particular nerve. A recent survey by the Pew Initiative on Food and Biotechnology found that 64% of Americans are uncomfortable with animal cloning. The numbers are probably worse in much of Europe and Asia, where U.S. experiments with modified crops cause widespread dismay and often lead to bans on U.S. farm exports.

There are legitimate ethical or religious objections to human tampering with the natural reproductive process. And cloning can have ill effects on animals, causing more mutations and early deaths. But the food purists do their cause a disservice when they argue that cloned meat is somehow unsafe or unhealthy.

To begin with, the clone genie is already out of the bottle. There is a voluntary moratorium on the sale of cloned meat and dairy products, but it is widely ignored. Some of the meat currently in the freezer of your local supermarket may well be from the offspring of a cloned animal.

The second delusion is that non-cloned products now in stores are more "natural." Cloning, which involves replacing an egg's nucleus with DNA from a genetically desirable animal, is just the latest artificial reproductive technology to come down the pike. Chances are, that T-bone on your table came from a cow produced using artificial insemination, in vitro fertilization, embryo transfer or some other method that didn't involve a cow and a bull making beautiful music together.

DOJ_NMG_0113986

Finally, it's delusional to think that special labels would make any difference. It's impossible to distinguish — at the molecular level or by taste — meat from a cloned animal from the meat of an animal born of two parents. So there would be no way to determine whether meatpackers were complying with the labeling law.

It isn't the FDA's job to rule on the morality of animal husbandry, nor to placate nervous trading partners overseas. Its mandate is to ensure the safety of the nation's food supply, and the verdict is in: Cloned meat is safe.

Those who aren't convinced will have other options. Just as "organic" farms and dairies across the country put special labels on their hormone-free milk or pesticide-free produce, ranches will doubtless spring up to market "non-cloned" meats. Those who want to pay more for lower-quality food will no doubt be able to do so.

OTHER NEWS:

Jobs Data Brighten Economic Picture (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-Morales, Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

Strong Payroll, Wage Gains Ease Concerns of Recession And Trim Odds of a Rate Cut

Job creation accelerated at the end of last year and wage gains hovered at their highest level in nearly six years, suggesting that the economy might be performing better than economists anticipated and dashing hopes that the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates anytime soon.

The Labor Department Friday said U.S. nonfarm payrolls expanded by a seasonally adjusted 167,000 jobs in December as strong gains in the service sector easily offset manufacturing losses and a drop in construction jobs. With employment gains for October and November revised up by a combined 29,000, the nation added a net total of 1.8 million jobs last year, compared with 1.9 million in 2005 and 2.1 million in 2004. Meanwhile, the unemployment rate last month remained unchanged at 4.5%, near a five-year low.

The strong payroll gains "were certainly a surprise," given recent forecasts for waning job growth, said Nigel Gault, an economist at consultancy Global Insight. "It clearly points to a stronger

Moody's Investor Services Chief Economist John Lonski6 parses the December jobs data in an interview with WSJ reporter Justin Lahart.

The Labor Department report also showed that wages are rising robustly for U.S. workers: Average hourly earnings rose eight cents to $17.04 in December, up 0.5% from a month earlier and 4.2% from December 2005. Last month's annual wage increase matches November's upwardly revised performance, which both mark the biggest percentage gain since February 2001.

Some economists believe that an increasingly tight labor market means that wages will move even higher in the months ahead, a trend that could damp corporate profits.

"At this stage of the business cycle, more of the total [profit] pie is going to workers and less is going to" corporate coffers, said Jan Hatzius, an economist at Goldman Sachs Group Inc. "Stronger wage growth is likely to persist for a substantial part of 2007."

Indeed, analysts noted Friday that the economy is generating jobs at a pace that is reducing the supply of available workers. This pool includes people who are looking for jobs as well as people who aren't actively searching for work but would accept a job if one were offered. In the past year, this pool has fallen by 1.2 million people to 11.4 million workers, according to economists at Bear Stearns Cos.

Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago President Michael Moskow suggested that December's job growth was well above what the economy can sustain in the long run without straining the supply of available workers.

Slowing population growth and the retiring baby boomers' exit from the work force means normal job growth is about 100,000 a month, he told the Labor and Employment Relations Association in Chicago late Friday. He noted that monthly job growth has averaged about 160,000 in the past six months.

"By the old standard, that would be just average, but given the current trends in the labor force, we view such growth as quite solid," Mr. Moskow said.

That further diminishes the odds that the Federal Reserve will ease monetary policy in coming months, a view that spooked financial markets Friday. The Dow Jones Industrial Average declined 82.68 points to close at 12398.01, while in the bond market in late trading, prices on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note were down 7/32, or a loss of $2.188 for each $1,000 face amount. The yield rose to 4.648%.

DOJ_NMG_0113987

Federal Reserve officials see the continued strength in employment as a bit puzzling given that overall economic growth appears to have decelerated. "That difference most likely reflected lags between movements in activity and employment, implying that growth in employment would probably slow over the next quarter or so," said minutes to the Fed's December policy meeting, released Wednesday. If officials still expect the labor market to weaken, they will be less concerned that low unemployment will generate inflationary pressure via higher wages.

Federal Reserve Bank of Boston President Cathy Minehan Friday said the economy will likely grow moderately this year, the unemployment rate will remain below 5%, and underlying inflation, though still a "challenge," will decline gradually.

Employment gains in December were driven by the service sector, which added 178,000 jobs last month. Although retailers shed 9,000 jobs, professional and business services, a category that includes consultants and lawyers, added 50,000 jobs; education and health care added 43,000 jobs; and leisure and hospitality added 31,000 jobs.

Meanwhile, hiring outside the service sector fell last month. Manufacturers cut 12,000 jobs, and the construction industry shed a less-than-expected 3,000 workers amid December's mild weather. Besides housing-related activity, the construction industry added jobs last month to meet demand for hotel construction and other projects.

Strong US Job Gains Dash Rate Cut Hopes (FT)

By Eoin Callan, Krishna Guha, Ed Crooks

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

US companies hired workers at a blistering pace last month, according to fresh data, which dashed hopes of early US interest rate cuts and brightened prospects that the world's biggest economy is heading for a soft landing.

The US Department of Labor said non-farm payrolls rose 167,000 in December, a figure far exceeding market expectations that prompted a sharp sell-off in the bond market. While equities fell back as the likelihood of a rate cut receded, the data sent the dollar higher, and halted an earlier slide in oil prices.

The December jobs gain was the biggest increase in 2006, defying economists' predictions that the pace of hiring would slow. Wages also picked up, with a 4.2 per cent annual increase in average hourly earnings.

The report is a boost for the Fed in its tug-of-war with the bond market over the state of the US economy and the likely future path of interest rates. Strong job creation and healthy wage gains reinforce the Fed view that the US economy is on track for a soft landing, in spite of the drag from housing and some weakness in manufacturing.

Meanwhile, they challenge the bond market's more pessimistic assumption that gathering economic weakness will force the Fed to cut interest rates.

US bond prices fell sharply following the release of the report, with the yield on the benchmark 10-year bond up 8.4 basis points to 4.69 per cent in the first hour. Bonds later recovered slightly. Short-term interest rate futures fell, bringing the implied odds of a 25 basis point cut by the end of the first half of this year to 30 per cent, down from 50 per cent before the data.

Job creation was also stronger than previously thought in November, with an increase of 154,000, compared with earlier estimates of 132,000.

Carlos Gutierrez, commerce secretary, told the FT the strong jobs numbers "can be sustained" and said wage gains showed workers were now sharing in the benefits of growth.

The economic data helped support the price of oil after sharp falls this week. Oil prices steadied above $55 a barrel for Brent crude. The Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries offered no clear signal on Friday. Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah, Qatar's oil minister, was reported by Bloomberg, the news agency, as being "very concerned" about the fall in prices.

Workers, Wages Add To Growth (WP)

By Nell Henderson, Howard Schneider, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Momentum Carries Economy Into 2007

Employers hired new workers and boosted wages at a brisk clip last month, creating far more jobs than many economists had expected and causing unemployment to hold steady at a low 4.5 percent, the Labor Department said yesterday.

That report followed others this week showing that retailers rang up decent holiday sales last month, while factories churned out more goods and businesses spent more on offices, shopping centers and other types of commercial construction.

It's a strong series of reports given that oil prices topped $77 a barrel last year, interest rates rose and a serious housing slump fueled fears of a recession.

DOJ_NMG_0113988

"There was a tremendous amount of momentum gathering at the end of the year, and it's carrying into 2007," said Richard Yamarone, director of research at Argus Research Corp.

Home builders, automakers and their suppliers cut thousands of jobs last month, reflecting downturns in their industries that slowed the economy in 2006 and are likely to restrain growth this year as well.

But by last month, the new data show, those woes had not dampened the nation's vibrant service sector, which includes education, health care, finance, travel, entertainment and other industries that together employ more than four of every five payroll workers.

Hiring in these industries more than offset layoffs elsewhere, for a strong net increase of 167,000 jobs in December and 1.8 million jobs for the year, the Labor Department said.

Employers also boosted average wages by a healthy 0.5 percent last month, to $17.04 an hour, which added up to a 4.2 percent increase over the 12 months ended in December, the biggest yearly gain since 2000.

And consumers found their wages went farther at year's end because of falling inflation, which has tumbled along with fuel prices since the summer. That helped encourage holiday spending: Sales at the major retail chains rose by a solid 3.1 percent in December from a year earlier, the International Council of Shopping Centers said this week.

"Nothing is more powerful than employment. That is the determinant of whether you spend . . . and that is fueling economic growth," Yamarone said.

With solid spending at home and a weaker dollar boosting demand from abroad, U.S. manufacturers increased their activity in December, rebounding from a decline in November, the Institute for Supply Management reported earlier in the week.

The Commerce Department also said this week that spending on nonresidential construction projects rose in both October and November, helping cushion the continued decline in spending on home building.

Yesterday's report was too much good news for Wall Street's taste. After a raft of mixed economic signals earlier this winter, investors had been betting the Federal Reserve would cut interest rates soon to fuel economic growth. But that looks increasingly unlikely, and stock and bond prices fell yesterday and investors abandoned their earlier assumptions. Analysts predicted the Federal Reserve will hold steady well into this year.

Fed policymakers raised short-term interest rates steadily through last June in an effort to cool the economy just enough to bring down inflation without causing a recession -- a goal called a "soft landing." While price pressures moderated last year, the central bank wants them to weaken further this year.

Now, the economy appears likely to grow a moderate 2.4 percent this year, after growing faster than 3 percent in each of the last three years, according to the average forecast of the 54 top business and university economists surveyed last month for Blue Chip Economic Indicators, a monthly publication.

The Blue Chip group also predicted inflation will ebb a little this year, while unemployment creeps up to average 4.8 percent, higher than last month's rate, but still low historically. None of the experts surveyed predicted a recession.

"We are successfully in a soft landing," said Diane Swonk, chief economist at Mesirow Financial. She predicted the economy would rebound strongly enough later this year to cause the Fed to raise its benchmark rate.

The Fed, however, isn't expected to raise interest rates in the near future because it is uncertain how much further the housing market will sag.

Home sales rose in November, fostering hopes they will stabilize soon. But home construction is likely to continue declining for many months while home builders work to reduce their inventories of unsold homes, analysts said.

Housing-related industries -- including residential construction, contractors, real estate agents and brokers -- shed 19,000 jobs last year, a sharp reversal after adding 306,000 in 2005, according to the Economic Policy Institute, a research organization focused on labor issues. Analysts forecast more such losses this year.

Manufacturing employment also appears likely to continue to slide, after falling by 72,000 workers last year. Nearly nine of every 10 factory jobs lost in the second half of last year reflected cuts by employers in businesses related to housing or automaking, said David Huether, chief economist at the National Association of Manufacturers.

Construction employment fell in each of the last four months of last year, but rose by 39,000 jobs over 2006, as gains in nonresidential work more than offset cuts by home builders, the Labor data showed.

But because of the continued expansion of the nation's service industries, the nation's overall job market tightened last year, brightening employment prospects for many workers.

Unemployment averaged 4.6 percent, the lowest level in six years, down from an average of 5.1 percent in 2005.

The jobless rate among white workers rose to 4 percent in December from 3.9 percent in November. African American unemployment fell to 8.4 percent last month, the lowest level since July 2001, from 8.6 percent in November. Latino joblessness fell to 4.9 percent from 5 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0113989

The average duration of unemployment shrunk last year as well, to 15.9 weeks as of December from 17.4 weeks in December 2005.

The ranks of the so-called "long-term" jobless workers declined as well, to 16 percent of all the unemployed last month, from 18.5 percent a year earlier, Labor said.

Jobs, Income Gains Bright Spots In 2006 (WT)

By Patrice Hill, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

The job market was the brightest spot in the economy at the end of last year, with wage gains hitting a six-year high of 4.2 percent and employers creating another 167,000 jobs, the Labor Department reported yesterday.

In all, 1.8 million new jobs opened up in 2006 while the healthy growth in incomes enabled consumers to overcome high gas prices and keep spending despite deep troubles in the housing market and the auto industry. The unemployment rate, at 4.5 percent in December, was at the lowest levels since 2000.

By the end of the year, robust growth in services, management and professional jobs like health care, education, engineering and telecommunications overwhelmed job losses in construction and manufacturing that resulted from the weak real estate and auto sectors. Many economists expected the opposite, thinking housing-related job losses would cascade into broader weakness in the labor market.

"It's certainly going to go a long way in calming fears that a housing slowdown was taking the economy apart," said Jim Paulsen, chief investment officer for Wells Capital Management. He expects forecasters to increase their estimates of economic growth this year as a result of the surprisingly strong job growth.

Other recent reports, including news of a weak Christmas sales season, have suggested economic growth and consumer spending are softening.

"Clearly, there is support for consumer spending" from the solid job and income gains, and that will underpin growth in the broader economy, said John Silvia, chief economist at Wachovia Securities.

Stocks and bonds fell on yesterday's news, as it played into worries at the Federal Reserve that an increasingly tight job market, especially for skilled and educated workers, will stoke wage growth and bolster inflation. Wages constitute about two-thirds of the costs covered by consumer prices.

Fed watchers said that rather than cut interest rates this spring, as many in the markets hoped, the jobs report will prompt the central bank to keep rates elevated and maintain vigilance against inflation.

"Wage gains remain a two-edged sword," said Mr. Silvia. They are "good for personal income" and economic growth, but they underpin inflationary pressures.

"The Fed isn't going to do anything this quarter" to change its anti-inflation stance, said Jack Malvey, global fixed-income strategist at Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc. "The momentum of the U.S. economy is more vigorous than some in the market presume."

Roger M. Kubarych, economist at Unicredit Markets, said the markets need to awaken to this fact: The Fed will not consider cutting rates unless the job market starts to show weakness.

Peter Morici, business professor at the University of Maryland, said employment conditions may not be as good as they seem. The department reported that 6.8 million people remain unemployed, and participation in the labor force remains well below 2000 levels because another 1.3 million would like to work but are discouraged and have stopped looking for jobs. Many would-be workers have dropped out to seek schooling.

Also, the department's survey of households shows that more than a million people became self-employed last year, often because they could not find good payroll jobs, Mr. Morici said.

"Many people who have been displaced from positions with regular employers have sought refuge in home-based consulting and blue-collar pickup jobs," he said. "For many these days, self-employment is three parts resume posting and one part work, but it still counts as employment at the Labor Department."

Lawrence Kudlow, president of Kudlow & Co., said the growth in self-employment and one-man businesses is a hallmark of an entrepreneurial economy.

"Free-market capitalism is a wonderful thing," he said. "The economy is still in a slowdown mode, but it is still quite healthy," thanks to the steady growth in jobs and income.

Job Growth Is Strong, Surprising Economists (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113990

Job growth was brisk last month as businesses added to their payrolls with surprising confidence, further evidence that the economy is not likely to slip into a recession.

This growth helped both the employed and the unemployed. The prospects for working Americans strengthened as wages for most workers climbed at a steady clip. Those looking for a job last month found a more welcoming job market, and the amount of time they spent out of work dropped considerably.

The national unemployment rate held steady at a low 4.5 percent.

Such strong numbers, reported yesterday in the government's monthly survey of households and businesses, came as a surprise to many economists, who expected the slowing economy to pressure employers to rein in hiring.

The report also came just two days after an employment survey from a private statistics firm suggested that businesses had shed 40,000 jobs last month.

"Such weakness as we have seen in the job market has been quite narrowly confined to those sectors immediately affected, like construction and manufacturing," said Nigel Gault, chief United States economist for Global Insight. "It really does help alleviate fears of a cumulative downturn spreading from housing and pulling everything down."

The report dashed cold water on those who were expecting the Federal Reserve to lower interest rates anytime soon. Investors, who have been counting on a rate cut by the central bank sometime in the first half of the year, bid stocks lower on the news and sent the bond market reeling. On Wall Street, stocks had their worst day since the end of November.

The Labor Department reported that employment outside the farming sector grew by 167,000 jobs in December, seasonally adjusted — more than enough to absorb natural growth in the work force. In another sign of just how strong the job market has been, the figures for October and November were revised to show that businesses hired more employees than the government first thought.

With the housing market in a slump, builders eliminated 3,000 jobs in December, after cutting substantially more in October and November. And economists said that had it not been for unseasonably warm weather, builders probably would have eliminated even more workers.

Downsizing in the American auto industry helped contribute to an overall decline in manufacturing jobs last month. For the year, manufacturers shed a net 72,000 jobs.

Retailers, too, shrunk their payrolls last month, reflecting a weak holiday shopping season. Home-improvement supply stores, clothing stores and sporting goods stores led the industry in jobs cut.

But the services sector of the economy showed considerable strength. Professional and business services — companies that offer things like administrative support, computer software design and waste management — added a net 50,000 jobs last month. Health care providers added 31,000 new jobs, and so did hospitality businesses like restaurants and bars.

In all, the largest percentage of the population since September 2001 was employed in December. The employment-population ratio edged up a tenth of a percentage point, to 63.4 percent.

"You want to see folks who are sitting on the sidelines able to come in and find work," said Jared Bernstein, an economist with the Economic Policy Institute. "You've had a really important expansion in labor force, in particular by people who were waiting for jobs and wages to heat up a bit."

Not only are more Americans working, but they are being paid more for it. Average wages have been outpacing inflation by enough of a margin in recent months that workers have seen some of the biggest real gains in their paychecks this decade.

In December, that trend appeared to continue as the average hourly earning for a worker in a nonmanagerial position climbed 8 cents, to $17.04. That was a 4.2 percent gain compared with December 2005, and it matched November's rise, which was the highest in more than five years. It has not topped that rate in more than six years.

Some recent evidence had suggested that wage gains were beginning to taper off, but yesterday's Labor Department statistics showed that workers continued to enjoy the benefits of a strong labor market.

"If you want a signal of what the labor market looks like, see if employers are paying more," said Drew Mathus, an economist with Lehman Brothers.

It appears that employers are giving their workers raises because tightness in the labor market demands it. The report is not likely to put any pressure on the Federal Reserve to ease interest rates .

"The Fed has got to be pleased with these numbers," said Edward Yardeni, chief investment strategist with Oak Associates, a money management firm in Akron, Ohio. "Interest rates are where they should be."

Minutes Show Fed Focus On Jobs Data (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113991

The central role that Friday's US jobs data will play in the Federal Reserve's next deliberations on interest rates is clear from the latest Fed minutes published this week.

The minutes show the Fed putting considerable weight on the continued strength of the labour market as an offset to other signs of weakness in the economy, for instance, in manufacturing output.

Policymakers noted "solid gains in employment over recent quarters stood in contrast to the softer pace of economic expansion suggested by the spending and production data".

While the bond market has focused on the weaker spending and output data, the Fed saw "mixed signals about the strength of near- term activity".

When output and jobs data diverge in this way, the standard explanation is that it is just a matter of time before the jobs market weakens, too.

The Fed acknowledged in this week's minutes that this remained the "most likely" explanation, implying that "growth in employment will probably slow over the next quarter or so".

But Fed policymakers are thinking about other possible explanations, too. Strong job creation could be a clue that the output numbers are underestimating the true level of growth in the economy and "the recent pace of activity may have been stronger than that indicated by the spending and production data". Alternatively, the combination of slow growth and robust job creation could be a signal that productivity is weaker than the Fed thought. That would not imply upward revisions to growth but it would make the Fed more reluctant to cut interest rates for a given level of growth.

The jobs market is a crucial driver of consumer spending, as well as a potential source of inflationary pressure.

As long as there is healthy growth in employment and in real wages, the Fed will feel confident that consumption will continue to grow, in spite of the disappearing wealth effect from housing.

The Fed's base-case scenario – that the economy overcomes its present weakness and returns to roughly trend growth later this year – already assumes that job growth will ease and unemployment will drift up a little.

And with demographic trends reducing the growth in the labour force, officials see payroll growth of 100,000 to 120,000 as consistent with stable unemployment. So the 167,000 increase for December almost certainly exceeds even the Fed's own relatively bullish expectations by a wide margin.

The Fed will take into account a wide range of data on the real economy and prices before making its decisions.

But while jobs and wage growth continues at anything like the present rate, it is hard to see it thinking seriously about cutting interest rates.

Bernanke Defends Fed Banking Supervision (FT)

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

Ben Bernanke stoutly defended the Federal Reserve's role in banking supervision on Friday, pushing back against suggestions that this role should be hived off and given to a single regulator as in the UK and Japan.

The Fed chairman said there was no evidence that Fed monetary policy decisions had ever been distorted by its supervisory responsibilities, and said the knowledge it gained by acting as a supervisor was essential to its ability to deal with financial crises.

"The Fed's ability to deal with diverse and hard-to-predict threats to financial stability depends critically on the information, expertise and powers that it holds by virtue of being both a bank supervisor and a central bank," he told the annual meeting of the American Economic Association.

His robust defence of the Fed's supervisory role comes at a time of increased US interest in the UK model of financial regulation, based on a single regulator, the Financial Services Authority, which took over supervisory functions previously performed by the Bank of England.

Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson recently highlighted the problem of multiple overlapping regulators in a speech on US capital market competitiveness in which he noted "while the business of banking has converged over time, we still have four separate banking regulators."

Mr Paulson questioned whether this system was conducive to "regulatory efficiency."

Mr Bernanke on Friday admitted that the "issue of efficiency" was "less easy to dismiss" than concerns that the supervisory role would influence monetary policy.

He conceded that the US banking regulatory system is "complex and in some respects duplicative" and said he supported efforts "to make supervision more effective and less burdensome."

But he said the supervisory authority of the Fed has "significant collateral benefits" – enabling it to respond more quickly, more effectively and in a more informed way to financial crises.

DOJ_NMG_0113992

The Fed chairman said the knowledge and relationships built up through supervision were crucial in helping it to deal with recent crises, including the provision of massive amounts of liquidity to the banking system after the terrorist attacks of September 11 2001.

Mr Bernanke said the supervisory role also helped the Fed tackle the failure of Drexel Burnham Lambert in 1990 and the collapse of Long Term Capital Management in 1998.

The Fed chairman also suggested that the Fed's expertise, for instance, in capital markets, allowed it to make positive contributions to overall bank supervision.

While Mr Bernanke did not refer to Basle II specifically, the Fed tended to be more sympathetic to big banks arguments that they should be allowed to put greater weight on their own risk-management systems, than some of the other US banking regulators.

Surge In Jobs Sends Markets Lower (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

Wall Street and the Treasury market ended the first week of 2007 with sharp losses yesterday after a surprising surge in new jobs and wages diminished the hopes of investors for an interest rate cut.

The markets shuddered at the Labor Department's report that employers increased their payrolls by 167,000 in December and increased the hourly wages of workers by 0.5 percent. The unemployment rate, meanwhile, held steady at 4.5 percent.

The report suggested that the economy will not be slowing as much as investors anticipated — news that should prove positive for stocks in the long term, but which raised concerns yesterday that the Federal Reserve might use it as a reason to raise interest rates.

A rise in rates could crimp consumer spending, and further weaken the housing market by making mortgages more expensive.

At this point, though, economists see policy makers keeping rates steady.

"Until we get an uptick in the unemployment rate, in this environment the Fed will probably stay in a holding pattern," said Michael Strauss, chief economist at Commonfund, pointing to the slowing, but still expanding, economy.

"Moderate economic growth is historically good for the equity market, not a bad thing," he said.

Concerns about the jobs report added to disappointment over a warning by Motorola that it is lowering its fourth-quarter sales estimates, as well as a series of analyst downgrades of technology companies.

Motorola fell $1.61, or 7.8 percent, to $18.94 on the New York Stock Exchange.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell 82.68 points, or 0.66 percent, to 12,398.01 — the biggest one-day drop since Nov. 27. The Dow was down more than 115 points at one time yesterday.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index dipped 8.63 points, or 0.61 percent, to 1,409.71.

The Nasdaq composite index dropped 19.18 points, or 0.78 percent, to 2,434.25.

Yesterday's steep declines capped a week that showed the stock market's indecision over whether it wants the economy to slow or perk up.

On Wednesday, the first trading day of 2007, stocks were mixed after the Fed released minutes disclosing some expressions of concern that the weak housing sector might be a drag on the economy. Yesterday's positive jobs snapshot, however, suggesting a quickening economy, caused stocks to drop.

The clash between worries over economic cooling and inflation reflects the caution felt by investors, given the big run-up of stocks in late 2006.

"It's just a sign of volatility," said Jeff Kleintop, chief investment strategist for PNC Wealth Management. "We just went through a rally that could've been drawn with a ruler."

The Dow was down 0.52 percent on the week and year; the S.& P. is down 0.61 percent; but the Nasdaq is up 0.78 percent.

The Federal Reserve, which has kept rates stable since August after raising rates for two years, is expected to leave rates unchanged again when its rate-setting committee meets at the end of the month. Still, investors were nervous enough yesterday to sell stocks and bonds, after a months-long pattern of cashing in recent gains at the first possible sign of a rate increase.

Crude oil prices rose 72 cents, to settle at $56.31 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange, but ended nearly 8 percent lower on the week on expectations of sluggish demand because of mild weather in the Northeast and Midwest.

Many technology stocks declined on a spate of analyst downgrades. Intel fell 7 cents, to $21.10; Silicon Laboratories dropped $1.98, or 5.6 percent, to $33.36; and Broadcom fell $1.07, or 3.2 percent, to $32.50.

DOJ_NMG_0113993

Strong December sales figures from the nation's two biggest consumer electronics retailers, Best Buy Company and Circuit City Stores, failed to give Wall Street a big enough boost to offset the jobs report and news from Motorola.

Best Buy rose 16 cents, to $50.

Circuit City fell 71 cents, or 3.6 percent, to $19.29, on worries about competition from Best Buy.

The price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note declined 10/32, to 9927/32.

The yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, rose to 4.64 percent, from 4.60 percent.

The 10-year yield had touched 4.70 percent during the day.

Treasury Prices Hit By US Labour Report (FT)

By Saskia Scholtes, Paul Davies

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

Government bond prices tumbled on Friday after a stronger-than-expected report on US labour market conditions caught traders on the back foot.

The fall in US Treasury prices initially brought yields close to where they had started the new year as investors adjusted their outlook for economic growth. The US Labor Department said the US economy created 167,000 new jobs in December and reported an upward revision to November job creation.

Economists' forecasts had been for a reading of 100,000 and many investors had been betting on an even weaker number. A report by private employment service ADP on Wednesday indicated US private sector employment had fallen in December.

The news produced a rapid sell off in US Treasuries, pushing yields around 10 basis points higher across all maturities. By late afternoon in New York, the market had recovered slightly, leaving the yield on the benchmark 10-year bond 4.8bp higher at 4.66 per cent, after starting the week at 4.70 per cent. The two-year note yield was most sensitive, adding 6.2bp to 4.77 per cent, down from 4.81 per cent at the start of the week.

The payrolls report also prompted investors to adjust their bets in the interest-rate futures markets. Short-term interest rate futures fell, bringing the implied odds of a 25-basis-point cut by the end of the first half of this year to 30 per cent, down from 50 per cent before the data.

The US market moves spilled across the Atlantic. European government bond prices had been firmer ahead of the data, having followed the positive trend from the US for much of this week.

However, the payroll figures saw them stumble instantly and end in the red for the week once again. The two-year Schatz yield was up 2.8bp on the day and the week at 3.918 per cent, while 10-year Bund yields were 4.5bp higher on the day and 2.6bp higher on the week at 3.979 per cent.

UK gilts also suffered in spite of data from the country's leading mortgage lender showing a surprise fall in house prices in December. Two-year gilt yields hit their highest level since July 2001 after rising 3bp to 5.221 per cent, which was 5.4bp up on the week. Ten-year yields, meanwhile, were 2.9bp higher on the day and 6.6bp up on the week at 4.804 per cent.

The benchmark 10-year Japanese government bond yield was up 0.5bp at 1.720 per cent.

Dollar Jumps To 6-Week High Against Euro On Jobs Data (WSJ)

By Dan Molinski

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

The dollar rose to a six-week high against the euro Friday and recovered much of its overnight losses against the yen after a surge in U.S. jobs growth.

Late Friday afternoon, the euro stood at $1.3003, down from $1.3083 late Thursday, while the dollar was at 118.68 yen, down from 119.08 yen. The euro fell to 154.32 yen from 155.79 yen. The dollar rose to 1.2361 Swiss francs from 1.2332 Swiss francs, as the pound fell to $1.9302 from $1.9435.

"We've broken through some big levels," said John McCarthy, director of foreign exchange at ING Capital Markets. "The number came in way on the upside."

The dollar has been rallying for three days against the euro, and is up 1.5% this week, despite forecasts by most economists for it to decline in 2007.

The euro's support level at around $1.3050 that hadn't been broken since late November easily gave way during the morning rally, and the psychological $1.30 level also buckled, with the euro dipping as far as $1.2981, a low not seen since Nov. 24.

DOJ_NMG_0113994

But for most of the session the euro steadied around $1.30. Against the yen, the dollar used the employment report to grab back most of its overnight losses on speculation the Bank of Japan may raise its ultra-low key interest rate when it meets Jan. 18.

After The Dow's 2006 Rise, Investors Ponder A Correction (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

Some investors are wondering if the Dow Jones Industrial Average is due for a significant short-term drop, nearly four years after the blue-chip average last suffered a 10% tumble, the traditional definition of a "correction" that helps keep a bull market from overheating.

After the Dow's 16% gain last year, some investing pros, including a few who are upbeat on stocks for the long haul, are nervous. The market's lackluster performance for the week, punctuated by the Dow's 82.68-point tumble Friday, only raised more questions for such skeptics.

The blue-chip average shed 0.7% Friday to end at 12398.01, down 0.5% in 2007's first week of trading. While such moves sometimes turned into full-blown corrections in the past, the market's pattern since its lows last summer has been to shrug off such modest weekly setbacks and continue higher, producing a relentless rally that has defied old-fashioned, what-goes-up-must-come-down market wisdom.

Jim Bianco, president of Bianco Research in Chicago, says he has struggled since late last year to explain the lack of a correction to his clients.

One possible explanation, he says, lies in the rising popularity of new investment products such as exchange-traded funds, which allow everyday investors to trade indexes or blocks of companies in one stroke.

Mr. Bianco says the trend may be cutting into the volatility of individual companies' shares, which, in turn, may be cutting into the volatility of the indexes of which the companies are components, creating a cycle that feeds on itself.

"This is the new environment we're in," Mr. Bianco says, "It's difficult to know what to make of it."

Friday's market woes could be traced to a few specific factors, starting with a report by the Labor Department that nonfarm payrolls rose by 167,000 jobs last month, larger than the rise of 115,000 jobs analysts expected.

This sign of economic strength curbed hopes that the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates to spur growth anytime soon, a move that would lower borrowing costs throughout the economy and help stocks.

The jobs report also buoyed energy traders' confidence that U.S. fuel demand will remain high. At the New York Mercantile Exchange, Crude-oil contracts for February delivery ended a two-day plunge, rising 72 cents, or 1.3%, to $56.31 a barrel, still off 7.8% on the week.

The energy rally also weighed on stocks, as higher pump prices tend to leave consumers with less to spend with nonenergy companies. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index on Friday fell 0.6%, or 8.63 points, to 1409.71, off 0.6% for the week. The Nasdaq Composite Index shed 0.8%, or 19.18 points, to end at 2434.25, up 0.8% on the week.

A rally in the U.S. dollar against the euro pushed gold to a fresh two-month low, since the yellow metal is traditionally viewed as an alternative to paper currency in some parts of the world. Contracts for January delivery tumbled 3%, or $19, to $604.90 a troy ounce, off 4.8% on the week on Nymex's Comex division.

George Gero, vice president with RBC Capital Markets Global Futures, says oil, gold and other sagging commodity prices could rally later this year if the Fed eventually cuts interest rates, as most of Wall Street expects. Although traders' hopes for a rate cut were dealt a blow Friday, they should eventually be rewarded, Mr. Gero says.

"The gold market has been spooked by a number of things the past week or so," Mr. Gero says. "The jobs report was just the straw that broke the camel's back."

A fresh rally in commodities, especially crude oil, would tend to hurt stocks and could feed a correction.

S&P strategist Sam Stovall, who fretted publicly late last year about the possibility of a sustained setback, says he has become less worried, although he is still forecasting a relatively modest 6.5% gain in the S&P 500 this year.

Like the Dow, the broad-based S&P hasn't had a traditional 10% correction in several years. But, Mr. Stovall says, some global indexes did suffer 10% pullbacks in 2006 on the way to gains for the full year.

"I took a second look and realized that markets are more global now, with more money flowing into U.S. shares from overseas," Mr. Stovall says. "By that standard, it made sense to look more globally for the correction as well."

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell.1 Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was three billion shares, as 845 stocks advanced and 2,477 fell.

DOJ_NMG_0113995

Bond prices fell.2 The 10-year note fell 7/32 point, pushing up the yield to 4.648%. The 30-year bond fell 8/32 to yield 4.743%.

The dollar was mixed.3 Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 118.68 yen, compared with 119.08. The euro fell to $1.3003, compared with $1.3083.

Dow's Dogs Still Having Their Day (NYT)

By Conrad De Aenlle

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

EVERY dog has its day, but the Dogs of the Dow have had their day for seven years. During that span, the Dogs — the 10 stocks in the Dow Jones industrial average with the highest dividend yields at the end of each year — have handily outperformed the index itself and other benchmarks of blue-chip stocks.

Owning the 10 Dogs in equal dollar amounts would have produced an annualized total return, share price appreciation plus dividends, of 5.5 percent since 1999, according to Dow Jones & Company. The complete 30-stock index could manage only 3.3 percent.

The Dogs of the Dow are the sort of stocks that value investors covet. Despite the unflattering appellation, the Dogs are solid, long-established businesses that are selling at bargain prices and producing enough cash flow to have high dividend yields.

"These are companies that have been around for years," said James Huguet, president of Great Companies Funds, a Florida portfolio manager specializing in shares of large American businesses. "You're buying them at a discount, and they're paying dividends, so it takes some of the risk out."

The Dogs for 2007, in descending order of yield, are Verizon, Altria, AT&T, Pfizer, Citigroup, Merck, General Motors, Dupont, J. P. Morgan and General Electric.

A refinement of the strategy is to buy just the five Dogs with the lowest share prices at the end of each year. Doing so would have raised the performance of a Dogs portfolio over the last seven years to an annualized return of 7.3 percent. The five lowest-priced Dogs for 2007, beginning with the cheapest, are Pfizer, G.M., AT&T, G.E. and Verizon.

Many Dow Dogs, now or in any year, have something in common besides longevity and low valuations. They are flawed in some way, which is why they are cheap in the first place.

"These are companies that are in temporary trouble," said Pat Dorsey, research director at Morningstar. "That is what the strategy is supposed to highlight. Sometimes they bounce back after a rough patch, sometimes management gains some I.Q. points, and sometimes it gets booted out." (A high yield can signal trouble because it sometimes results from a decline in the share price rather than an increase in the dividend.)

Mr. Huguet focused on the third possibility. Many of the companies that attain Dog status have been taken down the wrong path, he said. Share prices sink, forcing changes at the helm. The new broom begins sweeping around the time that the stocks would be added to a Dogs portfolio.

"A lot of the time when Dogs of the Dow that have been downtrodden suddenly come alive, it's because you have new management in there," he said. "Earnings turn around, and because the stock is depressed, it can have a huge effect on the price."

Mr. Huguet prefers to own fast growers rather than potential turnaround plays, so he is not a fan of the Dogs strategy. He does own a couple from this year's crop, though: Citigroup and J. P. Morgan.

Walter McCormick, lead manager of the Evergreen Fundamental Large Cap fund, also likes the two banks, along with the drug maker Pfizer and the food and tobacco producer Altria.

THIS year may be an especially good one for the Dogs, Mr. McCormick said. After the strong run turned in by many species of Dow stocks over the last few years, returns for the Dow industrial index may diminish, encouraging investors to put a premium on stocks with high dividend yields, he explained. "You'll want the wind at your back," he said. "If we have a year when returns are in the high single digits, you're halfway there with high-yielding stocks."

Mr. Dorsey, at Morningstar, has mixed feelings about the Dogs. He, too, likes Citigroup, J. P. Morgan and Altria, calling them "reasonably cheap." On the other hand, he considers G.M. and AT&T "ridiculously overvalued."

He is shunning Merck, which is fending off lawsuits over its painkiller Vioxx, and has had good results in court, but not where it counts, he said. "Merck has a terrible pipeline" of new drugs, he said. "That's what makes drug companies go."

All in all, Mr. Dorsey finds the 2007 Dogs to be "not a very inspiring group." Even so, he approves of the strategy because it may help to teach old investors a new trick.

"You're buying solid companies when they're down on their luck," he said. "That's better than buying whatever was hot last year, as many investors do."

DOJ_NMG_0113996

Lower Oil Prices Slow In Reaching Pump (WP)

By Steven Mufson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

With cherry blossoms coming out in New York City, Merrill Lynch & Co. oil and gas analyst John Herrlin sent a note to investors yesterday saying "soon I might have to cut my lawn rather than run the snow blower."

The warm weather was bad news this week for oil and gas companies, the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries and any traders who had bet on rising energy prices. But for consumers, the unseasonably warm weather may make it cheaper to fill their gas tanks -- though it hasn't yet.

Three straight months of tepid demand for heating oil, combined with a broad commodity sell-off triggered by a New Year's change in the investment mix of index funds, helped drive down crude oil prices sharply this week. Crude prices plunged almost 9 percent on Wednesday and Thursday, before stabilizing on Friday. They finished the week at $56.31 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange, down 7.8 percent since the start of the year.

So far, the benefits of falling crude oil prices haven't trickled down to consumers. Drops in gasoline prices tend to lag somewhat behind declines in crude oil prices. According to AAA, the average nationwide price for unleaded regular gasoline was $2.33 a gallon yesterday, essentially unchanged from the day before and up nearly 3 cents from a month ago.

"Though gasoline prices have dropped in the last couple of days by a fraction of a cent, they are still historically high gasoline prices," said John Townsend, a spokesman for AAA. "The yearly average price for 2006 was the highest pump price paid ever in history." Regular unleaded prices in 2006 averaged $2.57 a gallon, up 31 cents from hurricane-ravaged 2005.

Townsend said that because several factors had contributed to high prices last year, it was harder for consumers to comprehend. "There were a lot of little cuts that all added up to a lot of bloodletting at the pump," he said.

This week, however, the bloodletting was on Wall Street. The swift drop in prices fueled questions about whether a hedge fund had taken a major hit, but the funds remained mum about their positions.

"We don't know the carnage yet," said Peter Fusaro, chairman of Global Change Associates and founder of a listing of hedge funds. But Fusaro said that European investors were still adding money to hedge funds, many of them trading energy.

Many investment banks have been forecasting relatively high oil prices for 2007. Barclays Capital predicts the price of West Texas Intermediate grade crude will average $76 a barrel, Lehman Brothers says it will average $73.50 and Goldman Sachs in December trimmed its forecast to a still-pricey $72.50.

Many of these investment banks say they expect oil and gas prices to stabilize because index funds will finish rebalancing their portfolios and OPEC could trim its output further. OPEC cut production in October and in December agreed to reduce it again starting Feb. 1. Later in the year, geopolitical factors could crimp supplies, and the summer driving season will return. Motor fuel demand has shown little sign of slackening despite high prices.

Qatar's oil minister, Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah, helped stop this week's slide in prices by telling Bloomberg News yesterday that OPEC was "very concerned" about the price drop. "For now there's no need before our meeting in March, but we have no objection to a meeting if prices continue to fall," he said.

Even with mild weather, oil inventories in the world's industrialized countries have been declining at a rate of about 1 million barrels a day, noted Edward Morse, chief energy economist for Lehman Brothers. Morse expects prices to level off.

"OPEC was meeting on Dec 14, and the rhetoric from OPEC was pretty bullish," said Adam Sieminski, chief energy economist of Deutsche Bank. "Then the oil traders got back to their desks on Jan. 3 and they looked out the window and people were stretching with their shirts off in front of the Nymex."

Sieminski, who expects prices to average $62 a barrel this year, said oil could drop to $50 in the near term because of the warm weather. But, he added, "with OPEC already cutting output and poised to cut more, we believe that oil prices are not likely to rest at the $50 a barrel level . . . even if prices do 'test' that level."

"This seems to be a bit of a short-term knee-jerk reaction to the weather," agreed Doug Leggate, oil analyst at Citigroup. He said that prices would head higher again as the summer driving season approaches because, he argued, the same bottlenecks involving the blending of ethanol and gasoline that helped drive up prices last year would happen again.

Even if prices stayed around this level, Leggate said, "that's not a low number."

Gauging The Demand (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

With great hoopla, automakers will unveil futuristic prototypes next week at the Detroit auto show, including advanced hybrids and a gas-electric sports car, the FT-HS, from Toyota.

DOJ_NMG_0113997

The only problem is that some of the technology being touted exists only as fancy fiberglass models.

The buzz machine shifts into high gear tomorrow with carmakers competing to demonstrate their concern about high gas prices, U.S. dependence on foreign oil and global warming. But despite all the glitz, what Americans will drive in the next few years will look a lot like what they drive today. Industry analysts say automakers won't have significant numbers of alternative-energy vehicles -- hybrids, diesels and plug-ins -- for sale until well after the turn of the decade.

The hype is racing ahead of consumer appetite for alternative-fuel vehicles, industry experts say. Only a small fraction of the cars on the roads are hybrids and diesels, which get better fuel mileage than gasoline-only cars and burn cleaner than they used to. While such vehicles have distinct advantages, consumers for the most part seem unwilling to pay their higher prices. As a result, carmakers will push ahead cautiously before deciding to turn out large numbers of the vehicles.

Auto companies are hesitant about the price of new technology. In hybrids, batteries and other components add $1,500 to $3,000 to the cost of each vehicle. Current cost pressures have auto companies scrounging to save as little as half a cent on some parts.

But the manufacturers are doing everything they can to be perceived as environmentally friendly.

Automakers are "investing large sums of money attacking the problem" of heavy fuel consumption and carbon dioxide emissions, which scientists say lead to global warming, said Tom Purves, chief executive of BMW's North American operations. "As an industry, I believe we've never worked as hard on these problems."

Environmental groups contend that the companies are delivering "automotive vaporware" to deflect attention from political momentum in Washington that could force them to boost fuel efficiency. The groups say carmakers are also trying to stay out of the crosshairs of a looming federal debate on global warming. The car companies have gone to court to fight attempts by states to regulate global-warming gases and have resisted attempts by U.S. lawmakers to mandate fuel efficiency increases.

"We would be much more impressed if GM were to say the U.S. needs to cap greenhouse gas emissions. That would be a wonderful new concept," said John M. DeCicco, senior fellow at Environmental Defense. "The country needs a climate change policy, and automakers need to step up to the plate."

Vehicles powered by fuels other than gasoline occupy a small corner of the U.S. auto market. Diesels have accounted for about 3 percent of the U.S. market over the past few years, and most are extra-large pickups used as work trucks. Diesels, which get 30 percent better fuel mileage than gasoline-powered cars, account for nearly half of the market in many European countries.

Though still small, hybrid sales are growing steadily. In 2006, automakers sold 255,000 hybrids, according to estimates by J.D. Power and Associates. This year, the figure is projected to be 350,000, in part because Toyota is increasing production of its popular Prius. Even with the growth, analysts don't expect hybrids to reach 1 million units, or 5 percent of the total market, until after 2011.

Plug-in technology is probably even further in the future because battery technology does not yet exist. Several sources in the industry said they expect Toyota to add plug-in power to the next-generation Prius, which is due later in the decade. Toyota declined to comment. Later this year, Toyota will bring out the Lexus LS 600h, a hybrid version of the luxury brand's flagship sedan.

Analysts say hybrid demand could dry up as early adopters finally get their hands on Priuses after waiting-list delays.

"Everybody who wants a hybrid is probably driving one," said Eric Fedewa, an industry analyst with CSM Worldwide. "There might not be substantial upside on the numbers unless there is legislative change or fuel prices change dramatically."

Other hybrids will go on sale this year. They include the Nissan Altima sedan and the Saturn Aura. GM will also begin selling hybrid versions of the Chevrolet Tahoe and GMC Yukon sport-utility vehicles. Dodge plans to introduce a hybrid version of its Durango SUV later in the year.

European automakers have been at the forefront of pushing acceptance of diesel technology. Despite diesels' fuel economy, the U.S. government has long considered their tailpipe emissions to be a health hazard. Manufacturers have talked up the new technology and worked with federal regulators to improve diesel fuel and engines to address air-quality concerns.

"Increasingly, people are going to become aware of the fact that there is more than one solution," said Purves, the BMW executive.

Just a few new diesels are due over the next few months, including a diesel version of the Jeep Grand Cherokee. Automakers will monitor how consumers react to them before they make plans to expand model lines or add production, said Fedewa, the CSM Worldwide analyst. "If we see that consumers buy every one that's made, then we know diesels are going to be strong sellers in North America," he said.

Other big automakers, such as Volkswagen and BMW, have pushed diesel introductions to 2008 in order to meet clean-air standards in all 50 states. BMW said it will bring a new diesel vehicle to the U.S. market in 2008, but so far the company won't identify the model.

DOJ_NMG_0113998

Purves said improving fuel efficiency and reducing emissions is expensive and technologically challenging. He said any tax breaks Congress enacts should include credits for diesel-powered cars. "You shouldn't discourage diesels here," Purves said. "You shouldn't have legislation that backs one horse."

Outdated And Inefficient (WSJ)

By William H. Donaldson, Harvey L. Pitt

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

In 1934, Congress created the Securities and Exchange Commission and employed an ingenious approach -- a partnership between government and the private sector. The SEC was given pervasive authority to proscribe and pursue fraudulent, deceptive or manipulative conduct. As an extra measure of investor protection, the securities industry was charged with defining (and disciplining those who engaged in) unethical and unacceptable business practices even if those practices didn't rise to the level of illegality. Although this system worked well, eventually the evolution of markets, advance of technology, and concept of for-profit securities markets made manifest that this system was outmoded, and highlighted the critical need to restructure and revitalize our system of securities industry self-regulation.

As Theodore Roosevelt noted, people are destined to be regulated, and their choices are either to regulate themselves, or sit back and wait for the government to do it for, and to, them. We think the NASD and the New York Stock Exchange deserve strong support for their recently announced, sensible and much-needed plan to improve securities industry self-regulation. It's the first significant change in the self-regulatory regime in this country in more than 70 years. Reform is due, and the plan is timely, well thought out and comprehensive.

Despite government's increasing role, there remains an important need for securities industry self-regulation. Given some of the lapses we've seen over the last several years, the need for high ethical standards and business practices is more important than ever. And yet, under the current, outmoded system, there are conflicting standards, inefficiencies and waste. Almost 200 firms are regulated by both organizations as well as the SEC. Under the current system, they're subject to dual -- but not always consistent -- rulebooks, examinations, investigations, sweeps and enforcement actions. Much of that burden is passed on to thousands of smaller securities firms through their clearing firms. The system is redundant and inefficient and in that context doesn't benefit either investors or the industry.

The proposed merger of the NASD and NYSE regulatory regimes put forward last month is in the best traditions of the government-private sector partnership Congress envisioned when it enacted the federal securities laws. Both of us, during our tenures at the SEC, were concerned about eliminating the overlap, duplication and excessive costs of self-regulation, while strengthening the industry's commitment to leading the way in developing best-in-class standards.

The proposal put forth by the NYSE and NASD is an important step forward in achieving these objectives. By establishing a single, independent self-regulatory organization (SRO) to oversee securities firms, the plan would eliminate complexity and confusion that doesn't increase investor protection -- and that, after all, is the ultimate goal of regulation. And the plan should reduce the cost of effective regulation across the board, helping firms of all sizes.

More than merely eliminating redundancy and attendant costs, the new SRO structure will make meaningful contributions to enhanced regulation. The significant knowledge, experience and expertise of broker dealer regulation that now resides in two separate organizations will be consolidated and housed in one. Rule writing, examination and enforcement will be enhanced, and information sharing, which is an important factor in effective regulation, will be improved.

The plan also addresses the important issue of governance. A majority of the new organization's Board of Governors will be from outside the industry, a check and balance critical to ensuring that investors' interests will be protected. At the same time, the governance structure of the new SRO also promises fair and balanced industry participation, thus assuring that the board's decisions will be informed by the views and insights of all segments of the industry. Under the plan, firms of all sizes will have the opportunity to voice their opinions and make their concerns known.

The dual regulation that exists today isn't well suited to a world in which there is keen and growing competition among strong capital market centers around the globe. The self-regulatory status quo does not work. The SEC's agenda is to ensure that self-regulation becomes even more effective and efficient, in order to enhance investor protection, while enhancing the competitiveness of our capital markets.

The NASD-NYSE plan is a good one on its own merits, and it offers the industry an important, and perhaps its only, opportunity to shape its own future. The SEC can't allow the current self-regulatory system to continue as is. With the SROs and the industry taking the lead, the need for a governmental solution is eliminated, and that's always a preferable course.

We look forward to the completion of this important initiative, and commend not only the self-regulators who have initiated it, but also the members of the industry who, we are certain, will hasten to make this proposal a reality.

Messrs. Donaldson and Pitt are former chairmen of the SEC.

DOJ_NMG_0113999

Republican Sen. Sam Brownback Set To Move Forward With Presidential Run (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON Jan 5, 2007 (AP)— Sen. Sam Brownback, a Kansas Republican and favorite son of the religious right, will officially enter the presidential race later this month in his home state.

"He will be fully announcing on January 20 in Topeka, Kansas," Brian Hart, the senator's spokesman, said Friday. The move was expected even though Brownback set up an exploratory committee in December to gauge whether he had enough support for a full-blown campaign.

After the announcement in Kansas, Hart said Brownback will fly to Washington to participate in the anti-abortion march marking the anniversary of the Supreme Court ruling.

Brownback is a lesser-known candidate in a crowded GOP presidential field that likely will include Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Rudy Giuliani, the former New York City mayor. Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor, rounds out the top tier. All three are considering runs but, to various extents, also have records or positions on social or fiscal issues that don't sit well with the Republican base.

So, Brownback a Catholic revered by the GOP's conservative wing for his opposition to abortion and gay marriage sees an opening in the race for someone like him. "I am an economic, a fiscal, a social and a compassionate conservative," Brownback said last month.

At the time, Brownback also called for a return to an American culture that promotes family values. He said the main focus of his campaign would be "to save and improve lives, rebuild families and renew the culture" in the United States that supports the institution of family.

Brownback, 50, was raised on a farm near tiny Parker, Kan. population 281 today where his parents still live.

His first foray into national politics was in 1976 while a student at Kansas State University, where he campaigned for Ronald Reagan in his unsuccessful quest to wrest the GOP nomination from Gerald Ford.

After receiving his law degree from the University of Kansas in 1982, he practiced law in Manhattan, Kan., and served as secretary of the state board of agriculture. He was named a White House fellow in 1990, and worked in the office of the U.S. trade representative.

Owens To Join Romney Presidential Team (DENP)

By Christa Marshall

Denver Post, January 6, 2007

Washington - Outgoing Colorado Governor Bill Owens has joined the senior advisory team of former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who is gearing up for a 2008 presidential bid.

Romney, 59, has not announced his candidacy officially, but submitted paperwork this week to form a presidential advisory committee, the first step in a race for the White House. If elected, he would be the first Mormon president.

Owens, a two-term governor who worked with Romney at the National Governors Association, revealed his support for the Massachusetts Republican last night on the Hugh Hewitt Show, a conservative talk radio program.

"I think he's (Romney's) one of the brightest people I've ever seen in public office," Owens said on the show. "He's a businessman, he's a manager. He is a conservative, he wants to cut taxes."

Owens added he had doubts about the conservative credentials of other potential candidates and was impressed by Romney's organization of the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City before becoming Massachusetts's governor the same year.

In a statement, Romney said he was pleased to have a senior advisor who was elected to the Colorado governorship with the greatest majority in the state's history.

"In his eight years as Governor of Colorado, he has shown a commitment to finding the kinds of new and innovative solutions that America needs if we are to meet a new generation of challenges," Romney said.

Owens could not be reached for comment today.

Owens joins U.S. Representative Marsha Blackburn, R- Tenn., as a senior advisor on the Romney for President Exploratory Committee, Inc.

Leaked Notes On '08 Show Giuliani Without The Spin (NYT)

By Joyce Purnick

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

The country sure has been enjoying itself reading about the Rudy Caper, feasting on the inside dish gleaned from Rudolph W. Giuliani's presidential playbook.

DOJ_NMG_0114000

The purloined or lost document gives outsiders a glimpse behind the curtain, a rare look at political calculations that, if predictable in their revelations, are decidedly surprising in their candor. Irresistible. The unexpected — the macaca tidbit, it might be called today — is always irresistible in the game of control that is politics.

Consider the alternative: Mr. Giuliani's own site on the Internet JoinRudy2008.com, which went up last month when he formed his presidential exploratory committee. Anyone with a computer can access the cheerful red, white and blue site to learn how the former mayor wants the public to see him, how he would like to be portrayed in a presidential campaign.

The Rudy Giuliani portrayed on JoinRudy2008.com is a dragon slayer with a record of unmitigated success. He is a man with an open smile, replacing the fearsome City Hall scowl that he used so often to great effect.

While the site is shiny and superspun, the campaign document — whether it was stolen and leaked by a Giuliani political opponent as the former mayor contends, or provided to The Daily News by someone sympathetic to a rival, as the newspaper contends — is dark and forthright.

And so the leaked campaign notebook has created a stir, and surely not for its contents. What else should Giuliani advisers do but plan to raise a lot of money from the superrich, and worry about their man's political vulnerabilities?

The Giuliani campaign document is anti-spin. Meant for insider eyes, it concedes that Mr. Giuliani as a presidential candidate may have to contend with such trouble as questions about his former wife, Donna Hanover, and his former associate, the controversial Bernard B. Kerik. It cites concerns about Mr. Giuliani's relatively liberal positions on social issues — stances not likely to find favor with the Republican Party's conservative wing.

This is all surely true.

The other way to look at these matters is: Don't look at them. That is the JoinRudy2008.com Web site's way.

For instance, the Web site liberally features Judith Nathan, Mr. Giuliani's current wife, providing a polished version of her career, accompanied by two flattering photographs.

Nowhere on the site is there even a mention of Ms. Hanover, married to Mr. Giuliani for 18 years and the mother of his two children. They divorced in 2002 after Mr. Giuliani announced to a stunned press corps, without, Ms. Hanover later said, telling her first, that the couple was splitting up.

The Web site doesn't mention Mr. Giuliani's first wife either, Regina Peruggi.

It does not mention the former mayor's two children, Andrew and Caroline.

It does not mention Mr. Kerik, the disgraced former police commissioner who would have been the secretary of homeland security today if his messy past hadn't caught up with him.

It does not mention Amadou Diallo, the unarmed West African immigrant whose death in 1999 in a fusillade of 41 police bullets was one of the most wrenching episodes of the Giuliani mayoralty.

The Web site does not cite the social issues referred to in the leaked document either — his support for abortion rights, civil rights for gay people, and gun control, for instance — positions that are not popular with many conservative Republicans.

As many political analysts have frequently pointed out, his record and conduct before the Sept. 11 attack are not well known to those beyond the borders of New York City, and as a private citizen for the last five years, he has often been able to stay above the political infighting on issues like Iraq or global warming, unless he has chosen to get involved.

The Web site won't fill in the blanks, focusing as it naturally does on Mr. Giuliani's strongest and best-known accomplishments, from presiding over a significant reduction in crime to becoming "America's Mayor" after Sept. 11.

His record is portrayed only in a successful light.

Missing is any reference to the famous Giuliani combativeness, which he and many (not all) New Yorkers seemed to relish; that crime had actually begun to go down before he took office; that the city, which improved in many areas during his mayoralty, was still not a utopia after two terms of his leadership; that polls showed that many New Yorkers, including some who had voted for him, had grown weary of his pugnacious style.

Asked about the site's contents yesterday, a spokeswoman for Mr. Giuliani, Sunny Mindel, said she would not comment.

The Web sites of other prospective candidates are just as relentlessly positive because, political strategists note, they are no more than the cyberspace version of campaign brochures.

Most voters recognize the limitations of today's managed politics, those same strategists say — from the sound bite to the carefully modulated speech — and so relish the unscripted moments. Almost as much as reporters do.

Obama To Headline Big Fundraiser (WP)

By Tim Craig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Money Will Help Party's Bid to Defeat GOP Legislators This Fall

DOJ_NMG_0114001

RICHMOND, Jan. 5 -- U.S. Sen. Barack Obama, a possible presidential candidate next year, will be the featured guest at a major fundraiser for the Virginia Democratic Party next month, his spokesman said Friday.

The Illinois Democrat will speak to 2,000 donors and activists at the party's annual Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner here.

The first-term senator's participation comes as he considers running for the White House, a prospect generating a lot of buzz among Virginia Democrats, and as national Democratic Party leaders recognize that Virginia has become more competitive, especially in the northern suburbs.

James Webb upset Sen. George Allen (R) in November, and Democrats have won the past two elections for governor. The $165-a-ticket dinner is designed to help the party raise money for its efforts to unseat Republican legislators this fall. The GOP controls both houses of the General Assembly.

Robert Gibbs, Obama's communications director, said the senator is eager to help Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) and the state party.

"Sen. Obama is an admirer of Gov. Kaine's and believes that Gov. Kaine is somebody who demonstrates that working together to get something done is not just a slogan," Gibbs said.

Because Obama could announce his plans as soon as this month, his speech at the fundraiser at the Richmond Convention Center could prompt a lot of discussion about Virginia's role in the presidential race.

Virginia's Democratic presidential primary has been held relatively early in past elections, before any candidate had the nomination locked up.

In 2004, Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts, then-Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina and retired Army Gen. Wesley K. Clark spoke at the Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner, which was held days before the primary.

Kerry easily won the Virginia primary, and Clark and Edwards dropped out of the race shortly thereafter.

If Obama enters the 2008 race and stays in it until the primary Feb. 12, Virginia Democrats say, he will probably be a major factor in the state's nominating contest.

"Barack is an exciting, substantive, inspiring speaker and leader. He has to be at the very top of potential candidates," said Del. Brian J. Moran (D-Arlington), chairman of his party's caucus in the House.

Democratic leaders are also hopeful that the party's nominee in 2008 will break the GOP's grip on the state's 13 electoral votes. A Democratic presidential nominee hasn't won the state since 1964.

Obama has made several high-profile visits to Virginia in recent months.

Last fall, he headlined two rallies for Webb during his heated contest with Allen. Thousands of people attended the rallies in Old Town Alexandria and Richmond. When Obama finished speaking at each, the crush of admirers and autograph-seekers swarming around him was so large that his staff had trouble clearing a path for him to his car.

Obama also campaigned for Kaine during the final days of the 2005 governor's race, which helped energize black voters.

Other potential Democratic presidential candidates were also visible in the state on behalf of Webb. Kerry, Edwards and Clark made appearances, as did New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, whom many Democrats regard as the front-runner for the nomination if she enters the race.

But many Democratic organizations and candidates across the country have come to rely on Obama to draw a crowd.

Obama headlined the West Virginia Democratic Party's Jefferson-Jackson Day Dinner in September. Party leaders said Obama's presence made the dinner the most well-attended in its history, according to local media accounts.

Former Democratic Party Boss Lambasts Kerry Campaign (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON - Former Democratic Party boss and Clinton friend Terry McAuliffe is lambasting John Kerry's unsuccessful presidential campaign, calling his effort to unseat President Bush "one of the biggest acts of political malpractice in the history of American politics."

In his scrappy memoir, McAuliffe criticizes the 2004 campaign that he was responsible for defending but ultimately lost to what he describes as a more organized Republican machine. McAuliffe calls the Kerry campaign gun-shy, distracted and incompetent.

McAuliffe is close to Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton and will support her presidential bid if the New York senator runs in 2008. McAuliffe's book, published by Thomas Dunne Books, could serve as the opening salvo against a potential Clinton rival as Kerry weighs another bid. However, McAuliffe has kind words for other possible candidates, such as Sens. Barack Obama and Chris Dodd and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack.

The book, "What a Party! My Life Among Democrats: Presidents, Candidates, Donors, Activists, Alligators and Other Wild Animals," goes on sale Jan. 23, but copies have already shown up in some bookstores.

DOJ_NMG_0114002

McAuliffe plans a 25-city tour to promote the memoir and parties to celebrate its publication _ Feb. 8 in Washington hosted by Mrs. Clinton and Jan. 22 in New York City hosted by former President Clinton.

The book is full of revelations from McAuliffe's years among the power elite _ getting a startling leg rub from Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat at a dinner, watching movie stars Ben Affleck and Gwyneth Paltrow smooching during a showing of "Good Will Hunting" at Camp David and being chastised by former President George H.W. Bush during the 2000 election for treating his son with such "disgrace."

He had an insider's look at the Clintons' marriage during the Monica Lewinsky scandal _ going along on a chilly Clinton family vacation to Utah a month after the impeachment vote and watching Mrs. Clinton silently click through channel after channel reporting on her husband's infidelities before settling on ESPN. He wrote that the president described the period to him as "an absolute living hell."

McAuliffe served as chairman of the Democratic National Committee from 2001 to 2005, although he says Kerry's aides wanted to oust him once the Massachusetts senator secured the nomination. He said he was never invited to a single meeting at Kerry headquarters.

Kerry spokesman David Wade said although many people wish the outcome of the 2004 election had been different, Kerry is proud of the hard work of his campaign staff and McAuliffe's efforts as party chairman. "It's time to look forward, not backwards," Wade said.

McAuliffe said Kerry's camp was so afraid of offending swing voters that it didn't defend his record or criticize Bush. He said he was muzzled by Kerry's aides from assailing Bush's military record.

He said the campaign also ordered speeches at the Democratic National Convention to be scrubbed of any mention of Bush's name or his record _ although McAuliffe privately encouraged firebrand Al Sharpton to go ahead with his attacks on the president in his crowd-pleasing speech.

"I thought the decision of the Kerry campaign to back off any real criticism of Bush was one of the biggest acts of political malpractice in the history of American politics," he said.

Meanwhile, Republicans went on a sharp tirade against Kerry at their convention. But when Bush said in an interview on the first day that he didn't think the U.S. could win the war on terror, Kerry did not respond. The Massachusetts senator was windsurfing off Nantucket, unaware of the president's comments.

McAuliffe said Kerry later told him that was one of the biggest mistakes of his campaign. "I should have gotten off the island," McAuliffe quotes Kerry as saying.

McAuliffe said he was "flabbergasted" to learn after the election that Kerry had $15 million left that he could have spent in the final push. "It was gross incompetence to hoard that money when the race was bound to be so close," McAuliffe said.

McAuliffe said Republicans told him they were shocked that Kerry just took the attacks on his military record, but also overjoyed. He said Bush called President Clinton while he was recovering from his heart attack in September 2004 and said, "The Kerry campaign is the most inept group I have ever seen in politics. Don't let them ruin your reputation."

He said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., asked him why Kerry wasn't fighting back more. "My guy (Bush) is no great shakes, but your guy (Kerry) looks like a wimp," McAuliffe quotes McCain as saying.

Kerry's former running mate, John Edwards, also was frustrated with the campaign, according to McAuliffe. McAuliffe said Edwards was angered that the campaign wouldn't let him go after Bush, but Kerry disputed Edwards' claim and said he was frustrated his vice presidential pick wasn't campaigning harder.

Goal Is To Look Good, Writer Of Democratic Memoir Admits (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 — Most memoirs — and virtually all memoirs by people in politics — are heavily varnished and blatantly self-serving. Say this for Terry McAuliffe, the former Democratic Party chairman and fund-raiser extraordinaire: at least he admits it right up front in his author's note.

"This is my book and I've done my best to make myself look good," he writes in his new memoir with the ungainly title, "What a Party! My Life Among Democrats: Presidents, Candidates, Donors, Activists, Alligators and Other Wild Animals" (Thomas Dunne Books).

"Even if you think I'm full of it, I bet I can still make you laugh."

There are any number of humorous anecdotes sprinkled among the chest-deep pile of dropped names in the 406-page volume, including Yasir Arafat's repeatedly rubbing Mr. McAuliffe's leg under the table at a dinner in Washington in 2000 and the South Korean secret police's warning the White House in 1998 that President Bill Clinton had spent most of the night in a hotel room in Seoul with "a good-looking younger man." That younger man was Mr. McAuliffe, who had been up late playing cards with his buddy the president.

DOJ_NMG_0114003

And he shares the tale of getting up on stage half-plastered at the Foxwoods Casino in Connecticut to sing "Will You Still Love Me Tomorrow?" to nail down a $500,000 contribution from the chief of the Mashantucket Pequot Indians. There are two sections of photographs, a portable version of the Washington Power Wall, displaying the author with all manner of celebrities and potentates: Jimmy Carter, Kevin Spacey, Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., Richard A. Gephardt, Pope John Paul II, Al Gore, Chris Tucker and Cicely Tyson, Hillary Rodham Clinton, Olivia Newton-John, Edward M. Kennedy and John Kerry, Ariel Sharon, King Juan Carlos of Spain, Mikhail Baryshnikov.

And a Washington memoir would not be complete without a little old-school score settling, in this case with Mr. Kerry, who lost the 2004 presidential campaign despite what Mr. McAuliffe portrays as his own Herculean efforts.

Mr. Kerry's biggest blunder, in Mr. McAuliffe's account, was to forbid any attacks on President Bush from the lectern at the 2004 Democratic convention. Mr. McAuliffe calls that decision "one of the biggest acts of political malpractice in the history of American politics."

He also knocks Mr. Kerry for not responding forcefully to the Swift boat group's attacks on his military record and for hoarding money at the end of his campaign, ending the contest with a surplus of $15 million that Mr. McAuliffe believes would have made the difference in Ohio, the decisive state.

David Wade, a spokesman for Mr. Kerry, said that his boss was grateful for Mr. McAuliffe's "incredible" efforts in the 2004 campaign and that he wished the outcome had been different. But, Mr. Wade added, "it's time to look forward, not backwards."

Mr. McAuliffe, reached on the golf course at the Army-Navy Club in Arlington, Va., on Friday afternoon said, "Kerry and I went through all these issues, and he agrees with me on every one."

He added, before teeing off with Mr. Clinton, "I say a lot of nice things about Kerry in the book, too."

Buckley Quits Race For State Dem Chair (NHUL)

New Hampshire Union Leader, January 6, 2007

MANCHESTER – Party vice chair Raymond Buckley, facing a criminal probe, withdrew this afternoon as a candidate to succeed Kathy Sullivan as chair of the New Hampshire Democratic State Committee.

UnionLeader.com has learned that Manchester police began an investigation of Buckley at the request of the Attorney General's office after Gov. John Lynch received a complaint linking him to pornography. Buckley tonight denied any wrongdoing.

"After much consideration and discussion with family and friends, I have decided for personal reasons that it does not make sense for me to seek the chairmanship of the N.H. Democratic State Committee at this time in my life," the veteran Manchester political activist said in an afternoon press release.

Tonight, in a statement, Buckley said, "These politically motivated allegations are completely false. I have no doubt that the allegations will be proven baseless but I am angry beyond belief that the politics of personal destruction have come to New Hampshire."

A letter letter containing allegations against Buckley was sent to Gov. John Lynch's office late last week, said spokesman Colin Manning. The letter was reviewed on Tuesday, and immediately referred to the state Attorney General's office for investigation, Manning said.

Lynch told party officials Buckley should not run for the chairmanship given the allegations, said Manning, who would not say whether Buckley was spoken to directly.

Ray Buckley (left) took the stage with Democratic National Committee Chairman Terry McAuliffe at a rally in Derry on Sept. 19, 2004. (AP)

"The governor made it clear to state party officials he did not feel Ray Buckley should run with this matter pending," Manning said.

Sullivan nevertheless defended her longtime political ally tonight. She issued a one-sentence statement saying "Raymond will be exonerated, and I believe he will be vindicated of these politically motivated charges."

In a prepared statement earlier this afternoon, Sullivan had said: "Raymond Buckley's contributions to the state and national Democratic Party and the state of New Hampshire are many, and we are so grateful for his service. I am very sorry that he has decided not to run; he would have been an excellent state party chair. A lot of the credit for our successes in 2006 has to go to my friend, Raymond Buckley."

When called at her law office and asked if law enforcement authorities have seized Buckley's or any computers at state Democratic headquarters, the outgoing party chair refused to answer. Sullivan said, "I'm going home."

Manchester Deputy Police Chief Glenn Leidemer, who heads the department's investigative division, confirmed that Buckley is the target of a criminal investigation. "Through the Attorney General's office, we received a complaint against Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0114004

Buckley. Our department is in the early stages of investigating the complaint. Based on this being an ongoing, active investigation, I am not going to comment on the nature of the complaint nor am I going to identify the person who brought the allegation forward," he said.

Three sources, including city GOP activist Joe Kelly Levasseur, said the letter to Lynch was sent by Manchester Rep. Steve Vaillancourt, a Republican who shared a house with Buckley several years ago.

Vallancourt refused to comment directly when asked if he sent the letter.

Buckley, 47, of Manchester, is a veteran campaign strategist. He serves as chair of the Eastern Region Caucus of the Democratic National Committee and sits on the DNC executive committee. He is a national at-large board member of the National Stonewall Democrats, an lobbying group of gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered party activists.

He is also the director of the state Senate Democratic Caucus political action committee, which raised nearly $1 million to help Democrats win control of the state Senate in November.

Ray Buckley was a speaker at the 2000 Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles. (AP)

He served one term as a Manchester alderman and is a former executive director of the Democratic State Committee, a member of the Democratic National Committee's executive committee and vice president of the Association of State Democratic Chairs.

The 28-year member of the state party committee is in his fifth term as the chair of the Manchester City Democrats and served eight terms in the state House of Representatives.

Within days of Sullivan's decision not to seek a fifth term as chair, he was endorsed by Sullivan, Gov. John Lynch, Senate President Sylvia Larsen, House Speaker Terri Norelli, and the state's two newly-elected congressmen, Paul Hodes and Carol Shea-Porter.

Buckley's list of supporters also included all 14 Democratic state senators, the officers of the state Democratic Party, Democratic National Committee members Anita Freedman and Gaetan DiGangi, six former Democratic state chairs, former U.S. Sen. John Durkin, former U.S. Reps. Norman D'Amours and Dick Swett, nine Democratic county chairs and the leadership of the Young Democrats.

Buckley said this afternoon that "an outstanding public servant" would enter the race to succeed Sullivan. Former House Minority Leader Jim Craig of Manchester is that replacement candidate.

Craig issued a statement announcing that he has the backing of Lynch, Larsen and Norelli.

State Rep. Betty Hall, 85, is the only other announced candidate. The party election will take place Saturday, March 24, at the Institute of Politics at St. Anselm College in Manchester.

At Inauguration, Governor Praises The Central Path (SFC)

By Mark Martin

San Francisco Chronicle, January 6, 2007

Sacramento -- Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger cast himself Friday as the leader of a "post-partisan" movement that would give birth to innovative ideas through collaboration, not party warfare, urging leaders in his second inaugural address to govern from a "dynamic center that is not held captive by either the left or the right or the past."

In a 15-minute speech, the Republican governor made no policy proposals and instead focused entirely on tone, rejecting the liberal versus conservative battleground in favor of the pragmatic middle.

Aides said the message, from a governor who bucked a national anti-GOP trend last fall by cruising to re-election, was aimed beyond the state toward a national audience.

"The American people are instinctively centrist," the governor insisted. "So should be our government. America's political parties should return to the center. They should return to the center where the people are."

Schwarzenegger, who broke his right leg skiing two weeks ago and hadn't been seen in public since, delivered the speech standing at a podium in the ornate Memorial Auditorium in Sacramento after walking on stage with crutches. He was sworn in by California Supreme Court Chief Justice Ronald George while standing, but he leaned on first lady Maria Shriver, who gripped his left arm as he raised his right hand and took the oath of office.

Rumors had swirled in Sacramento throughout the week about how the image-conscious governor would appear, and internal administration suggestions about using a wheelchair were dismissed as appearing too weak for a former Mr. Olympia.

Schwarzenegger gave his speech standing without crutches and without referring to his condition. Others noted it, however: Emcee and former San Francisco Mayor Willie Brown called Shriver "foxy and sexy" as he introduced her, saying he could make the remarks because Schwarzenegger couldn't chase him down.

Schwarzenegger's second and last term began more than three years after he stunned the world by quitting his movie career to run in the recall election. In November 2003, he took office as an international curiosity; on Friday, his celebrity was far less of a story. "Entertainment Tonight" did not cover this inaugural as it did the last time, and the number of credentialed media was 316, down from more than 700 before.

DOJ_NMG_0114005

The speech did invoke some of the same themes as the 2003 version, however.

Then, he said the recall election demanded a change in the political climate and a new culture in Sacramento.

On Friday, the governor conceded he had stumbled on those ideals in 2005, when he called for a special election that created war between the governor and Democrats and ended in disaster for him when all of his initiatives failed. Schwarzenegger has freely admitted the special election was a mistake and did so again Friday as he called for four years of the kind of cooperation that led last year to deals with Democrats on such issues as raising the minimum wage, spending on public works projects and curbing greenhouse gas emissions.

Cooperation is what the people want, he said.

"The people are disgusted with a mind-set that would rather get nothing done than accomplish something through compromise," he said.

Schwarzenegger argued that both liberal ideas like the New Deal and conservative ones espoused by Ronald Reagan were important to the country's history, but "it is time we combined the best of both ideologies into a new creative center." He noted that that the number of registered voters not affiliated with either party could become the majority in the next 20 years.

Schwarzenegger is hardly the first politician to call for bipartisanship.

Former Gov. Gray Davis, who was kicked out of office when Schwarzenegger won the recall, said he delivered a similar message in his 1999 inaugural.

"I said then I didn't care if the ideas came from the right or the left as long as they moved the state forward," said Davis, who attended the ceremony Friday with his wife, Sharon.

But others said Schwarzenegger's message was coming in the right place at the right time.

Assembly Speaker Fabian Núñez, D-Los Angeles, who has become perhaps the governor's strongest ally in the Legislature, said the deals struck in Sacramento in 2006 were in contrast to stalemates on major issues in Washington, D.C. Núñez noted that Congress and other states could learn from the lessons in California, saying Schwarzenegger's call for cooperation "isn't just empty words. There's a lot of accomplishment to back this up."

The speech could mark a turning point in the governor's still-nascent political career. Aides say he is planning to travel to states around the country to deliver remarks with a similar bipartisan theme in hopes of influencing national politics.

While the governor is constitutionally barred from running for president because he is foreign-born, he clearly wants to be a national figure.

But whether his message will resonate elsewhere remains to be seen, one political analyst noted.

Schwarzenegger is too unique to be a national model, said Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia's Center for Politics.

Sabato said Schwarzenegger has to appeal to moderates and independents to win in California. And because he can't run for president, he doesn't have to play to the partisan Republican base as he moves forward, he said.

"Schwarzenegger is the moderate for Republicans nationally," Sabato said. "The problem is that almost none of them can afford to follow because their constituency is far more conservative. ... There will be plenty of Republicans wishing they could follow Arnold's footsteps, but the reality is that we will see very few pupils following the master."

And in Sacramento, as Schwarzenegger prepares to tackle an ambitious agenda including revamping health insurance, fixing a broken-down prison system and addressing always-contentious water issues, the governor's centrist mantra is likely to be tested by the push and pull that comes with deeply divisive issues. Friday was marked by mostly friendly platitudes and gestures -- Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata, D-Oakland, held Schwarzenegger's crutches as he made remarks at a lunch with legislators after his speech -- but that could change.

And legislative Republicans, who often have had an uneasy relationship with a governor far more moderate than most of them, did not exude enthusiasm Friday. Schwarzenegger spent a few minutes in his speech promoting global warming legislation that passed last year with only one Republican vote.

"One person's success is another person's failure," said Assemblyman Rick Keene, R-Chico. "Working together across the aisle, trying to get some things done, is something we're all interested in doing. But when it comes to specific solutions to specific problems, there are going to be a diversity of problems."

Schwarzenegger was sworn in with his hand on a Bible that has been in his family since 1878. The governor missed the first part of the ceremony, which featured diverse acts ranging from a group called the Mariachi Divas to Irish dancers, before appearing on crutches. About 3,000 people attended.

The governor is set to introduce his 2007 agenda, including his budget proposal and a health care reform plan, next week.

DOJ_NMG_0114006

Schwarzenegger Adopts "Centrist" Line (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP) -- Hobbling to his inauguration on crutches, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger promised yesterday not to be beholden to a political party in his second term and declared that "centrist does not mean weak."

Nursing a broken right leg, Mr. Schwarzenegger missed the first part of the program before coming out to deliver his speech.

Centrist "does not mean watered down or warmed over," he said. "It means well-balanced and well-grounded."

The Republican governor said his dismal year in 2005, when a clash with the state's public employees union cut his approval rating in half, had awakened him to a new way of doing business.

"Like Paul on the road to Damascus, I had an experience that opened my eyes," he said. "And what was it that I saw? I saw that people, not just in California, but across the nation, were hungry for a new kind of politics, a politics that looks beyond the old labels, the old ways, the old arguments."

Mr. Schwarzenegger said growing numbers of independent voters are showing the way to a new era of what he called "post-partisanship." And he called for a new "creative center" in politics.

"This is a dynamic center that is not held captive by either the left or the right or the past," he said.

The state's 38th governor was sworn in by California Supreme Court Chief Justice Ronald George, using a Schwarzenegger family Bible from 1878.

To burnish his bipartisan credentials, Mr. Schwarzenegger invited the state's top Democrats, including U.S. Rep. Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, who on Thursday became the first female speaker of the House, and U.S. Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer, although none of them attended.

The master of ceremonies was another famous Democrat, former San Francisco Mayor Willie Brown, who once was speaker of the state Assembly.

The symbolism is important for Mr. Schwarzenegger, who will need the cooperation of Democrats again this year as he attempts ambitious reforms in health care and prisons. Democrats hold majorities in both houses of the California Legislature.

Glitterati, Gawkers Shrug Off Second Inauguration (LAT)

By Scott Martelle, Robert Salladay, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

Three years ago, when the revolution was still new, thousands of people crowded the streets around the state Capitol hoping for a glimpse of Arnold Schwarzenegger and his fellow-travelers — Hollywood celebrities — as California swore in a movie action hero as its 38th governor.

On Friday, the celebrities and the crowds were notably absent, spotlighting the difference between a movie star doing the unusual — winning a gubernatorial recall election — and a now-seasoned politician signing in for four more years.

Not nearly as many people care.

"It seems so long ago," said Bonnie Rose, 58, a hospital lab technician who steered her morning walk past Sacramento Memorial Auditorium hoping for a glimpse of fame. "I think he's looked at more as a governor now" than a political curiosity, she said. "He's proved himself."

With Schwarzenegger's personal party schedule limited by a broken leg, and the drama of the recall election faded into the politically distant past, the governor's second inauguration came off Friday like a small-town parade instead of an international event.

Gone were the global media and TV tabloid shows such as "Access Hollywood." No smiling Jamie Lee Curtis or Danny DeVito, Kelsey Grammer or Dennis Miller were to be found. The only returning celebrities were Rob Lowe and Tom Arnold. "I am the lieutenant governor," Arnold joked to reporters.

But even Bob Saget, who emceed a special "green" program Thursday on the Capitol lawn, had already headed back to Los Angeles and missed the inauguration and Friday night gala.

"It seems like maybe there's a little bit less energy," said Andrew Tescher, manager of Lucca, one of the governor's favorite Sacramento lunch spots. "There seemed to be a lot more energy behind the media last time. There was more hype."

There was more of everything then. About 8,000 people were invited to Schwarzenegger's first inauguration, a big-ticket event in a city unaccustomed to glitz — or hosting international media. On Friday, not even all of the 3,000 expected guests showed up. And the list for media credentials that topped 700 three years ago barely broke 260 this time.

DOJ_NMG_0114007

The program, though, was more varied and crisper, led by former Assembly Speaker, ex-San Francisco Mayor — and legendary Democrat — Willie Brown. Brown joked about helping make California "ungovernable" when he was speaker and said "incredible change" had come to California.

"Under Arnold Schwarzenegger's leadership, and with the incredible cooperation of leaders from both parties, a revolutionary thing has taken place," Brown said to applause. "Things are getting done."

Brown then mispronounced several names of dignitaries on the stage, turning the mayor of San Francisco — Brown's hometown — into "Galvin" instead of Gavin Newsom. Other dignitaries included former Govs. Gray Davis and Pete Wilson; Democratic Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa; and such elected statewide officials as incoming Controller John Chiang and Secretary of State Debra Bowen — both Democrats — as well as departing Republican Secretary of State Bruce McPherson, whom Bowen defeated in November.

There were two prime Democratic absences: Phil Angelides, who is leaving his post as treasurer after getting trounced in the governor's race, and Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante, who lost the insurance commissioner race to Steve Poizner.

The governor's wife, as she did three years ago, played a prominent role in the ceremony. As dramatic New Age music played and images of California's natural wonders flashed on a jumbo video screen, Maria Shriver read a Hopi prayer. "Be good to one another and do not look outside yourself for the leader.... The time of the lonely wolf is over." At the 2003 inaugural, Shriver read a five-minute essay created from the works of poet Maya Angelou.

Invited guests — mostly government figures and Schwarzenegger supporters — had begun lining up outside the red-brick auditorium a few blocks from the Capitol before 10 a.m. A large television screen was set up on the lawn outside for the uninvited to watch the ceremony, but 50-degree air and a stiff, bone-chilling wind made standing still uncomfortable.

About three dozen people — nearly everyone who braved the cold — wound up getting lucky. As Brown began the program, a Schwarzenegger aide emerged with a fistful of tickets in hopes of filling unclaimed seats.

"We were just going to watch a little on the screen," said Elijah Caron as he and fellow state worker Carlos Galindo stepped up to the security table for screening. "Now we're going to see the show."

Jim Devisscher, 53, of Sacramento just missed the cut. As he was waiting for the aide to hand him a ticket, the invocation began inside and organizers barred anyone else from entering.

"This is probably a better view than our seats would have been," he said as he moved closer to the TV screen.

Schwarzenegger Opens In A Sequel (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Jan. 5 — Nursing a broken leg but armed with an electoral mandate, Arnold Schwarzenegger was sworn in Friday to his second term as governor of California.

The ceremony, in a nearly full arena here in the state capital, came two months after Mr. Schwarzenegger's convincing victory over his Democratic challenger, Treasurer Phil Angelides, and two weeks after a painful fall on a ski trip to Sun Valley, Idaho, which shattered his right leg.

Before Friday, Mr. Schwarzenegger had not been seen in public since the accident and his resulting surgery, though photographs had shown the still-buff, preternaturally tan governor looking surprisingly meek in a hospital bed.

So the ceremony served both as a celebration and as a kind of group get-well card, complete with the kind of bipartisan oratory that usually marks the beginning — and usually only the beginning — of any governor's term.

"There is an incredible change that has occurred here in Sacramento," said Willie L. Brown Jr., former San Francisco mayor and onetime Assembly speaker, who acted as the event's rakish master of ceremonies. "Things are getting done. Over the last year it has been dramatically demonstrated, and California is better off for that effort."

Likewise, the inauguration was a chance for Mr. Schwarzenegger to take hold of the political center, something he did effectively during the election year — the accomplishments included passage of a major bill on global warming and another raising the state's minimum wage — and in the election itself, which the governor, a Republican in a predominantly Democratic state, won by drawing large numbers of voters across party lines.

"We must think of ourselves as belonging not to just the Republican Party or the Democratic Party, but to the Party of California," he said in his inaugural speech, moments after taking the oath of office with his wife, Maria Shriver, at his side.

The bipartisanship was evident in the half-dozen prominent California Democrats on the stage at the Memorial Auditorium, a 3,800-seat arena just blocks from the Statehouse. Among them was Gray Davis, whom Mr. Schwarzenegger succeeded after a recall election in 2003.

Mr. Schwarzenegger has already begun to lay out an aggressive agenda for his second term. A major address is set for Monday in which he is expected to announce plans for a sweeping health care overhaul that may include providing medical coverage for 6.5 million uninsured Californians. His State of the State address will be on Tuesday, and the announcement of his budget on Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0114008

Friday's speech was devoted primarily to one topic — centrism in what he called the "nation state" of California — though he struck almost presidential chords when he began his address with references to the war in Iraq, a country he described as "fertile with bloodshed and hate," and the killing in Darfur.

"Faith and hope are two qualities that are in short supply in the world right now," he said. "There are such deep divisions in our human family."

By and large, however, the inauguration was a chance for supporters to enjoy the kind of pomp and star power that Californians have come to expect during Mr. Schwarzenegger's tenure. Jose Feliciano and Jennifer Holliday serenaded the governor at the ceremony, and a gala here Friday night featured Paul Anka and Donna Summer as headliners.

Before the swearing-in, a procession of multiethnic performers took the stage, including an Irish-style dance troupe, a mariachi band, a black gospel choir and a white youth choral group, who performed wearing flag-adorned sweaters and shirts.

Mati Waiya, a ceremonial leader of the Chumash Indian tribe, arrived at the inauguration bearing a condor and an eagle feather, which he said symbolized peace and dignity. Mr. Waiya, who also wore a bear bone through his nose, said he had worked with Mr. Schwarzenegger's transition team after the recall election and had been impressed by the governor's efforts on the environment and his willingness to differ with fellow Republicans.

"I think he's serving both sides," Mr. Waiya said, "but it's nice to see him get the Republicans a little upset."

Indeed, the two major speakers on Friday, other than the governor, were Democrats: Mr. Brown and Ms. Shriver, whose mother is Eunice Kennedy Shriver, sister of President John F. Kennedy. The elder Ms. Shriver, 85, drew a standing ovation as she took the stage.

Mr. Schwarzenegger got a few laughs during his address with his now-familiar comparison of his political career to his action-movie days. "My escapes here have been more hair-raising than anything I've ever done in the movies," he said.

But Mr. Brown got the biggest laugh, when he said Maria Shriver, a former television reporter, had "taken the role of the embedded journalist to the ultimate." Ms. Shriver seemed to enjoy the joke.

Moments later, Mr. Brown went even further, calling Ms. Shriver "foxy and sexy," something he said he would not have had the courage do if Mr. Schwarzenegger, still backstage before being introduced, had been closer at hand. Or not on crutches, for that matter.

Patching Up What's Broken? (WP)

By William Booth, Sonya Geis, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger Limps Toward the Center

All hail the peaceful, prosperous and powerful nation-state of California in all its super-fantastic diverse glory! And just so you get the message: Out comes the multicultural Mariachi Divas, an all-female band fronted by an Irish Italian and including a Samoan and a couple of Mexican Americans, singing the Beatles' "Twist and Shout." There was a gospel choir, too, and precocious children playing harps and a National Guard marching band and the silver-maned Jose Feliciano strumming his acoustic guitar for the national anthem.

Yes! There were the most excellent of production values Friday morning at Memorial Auditorium in Sacramento, with those sweeping, aerial camera shots on the televised version, just like the Academy Awards. Because it was a show, and it was a pretty good one. It was Arnold's second inauguration -- and unlike the first one (boring), his wife, former TV news star Maria Shriver, was clearly in charge of the sequel.

The theme? Make nice.

It is apparently the dawn of "post-partisanship" in California, as Schwarzenegger renounced the "fringes of left and right" (technically, he's still a Republican) and declared the "new creative center."

Gone: references to the Terminator.

You remember the plot. After famously sweeping into office three years ago on a weird and wild wave of populist revolt, the former Mr. Universe famously veered to the right in 2005, and famously got his Austrian butt kicked by a disapproving electorate (his poll numbers sank, his initiatives tanked), and now the former global action star is back where he started, in the middle, embracing all.

To this party? Everybody was invited. The master of ceremonies was none other than the Mac Daddy of California Democrats, the former "Ayatollah of the Assembly," former mayor of San Francisco Willie Brown.

Brown introduced the former governors Pete Wilson (Republican), whom he called "my buddy for many years," and Gray Davis (Democrat), whom he described as "a former driver of mine" (warmhearted laughter ensued).

DOJ_NMG_0114009

Davis, recall, was the governor recalled by voters in 2003. Now? There he was, waving to the throng, as robotic as ever and stiffly smiling, apparently just glad to be back on the rostrum.

Schwarzenegger's mother-in-law, Eunice Kennedy Shriver, was greeted with a standing O, and then Brown brought out Shriver and the four Schwarzenegger kids (one of whom has that now long boy hair). Brown said it was his honor and his joy to introduce Shriver, "who has taken the role of the embedded journalist to the ultimate level." Then Brown added, "because the governor can't catch me," that Shriver was "foxy and sexy."

Shriver, looking chic and thin in a black coat dress, called it "an extraordinary day" and thanked so many people for coming "to celebrate one man," her husband.

Then Shriver, inspired, she said, by a recent book of essays by Alice Walker, recited a Hopi Indian prayer titled "We Are the Ones We Have Been Waiting For," and as she read, she was accompanied by projected images of the rapturous California landscape and by mystical flute music, really quite soothing, like the soundtrack at a particularly good spa.

Then the money shot. To the orchestral swell of Aaron Copland's "Fanfare for the Common Man," Schwarzenegger emerged on the stage, supported by silver-colored crutches. In a dark suit and sky blue tie, the henna-headed actor-turned-governor soaked in the applause, for it was a moment, his biographers have noted, that he dreamed of years ago.

Except, of course, the crutches. Perhaps you recall that over the holidays, while at their chalet/compound in Sun Valley, Idaho, Schwarzenegger, 59, experienced what has been described in the press as "a freak skiing accident": He broke his upper right femur when he tripped over his ski pole, which he caught under his ski, while he was standing still. Very, very painful. (Indeed, the medical reporter for the San Francisco Chronicle speculated that "it is reasonable to assume that the governor must handle the stress of a highly public inauguration and the rollout of new policy initiatives while also taking medication to manage the pain.") But seemingly clear-eyed, Schwarzenegger laid his crutches aside and, steadied by his wife, raised his right hand and took the oath of office.

Then (with crutches again) he hobbled over to the lectern as a choir sang a "hallelujah" refrain. "Wow, this feels good," he said, so maybe the Chronicle was right.

Anyway, in his 15-minute speech, Schwarzenegger said that the last three years have been "the most fulfilling of my life," and that "my escapes have been more hair-raising than anything I've done in the movies." He acknowledged the defeat of his initiatives in a 2005 special referendum: "I took the wrong approach," but "like Paul on the road to Damascus" his personal thumping inspired a vision. "We must think of ourselves as belonging not just to the Republican Party or the Democratic Party, but to the Party of California," Schwarzenegger said. "Because California is a collective ideal worth preserving."

He continued on this theme.

"Centrist does not mean weak. It does not mean watered down or warmed over," he said. "It means well balanced and well grounded. The American people are instinctively centrist -- so should be our government."

Gone: references to weak "girlie men."

Schwarzenegger said that his dream California -- peaceful, prosperous, multicultural, where the people live healthy lifestyles and have health insurance, where the children are well educated, the infrastructure sound, the economy humming along on clean, green, post-fossil-fuel technologies and the biotech industry is booming because of stem cell research -- was "a model for the world."

At the end of the swearing-in ceremony, Schwarzenegger and the audience of 3,000 were treated to singer Jennifer Holliday belting out her classic, "And I Am Telling You I'm Not Going," with its pivotal lyric, "I'm staying and . . . you're gonna love me."

O'Malley To Travel State To Thank His Supporters (WP)

By John Wagner, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Governor-Elect to Reprise Theme of Unity

Martin O'Malley (D) announced plans yesterday for a "One Maryland Inaugural Tour and Celebration" in the week leading up to his swearing in Jan. 17 as the state's 61st governor.

The tour, which will also feature Lt. Gov.-elect Anthony G. Brown (D), is scheduled to begin with a town hall meeting Tuesday in Montgomery County and wrap up a week later with a gathering in Annapolis of several hundred high school students, according to O'Malley's inaugural committee. Other stops are planned in Anne Arundel County, Southern Maryland and Western Maryland and on the Eastern Shore.

"They are going on the tour because they feel it's important to thank the people who supported them during the campaign, and they campaigned on the theme that we're all in this together, and we're one Maryland," said O'Malley spokesman Rick Abbruzzese. "It's the way they intend to govern."

DOJ_NMG_0114010

The entertainment lineup for the inaugural gala at the Baltimore Convention Center will include 1970s R&B superstars Kool & the Gang; retro swing band Big Bad Voodoo Daddy; Irish rockers the Saw Doctors; and Latin star Eddie Palmieri Jr.

O'Malley, who until recently fronted a Celtic rock band, has been an opening act for the Saw Doctors.

Tickets for the black-tie-optional gala are $50 and can be bought online at http://www.mdinauguration.com.

O'Malley's swearing-in and inaugural parade will take place in Annapolis.

Besides O'Malley and Brown, Tuesday's town hall meeting will include O'Malley's nominee for transportation secretary, John D. Porcari, and Montgomery County Executive Isiah Leggett (D). The meeting will start at 8 p.m. at Albert Einstein High School in Kensington.

Making No Small Plans (NYT)

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

Gov. Eliot Spitzer is fond of saying that you can't change the world by whispering. What New Yorkers saw in his first week in office was a governor in full trumpet about how to overhaul their state government. While some veterans of state politics saw Mr. Spitzer's State of the State speech on Wednesday as too ambitious, former Gov. Hugh Carey got it just right. "It's a very big agenda," he said, "but it's not too big for New York."

We are still in the promising stage, of course, and the real test will begin later this month with Mr. Spitzer's first executive budget. But he has begun by laying down a number of important, and sensible, markers. On health care, he wants insurance for all children. He hopes to find some of the money to do this by consolidating hospitals and shifting patients from nursing homes to at-home care.

On education, Mr. Spitzer says he wants to spread money out more fairly to students who most need it. Suburban lawmakers whose schools are favored by the current formula will object. But he may win them over with his plan to lower property taxes that fall heavily on middle-class suburbanites.

He made a strong pitch for economic revitalization upstate, a familiar but elusive goal of a long line of New York politicians.

Mr. Spitzer also proposed a series of reforms that are certain to rile legislators accustomed to lifetime tenure in Albany. He intends to create a nonpartisan redistricting commission and vowed to veto any future district lines that are gerrymandered to make elections uncompetitive. And he wants to "replace the weakest campaign finance laws in the nation with the strongest." That means lowering contribution limits and providing public financing so that moneyed interests can no longer buy political clout.

Also on Mr. Spitzer's ambitious to-do list, and appropriately so, are restructuring the courts and organizing the overlapping local governments across the state.

Mr. Spitzer faces two major hurdles. One is finding top-flight appointees to make these proposals a reality. One of the most important sales jobs he has now is convincing enough good people that working for government wages is worth it to help reinvent such a powerful state government. Mr. Spitzer's other challenge will be getting the Legislature to go along. Much of his speech was met with an odd silence from lawmakers. Perhaps it was the way Mr. Spitzer carved out new political territory that does not entirely cater to upstate Republicans or downstate Democrats. But it may simply be that they do not yet know what to make of all that urgency, all those promises, all that work.

Mr. Spitzer certainly acts like a man ready to go forward quickly. The goals he has set may be daunting to the old guard in Albany, but anything less from this governor would have been a grave disappointment.

"Embryo Bank" Stirs Ethics Fears (WP)

By Rob Stein, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Firm Lets Clients Pick Among Fertilized Eggs

A Texas company has started producing batches of ready-made embryos that single women and infertile couples can order after reviewing detailed information about the race, education, appearance, personality and other characteristics of the egg and sperm donors.

The Abraham Center of Life LLC of San Antonio, the first commercial dealer making embryos in advance for unspecified recipients, was created to help make it easier and more affordable for clients to have babies that match their preferences, according to its founder.

"We're just trying to help people have babies," said Jennalee Ryan, who arranged for an egg donor to start medical treatments to produce a second batch of embryos this week. "For me, that's what this is all about: helping make babies."

But the embryo brokerage, which calls itself "the world's first human embryo bank," raises alarm among some fertility experts and bioethicists, who say the service marks another disturbing step toward commercialization of human reproduction and "designer babies."

DOJ_NMG_0114011

"We're increasingly treating children like commodities," said Mark A. Rothstein, a bioethicist at the University of Louisville in Kentucky. "It's like you're ordering a computer from Dell: You give them the specs, and they put it in the mail. I don't think we should consider mail-order computers and other products the same way we consider children."

Prospective parents have long been able to select egg or sperm donors based on ethnicity, education and other traits. Couples can also "adopt" embryos left over at fertility clinics, or have embryos created for them if they need both eggs and sperm. But the new service marks the first time anyone has started turning out embryos as off-the-shelf products.

Before contracting for the embryos, clients can evaluate the egg and sperm donors, and can even see pictures of them as babies, children and sometimes adults. A fertility specialist will then transfer the embryos into a client's womb or into a surrogate, which Ryan can also arrange.

"We're unique," Ryan said. "We're the only one in the world doing this right now."

Some fertility doctors and ethicists are undisturbed by the Abraham Center because the service does not differ markedly from what already happens routinely at fertility clinics.

"I know some people say: 'This is shocking. Embryos made to order,' " said John A. Robertson of the University of Texas at Austin, who advises fertility specialists on ethical issues. "But if you step back a little bit, you realize that people are already choosing sperm and egg donors in separate transactions. Combining them doesn't pose any new major ethical problems."

But others condemned the process as the unsettling culmination of recent objectionable developments, including the payment of egg and sperm donors and the growing tendency to try to select traits such as sex, intelligence and appearance.

"People have long warned we were moving toward a 'Brave New World,' " said Robert P. George of Princeton University, who serves on the President's Council on Bioethics. "This is just more evidence that we haven't been able to restrain this move towards treating human life like a commodity. This buying and selling of eggs and sperm and now embryos based on IQ points and PhDs and other traits really moves us in the direction of eugenics."

"We find this very troubling," agreed Steven Ory, president of the American Society for Reproductive Medicine. "This is essentially making embryos a commodity and using technology to breed them, if you will, for certain traits."

Ryan dismissed the complaints.

"People can say, 'Oh, this is the new Hitler.' That's not the case," she said. "I don't take orders. I say 'This is what I have' and send them the background. If they don't think it's right for them, they don't have to take them."

So far the embryos Ryan has created have been from white donors, but she said that was because most of the couples that have contacted her are white. Among the more than 150 couples on her waiting list are African Americans, and she plans to try to create embryos for them, as well as possibly other races and mixes of races.

Ryan is, however, using only egg donors who are in their 20s and have at least some college education and only sperm donors who have advanced education, such as a PhD or law degree. All must undergo a standard round of health tests required for all egg and sperm donors, as well as screening to make sure they have no criminal record or family history of mental illness, Ryan said. They answer detailed questionnaires that ask about their childhood temperaments, favorite books, adult hobbies and family histories.

"If I do discriminate, it's that I only want healthy, intelligent people," Ryan said. "People will say, 'You're trying to create the perfect human race.' But we've always done gene selection just by who women choose as their husbands and men choose as their wives. This is no different."

Ryan said the main advantage is not the attributes of the donors but the cost: She charges $2,500 per embryo and estimates the total price tag should be less than $10,000 for each attempt at pregnancy, which is much less than the cost of standard adoption or in vitro fertilization.

Some experts questioned the creation of embryos for unspecified recipients when about 400,000 excess embryos are in storage at fertility clinics. But Ryan said her embryos are better because she uses young, fertile donors, whereas excess embryos frozen in storage tend to come from older women with fertility problems.

The cost, convenience, prospects of success and ability to vet the donors all are attractive to Ryan's clients -- potentially not only infertile couples and single women but also gay men and lesbian couples.

"You get to get an idea of what your baby will look like, and it just seems like it's a lot easier and more affordable," said Joan, 42, of Birmingham, Ala., who asked that her last name not be used. She contacted Ryan after she was unable to get pregnant using three egg donors and becoming disenchanted by the prolonged process of trying to adopt a child or a leftover embryo. She and her husband want a sibling for their 3-year-old son. "I am not going to give up until I have another baby. This seems very, very attractive," she said.

Some experts, however, warn that the legal status of these embryos remains unsettled.

"Having an interstate business involving human embryos seems to be a bad practice from pretty much every perspective," said Susan L. Crockin, a lawyer in Newton, Mass., who specializes in reproductive technology.

DOJ_NMG_0114012

So far, Ryan said, she has produced one batch of 22 embryos using an egg donor in her 20s from Arizona and a sperm donor from Fairfax Cryobank, a sperm bank operated by the Genetics & IVF Institute in Fairfax. He is a 6-foot-tall lawyer with blond hair and blue eyes. She is a student with brown hair and hazel eyes.

A single woman in her 40s from California and a married woman from Canada in her 30s each had two of the embryos implanted and are five months pregnant, Ryan said. In case they want more children or the pregnancies fail, the two clients split the rest of that batch and had the embryos frozen.

A Houston doctor whom Ryan planned to hire to create the second batch dropped out after learning what Ryan was doing, she said. Another doctor in New York subsequently signed on to use the same sperm donor and a blond-haired, blue-eyed egg donor from Utah who works for an airline. The egg donor started taking hormones this week to trigger ovulation.

Another single woman from California in her 40s has signed a contract for two of these embryos, with a 30-day option for more, Ryan said. Any remainders can be shipped frozen to clients on the waiting list, she said.

"When the first 'test tube' baby came out, some people said it was evil," Ryan said. "I think the same thing is happening with this. Because it's new, it's getting all this criticism."

Texas Firm First To Offer Ready-made Embryos (HC)

By Rob Stein

Houston Chronicle, January 6, 2007

A San Antonio company has started producing batches of ready-made embryos that single women and infertile couples can order after reviewing detailed information about the race, education, appearance, personality and other characteristics of the egg and sperm donors.

The Abraham Center of Life, the first commercial dealer making embryos in advance for unspecified recipients, was created to help make it easier and more affordable for clients to have babies that match their preferences, according to its founder.

"We're just trying to help people have babies," said Jennalee Ryan, who arranged for an egg donor to start medical treatments to produce a second batch of embryos this week. "For me, that's what this is all about: helping make babies."

But the embryo brokerage, which calls itself "the world's first human embryo bank," raises alarm among some fertility experts and bioethicists, who say the service marks another disturbing step toward commercialization of human reproduction and "designer babies."

"We're increasingly treating children like commodities," said Mark Rothstein, a bioethicist at the University of Louisville. "It's like you're ordering a computer from Dell: You give them the specs, and they put it in the mail. I don't think we should consider mail-order computers and other products the same way we consider children."

Off the shelfProspective parents have long been able to select egg or sperm donors based on ethnicity, education and other traits. Couples also can "adopt" embryos left over at fertility clinics, or have embryos created for them. But the new service marks the first time anyone has started turning out embryos as off-the-shelf products.

Before contracting for the embryos, clients can evaluate the egg and sperm donors and can even see pictures of them as babies, children and sometimes adults. A fertility specialist will then transfer the embryos into a client's womb or into a surrogate.

"We're the only one in the world doing this right now," Ryan said.

Some fertility doctors and ethicists are undisturbed by the Abraham Center because the service does not differ markedly from what already happens at fertility clinics.

"I know some people say: 'This is shocking. Embryos made to order,' " said John Robertson of the University of Texas at Austin, who advises fertility specialists on ethical issues. "But if you step back a little bit, you realize that people are already choosing sperm and egg donors in separate transactions. Combining them doesn't pose any new major ethical problems."

But others condemned the process as the unsettling culmination of recent objectionable developments, including the payment of egg and sperm donors and the growing tendency to try to select traits such as sex, intelligence and appearance.

"People have long warned we were moving toward a Brave New World, " said Robert George of Princeton University, who serves on the President's Council on Bioethics.

Ryan dismissed the complaints.

"People can say, 'Oh, this is the new Hitler.' That's not the case," she said. "I don't take orders. I say 'This is what I have' and send them the background. If they don't think it's right ... they don't have to take them."

No discriminationSo far, the embryos Ryan has created have been from white donors, but she said that was because most of the couples that have contacted her are white. Among the more than 150 couples on her waiting list are blacks, and she plans to try to create embryos for them, as well as possibly other races and mixes of races.

DOJ_NMG_0114013

Ryan is using only egg donors who are in their 20s and have at least some college education and only sperm donors who have advanced education, such as a Ph.D or law degrees. All must undergo a standard round of health tests, as well as screening to make sure they have no criminal record or family history of mental illness, Ryan said.

"If I do discriminate, it's that I only want healthy, intelligent people," Ryan said.

Lower cost advantageRyan said the main advantage is not the attributes of the donors but the cost: She charges $2,500 per embryo and estimates the total price tag should be less than $10,000 for each attempt at pregnancy, which is much less than standard adoption or in vitro fertilization.

The cost, convenience, prospects of success and ability to vet the donors all are attractive to Ryan's clients.

"You get to get an idea of what your baby will look like, and it just seems like it's a lot easier and more affordable," said Joan, 42, of Birmingham, Ala., who asked that her last name not be used. She contacted Ryan after she was unable to get pregnant using three egg donors and becoming disenchanted by the prolonged process of trying to adopt a child or a leftover embryo.

A Houston doctor whom Ryan planned to hire to create a second batch of embryos dropped out after learning what Ryan was doing, she said. A doctor in New York subsequently signed on.

Texas Company Sells Ready-made Embryos (DMN)

By Rob Stein

The Dallas Morning News, January 6, 2007

A San Antonio company has started producing batches of ready-made embryos that single women and infertile couples can order after reviewing detailed information about the race, education, appearance, personality and other characteristics of the egg and sperm donors.

The Abraham Center of Life LLC, the first commercial dealer making embryos in advance for unspecified recipients, was created to help make it easier and more affordable for clients to have babies that match their preferences, according to its founder.

"We're just trying to help people have babies," said Jennalee Ryan. "For me, that's what this is all about: helping make babies."

But the center, which calls itself "the world's first human embryo bank," raises alarm among some fertility experts and bioethicists, who say the service marks another disturbing step toward commercialization of human reproduction and "designer babies."

"We're increasingly treating children like commodities," said Mark A. Rothstein, a University of Louisville bioethicist. "It's like you're ordering a computer from Dell: You give them the specs, and they put it in the mail. I don't think we should consider mail-order computers and other products the same way we consider children."

Prospective parents have long been able to select egg or sperm donors based on ethnicity, education and other traits. Couples can also "adopt" embryos left over at fertility clinics or have embryos created for them if they need both eggs and sperm. But the new service is the first time anyone has turned out embryos as off-the-shelf products.

Before contracting for the embryos, clients can evaluate the egg and sperm donors, and can even see pictures of them as babies, children and sometimes adults. A fertility specialist will then transfer the embryos into a client's womb or into a surrogate, which Ms. Ryan can also arrange.

Some fertility doctors and ethicists are undisturbed by the Abraham Center because the service does not differ markedly from what already happens routinely at fertility clinics.

"I know some people say: 'This is shocking. Embryos made to order,' " said John A. Robertson of the University of Texas at Austin, who advises fertility specialists on ethical issues. "But if you step back a little bit, you realize that people are already choosing sperm and egg donors in separate transactions. Combining them doesn't pose any new major ethical problems."

But others condemned the process as the unsettling culmination of recent objectionable developments, including the payment of egg and sperm donors and the growing tendency to try to select traits such as sex, intelligence and appearance.

"This is just more evidence that we haven't been able to restrain this move toward treating human life like a commodity," said Robert P. George of Princeton University, a member of the President's Council on Bioethics. "This buying and selling of eggs and sperm and now embryos based on IQ points and Ph.Ds and other traits really moves us in the direction of eugenics."

Ms. Ryan dismissed the complaints.

"People can say, 'Oh, this is the new Hitler.' That's not the case," she said. "I don't take orders. I say 'This is what I have' and send them the background. If they don't think it's right for them, they don't have to take them."

DOJ_NMG_0114014

So far the embryos Ms. Ryan has created have been from white donors, but she said that was because most of the couples that have contacted her are white. Among the more than 150 couples on her waiting list are African-Americans, and she plans to create embryos for them, as well as in other races

Ms. Ryan is, however, using only egg donors who are in their 20s and have at least some college education and only sperm donors who have advanced education, such as a doctorate or law degree. All must undergo a standard round of health tests required for all egg and sperm donors, as well as screening to make sure they have no criminal record or family history of mental illness.

"If I do discriminate, it's that I only want healthy, intelligent people," Ms. Ryan said.

Ms. Ryan said the main advantage is not the attributes of the donors but the cost: She charges $2,500 per embryo and estimates the total price tag should be less than $10,000 for each attempt at pregnancy.

The cost, convenience, prospects of success and ability to vet the donors all are attractive to Ms. Ryan's clients.

"You get to get an idea of what your baby will look like, and it just seems like it's a lot easier and more affordable," said Joan, 42, of Birmingham, Ala., who asked that her last name not be used.

She contacted Ms. Ryan after she was unable to get pregnant using three egg donors and becoming disenchanted by the prolonged process of trying to adopt a child.

"I am not going to give up until I have another baby," she said. "This seems very, very attractive."

Reagan Bust OK'd For Hill (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

Nearly twenty years after leaving office, Ronald Reagan is coming back to Washington. California lawmakers have voted to place a bronze bust of the former president in the Capitol Rotunda and alongside other national luminaries such as Abraham Lincoln, Sam Houston and Gen. Robert E. Lee.

The bust of Mr. Reagan, who was often referred to as "the great communicator," will replace that of Thomas Starr King, "the orator who saved the nation." King is credited with keeping California in the Union during the Civil War.

King's bust has resided in the National Statuary Hall since 1931. Lincoln once credited King with preventing California from splitting from the Union to form its own republic during the war.

Each state is allowed to have two bronze statues bearing the likeness of figures instrumental to the state's history. In 2000, Congress voted to allow state legislatures to replace their state's statues. Since then, only one state, Kansas, has chosen to do so. Kansas replaced the likeness of former Gov. George Washington Glick with one of Dwight D. Eisenhower.

"As the only governor of California to serve as president of the United States, Ronald Reagan is a clear choice for a delegate to Statuary Hall," said Grover Norquist, head of the Ronald Reagan Legacy Project, an organization that works to have landmarks named after the former president. Mr. Norquist also leads Americans for Tax Reform, a group that promotes federal candidates for office.

In addition to his reputation as a fiery orator, King's legacy includes raising millions of dollars for state sanitary commissions in New York and California, which helped to care for wounded soldiers. After his death in 1864, mountain peaks in Yosemite National Park and New Hampshire were named in his honor.

The National Statuary Hall is located next to the Capitol Rotunda and served as the original House chambers when the Capitol was first erected. After a new House chamber was built, it was decided in 1853 that the room should be used to house works of art, according to Capitol Architect spokeswoman Eva Malecki.

Ms. Malecki said busts of former presidents, including Eisenhower and Lincoln, are typically housed in the Rotunda. However, it's still unclear whether Mr. Reagan's bust will be there or along with the other statues in the Statuary Hall. "That will be up to Congress to determine," Ms. Malecki said.

Mr. Reagan's statue will accompany that of Junipero Serra, the Roman Catholic founder of nine California missions. Mr. Reagan, elected governor of California in 1967, served two terms before pursuing the Republican presidential nomination in 1976.

The resolution to replace Mr. King's bust with Mr. Reagan's was passed on Aug. 31 by the California Legislature with only one lawmaker, Sen. Debra Bowen, voting no. Mrs. Bowen is a member of the Unitarian Church, as was Mr. King.

The resolution's author, Sen. Dennis Hollingsworth, said lawmakers had plenty of time to address any concerns with the change because his resolution was first introduced in 2005. "Folks who have raised opposition have tried to make it sound like a last-minute thing," Mr. Hollingsworth said in an interview with the Associated Press. "But there were two years where the bill was able to be analyzed and scrutinized."

The California-based Ronald Reagan Presidential Foundation will fund the project and commission a sculptor for the bust. The foundation also will pay to have the bust of King transferred to Sacramento. Mr. Hollingsworth said having the King statue in his state's Capitol will help Californians become more familiar with his legacy.

"Now fourth-graders on school field trips will have the opportunity to get to know King better."

C. William Verity Jr. Former Commerce Secretary, 89, Dies (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

COLUMBIA, S.C., Jan. 5 (AP) — C. William Verity Jr., United States secretary of commerce under President Ronald Reagan and a steel executive, died Wednesday in Beaufort, S.C. He was 89.

Mr. Verity, who suffered from asthma, died of complications of pneumonia in a Beaufort hospital, said his oldest son, John Verity.

William Verity was named commerce secretary in August 1987 after his predecessor, Malcolm Baldrige, was killed in a rodeo accident.

Mr. Verity retired as chairman of the board of the Armco Steel Company, now the AK Steel Corporation, in 1982 but remained a director for another four years. He was the grandson of George M. Verity, who founded the company.

A Navy veteran and a Yale graduate, he was born Jan. 26, 1917, in Middletown, Ohio.

His wife, Peggy, died in 1999. Survivors include a daughter, Peggy Verity Power, of Edwards, Colo.; two sons, Jonathan George and William Wymond, of Beaufort; two sisters, Betsy Verity Blakey, of Columbus, Ohio, and Jean Verity Woodhull, of Dayton, Ohio; seven grandchildren; and four great-grandchildren.

Remember Cindy Sheehan? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

When Cindy Sheehan became a celebrity for her "peace" vigil outside President Bush's Texas ranch in 2005, the antiwar left hailed her as a heroine. A DailyKos.com blogger anointed her "'Mother Sheehan,' . . . the bringer of life who has been wronged by state power." A mainstream media columnist proclaimed that "the moral authority of parents who bury children killed in Iraq is absolute." Even before Mrs. Sheehan became a media darling, minority House Democrats called her as a witness at a June 2005 hearing about Britain's so-called Downing Street Memos.

Well, she's their problem now. On Wednesday members of the new House majority tried to hold a press conference to discuss their legislative priorities, but a group of hecklers, led by Mrs. Sheehan and chanting, "De-escalate, investigate, troops home now," forced Representative Rahm Emanuel to shut it down. Thursday, Representative Louise Slaughter was treated to an encore, although her press conference was merely delayed 45 minutes. "I was a little perplexed about why they were protesting us," Ms. Slaughter said.

She shouldn't be perplexed, for Mrs. Sheehan is not just the grieving mom of media lore, or even a liberal war opponent. She is an outright anti-American activist, who has called the U.S. a "morally repugnant system," said that "this country is not worth dying for," and during Hurricane Katrina demanded that the President "pull our troops out of occupied New Orleans," among many similar utterances.

Many who once lionized "Mother Sheehan" have simply gone mum. We found few comments about her latest antics on the left-wing blogs. It's heartening to realize that her erstwhile backers were motivated by partisanship, not hatred of country.

A Meeting With Gerald Ford (NYT)

By Orlando Patterson

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

In the summer of 1975, I was asked by Robert Goldman, President Ford's in-house intellectual, to participate in a discussion on ethnicity at the White House, one of a series put on for the edification of the president.

America was then going through the so-called ethnic revival. Talk about the recovery of threatened ethnic heritage was everywhere, the beginnings of what later evolved into the multicultural and identity movement. Politicians had been quick to grasp the movement's potential, and it would become a controversial issue in the subsequent presidential election.

I gathered from our conversation that the unusual nature of Ford's ascent to the presidency had prevented the normal electoral process of learning that transformed local politicians into potential statesmen, and that the discussions were a crash course substitute. The other members of the ethnicity session would be Daniel Patrick Moynihan, the future senator from New York, Nat Glazer, my colleague at Harvard, Michael Novak, a writer and public speaker who had recently emerged as the leading ideologist of the revival, and John Higham, the historian of immigration. I was flattered to be so honored, but felt it necessary to point out that I was then the friend of and special adviser to the second most radical leader in the hemisphere, Prime Minister Michael Manley of Jamaica, who at the time was very much on the radar screen of the C.I.A. and State Department. They already knew that, but my associations were deemed irrelevant. I was impressed.

DOJ_NMG_0114016

We met one Saturday in an airy, informal part of the White House, the room flooded with the late-morning light of early fall. The president's golf game had gone on a bit longer than anticipated, and as we waited I mused to myself that we were being asked to perform the intellectual version of a medieval jousting tournament. Novak would passionately defend the ethnic revival; I was strongly against it. Higham was more of my persuasion. Moynihan and Glazer were presumably the moderates, but since their recently published text, "Beyond the Melting Pot," had rapidly become the locus classicus of the new ethnicity, it was hardly an even match.

The president's entry was refreshingly lacking in drama. There was no sudden hush, no ego filling up the room, not the slightest whiff of alpha male testosterone. He was a fine-looking man, in a Lake Wobegon sort of way. Casually dressed and relaxed in manner, he shook hands firmly, apologized for being late with a self-effacing remark about his game, then invited us to have drinks with him. He finished two martinis before lunch. Moynihan and I happily joined him, while the others discreetly held glasses filled with something else.

Accompanying the president was the soft-spoken young aide who had initiated and made this all possible. His shoulders hunched in a confiding way as he addressed us, and his thoughtful, collegial manner put us instantly at ease. This was Dick Cheney, the chief of staff, and I will never be able to reconcile the open, intellectually broad-minded person I met that day with the secretive éminence grise of today.

During the discussion's more formal phase, I told the president that I had been drawn to America by the cosmopolitanism of its mainstream, not to seek sanctuary in an atavistic cocoon. I argued that all ethnic movements are two-edged swords. Beginning benignly, and sometimes necessary to repair injured collective psyches, they often end in tragedy, especially when they turn political, as illustrated by German history.

I also argued that the ethnic revival was partly a reaction against the recent gains of black Americans. Sadly, black leaders' shift to separatism and identity politics had legitimized this reactionary backlash against them. Whatever the president's personal position, I urged him to keep the state out of it.

Throughout our discussion the president listened attentively. He occasionally asked a question — nothing profound, but enough to suggest that he was following it all quite closely. As we talked over lunch it slowly dawned on me that the president's behavior was the most inspiring display of self-assured humility I had ever witnessed. Here he sat, the most powerful man in the world, eager to learn about his own society, even from a recent immigrant.

He was a man at peace with himself. Uncomplicated but without a trace of shallowness; calm, dignified and quietly engaging, a person you would like to be your friend.

Mr. Ford Gets The Last Laugh (NYT)

By Chevy Chase

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

IN recent days, I've been bombarded by requests to comment on my relationship with President Gerald Ford. Until now, I've tried to say nothing — any remarks from me during the Ford family's private time of grief would have been inappropriate.

The requests were understandable, I guess. You see, I made a reputation for myself 30 years ago on "Saturday Night Live" in part because of a number of sketches and "Weekend Updates" that I wrote or appeared in ridiculing Mr. Ford for his apparent "stumble-bumbling" (though he was perhaps the best athlete to have been president) and making fun of his presidency.

Luckily for me, Mr. Ford had a sense of humor.

I've often thought how odd it was that we became linked together. It's not like we had a lot in common. After all, Mr. Ford had never been helped for any problems with "self-medication" in a facility that has helped so many throughout these past decades. And he had never been castigated by the press for such atrocities as "Oh! Heavenly Dog" or "Cops and Robbersons," among other slightly awful films I had made in Hollywood.

But linked together we were. And not just in the obvious ways. If it hadn't been for the courage of Mr. Ford's wife, Betty, for admitting to an alcohol problem, I would never have received the help I needed in the early 1980s at the Betty Ford clinic, located not far from the Ford residence near Palm Springs. During my short stay there, I often saw Mrs. Ford personally surveying the clinic and generously offering a helping hand to those who were lucky enough to face their problems and, with the learned help of the clinic staff, appraise their behavior and their lifestyles.

One day when my wife, Jayni, came to visit me at the clinic, the Fords invited us to lunch. As it happened, Mrs. Ford had become so beloved and respected by many for her earlier openness about breast cancer and her alcoholism that a television network was in preproduction on a special bio-pic about her. Mr. Ford suggested that while we ate lunch, the four of us could view the videotape of various performances by actors being considered to play the part of the president.

DOJ_NMG_0114017

Seated at a small table set for four in a simple dining room also containing a somewhat complicated videotape recorder and TV set were the former commander in chief and I making friendly small talk before lunch was brought in. And on all fours, literally on their hands and knees in front of the bulky and confusing tape machine, were Mrs. Ford and Jayni trying their best to figure out the wiring of the playback machine and the way the whole system worked, so we could watch the screen tests. Noting the effort the ladies were putting into getting the VCR to work, I suggested to Mr. Ford that perhaps we might help them out.

As I began to stand up from my chair, he took gentle hold of my arm, sat me back down and said: “No, no, Chevy. Don’t even think about it. I’ll probably get electrocuted, and you’ll be picked up and arrested for murder.”

We both laughed.

I’ll never forget that moment. My laughter was hearty and genuine.

Rice Calls For Denuclearization Moves From North Korea (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, January 6, 2007

The United States has intensified efforts to resume nuclear disarmament talks with North Korea, while confirming it was working with Japan on an emergency plan for a possible crisis in the Korean peninsula.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told a joint news conference with visiting South Korean Foreign Minister Song Min-Soon that the six-party talks could resume "fairly soon" if Pyongyang signals it is ready for constructive denuclearization steps.

A first round of talks in Beijing last month involving the six -- China, Japan, North Korea, South Korea, Russia and the United States -- ended without apparent progress.

But Rice said Friday that those five days of discussions had laid the groundwork for further negotiations.

"We did not make the progress that I think we would have liked, and we believe that the North Koreans need to come in a more constructive spirit," she said.

"But it does not mean there were not very productive discussions that took place during that round," she said.

Rice said there was "intensive discussion among the parties about a resumption of the six-party talks" and that if the North Koreans demonstrate they are "prepared to come with a constructive response," the negotiations could resume soon.

Rice declined to speculate on when the negotiations might resume, though her spokesman said the next round could take place later this month.

Song, for his part, said it was "North Korea's turn to come back to us with a positive and realistic response" to proposals made to Pyongyang during the talks December 18-22 in Beijing.

"I know of no substantive response from the North Koreans" yet, Rice added, but she said the Chinese were in discussions with the reclusive communist regime.

White House spokesman Tony Snow on Friday confirmed that Washington and Tokyo were working on an emergency plan for a possible crisis on the Korean peninsula but said it was a routine contingency effort.

"People make plans all the time," Snow said after Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso, in Tokyo, revealed that the aim was "to protect some 20,000 Japanese residents and tens of thousands of tourists" in South Korea.

"It is a standard part of any government's preparation to try to take a look at all alternatives, domestically and internationally, and try to prepare for them," Snow told reporters.

Aso, who did not elaborate on the various scenarios being considered, said officials needed to consider "ways to evacuate Japanese nationals using US military vessels and civilian ships."

He added that the plan would also consider how to deal with refugees from the Communist North.

Snow said the United States and Japan were hoping "for the six-party talks to resume soon."

The negotiations were suspended in late 2005 after North Korea walked out in protest at US financial sanctions imposed on a Macau bank accused of illicit dealings on behalf of Pyongyang.

Before the breakdown, North Korea signed a statement agreeing to give up its nuclear weapons program in exchange for economic aid and security guarantees from the other five states.

But it then went ahead and conducted its first nuclear test explosion in October, sparking international condemnation and UN sanctions.

Under intense pressure from its main ally, China, the North agreed to return to the talks last month.

The resulting five-day round of negotiations in Beijing failed to make any progress, as North Korea insisted the financial sanctions be lifted as a condition for tackling the nuclear disarmament issue.

DOJ_NMG_0114018

Rice played down press reports this week that North Korea was making preparations for a second nuclear test explosion as a way of pressuring its partners for concessions in the next round of talks.

"We don't see any change in the circumstances that we currently face," Rice said, adding that a new nuclear test by the North Koreans would "obviously further deepen their isolation."

Song said South Korea had no indications another test was imminent.

US officials have declined to lay out publicly their specific demands of the North Koreans, but they are believed to include reopening nuclear sites to UN inspectors and initial steps to dismantle key installations, including the nuclear testing center in the mountains north of Pyongyang.

Parallel talks on the financial sanctions issue are also due to resume later this month in New York, though no date has been set.

Rice Cautions N. Korea (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, January 6, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice cautioned North Korea on Friday that a second nuclear test "no doubt would deepen its isolation."

Rice and South Korea's foreign minister, Song Min-Soon, agreed at a State Department news conference that their governments want negotiations on North Korea's nuclear program resumed.

"If North Korea is prepared to return in a more constructive spirit" the talks could be reopened fairly soon, Rice said. But she added, "We know of no substantive response from the North Koreans."

The South Korean minister said he had no indication that a fresh nuclear test by the North Koreans is imminent, following its initial blast last Oct. 9.

The talks, held last month in Beijing, would swap economic incentives and a U.S. assurance of respect for North Korea's security for cessation of the nuclear weapons program that produced a nuclear test nearly two months ago.

Nuclear Talks With N. Korea Expected To Resume (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

U.S., Allies Hope to Learn Whether Pyongyang Will Accept Suggested Steps Toward Standing Down

Six-nation talks on ending North Korea's nuclear program are likely to reconvene this month or next, when the United States and its allies hope to get a clearer sense of whether Pyongyang has any interest in giving up its weapons, U.S. and South Korean officials said yesterday.

South Korean Foreign Minister Song Min Soon, who held talks yesterday in Washington with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, said in an interview that North Korea did not "flatly reject" a number of ideas presented by the United States at the last round of talks, held in December, "even though it did not accept them."

Song would not detail those ideas, but U.S. and Asian diplomats have said the United States laid out steps that Pyongyang could take at the outset to demonstrate progress, including suspending operations at its Yongbyon reactor, readmitting international nuclear inspectors, reporting its nuclear facilities and closing its nuclear testing site.

The push to persuade North Korea to end its programs has been complicated by the fact that Pyongyang conducted its first nuclear test in October. Earlier this week, tens of thousands of North Koreans held a rally in the capital to defend their government's right to have nuclear weapons.

Previously, U.S. officials said they hoped to get a response to those ideas, first advanced at a bilateral meeting in November, at the December talks. But Song said it appeared the North Korean diplomats needed to take the proposals back to Pyongyang for further evaluation. "They are looking at a chance to make a deal, as usual, on their own terms," he said, adding that he did not know whether the differences could be bridged.

At a news conference with Song, Rice said, "There was some good work that was done during the round at the end of December, but really we're going to need to move well beyond that to consider this next round of talks, I think, successful."

Some U.S. officials have suggested that the main interest of the administration in continuing the talks is to convince China, North Korea's main patron, of Pyongyang's intransigence and the need to take forceful action against it.

South Korean news agencies reported yesterday that vehicles and personnel movement had been spotted near the site of North Korea's first test, but U.S. and South Korean officials cast serious doubt on those reports.

DOJ_NMG_0114019

"Seoul and Washington are having a close joint-intelligence assessment, but so far we do not have direct indication that there is an imminent test," Song said. He noted that North Korea conducted its last test underground, giving analysts very little time to detect possible preparation.

Song defended South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun for comments late last year, when he suggested that a split between the U.S. State Department and the Treasury Department had led to the rupture of the talks in 2005. Four days before an agreement was reached on principles for North Korean disarmament, Treasury accused a Macau bank of assisting in North Korean counterfeiting. North Korea used the incident to boycott the talks for 13 months and would discuss only that issue when the talks restarted in December.

"With a conspiracy view, you may say [the two departments] were playing games," Roh said. As a result, he added, the statement of principles "was buried the moment it was born."

Song said: "The point of my president's remark was not about some conspiracy but about his frustration, his frustration of nonprogress in the implementation program of the September agreement."

Policy Pat With Diplomat's Death (WT)

By Andrew Salmon, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

SEOUL -- The death of North Korea's foreign minister, Paek Nam-sun, the communist nation's top "diplomatic warrior," is unlikely to lead to any change in Pyongyang's policy toward Washington or the North's nuclear weapons programs, analysts say.

Mr. Paek's death was confirmed Thursday. No cause of death was given, but Mr. Paek, 77, was thought to be suffering from kidney disease.

Mr. Paek took on the role of foreign minister in 1998. Before that, he had come to prominence as a party cadre engaged in North-South Korean relations work with the Red Cross in the 1970s and 1980s. His last appearances on the international scene were at an Asian foreign ministers' meeting in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, followed by an official visit to Singapore, in July. During the visits, he was clearly ill and almost immobile.

Yesterday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, meeting in Washington with her South Korean counterpart, Song Min-soon, warned that a second nuclear weapons test by Pyongyang, following up on the test conducted in October, would only "deepen North Korea's isolation" in the international community.

Miss Rice declined to discuss whether U.S. intelligence officials have picked up on recent private reports that the North could be preparing a second such test.

"I'm not going to speak about intelligence information, but we don't see any change in the circumstances that we currently face," she told reporters after talks in Washington with the Korean diplomat.

Mr. Song said there were no signs of an imminent nuclear test, which would be North Korea's second since Oct. 9.

In a society as opaque as North Korea's, it is impossible to predict a successor to Mr. Paek, but one analyst expected Mr. Paek's deputy at the foreign ministry to succeed him.

"In real political terms, Paek has been a somewhat nominal minister. His deputy, Kang Sok-ju, has been playing the key role, talking directly to Kim Jong-il," said Kim Sung-han of Seoul's Institute of Foreign Affairs and National Security. "Kang is a possible successor, and he has been the point man in North Korean policy toward the United States."

The chances of Mr. Paek's successor having any leeway in moderating the country's nuclear policy are small.

"In propaganda, the diplomatic corps is referred to as 'diplomatic warriors'; there is talk of 'attack diplomacy'; and every time they have a success on the diplomatic front, when they face down America, they consider it a 'victory,' " said Brian Myers, an authority on North Korean propaganda at Dongseo University in South Korea. "This adversarial approach to relations is not going to change. In a dictatorship, there is no room for individual ministers to make policy decisions."

State Department officials said yesterday there was a chance that six-nation talks on the North's nuclear program could resume as early as this month. A short negotiating session last month in Beijing -- following a 15-month boycott of the talks by Pyongyang -- produced no progress, but Miss Rice said there had been some "very productive discussions" in the latest negotiating session.

In talks with China, the United States, South Korea, Russia and Japan, the North in September 2005 agreed to rid the peninsula of nuclear arms in exchange for economic aid and security guarantees.

But fleshing out the accord stalled when Pyongyang angrily reacted to U.S. Treasury sanctions on a Chinese bank that handled much of the North's state accounts.

China Advises "Serious Response" By Iran To U.N. Sanctions (WP)

By Edward Cody, Washington Post Foreign Service

DOJ_NMG_0114020

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

BEIJING, Jan. 5 -- China told Iran's top nuclear negotiator Friday that Tehran should abandon its defiance of U.N. sanctions and work for a swift return to talks to resolve the standoff over its nuclear program.

The Chinese admonition, conveyed by the official news media, came in a meeting between Ali Larijani, secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, and President Hu Jintao, who urged a "serious response" to the U.N. sanctions. State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, China's senior foreign policy troubleshooter, gave Larijani a similar message Thursday, the New China News Agency reported.

China's public advice to Iran marked another instance in which Beijing seemed to be following a course parallel to that of the United States on nuclear nonproliferation. Diplomats from the two countries have worked with increasing closeness over the past three years in Chinese-sponsored negotiations to dismantle North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

The Bush administration, in tandem with European leaders, has championed tough sanctions to force Iran to back down and reportedly is seeking new measures that would go beyond those already imposed. President Bush said Thursday that he thought it would be difficult to ensure a peaceful world if the Iranian government pushed forward with its research program and eventually equipped its military with nuclear weapons.

Although it has been reluctant to support sanctions in the past, China backed the U.N. Security Council's unanimous resolution of Dec. 23 that imposed sanctions on Iran and called for a suspension of its uranium enrichment program. But the Iranian Foreign Ministry dismissed the resolution as "illegal," President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad called it "trash paper" and the enrichment effort has continued apace.

Tang and Hu both reminded Larijani that the resolution passed unanimously, meaning China also voted for it, and said it reflected the concerns of the international community about safeguarding nonproliferation.

"China has always maintained that dialogue and negotiations are the best way to resolve the Iranian nuclear issue," Tang said, according to the news agency.

Larijani, in a news conference, said he had conveyed a letter from Ahmadinejad to Hu. He declined to specify its contents but sought to dispel the notion that Iran and China might be estranged because of China's decision to join the United States and other Security Council members in condemning Iran's nuclear research program.

"Of course, we know who is really behind these sanctions, so we are not blaming anybody for this," he said, alluding to the United States. The growing commercial ties between China and Iran will not be affected, he said, adding, "Countries that have long-term strategic relations will not change them because of tactical issues, and this was a tactical issue."

Larijani said that, in any case, Iran's government is not concerned about the new sanctions, which bar trade in nuclear- and missile-related goods. "The Americans have been carrying out this kind of policy for 27 years," he said, "and it's not had much effect."

Larijani said Iran's case is different from North Korea's because North Korea has developed a nuclear weapon, and "it is not part of our strategy to seek nuclear weapons." He said Iran wants to remain in the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty regime, but added, "If we are threatened, that could change."

Larijani dismissed Bush's comments as just one more in a string of U.S. criticisms. If the U.S. leader is genuinely worried about the dangers posed by nuclear weapons in the Middle East, Larijani said, "he should worry about Israel."

Report: China Prods Iran To Answer U.N. (AP)

By Audra Ang, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 6, 2007

China on Friday urged Iran to give a "serious response" to a U.N. Security Council resolution that imposed sanctions on Tehran for refusing to suspend uranium enrichment.

Iran's top nuclear envoy, however, warned that Tehran's commitment to the peaceful use of nuclear technology will change if the country is threatened.

The negotiator, Ali Larijani, was in Beijing for a two-day visit and gave Chinese President Hu Jintao a letter from Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Larijani and Hu discussed the U.N. sanctions, which bar all countries from selling materials and technology to Iran that could contribute to its nuclear and missile programs. The resolution, passed last month, also froze the assets of 10 Iranian companies and 12 individuals related to those programs.

If Iran refuses to comply with the demand to suspend uranium enrichment within 60 days, the resolution warns Tehran that the council will adopt further nonmilitary sanctions.

The sanctions reflect "the shared concerns of the international community over the Iranian nuclear issue, and we hope Iran could make a serious response to the resolution," Hu told Larijani, according to China's official Xinhua news agency.

DOJ_NMG_0114021

Hu added that "China continues to believe the Iranian nuclear issue should be resolved through diplomatic negotiation."

In Tehran, Ahmadinejad said Friday that sanctions won't stop Iran from enriching uranium, state-run television reported.

"Iran will stand up to coercion. ... All Iranians stand united to defend their nuclear rights," state-run TV quoted him as saying.

"Enemies have assumed that they can prevent the progress of the Iranian nation through psychological war and issuing resolutions, but they will be defeated," Ahmadinejad was quoted as saying on state-run TV.

While the United States has led the drive to stop Iran from enriching uranium — a process that produces the material for either nuclear reactors or weapons — it compromised on the sanctions to win the support of China and Russia, both veto-wielding members of the Security Council who have strong trade ties with Tehran.

Larijani indicated that China's decision to support the resolution has not hurt ties between the two sides, calling them "long-term and long-lasting."

"Countries who have strategic long-term relationships will not change their strategic relationships because of tactical issues," he said at a news conference.

He added in reference to Washington: "We know who is really responsible, who is really behind the sanctions and nobody else can be blamed for this."

Iran has denied that it seeks to build atomic weapons, saying its nuclear program is limited to the generation of electricity, a stance Larijani reiterated.

"We oppose obtaining nuclear weapons and we will peacefully use nuclear technology under the framework of the Nonproliferation Treaty," he said.

"But," he warned, "if we are threatened, the situation may change."

In another show of defiance, Iranian Vice President Gholamreza Aghazadeh, who also heads the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, announced that Tehran has produced and stored 250 tons of uranium hexaflouride gas, the feedstock for enrichment, state-run TV reported.

The hexaflouride gas, or UF-6, is being stored in underground tunnels at a nuclear facility in Isfahan to protect it from any possible attack.

"Today, we have produced more than 250 tons of UF-6. Should you visit Isfahan, you will see we have constructed tunnels that are almost unique in the world," state-run TV quoted Aghazadeh as saying.

The central Iranian cities of Isfahan and Natanz house the heart of the country's nuclear program. In Isfahan, a conversion facility reprocesses raw uranium, known as yellowcake, into uranium hexaflouride gas. The gas is then taken to Natanz and fed into the centrifuges for enrichment.

Iran has said it is moving toward large-scale uranium enrichment involving 3,000 centrifuges and plans to later expand this to 54,000 centrifuges. Centrifuges spin uranium gas into enriched material, which at low levels is used to produce nuclear fuel to generate electricity. But further enrichment makes it suitable for use in building nuclear weapons.

Iran has claimed to enrich small amounts of uranium at the low percentages needed for fuel-grade uranium, as opposed to weapons-grade enriched uranium, which must be enriched at levels above 90 percent. U.S. intelligence agencies have estimated that Iran might be able to develop a nuclear weapon in four to 10 years.

Aghazadeh confirmed in April 2006 that Iran has produced 110 tons of uranium hexaflouride gas. Experts say that amount would be enough to produce up to 20 nuclear bombs if Iran was to divert its civilian nuclear program into making weapons.

Associated Press Writer Ali Akbar Dareini in Tehran, Iran, contributed to this report.

American Diplomat To Visit Strife-Torn Somali Capital (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

KISMAYO, Somalia, Jan. 5 — The State Department's top diplomat for Africa plans to visit Mogadishu, the violence-scarred Somali capital, on Sunday, American officials said Friday. It would be the first time in more than a decade that a high-ranking United States official has set foot there.

But Al Qaeda's second-in-command, Ayman al-Zawahri, urged the world's Muslims on Friday to turn Somalia into a battlefield and use suicide attacks.

These developments were part of Somalia's transformation after Ethiopian-led forces ousted the once powerful Islamist movement from the capital last week and helped install a potentially viable government there for the first time in over 16 years.

American officials said the schedule for the diplomat, Jendayi E. Frazer, assistant secretary of state for African affairs, was still tentative, but that she planned to be in Mogadishu for four hours to meet with officials of the transitional government and leading Somali intellectuals.

DOJ_NMG_0114022

The United States has had a minimal presence in the country since its diplomats were withdrawn in the fall of 1994, nearly a year after 18 Americans were killed during an ill-fated attempt to capture a warlord in Mogadishu. In his speech on Friday, Mr. Zawahri urged Muslim fighters to wage a holy guerrilla war in Somalia. "I speak to you today as the crusader Ethiopian invasion forces violate the soil of the beloved Muslim Somalia," he said in an audio recording on a Web site that has featured Qaeda messages before. "Launch ambushes, land mines, raids and suicidal attacks until you consume them as the lions eat their prey."

It was not the first time that Muslim extremists have called for a holy war in Somalia.

Ethiopia has a long Christian history, and Somalia's Islamist leaders had been trying for months to rally outside support by portraying the Ethiopians as infidel invaders and urging Muslims worldwide to turn Somalia into the third front for jihad, after Iraq and Afghanistan.

In the end, though, Western intelligence officials said that only a few hundred foreign fighters heeded the call, and that they seemed to make little difference. The Islamist forces, made up of mostly untrained teenage troops, were routed by Ethiopian soldiers in one battle after another and lost in one week all the territory they had gained in the past six months.

Somalia's transitional government is now in loose control of most of the country and Western diplomats, including Ms. Frazer, are urging African nations to quickly put together a peacekeeping force before Somalia reverts to anarchy.

Officials from Ethiopia, one of the poorest nations in the world, have said that they do not have the resources to keep soldiers here much longer. Ethiopia has justified its intervention by saying that Somalia's Islamists were a regional menace.

Ms. Frazer met Friday with Kenyan and Somali officials in Nairobi to discuss the details of the peacekeeping force. Uganda has already volunteered troops, and Nigeria, South Africa and Tanzania have indicated they might also send forces.

Ms. Frazer was to travel to Yemen and Djibouti on Saturday to pursue the matter.

In Mogadishu, the transitional government was struggling to collect weapons. Earlier in the week, Ali Muhammad Gedi, the transitional prime minister, announced that Thursday was the deadline for all militias and gunmen to surrender their arms. Only a handful have complied and the deadline has been pushed back to Saturday.

As for the Islamists, Somali officials said Friday that the last remnants of their forces were cornered in a remote area of southern Somalia, south of Kismayo. Somali officials said they expected the conflict to end soon, though the Islamists have vowed to fight on as an underground insurgency.

Iraq-style Insurgency Urged On Somalis (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

Al-Qaeda's second-in-command on Friday urged members of a Somali Islamist movement to launch an Iraq-style insurgency against Ethiopian troops to "wipe them out".

In an audiotape purportedly by Ayman al-Zawahiri described the Ethiopian soldiers as a crusader invasion force and called on the Islamists to "ambush, mine, raid and [carry out] martyrdom campaigns."

Ethiopia, an important regional US ally, has thousands of troops in Somalia backing that country's weak transitional government. Its forces launched a rapid offensive against the Islamist movement, which had controlled much of southern Somalia, forcing it to flee all its major strongholds during the last two weeks.

However, the Islamists have vowed to fight on with a guerrilla campaign, and it is unclear what state the Islamists' forces are in and whether they have been genuinely defeated. There have also been concerns that any insurgency could attract foreign militants – Somalia is a Muslim nation with one of Africa's longest coastlines, stretching from the Indian Ocean to the Gulf of Aden.

Both Addis Ababa and Washington, which gave its tacit support to Ethiopia's offensive, accuse the Islamists' leadership of including and harbouring alleged al-Qaeda members, including three men wanted in connection with the 1998 bombing of the US embassy in Nairobi and the 2002 suicide attack on a Israeli-owned hotel on the Kenyan coast.

The Islamist movement that began as an alliance of Islamic courts and was not a monolithic group has denied any links to terrorism. However, a hardline military element, known as the Shabaab, was thought to include extremists.

Somalia, which has not had a functioning government since the fall of dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991, is awash with weapons and has been plagued by 15 years of lawlessness.

On Friday, African and western officials, including Jendayi Frazer, US assistant secretary of state for Africa, met Abdullahi Yusuf, the Somali president, in Nairobi to discuss peacekeeping options and support for the transitional administration, which is deeply unpopular in many areas and has had little influence since it was formed two years ago.

Ms Frazer said Washington would provide $40m to Somalia in political, humanitarian and peacekeeping assistance, while the EU said it would help finance a force envisioned at 8,000 troops.

DOJ_NMG_0114023

"If international support is to be effective, it is essential an inclusive process of political dialogue and reconciliation...be launched without delay," the diplomats said in a joint statement.

Without Ethiopian support, the transitional government would struggle to survive. But a peacekeeping force is likely to take weeks to put together. The only country that has indicated it would be willing to contribute troops is Uganda, and a mandate and logistical issues still have to be worked out.

Addis Ababa has said it plans to withdraw its forces within weeks, but there are fears that an Ethiopian pull-out could leave a vacuum and the resumption of rule by warlords and clan-based violence. But the longer they stay, the greater the chance the Ethiopians will be seen as an occupying force.

Islamist Stragglers Vow Guerrilla Tactics, Suicides (WT/AP)

By Elizabeth A. Kennedy, Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 6, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia — Islamist fighters hiding in Mogadishu since their movement's main force was driven from the Somali capital say they will heed al Qaeda's call for guerrilla attacks and suicide bombings against Ethiopian troops whose intervention was key to the Islamists' defeat.

"I am committed to die for the sake of my religion, and the al Qaeda deputy's speech only encourages me to go ahead with my holy war," 18-year-old Sahal Abdi told the Associated Press, referring to an audio message posted on the Internet yesterday.

Troops of Somalia's transitional government, backed by the Ethiopian military, routed the Islamic militia from much of southern Somalia, ending their six months in power. The group had brought a semblance of stability here but terrified residents with a version of Islamic rule that included public executions and floggings of criminals.

Interviews with militants who fought with the Islamic Courts Union and went underground when most of their comrades fled Mogadishu last week suggest their movement is ready for battle.

Somalia's interior minister says 3,500 fighters are hiding in and around the capital.

The AP contacted several militants by telephone after townspeople identified them as former fighters known from the months when the Islamic movement controlled Mogadishu.

None of those interviewed was a leader.

They acknowledged being fighters but refused to be photographed and, in some cases, to give their full names, fearing reprisals from government or Ethiopian troops.

They said the movement they served as foot soldiers will rise again.

"The call from the al Qaeda deputy leader is based on Islam and we are adamant in our religion," said Sheik Musa, who would not identify himself further. "There is no option but to heed his call."

Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden's deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, urged the Islamic movement's fighters and other Muslims to attack the troops of Christian-dominated Ethiopia, which he called a "crusader" invasion force.

"Launch ambushes, land mines, raids and suicidal combats until you consume them as the lions and eat their prey," al-Zawahri said in the taped message that aired on a Web site frequently used by militants and carried the logo of al Qaeda's press production wing, as-Sahab.

A meeting of U.S., European Union, African and Arab diplomats ended in Kenya yesterday with a U.S. pledge to provide $40 million to Somalia in political, humanitarian and peacekeeping assistance, and a plan to ask more African nations to send troops to help stabilize the country. Uganda has pledged at least 1,000 peacekeepers.

The EU said it would also help pay for a peacekeeping force envisioned at 8,000 soldiers.

Still supported by Ethiopians, government troops prepared yesterday for a major assault on Ras Kamboni, the last stronghold of the Islamic militia. U.S. warships patrolled offshore to prevent militiamen from escaping by sea.

The U.S. 5th Fleet said vessels were being boarded to look for militants, including three al Qaeda suspects wanted for the 1998 bombings of two U.S. embassies in East Africa. The Islamists have denied U.S. accusations that the three were leaders in the Somali movement.

Quick Deployment Of Peacekeepers Urged For Somalia; Aid Pledged (WP)

By Karen DeYoung, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Western and African diplomats meeting yesterday in Nairobi urged the quick deployment of an African peacekeeping force in Somalia, as the United States pledged $40 million to assist the mission and provide humanitarian aid.

DOJ_NMG_0114024

In a communique peppered with references to the urgency of the situation, the Somalia Contact Group called for "immediate support for the stabilization of Somalia," noted an imperative to launch a political reconciliation process "without delay" and cited the need for "immediate concrete assistance."

"The group clearly felt it was important that there not be a security vacuum," Jendayi E. Frazer, the U.S. assistant secretary of state for African affairs, who chaired the meeting, told reporters in Nairobi.

Ethiopia has said its military force, which drove out the Islamic movement that controlled the southern part of the country and installed a weak, internationally backed transitional government, would stay only a short time.

If money were the only problem, Somalia would be on its way to stability, noted a diplomat from one of the countries involved in the group, whose membership includes the United States and several European countries as well as the European Union, Kenya and Tanzania, with participation from the United Nations and the African Union.

So far, only one African country has agreed to contribute troops to the force. Uganda has offered a 1,200-member contingent that Frazer said she hoped would be deployed by the end of January but that is only about a tenth of what is seen as necessary. The contact group communique said that Kenya's foreign minister would begin a mission to "explore additional troop contributions."

Of the $40 million pledged by the United States, $16 million is designated for peacekeeping support. The E.U. has pledged $47 million, of which $19.5 million is to go to the force.

U.S. Gen. William Ward, the deputy commander of the U.S. European Command who is traveling with Frazer, told reporters in Nairobi that there were no plans to deploy U.S. military personnel. U.S. assistance would include airlift, logistical and intelligence support.

The Europeans are similarly loath to send troops to Somalia, where a U.N. humanitarian force was withdrawn in 1995 following the deaths of numerous soldiers, including 18 Americans killed in a single battle.

Equally problematic is the reconciliation of Somali clans whose loyalty is distributed among the transitional government, a divided Islamic leadership and myriad other warlords. Western aid pledges are contingent on the warring groups -- with the exception of the Islamic leaders the United States says are harboring al-Qaeda suspects -- agreeing to a political accommodation.

If an international force were to enter the country before a political deal is made, the European diplomat said, it would be seen as supporting only one faction.

In Somalia, Confusion Remains In Command (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Premier Exhorts Revived, Ragtag Army

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 5 -- The revived Somali national army assembled here Friday in the sand-blown yard of the former parliament, a hollowed-out building splashed with grenade blasts and scrawled with apocalyptic graffiti.

About 1,000 men sat in the sun, soldiers who had been inactive for 15 years, old men with graying beards wearing whatever shade of camouflage they found at the market or dug out of storage. Few had boots; most wore leather loafers, sandals or thin-soled tennis shoes. They squinted at the newly ascendant prime minister, Ali Mohamed Gedi, who was swept into power last week on the strength of Ethiopian soldiers now pointing machine guns at the crowd.

"As prime minister, I say let us go back to our national interests," said Gedi, a former veterinarian. "This capital of Somalia is not for clans or tribes. It's for all Somalis. Is this clear? Will I repeat it, or have you got it?"

They all stood to sing the Somali national anthem, with many soldiers simply moving their lips, having forgotten the words. When it was over, 100 or so civilians heckled the new force -- "Traitors!" -- and Gedi zipped off in a convoy.

Even at such orchestrated events in Mogadishu, it is unclear who is in control, and the same could be said of Somalia itself.

Candidates for the title include the heavily armed Ethiopian forces stationed at strategic points around the city, without which Gedi's government would have failed to take the country from the popular Islamic Courts movement. There is Gedi himself, who leads an internationally recognized government but is perceived by many Somalis as a puppet of the Ethiopians.

The Ethiopians, in turn, are perceived as closely tied to the United States, which has expressed concern that Somalia could become a stronghold for terrorists. There is the fractious parliament, which Gedi is set to meet with in the next few days and whose members include warlords formerly backed by the United States, and others tied to webs of clans, sub-clans and sub-sub-clans, most with their own militias.

And somewhere in the oceanside city of sand, goats, poetry and barbed wire, an estimated 3,500 former Islamic Courts fighters who shed their uniforms are thought to be awaiting instructions to attack the Ethiopian troops. On Friday, al-Qaeda's deputy leader, Ayman al-Zawahiri, posted a message on the Internet calling on the fighters and other Muslims to attack the invading "crusader" force, Ethiopia, which has a government and army dominated by Christians and a population that is nearly half Muslim.

DOJ_NMG_0114025

All week, pamphlets circulating in the city have warned residents to stay away from Ethiopian soldiers.

"This is a funny question," said Gedi, when asked who is controlling Somalia. "The transitional federal government. It's a fully inclusive and representative government. This is my commitment, this is my responsibility as a prime minister to lead the Somali people."

Gedi's government is frail, however. He has not reached out to any moderate Islamic Courts leaders, widely credited with bringing security to Mogadishu, choosing to provide amnesty instead of inclusion in the government. A process of disarming the city is going badly, and Gedi said this week that he has only half the security forces he needs. Although the United States pledged $40 million in aid Friday, the government has practically no revenue to pay soldiers and set up ministries, or to assist thousands whose farms were ruined by recent floods.

Somalia's parliament, where representation is based on clan and sub-clan, includes many of the old warlords who had organized as an "anti-terrorism coalition" funded by the U.S. government, and otherwise made money by setting up roadblocks across the country to extract bribes. They were defeated by the Islamic Courts in June and are now seeking to wield power again, with some, such as Mohamed Qanyare Afrah, growing impatient with Gedi, whom they accuse of favoring his own people.

"They don't have any real power or any real authority," Qanyare said of the government. "My people want a government of national unity, not a government of certain clans, and that is what this government looks like."

Qanyare, a charismatic man known as the founder of the anti-terrorism coalition, sat in his armed compound on a hill at the city's crumbled edge, a place that seemed more like a military position than a home. He is from a sub-clan that is a rival of Gedi's.

A fleet of trucks was parked behind a wall, and militiamen armed with AK-47 assault rifles clustered at the door. Qanyare wore a bright yellow shirt with an abstract print, his hair wild and gray, and compared the prime minister and the various clans to a man with many unequally loved wives.

"If you don't love them, they will get a divorce," said Qanyare, adding that, at the moment, he is reading a book titled "Global Intelligence."

Ordinary Somalis are not sure who is in charge: the Ethiopians, the government, the warlords or the exiled Islamic Courts leaders and their underground fighters. Asked who he thought was wielding the most power, Amir Sheihk Elmi, who is in the cellphone business, said, "Allah."

Security continues to be the main concern in Mogadishu, where many residents fear that without an effective government force, authority in the country is reverting to the old collection of warlords and freelance militiamen.

Former Islamic Courts fighters in the city are hoping to harness those fears, along with resentment toward the Ethiopian troops, to reassert control.

"We are in Mogadishu, and we will challenge anyone to get security back," said Ali, a 21-year-old former fighter who declined to be identified further.

Late Friday afternoon, Ali said he had not heard about Zawahiri's Internet message. But he said that "shebab" fighters -- the young volunteer core of the Islamic Courts militia thought to be the most serious fighters -- were in "full contact" with Islamic Courts leaders who had fled the city last week. Asked whether he had a weapon, Ali shrugged and said insouciantly: "I have an AK-47 at home."

"When I hear about disarmament, I laugh," he said. "Who is supposed to take the guns? Who will be doing this?"

Asked who was in control of Somalia, he said without hesitation, "Sheik Sharif," referring to Sharif Ahmed, a top Islamic Courts leader reportedly among those on the run along the Somali coast.

The United States and Ethiopia have accused the Islamic Courts leaders of harboring three suspects in the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania and of cooperating with al-Qaeda. Intelligence analysts disagree over the extent to which al-Qaeda has influenced leaders in the Islamic movement, if at all, and whether the three terrorism suspects were in hiding in Somalia or being sheltered.

On Friday, U.S. Navy warships patrolled off the Somali coast to prevent suspects from escaping by sea. And Ethiopian troops were preparing for a major attack on Ras Kamboni, a town near the Kenyan border that is thought to be the last stronghold of fleeing Islamic Courts fighters.

Day After Killings, A Hamas Leader Calls For A Truce (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114026

JERUSALEM, Jan. 5 — The Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, called Friday for an end to the internal violence in the Gaza Strip, a day after members of his own Hamas militia surrounded the house of a Fatah commander, killed him and his bodyguards and seriously wounded his wife and brother.

Before his death, the commander, Col. Muhammad Gharib, begged for help on a live telephone call to Palestinian television, saying his home near Jabaliya was being attacked by the Executive Force, a parallel security force under the command of the Hamas-run Interior Ministry, but that Fatah leaders and fighters did not respond.

"They are killers," he said of the gunmen. "They are targeting the house. Children are dying, they are bleeding. For God's sake, send an ambulance! We want an ambulance — somebody move!"

On Friday, Fatah issued a statement suggesting another round of retaliation. "All killers are legitimate targets," the statement said, adding, "What is called the Executive Force is an enemy."

The statement, confirmed by a Fatah official, Abdel-Hakim Awad, also said negotiations with Hamas on a unity government were impossible in the present atmosphere.

"There will be no dialogue in the midst of this series of killings and organized terrorism practiced by Hamas," the statement said, calling on the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, to fire Interior Minister Said Siam and disband the Executive Force.

"Said Siam is responsible for the execution and the cold-blooded murder to which our martyrs in Jabaliya were subjected," the statement said.

Mr. Abbas, who met with Mr. Haniya early Friday in an attempt to restore calm, tried to disband the Executive Force when it was established, but failed. Now it has about 6,000 men, including several hundred drawn from factions usually loyal to Mr. Abbas's Fatah movement.

Hamas officials said Colonel Gharib had been responsible for the deaths of two of their fighters.

Mr. Abbas has called for early parliamentary and presidential elections, a challenge to the Hamas government, which won parliamentary elections a year ago. Hamas has said it will not allow early elections, which it says are illegal, and has moved to enforce its hold over Gaza while calling for renewed talks on a unity government that Mr. Haniya would lead.

The new tensions have set off a series of battles between Hamas and Fatah forces that show no sign of ending, despite various efforts to restore calm.

There were emotional funerals on Friday for some of the dead from the attack on Thursday on Colonel Gharib's home. Two more people who had been wounded died Friday, bringing the total to eight. As a funeral cortege passed the colonel's blackened, shrapnel-riddled house, masked men fired guns into the air and shouted for revenge.

In Palestinian violence on Thursday, more than 60 people were wounded, including 10 children, Palestinian medics said. On Wednesday, five people died from violence.

On Friday a local cleric and frequent critic of Hamas, Adel Nasar, was murdered as he left his mosque, witnesses told The Associated Press.

There was no claim of responsibility in the death of Mr. Nasar, who was not openly affiliated with any political party, though he often spoke against Hamas in his sermons. In his sermon on Friday, Mr. Nasar warned that God would punish the killers of Colonel Gharib and his bodyguards, as well as the Palestinian rulers for not putting the rule of God into effect, witnesses said.

Speaking in another mosque on Friday, Mr. Haniya called for Palestinian guns to be aimed at Israelis, not other Palestinians. "Our fight is not an internal one, it's against the occupation," he said. But it is increasingly clear that Mr. Haniya, although prime minister, does not have operational control over many of the Hamas gunmen, just as Mr. Abbas cannot control Fatah-affiliated militias.

As in Iraq, the division of power created by democratic elections, in the absence of a traditional powerful state or after the disappearance of one, has meant the continuation of party politics through armed militias affiliated with factions but not always controlled by them.

In the West Bank on Friday, Fatah supporters celebrated an anniversary by attending the weekly demonstration against Israel's separation barrier in the town of Bilin, where the barrier cuts off the village from much of its farmland.

The demonstrators are a mixture of Palestinians, Israelis and foreigners, and as usual, what was supposed to be a nonviolent protest turned into exchanges of rocks, rubber-coated bullets and tear gas with the Israeli Army and the border police.

Ten demonstrators were wounded, and two were hospitalized. Jibril Rajoub, a Fatah member and former security chief, said, "Our battle with Hamas is not a battle of assassination, kidnapping or revenge."

"Our battle is with the occupation, not with each other," he added.

According to [a news organization], the Bush administration is asking Congress for $86 million in aid, not including weapons and ammunition, to bolster Mr. Abbas and his Presidential Guard. The aid, mostly training and supplies, according to an American document obtained by [a news organization], is intended "to dismantle the infrastructure of terrorism and establish law and order in the West Bank and Gaza." Officials said previously that they expected to ask for nearly $100 million for the effort, which has itself been widely reported.

DOJ_NMG_0114027

In Israel, there were recriminations over a failed army arrest raid in the center of the West Bank city of Ramallah on Thursday, hours before Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was to meet President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt. The wanted man, though wounded, escaped, and four Palestinians were killed as Israeli forces exchanged fire with Palestinians in violent scenes that were televised live on Al Jazeera.

Mr. Olmert's aides said he had not been informed of the raid in advance and was angry about what had happened. The violence overshadowed the summit meeting, which Olmert aides said had gone well.

Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, an Israeli cabinet member and former defense minister, criticized the timing of the raid. "I don't think this operation should have been carried out on the day of a visit by the Israeli prime minister to a country in which we have a supreme strategic interest," he told Israel Radio. "Our relations with Egypt are more important to us than anything else."

Cleric Shot In Gaza After Plea For Calm (FT)

By Harvey Morris, Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

Unidentified gunmen shot dead a Muslim cleric after he delivered a sermon in the Gaza Strip on Friday calling for an end to fierce factional fighting between Hamas and Fatah, hospital officials and local residents said.

The cleric's shooting in central Gaza came hours after Ismail Haniyeh, the Palestinian Authority's Hamas prime minister, and Abu Mazen, its Fatah president, agreed to keep rival gunmen off Gaza's streets after clashes in which eight were killed.

Brushing aside Mr Haniyeh's plea for calm, Fatah issued a statement in Gaza: "Blood for blood and aggression for aggression...and all the sons of the movement should retaliate to each aggression openly."

It was their first encounter since last month's announcement by Mr Abbas that he planned to call new elections, which sparked the latest round of factional violence.

There was no statement from the president on the outcome of the meeting, but Mr Haniyeh said: "We are going to end all armed displays in the streets."

Mohammed Ghayeb, a commander of the Fatah-linked Preventive Security Force, and six of his bodyguards were killed on Thursday at the end of a day-long Hamas assault on his Gaza home. In a call to Palestine television shortly before he died, Colonel Ghayeb appealed for an ambulance to be sent to his home.

Hamas militants had held the Fatah force responsible for the killing of one of their number earlier in the day.

The factional violence is worsening just as the US is gearing up for another diplomatic effort in the region, sending Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, to Israel and the Palestinian territories late next week. However diplomats and US officials in Washington give no sign of any significant shift away from the current strategy of supporting Mr Abbas, with money and equipment, while isolating and shunning Hamas.

The international Quartet seeking to direct the peace process with Israel – the European Union, the US, Russia and the United Nations – are to meet on the sidelines of an international conference for Lebanon in Paris on January 25.

Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, and Javier Solana, the EU foreign policy chief, were both in Washington this week to press for renewed US engagement before the US electoral calendar of the 2008 presidential race pushes foreign policy aside. But the US has rebuffed efforts by some Europeans to broaden negotiations to include Syria.

Leaders of the two Palestinian factions have reached numerous deals to calm the factional violence but few have held for more than a few days.

Relations between the rival parties deteriorated after Hamas defeated Fatah in general elections a year ago and worsened after Mr Abbas called for new elections after the breakdown of talks to form a national unity government.

The rivalry is exacerbating a de facto split between the Gaza Strip, Hamas's power base, and the West Bank, where Fatah has a stronger armed presence.

Tanzanian Woman Is Chosen For U.N.'s 2nd Highest Post (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 5 — Secretary General Ban Ki-moon on Friday appointed Asha-Rose Mtengeti-Migiro, the foreign minister of Tanzania, to be deputy secretary general and said he intended to give her responsibility for day-to-day management of the world organization.

In choosing Ms. Migiro, 50, a professor who has served for six years in Tanzania's cabinet, Mr. Ban fulfilled a pledge to place a woman from a developing country in the second most powerful post at the United Nations. In a statement, he praised her

DOJ_NMG_0114028

"outstanding management skills" and said he intended to delegate to her "much of the administrative and management work of the Secretariat."

On Wednesday Mr. Ban, who took over as secretary general on Jan. 1, appointed Alicia Bárcena Ibarra, 54, a Mexican diplomat, to be the under secretary general for management, the top post focused exclusively on administration.

While some United States officials were unenthusiastic about Ms. Bárcena because of her lack of experience in financial management, they praised the choice of Ms. Migiro.

"Her experience indicates she will do a fantastic job," said Richard A. Grenell, the spokesman for the United States Mission. American officials said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was personally acquainted with Ms. Migiro and was pleased when she heard of the appointment on Friday.

Ms. Migiro has been Tanzania's foreign minister since January 2006, and before that she served for five years as minister for community development, gender and children. Over the past year she has played a leading role in efforts to resolve conflicts in central Africa.

As Mr. Ban started to build his team this week, African diplomats said they were pleased to hold on to one of the most influential posts after Kofi Annan, the former secretary general, who was from Ghana, stepped down.

"Women are multitasking people," said Dumisani S. Kumalo, the South African ambassador, who is a major player on behalf of developing nations. "And African women are even better. Watch out!"

African diplomats said Ms. Migiro had carried out a management overhaul in the foreign ministry, requiring new standards of efficiency.

Some United Nations officials noted that Mr. Ban's choices signaled a step back from the corporate-style management reforms that Washington has pushed since the early 1990s. Neither Ms. Migiro nor Ms. Bárcena had substantial business experience. Mr. Ban made it clear that he would focus on diplomacy and did not intend to play the chief executive role, as some Americans had hoped.

But Ms. Migiro may help Mr. Ban to win new support for reform. "The developing countries have seen the United States reforms as a way of taking control of the United Nations away from them," said Princeton N. Lyman, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations. He said Ms. Migiro might be able to propose reforms "in a way that does not seem threatening to them."

UN Chief Picks Tanzanian Deputy (BBC)

BBC.com, January 5, 2007

The new United Nations Secretary General, Ban Ki-Moon, has named a Tanzanian official, Asha-Rose Migiro, as his deputy.

The current Tanzanian foreign minister, she replaces British diplomat Mark Malloch Brown.

Before joining the government, Ms Migiro was a senior lecturer at the law faculty of Dar es Salaam University.

The appointment fulfils Mr Ban's pledge to choose a woman to fill the post of deputy secretary general.

Mr Ban described Ms Migiro as a highly respected leader who had championed the cause of developing countries over the years.

Mr Ban, 62, is the first Asian to hold the top post in 35 years.

The former South Korean foreign minister succeeded Kofi Annan, of Ghana.

Tanzanian Woman Chosen For No. 2 Post At United Nations (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

UNITED NATIONS — Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon on Friday made good on his pledge to appoint a woman from the developing world as deputy, choosing Tanzanian Foreign Minister Asha-Rose Migiro.

Ban called Migiro "a highly respected leader who has championed the cause of developing countries," and said he planned to delegate much of the U.N.'s management and administrative work to her. She will also oversee socioeconomic affairs and development issues.

The deputy secretary-general is a relatively new U.N. post, created by Ban's predecessor, Kofi Annan, in 1998. After the Iraq oil-for-food scandal revealed systemic mismanagement in the organization in 2005, Annan tried to transform the post to help rein in the bureaucracy. Ban has pledged to streamline the U.N. staff, and Migiro will oversee the day-to-day running of the world body and the changes in management and operations that Ban says he plans.

Migiro, 50, became Tanzania's first female foreign minister in January 2006 after serving as a university lecturer and Cabinet minister in Dar es Salaam, the nation's capital.

DOJ_NMG_0114029

U.N. spokeswoman Michele Montas said Migiro proved her ability to manage as the chairwoman of the Great Lakes regional conference in Central Africa in December. Montas said Ban carefully considered many candidates and emphasized that Migiro "was not named because she's an African and because she's a woman, but essentially because of her qualifications."

South African Ambassador Dumisani Kumalo, however, said that although Migiro "is very experienced in managing foreign affairs," being an African woman was her best qualification.

"Women are multi-tasking people," Kumalo said. "African women are even better. Watch out!"

African Union envoy Salim Ahmed Salim, Tanzania's former prime minister and foreign minister, said Migiro was a good choice, and not just because she was Tanzanian. "She's a very informed person, well educated, extremely articulate," he said. "She is one of those who has been an activist in the political situation in Tanzania, and an activist basically in the struggle for human rights on the continent."

Ban has spent his first week on the job filling his Cabinet, trying to balance merit, gender and geography. The permanent Security Council members have traditionally been guaranteed some of the top Cabinet posts, and so far, the custom seems to be continuing.

The new secretary-general named British diplomat John Holmes to be the new chief for humanitarian affairs and appointed Montas, an award-winning Haitian broadcast journalist, as his spokeswoman. Former Indian ambassador and undersecretary-general Vijay Nambiar is Ban's chief of staff. Mexican environmentalist Alicia Barcena Ibarra, who was Annan's chief of staff, succeeded American Christopher B. Burnham as undersecretary-general for management.

The U.S. is expected to receive a bolstered political affairs post and France to retain peacekeeping. China may run the Department of Economic and Social Affairs.

U.N. Chief To Open Financial Records (WP)

By Colum Lynch, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 5 -- U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki Moon announced Friday that he will release his personal financial records, making him the first U.N. leader to subject his financial dealings to public scrutiny.

Ban also appointed Tanzania's female foreign minister, Asha-Rose Migiro, as the United Nations' second-ranking official, fulfilling a campaign pledge to pick a woman from the Third World as his deputy.

The moves came as Ban faced a week of tough questioning from reporters over his decision to select two U.N. insiders to run his office and to oversee the institution's management. Those appointments raised questions about Ban's commitment to reinvigorate the world body's tarnished administrative culture.

The former South Korean foreign minister's action on his financial records was partly symbolic, because Ban had already been required to file disclosure statements when he served in the South Korean government. It was calculated to prod other senior U.N. officials to voluntarily make their own financial statements public.

Still, his announcement represented a break from his predecessor, Kofi Annan, who declined news media appeals to release his personal financial records and grudgingly agreed to disclose them to the newly established U.N. ethics office only during his final months in office.

Michele Montas, Ban's spokeswoman, said that Ban filed his financial statement on Tuesday with the U.N. ethics unit, where it will be examined by a U.S. auditing firm, PricewaterhouseCoopers. Other senior U.N. officials are required to file a financial disclosure statement with the ethics unit, but they are not required to make them public. "If they voluntarily want to do it, I guess they could do it. However, they are not in any way forced to do it," Montas said. "The secretary general said he wanted to give an example."

Montas said Ban has also asked the United Nations' top 60 officials to offer letters of resignation to allow him greater flexibility in selecting a new management team. She said the officials will continue their work for the organization until Ban assembles his new team.

Ban will "delegate much of the management and administrative work" to Migiro, a former academic who served for five years as Tanzania's minister for community development, gender and children's affairs, Montas said. Migiro, who was appointed Tanzanian foreign minister in January 2006, will also oversee U.N. social, economic and development activities.

It remained unclear how vigorously Ban examined Migiro's qualifications before offering her the job. Montas said that Ban had not held a single face-to-face interview with her before she was selected. But she said that Migiro, who beat out several other candidates for the job, had impressed him when they worked together as foreign ministers. "She was not named because she's an African and because she is a woman, but essentially because of her qualifications," Montas said.

DOJ_NMG_0114030

In a statement, Ban called Migiro "a highly respected leader" with "outstanding management skills" who has championed the cause of the world's poorest countries. The appointment was praised by a bloc of developing countries -- the Group of 77 -- which has been lobbying aggressively for greater representation in the U.N. leadership.

A Status Quo Secretary General (NYT)

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

The big powers in the United Nations Security Council chose Ban Ki-moon as secretary general because they wanted a low-key bureaucrat who wouldn't rock the boat. Judging by Mr. Ban's early moves, the world has gotten exactly that.

Expect no Kofi Annan-style exhortations to live up to the values of the U.N. charter. In commenting on the sordid execution of Saddam Hussein, Mr. Ban even managed to forget that the U.N. opposes the death penalty on principle. Expect no shift from patronage to selection based on merit for key staff positions. The top jobs in peacekeeping, political affairs and humanitarian relief are already being doled out to the favored candidates of London, Paris and Washington (three of Mr. Ban's backers).

And expect no serious drive for much-needed administrative reform. The top management job, previously held by a reform-minded American, has now been given to a long-serving insider, Alicia Bárcena Ibarra of Mexico.

Mr. Ban takes over at a difficult time. The secretariat's reputation for integrity has been battered by the oil-for-food scandal, and the Security Council's claim to influence has been battered by its failure to halt the genocide in Darfur or the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea.

On one crucial front, though, the outlook may be brightening. Under President Bush, relations between Washington and the U.N. were driven to their lowest point ever, following the twin blows of the Iraq war and the destructive presence of the former ambassador, John Bolton. The White House reportedly plans to nominate a new ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, who actually believes in diplomacy.

Mr. Khalilzad is currently the ambassador in Baghdad, where he is one of the few American officials to try to reach out to Sunni Muslims and curb the divisively sectarian policies of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. Unfortunately, the White House — desperate to make Mr. Maliki look like a leader — decided it did not want such an activist ambassador. We hope that choosing Mr. Khalilzad for the United Nations is at least a sign that Mr. Bush is learning the importance of diplomacy and cooperation, if not the importance of a powerful U.N. leader or a strong-minded ambassador in Baghdad.

China Moves To Tighten The Money Supply (NYT)

By David Barboza

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

SHANGHAI, Jan. 5 — China's central bank said late Friday that it had raised the reserve requirement ratio for banks, the fourth increase in six months, to further tighten the nation's money supply.

The modest move, which takes effect this month, increases the reserve ratio by half a percentage point, to 9.5 percent. Analysts said it was the government's latest warning that too much money in the financial system could ignite inflation and perhaps fuel a stock market bubble.

"This is a warning shot," said Dong Tao, the chief economist for non-Japan Asia at Credit Suisse. "If the stock market continues to go up, we might see further tightening."

Raising the amount of cash reserves that Chinese banks keep on hand with the central bank effectively restricts the amount of money that banks can lend. While not being very restrictive, the central bank aims to curb excessive lending to new factories, real estate projects and road construction.

The move also comes as China's stock market is booming after several years in the doldrums. Last year, the country's key index — the Shanghai exchange — rose 130 percent to close at 2,675, a record and the best performance of any major stock exchange in the world in 2006.

The market reached a 16-year high in December, as millions of investors who had been sitting on the sidelines in 2004 and 2005 jumped back into stocks.

Analysts say the government is determined to keep the economy expanding but is concerned about growing so quickly that the economy might crash before 2008, when Beijing is host to the Olympic Games, viewed as the ultimate coming-out party for China.

Overinvestment in real estate and construction has been among the chief worries for the government. And for much of the last two years there have been frequent warnings and government measures to tame a wild property run.

The Central Bank said that last October, for the first time in five years, the bank savings of Chinese citizens decreased from the month before, presumably as more money went into the stock market. Credit Suisse estimated that more than $30 billion in bank deposits have flowed into mutual funds or direct plays into the stock market over the last six weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0114031

Many analysts say now that the bull run will continue in 2007, prompting even more money to flow into the market. One Chinese mutual fund raised $5 billion in a single day recently before closing its doors to new investors, an astonishing achievement here, according to some economists.

Industrial and Commercial Bank of China, which was publicly listed only last October, here in Shanghai and in Hong Kong, has already gained over 70 percent. This week, prices shot up again, before falling sharply Friday.

The run-up means companies in China can once again raise money in the Chinese market rather than relying on the Hong Kong stock market. But huge risks remain in a market that many analysts have long derided as a gambling den crowded with companies with suspect accounting.

Several economists say that more increases are expected in the coming months, to tame the economy and the stock market.

Hong Liang, a Hong Kong-based economist at Goldman Sachs, said that the government had used the reserve ratio as a policy tool to help manage the economy but that it had not been very effective in cooling things down. She did not "expect it to have much impact on the real economy or the financial markets."

Large amounts of money flow into the country through foreign investments and surplus dollars from trade. China also has a high savings rate. So many people are looking to put that money to work — in real estate, the stock market and even by investing in art and antiques.

"A lot of hot money has entered the market, legally and otherwise," said Chang Chun, a professor of finance at the China Europe International Business School in Shanghai, speaking of the stock market. "In the past few years people were overpessimistic. Right now, they are overoptimistic and they're bringing a lot of money into the market."

China Currency Near Parity With Hong Kong's Dollar (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

HONG KONG, Jan. 5 — For more than half a century, residents of Hong Kong have taken pride in being more prosperous than their cousins nearby in mainland China, and have enjoyed feeling like big spenders whenever they crossed the border.

Merchants across the border in Shenzhen were happy to take Hong Kong dollars, pocketing the 6 percent premium it commanded over China's currency. Mainland tourists offering Chinese currency here were charged extra or even turned away and told to come back with Hong Kong dollars.

But the yuan is poised to become more valuable than the Hong Kong dollar by the end of the month, and could pass the traditional benchmark for the Hong Kong dollar's value as early as next week. The shift has been the latest in a series of shocks for residents' confidence that they or their ancestors had made the right decision to live in Hong Kong instead of anywhere else in China.

"Nowadays, the gap between China and Hong Kong has narrowed, and some people even think the standard of living in China is higher," where prices are lower and incomes are rising quickly, recalled Chan Chi Him, the second generation of a family that has sold birds' nests as a delicacy here since the end of World War II.

"It's easier for Chinese people to make money," he said.

Average incomes per person in cities like Beijing, Shanghai or Guangzhou remain a fifth or less of incomes for people in Hong Kong. But the averages in China are dragged down by very large numbers of very poor people.

People in Hong Kong are used to comparing themselves with the educated middle class on the mainland. And they are finding that a growing class of Chinese businessmen and businesswomen have become more affluent than the average resident of Hong Kong.

Millions of middle-class Chinese flock here every year, and shopkeepers are now happy to take Chinese currency, known as the yuan or renminbi.

At the same time, many shopkeepers across the border in China have stopped taking Hong Kong dollars or have begun asking a slightly greater number of dollars than the number of yuan on price tags would suggest.

Prices are rising here in markets for everything from luxury apartments to dried bugs, and the culprit is the same: the rising value of the Chinese yuan and the falling value of the Hong Kong dollar.

The winning bid in a land auction last month worked out to more than $7,000 a square foot once houses are built, making Hong Kong real estate some of the most valuable in the world. Developers are betting that multinationals and mainlanders alike will continue to see Hong Kong as an excellent base for doing business in China.

But Hong Kong also imports much of its food and other goods from the mainland, and the prices are climbing.

Sellers of traditional Chinese medicine are having to pay more for the herbs, insects and other wares they buy from the mainland. The price of dried cicadas, which are boiled in soup to improve eyesight, has risen close to 4 percent in the last year as the yuan has gradually strengthened, said Lee Chun Hung, the chairman of Lee Hoong Kee Ltd., a Chinese medicine wholesaler.

DOJ_NMG_0114032

Prices have soared for herbs that are in demand across China, as increasingly affluent mainlanders have bid up prices to levels that many people in Hong Kong cannot afford. A rare root that is boiled in soup and eaten to strengthen the lungs now sells for $618 for a small box, four times its price two years ago.

"It's not just the rise of the renminbi," Mr. Lee said, "it's also because the standard of living is going up on the mainland."

While prices are starting to creep up here after years of deflation, rising home prices and falling unemployment have helped produce soaring confidence here in the territory's economic future, recent surveys have shown.

The yuan has been rising partly because of calls from the United States and Europe for the Chinese currency to reflect China's rising trade surplus and huge intake of foreign investment.

Chinese officials have also voiced concerns that maintaining a low value for the currency may eventually unleash inflation, although prices are barely rising now on the mainland.

China unified various exchange rates in 1994 and, after several years of gradual appreciation, fixed the exchange rate of the yuan at 8.28 to the dollar in 1998. Beijing officials maintained that level until July 2004. They then began allowing a slow appreciation, with the yuan climbing 3.4 percent last year. It was worth slightly more than 7.81 yuan to the dollar in Friday trading in Shanghai.

The Hong Kong Monetary Authority pegged the Hong Kong dollar at 7.8 to the United States dollar in September 1983, and maintained that policy with few changes until June 2005. It then moved to a narrow trading band of 7.75 to 7.85 to the dollar.

The Hong Kong dollar has been trading near the top of that band lately, which is why it is likely that it will take a couple of more weeks for the yuan to reach parity.

Ben Simpfendorfer, a currency strategist at the Royal Bank of Scotland, said that the yuan would surpass the Hong Kong dollar "definitely before the end of the month."

While some speculators have raised the idea that the Hong Kong dollar might be repegged to the yuan, the Hong Kong Monetary Authority has been opposed, and most economists say that the move would be a bad idea. The weaker Hong Kong dollar improves Hong Kong's competitiveness relative to cities on the mainland, and a peg to the yuan would be difficult to maintain.

The yuan is not an internationally traded currency and the Chinese government backs it with a fairly inflexible monetary system in which the economy is controlled less by interest rate changes than by administrative measures, like an order on Friday that banks raise their reserves at the central bank to 9.5 percent of assets, from 9 percent.

The sometimes tumultuous violent history of currency policy in Hong Kong has also discouraged officials. When the Hong Kong dollar plunged in early September 1983, partly on uncertainty over what would happen to the territory after its return to Chinese rule in 1997, gasoline prices climbed because they were set in dollars and taxi drivers responded by holding a protest that turned violent; the Hong Kong dollar has been closely managed ever since.

China Media Battle Hints At Shift On Intellectual Property (NYT)

By Howard W. French

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

SHANGHAI, Jan. 3 — One of China's largest newspapers has filed a lawsuit against one of the country's leading Internet portals claiming that it violated copyright laws, setting off a media war and highlighting the first signs of a possible shift in policies toward intellectual property rights here.

In the suit, which was filed in October and is expected to go to court soon, the newspaper, The Beijing News, is seeking $400,000 in damages from a popular Internet site called Tom.com, alleging that it has copied and republished more than 25,000 articles and photos without authorization since 2003.

China has long had the reputation as a sort of no man's land for intellectual property rights, with companies in virtually every industry freely copying designs and other content from foreign companies and domestic rivals with little fear of punishment.

The lawsuit, however, is headed to court at a time of accelerating legal change and signs of increased efforts by law enforcement to protect copyrights and intellectual property. It is also a critical time for China's newspaper industry, which grew explosively in the last decade or so but now faces an even faster-growing rival: Internet-based news media.

Now, as in the United States and many other countries, with computer use and broadband access booming here, newspapers are losing readers to large, corporate-owned Web sites. What had set China apart from much of the rest of the world until recently was that these Web sites faced no legal obstacles in copying material from newspapers, often wholesale.

"There is a very brutal competition between newspapers — with seven or eight big ones just in Beijing — and now a big, new player, the Internet, wants to wipe them all out, to change the landscape," said Yu Guofu, a lawyer who specializes in intellectual property. “The press is leading a hard life and facing an unpleasant future, but it has decided it is better to protect its rights than just sit and wait to die.”

DOJ_NMG_0114033

According to one recent study, newspaper readership in China has declined sharply in the last three years, with the number of people who say they read a newspaper at least once a week falling to 22 percent last year from 26 percent in 2003.

A major presumed cause for the decline is that big Internet content providers, or portals, have become one-stop sources for all manner of information, including news, entertainment and blogs.

Until recently, the general practice for most portals was to lift news and other information directly from other sources, sometimes crediting the original source and sometimes not, but rarely paying for the information.

The Beijing News lawsuit was filed a little more than a year after a meeting of major newspaper publishers in Nanjing at which strategies were discussed to shore up the industry’s base and combat the leeching of content and readers by Internet companies.

“In terms of the law, things are quite clear, that Tom’s use of Beijing News’s work without authorization clearly violates Beijing News’s copyrights,” said Yu Guoming, dean of the school of journalism at Renmin University in Beijing. “There are lots and lots of cases very similar to this one, but with this lawsuit, the traditional media is sending a very clear signal to the electronic media that their free lunch is over.”

A spokesman for Tom.com, Tu Jianglu, denied any violations. “As a big company we respect copyright and property rights,” he said. “I can only say that there are other facts that make this more complicated.”

The Beijing News declined to comment on the lawsuit.

Until recently, China’s laws have generally been anything but clear on intellectual property, and have made it difficult to win a suit over an alleged infringement. Such an environment may have served China’s needs earlier in its industrial takeoff, when its industries were straining to catch up with the West.

The battle in the news media reflects part of a shift in the intellectual property landscape as China’s growing place in world trade has brought strong new pressures to rein in wholesale piracy. Many of the country’s largest Internet companies, for example, are listed on foreign stock exchanges, making them liable for lawsuits filed abroad.

Zhang Xin, a spokesman for Sohu.com, a leading portal, said, “We’ve signed agreements with over 1,000 traditional news organizations in China, which means that if we use their articles or reports, we definitely have reached prior agreement with them.”

An awareness also seems to be taking hold here that Chinese companies must build strong brands of their own to succeed and that they cannot do so in an environment where copying goes unpunished.

“To enhance the country’s development we are trying to encourage innovation,” said Xu Chao, vice director of the National Copyright Bureau, a government agency. “We are placing more emphasis on intellectual property, and have made improvements in the law. It used to be possible for traditional media or Internet media to simply copy each other’s work, but now this has been forbidden.”

White Farmers Given Leases In Zimbabwe (WP)

By Craig Timberg, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

19 Grants Signal Modification Of Divisive Land Reform Policy

JOHANNESBURG, Jan. 5 -- Zimbabwe has granted long-term leases to 19 white farmers in a step toward allowing as many as 1,000 white-owned commercial farms to resume operating legally after years of land seizures, a top government adviser said.

The issuing of the leases is the latest indication that Zimbabwe is pulling back from the harshest elements of a seven-year-old land reform program that has devastated its once-thriving agricultural sector and helped push the annual inflation rate over 1,000 percent, the highest in the world.

The adviser, Sam Moyo of the African Institute for Agrarian Studies in Harare, the capital, said the government is not abandoning an effort that has given farms to tens of thousands of landless black peasants. But he said it is now clear that Zimbabwe has sufficient fertile land to also allocate modest plots to most of the white farmers who remain.

"There's enough land to accommodate a thousand white farmers," Moyo said from Harare. He outlined the plan in Thursday's editions of Britain's Guardian newspaper.

Many white farmers have rejected the move as a desperate bid to revive the country's economy without restoring their property rights. The new leases are for 99 years but include conditions that would allow government officials to easily revoke them, and the leases can be bought and sold only with the approval of the government.

DOJ_NMG_0114034

Farmers say that few banks will lend the capital necessary to restart major commercial operations without legally recognized, transferable deeds.

"They don't seem to be serious," said Trevor Gifford, vice president of Zimbabwe's Commercial Farmers Union, speaking from the eastern border city of Mutare. "Those 99-year leases they've issued are not worth the paper they're printed on."

Gifford was once a prominent promoter of the government's on-again, off-again effort to allow some white farmers to legally return to their land. But his public optimism about the government's intentions dimmed in May after his 600-acre farm was taken over. Ten families now inhabit the farm, and commercial cultivation has halted there, he said.

"It's very obvious the government is not interested in production, or even protecting the existing businesses," Gifford said Friday.

Land has long been an emotional, politically explosive issue in Zimbabwe, a southern African country of 12.2 million people that was once the region's breadbasket, producing lucrative surpluses of corn and tobacco.

Before the land invasions began in 2000, an estimated 4,500 white families owned most of the fertile land in a country whose citizens were overwhelmingly landless blacks. The average size of commercial farms in that era, Moyo said, was nearly 5,000 acres.

President Robert Mugabe, in power since the end of white-minority rule in 1980, backed the land invasions, which were spearheaded by self-proclaimed veterans of the guerrilla movement he once led.

Land redistribution, however chaotic and violent, was popular in some areas, but many of the new owners -- including some members of Zimbabwe's business and political elite -- lacked the expertise to run large-scale farms. Agricultural output collapsed, as did a national economy long dependent on farm exports. Zimbabwe, meanwhile, became a chronic recipient of massive international food aid.

Most of the white farmers have fled -- in some cases starting new agricultural ventures in Zambia, Mozambique or Nigeria -- or left the business.

Moyo estimated that 600 white farmers continue to work in Zimbabwe, though many of them on plots one-tenth their previous size, and said that 300 or 400 former farmers would like to return to work. The Commercial Farmers Union gives similar estimates, saying that nearly 1,000 current and former white farmers have applied for long-term leases from the government.

Among the contentious issues remaining is whether white farmers must surrender the deeds to their land to qualify for new leases. Many have locked them away in safes or in bank deposit boxes in other countries, with the intention of waging legal battles to reclaim the property when Mugabe is no longer president.

Moyo said that he did not expect that white farmers would have to relinquish their deeds but that the documents have been made void by a 2005 constitutional change nationalizing all property in Zimbabwe.

Government officials have for the past year made contradictory statements about the nature and extent of their plans to issue long-term leases to white farmers.

Moyo said the debate has often been confused by semantic distinctions, with the government seeing the new leases as an extension of the land reform program rather than a reversal of policy.

"What they are against is having oversized white farms, or too many white farms," he said.

Ties To Communist Secret Police Snare Polish Bishop (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, January 6, 2007

PARIS, Jan. 5 — Warsaw's new archbishop, Stanislaw W. Wielgus, caught in Eastern Europe's widening witch hunt for former Communist secret police informers, admitted Friday that he had collaborated with the Sluzba Bezpieczenstwa, or Security Service, known as the S.B.

"Before you today, I confess to the mistake committed by me years ago, just as I have confessed to the Holy Father," Bishop Wielgus said in an open letter to Polish Catholics. "By the fact of this entanglement, I have damaged the church."

He said he compounded that damage by denying "facts of this cooperation" in recent days.

Bishop Wielgus insisted, however, that he had neither spied on anyone nor harmed anyone. He said the only thing he ever did was to inform the secret police of his agenda during foreign academic meetings and to promise not to take part in anti-Communist activities.

He said it was up to Pope Benedict XVI to decide whether he would keep his new job, which he took up Friday.

The bishop is to be officially elevated to archbishop during a ceremony on Sunday in Warsaw at St. John's Cathedral, though many voices in Poland have called for him to step down.

DOJ_NMG_0114035

The Warsaw archbishopric is a particularly symbolic institution in the former Soviet bloc. The Polish church, together with the Polish-born Pope John Paul II, were crucial supporters of the pro-democracy Solidarity movement, which helped bring down the totalitarian system and end the cold war.

Confirmation that the archbishop collaborated is doubly troubling because the Polish secret police murdered a charismatic anti-Communist priest from the archdiocese, the Rev. Jerzy Popieluszko, in 1984. Warsaw's departing archbishop, Cardinal Jozef Glemp, waged a quiet battle with the Communist Party in those years.

Many historians argue that a significant segment of the clergy in Poland and other Eastern bloc countries collaborated to varying degrees with the secret services. Priests have recently been added to those segments of society under scrutiny in several countries during recent efforts to expose former Communist collaborators.

Two years ago, files surfaced showing that the Rev. Mieczyslaw Malinski, who had been close to John Paul II, worked for the S.B. in the 1980s. Several other prominent priests have since been accused of having been informers, and some have admitted that they had links to the secret police. The Polish church publicly apologized last year for priests who collaborated with the S.B., but has tried to keep their names secret.

The uproar over Bishop Wielgus's past began shortly after Pope Benedict picked him in early December to succeed Cardinal Glemp as Warsaw's archbishop. A Polish daily newspaper, Gazeta Polska, reported Dec. 20 that the bishop, 67, had spied on dissidents and fellow clerics for more than two decades, until Communism collapsed in 1989.

Both Bishop Wielgus and the Vatican sought to deflect the accusations by saying his involvement with the secret police had been nothing out of the ordinary for people traveling abroad during the Communist era. Leading representatives of the Polish clergy denounced the accusations against him.

But Poland's human rights ombudsman, Janusz Kochanowski, said Thursday that there was evidence in the secret police archives that Bishop Wielgus had knowingly cooperated with Communist authorities. Rzeczpospolita, one of Poland's most respected newspapers, published documents showing that he had met with police agents more than 50 times in one five-year period.

Even Poland's Catholic Church Historical Commission issued a statement on Friday, saying, "There are numerous, substantial documents confirming Stanislaw Wielgus's willingness for a conscious and secret cooperation with the Communist security forces."

The commission said that there was no evidence that Bishop Wielgus's actions harmed anyone, and that the documents would be sent to the Vatican for further study.

Monsignor Wielgus first admitted Friday that he had signed a cooperation statement with the secret police in 1978 under pressure by a "brutal intelligence officer" when he was seeking permission to travel to Munich. "That was my moment of weakness," he wrote.

But he accused the secret police of falsifying documents that cast him as a more eager, useful collaborator than he actually was.

"The personality ascribed to me in the intelligence service documents is so far from the truth that I would never have recognized myself," he wrote.

Those claims are not far-fetched. Almost from the moment the Iron Curtain fell, the nations of the former Communist bloc have been steeped in controversies over the files of their secret police forces. The documents are often elliptical and incomplete, and were sometimes embellished by secret police officers eager to impress their superiors, experts say.

The documents published by Rzeczpospolita and other newspapers suggest that Bishop Wielgus was recruited by the S.B. in 1967 when he was a philosophy student at the University of Lublin in eastern Poland, more than a decade before he signed the cooperation agreement. Newspapers cited other documents in which the S.B. claimed he had given them information about activities at the university, where he later served as a professor of medieval philosophy.

The newspapers claimed that some documents referred to Bishop Wielgus by the code names Grey, Adam and Adam Wysocki. They said he received training and was rewarded for his collaboration with a grant to study in Munich.

Later Friday, Bishop Wielgus issued another statement, which was broadcast by Vatican Radio's Polish service, in which he said he had collaborated so that he could travel abroad for his academic research.

"I'm not trying to justify anything, I know that I shouldn't have had any relations with the Communist regime's secret services," he said. "At the time I thought I had to continue my important scientific research and acquire sound training for the good of the church."

The Vatican has continued to support the embattled prelate.

"The Holy See, in deciding the nomination of the new archbishop of Warsaw, took into consideration all the circumstances of his life, including those regarding his past," the Vatican said in a statement on Friday, repeating the position it has taken for the past month.

DOJ_NMG_0114036

The statement said Benedict “has every confidence in Bishop Stanislaw Wielgus and in full conscience entrusted him the mission of pastor of the archdiocese of Warsaw.”

Polish Archbishop Admits Signing Communist Pact (WP/AP)

By Vanessa Gera, Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Cleric Allegedly Cooperated With Secret Police

WARSAW, Jan. 5 -- After calls for him to step aside, Warsaw's incoming Roman Catholic archbishop admitted Friday that he had signed an agreement to cooperate with the secret police during the Communist era and said he was leaving his fate in the hands of Pope Benedict XVI.

Archbishop Stanislaw Wielgus, whose installation ceremony is scheduled for Sunday, expressed regret for an act that he acknowledged "harmed the church." He said that despite signing the document, he "never informed on anyone and never tried to hurt anyone."

"Before you today, I confess to the mistake committed by me years ago, just as I have confessed to the Holy Father," Wielgus said in an open letter to Poland's Roman Catholic clergy and believers.

The mounting allegations against Wielgus have gripped the heavily Roman Catholic country, where the church is esteemed for its opposition to the former Communist government. People widely revere the late Polish-born Pope John Paul II, who is credited by some with hastening the fall of the Communist system.

The scandal grew after church officials said Friday that documents at a historical institute indicated Wielgus had willingly collaborated. A church commission said documents "confirm Rev. Stanislaw Wielgus's willingness for conscious and secret cooperation with the security organs of Communist Poland." The statement added, however, that there is no proof that he "inflicted any harm on anyone."

Newspapers on Friday devoted their front pages to the revelations. A government commission also concluded he had collaborated.

The allegations surfaced in the right-wing Gazeta Polska weekly, two weeks after the Vatican appointed Wielgus archbishop of Warsaw. He initially denied any collaboration.

In a statement Friday, Wielgus acknowledged that he had contact with the secret service, but he said documents indicating he collaborated were written by the secret police and reflected their account of events, not the truth.

Wielgus, who has been bishop of Plock since 1999, said he was leaving his fate in the hands of the pope: "With full humility, I declare to the Holy Father that I will submit to each of his decisions."

Wielgus is the latest in a series of church and public figures in Poland to face allegations of collaboration with the secret police before Communist rule ended in 1989.

In his statement, Wielgus acknowledged signing a declaration of cooperation in 1978 when seeking permission to travel to Munich because he was threatened by "a very brutal" secret police agent. "That was my moment of weakness," he wrote, insisting that he never cooperated with the secret police.

He also said many statements about him in the police documents are wrong, including that he spoke Spanish or had publications abroad. "The characterization of me in the secret police material differs so much from the truth, that I would not recognize myself on their basis if it were anonymous," he said.

During a visit to Warsaw in May 2006, Benedict cautioned against passing judgment on people who lived in different times, remarks that came in the wake of similar allegations against a Polish priest.

"We must guard against the arrogant claim of setting ourselves up to judge earlier generations who lived in different times and in different circumstances," Benedict told clergy. His comments were met with applause.

Chavez Denounced For Canceling TV License (LAT)

By Chris Kraul, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

The OAS says the president's decision to shut down Venezuela's oldest network appears to be censorship.

BOGOTA, COLOMBIA — Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's decision not to renew the license of his nation's largest and oldest television network, a frequent critic of his policies, drew a rebuke Friday from the Organization of American States.

OAS Secretary-General Jose Miguel Insulza said in a statement that Chavez acted in an arbitrary manner in yanking the license of RCTV, which began operations in 1953 and has the largest viewership of any network in Venezuela.

"The closing of a mass communications outlet is a rare step in the history of our hemisphere and has no precedent in the recent decades of democracy," Insulza wrote, adding he hoped "this decision will be revised."

DOJ_NMG_0114037

Chavez's "adoption of an administrative measure to close a news outlet gives the appearance of a form of censorship against freedom of expression and at the same time serves as a warning against other news organizations leading them to limit their actions at the risk of facing the same fate," Insulza said in the statement.

The OAS objection follows similar condemnations by news media freedom groups, including Reporters Without Borders and the Inter-American Press Assn.

Chavez announced the decision Dec. 28 at a military academy in Caracas, saying RCTV owners would have to "pack your bags, turn out the lights."

He accused the network of promoting the coup in April 2002 that briefly knocked him from power, and of committing unspecified ethical lapses. The Ministry of Communications and Information later specified that the license would not be renewed when it expired in May.

In a radio interview Thursday, Chavez, who was reelected last month in a landslide, said the decision was "irrevocable" and was made because RCTV "didn't pass the test to receive a renewal of a concession from a state that is serious, responsible, committed and respectful of the people."

RCTV General Manager Marcel Granier denied that his network had promoted the coup and merely covered it as a news event. He said in an interview that the network executives had not been presented with a formal notice or complaint that they could contest in court or at a public hearing.

"The only coup plotter is Chavez, who as everyone knows tried to overthrow the government in 1992, years before he was elected," Granier said. "We have a democratic tradition and we have been a model of that tradition.

"Not renewing our license is like President Bush one day announcing that NBC is going off the air because it was involved in a conspiracy against the United States," Granier said.

Orlando Ochoa, a risk analyst and economic consultant in Caracas, said that shutting down the nation's most popular TV network would "increase social polarization and destroy harmony at a time when Chavez has such a mandate to fight crime, inflation and eliminate corruption."

"Yes, RCTV had a critical attitude toward Chavez during the attempted coup more than four years ago, but so did all of the other big stations in Venezuela," Ochoa said. "The difference is that others have become more bland while RCTV maintains its attitude."

RCTV is a privately owned company whose largest shareholders are the Bottome and Phelps families. The network produces news and prime time programming, including 1,000 hours of telenovelas, or soap operas, each year. It owns 40 radio and television stations across Venezuela.

Granier said RCTV had "earned a place in Venezuelan society and we want to continue working as we have done." Asked whether the owners would sell if appeals failed, Granier said the market might be limited.

"Who is going to want to buy such a business in a country where there is a president in a military uniform saying which media can exist and which can't?" Granier said. "People want to invest in a country where there is rule of law."

Menem Preaches His Free Market Gospel (FT)

By Jude Webber

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

Carlos Menem polarises Argentines like few other politicians. His economic policies during a corruption-tainted government in the 1990s are blamed by many for sowing the seeds of the calamitous debt crisis that erupted five years ago, but a quarter of voters were still prepared to have him back in the past elections – and he is betting more will give him another chance now.

The former president, now 76, is bidding for his third term in office in elections next October, preaching a return to the free-market gospel he says will restore to Argentines their lost prosperity and put an end to President Néstor Kirchner's "out-of-control populism".

"I think I have a very good chance...I wouldn't be here otherwise," he told the Financial Times from his spacious office in the Hotel Presidente, his pied-á-terre in Buenos Aires.

Mr Menem scored a slim first-round lead over Mr Kirchner in the 2003 elections but pulled out of a runoff when it became clear he was heading for a "suicidal" defeat. That will not happen this time, unless pending charges over allegedly irregular arms sales thwart his plans.

"I'm determined to run. I won't withdraw," he vowed.

Argentina has been through the mill since Mr Menem left office in 1999, but he denies his policy of shackling the peso to the dollar caused the economy to implode and describes himself as "an angel" compared with the current government. Dollar parity made Argentines wealthy and stabilised an economy ravaged by inflation of 100 per cent a month at the start of Mr

DOJ_NMG_0114038

Menem's term in 1989. But foreign debt ballooned and the currency peg crumbled, sparking the biggest debt default in history, deadly street riots and the spectacle of five presidents in a fortnight in 2001-02.

Of the one-to-one exchange rate, Mr Menem said: "It worked very well...it made Argentina grow and the poverty rate was below what we have now." Indeed, he would consider bringing it back: "We'd have to see what state the country is in a year from now," he said. "I don't rule it out. Everyone is demanding it."

Mr Menem pledged an immediate end to what he called Mr Kirchner's "economic terrorism". He said was causing "an explosive social situation" in which a third of the population is below the poverty line and 16 per cent indigent, despite growth expected to be nearly 9 per cent this year, for a fourth straight year.

He vowed to scrap the price controls that Mr Kirchner introduced to try to rein in inflation, now running at 10 per cent; to abolish a freeze on energy tariffs that companies blame for a failure to invest to improve infrastructure or boost dwindling oil and gas reserves; to do away with "distortive" export tariffs and taxes on bank transactions; and to rein in runaway provincial budgets.

He had no quick fix for inflation, promising only that prices would realign themselves in a market economy. Untied from price controls and encouraged by a renewed government commitment to privatisation, companies would also be able to boost salaries, Mr Menem said, reckoning on a minimum wage of about $650 (€500, £337) a month, triple the current level.

Unlike Mr Kirchner, Mr Menem offered hope to the holders of $20m in defaulted Argentine debt who are suing for full reimbursement after they turned down the government's offer of a 70 per cent write-down. "I'd try to reach a deal," he said, without giving details. "The only way of fixing this is directly between the Argentine government and the creditors...And when I say fixing it, you don't fix things with words but with cash."

Mr Menem brushes off criticism of his government's scandals, lingering corruption allegations he calls "total infamy" and recent health problems, claiming to have up to 15 per cent support already.

But after controversial former leaders in Peru and Nicaragua were voted back to power in the past year, Mr Menem says simply: "Why not me?"

Kirchner Critic Seeks Argentine Presidency (FT)

By Benedict Mander

Financial Times, January 6, 2007

Roberto Lavagna, the former economy minister who is widely credited with engineering Argentina's rapid economic recovery since its collapse in 2001, has announced that he will run for president in elections due in October.

Mr Lavagna, who was sacked from the cabinet in November 2005 because of disagreements with President Néstor Kirchner, has criticised the government's "shift to the left" in the past year. He also warned of increasing signs of authoritarianism and an economic policy that deters foreign investment.

By challenging the presidency, Mr Lavagna has ended months of speculation, although the centre-left Mr Kirchner has yet to make clear if he will seek re-election. Mr Kirchner's high approval ratings, which some pollsters put above 70 per cent, mean that he is widely expected to win the elections. If he does not run, it is likely that he will be replaced by his wife, Cristina Fernández, an influential senator who would also be expected to win.

It remains to be seen whether the weak and fragmented opposition will unite behind Mr Lavagna against the formidable popularity of the government. Mr Lavagna told the daily La Nación that "it would be a mistake" to have several opposition candidates.

Without a united opposition, Mr Lavagna stands little chance of winning, says Sergio Berensztein, a political analyst based in Buenos Aires.

A key ally for Mr Lavagna, who claims to represent the "progressive centre", would be the main centre-right candidate, Mauricio Macri, who owns Boca Juniors football club. They have been in talks for several months, although Mr Macri reacted coolly to Mr Lavagna's announcement on Friday.

"If Lavagna and Macri run separately that will basically assure the president a victory in the first round of voting," said Mr Berensztein. If they pooled resources they might be able to push the elections to a second round of voting, which would be held if the winner gets less than 45 per cent of the vote without a 10-point lead. "The only way the opposition has a chance is with a solid coalition."

According to a recent poll by Graciela Römer, if there were elections now Mr Kirchner would win with 55 per cent of the vote, while his wife would get 39 per cent. Against Mr Kirchner, Mr Macri would come second with 11.8 per cent, while Mr Lavagna and Elisa Carrió, a centre-left candidate, would both receive more than 5 per cent.

In The Global Energy Rush, Nuclear Gets A Resurgence (WP)

By Doug Struck, Washington Post Foreign Service

DOJ_NMG_0114039

The Washington Post, January 6, 2007

Sixty miles outside Buenos Aires, construction crews soon will be swarming over a partially built concrete dome abandoned 12 years ago, resuming work on Argentina's long-delayed Atucha II nuclear power plant. They will be in the vanguard of surging interest in nuclear power worldwide.

Faced with evidence that coal- and oil-fired electric plants are overheating the planet, and alarmed by soaring demand for electricity, governments from South America to Asia are turning once again to a power source mostly shunned for two decades as too dangerous and too costly.

Globally, 29 nuclear power plants are being built. Well over 100 more have been written into the development plans of governments for the next three decades. India and China each are rushing to build dozens of reactors. The United States and the countries of Western Europe, led by new nuclear champions, are reconsidering their cooled romance with atomic power. International agencies have come on board; even the Persian Gulf oil states have announced plans for nuclear generators.

"Energy and climate changes can't remain tied to carbon or hydrocarbon," the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, said in October. "They are polluting, and we'll have to find substitute energies, including nuclear energy." It creates heat through nuclear reactions rather than combustion, giving off no carbon dioxide, the most important of the so-called greenhouse gases that trap heat in the Earth's atmosphere.

Utilities are dusting off plans for nuclear plants even though most of the problems that shelved those projects remain. Critics say governments have forgotten the crises of Three Mile Island and Chernobyl. The costs and time to build the concrete-encased plants far exceed those of conventional plants. There still is no safe permanent storage for the used fuel that will remain radioactive for a million years. Added to these problems are the newly realistic worry of a terrorist attack on a nuclear plant.

"It can be very controversial," Mexican Congressman David Maldonado said of his country's plans to build a $4 billion nuclear plant in Veracruz. "The things that have happened in years past, going back to Chernobyl, have created a lot of fear here."

In the United States, the Bush administration has strongly pushed nuclear power and backed a 2005 energy bill offering subsidies to utilities to go ahead with projects in a shortened, streamlined regulatory process. The industry talks enthusiastically of 10 to 30 new nuclear plants being started in the next two decades.

Critics say those predictions will stall without long-term subsidies, and they scoff at the administration's explanations that nuclear plants will help battle global warming and reduce dependence on foreign oil. "The Bush administration doesn't believe climate change is a threat unless it is arguing for nuclear power," said Edwin Lyman, a senior staff scientist at the Union of Concerned Scientists in Washington.

Skeptics contend that the nuclear resurgence is still just talk. In the United States, they note, not a single reactor has been ordered. The high costs and long delays that vexed nuclear construction -- Argentina's Atucha II was 14 years in construction before it was halted -- soon will diminish the atomic ardor in other countries, they say.

"Even with all the respective subsidies, nuclear power plants are still too expensive," Lyman said. "We need to move faster to really take a bite out of greenhouse emissions, and there aren't any scenarios in which nuclear power can do that."

At present, 442 nuclear plants are operating in more than 31 countries, according to the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna. The United States has the most -- 103, which provide about 19.3 percent of the country's electric power. Next is France, with 59, and Japan, with 55. Worldwide, atomic energy accounts for 16 percent of electrical production; the vast majority of electricity is generated by burning coal, oil and natural gas.

But carbon emissions from conventional plants bring "higher global temperatures, rising sea levels that would threaten to submerge coastal regions, prolonged droughts and more frequent violent storms," IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei warned in Jakarta, Indonesia, in December.

The world's energy needs will rise 51 percent by 2030 because of industrialization and population growth, the International Energy Agency in Paris predicts. Add up the carbon-dioxide emissions from all the oil and coal plants that would be built to meet that need, and scientists see an environmental nightmare in the making.

Natural gas is a cleaner fuel for making electricity, but the price has soared. Hydropower from dams has largely topped out at less than 20 percent of the world's electric supply. Alternatives such as solar, thermal and wind power remain a tiny contributor in most countries and would require dramatic economic changes to become substantial sources. To many policymakers, that leaves nuclear.

In Britain, such calculations led to a striking reversal in policy. In 2003, a government white paper called nuclear power an unattractive option; in May, Prime Minister Tony Blair declared that nuclear power is "back on the agenda with a vengeance."

Blair argued that the technology is a way to ensure British energy security in an unstable world and to combat global climate change -- a top priority of his government. Twenty-three nuclear plants now provide almost 20 percent of the United

DOJ_NMG_0114040

Kingdom's power, and Blair has called for a new mix of non-polluting sources, including nuclear plants and renewable alternatives.

"In the future, energy security will be almost as important as defense," Blair said in October.

Similar jitters about the reliability -- and price -- of traditional fuels are adding to the rush to nuclear. Japan, as host to the 1997 Kyoto conference that mandated a global reduction in greenhouse gases, is building three and planning 10 more nuclear plants in the next decade. Its plans are spurred by Japan's wariness over neighboring China's campaign to lock up oil and gas supply contracts with foreign countries.

"The timing of Kyoto Protocol coming into effect and the timing of China endeavoring in its mission to secure natural resources in the world coincide," said Tadao Yanase, director of nuclear energy policy at Japan's Agency for Natural Resources and Energy.

China's plans call for 15 to 30 new nuclear plants by 2020 and even more conventional plants, most of them coal-fired. Its researchers are working on creating smaller, less-expensive nuclear plants. India, with 16 nuclear plants, is building seven more plants and has been promised U.S. help to triple its collection by 2020.

Some nuclear construction will merely keep the status quo. The first big wave of nuclear plants, built in the 1970s and 1980s, are near their planned obsolescence; six have been shut down. Regulators in the United States have extended licenses to 60 years, but other countries are replacing aging plants to make sure the nuclear component of their base supply does not disappear.

Proliferation of nuclear material remains a worry. And another disaster like the Soviet Union's at Chernobyl in 1986 or a near-disaster like that at Pennsylvania's Three Mile Island in 1979 would likely freeze the plans for nuclear construction.

"The industry is sticking its head in the sand," said Jim Riccio, a policy analyst at anti-nuclear Greenpeace in Washington. "They haven't gotten close to addressing safety or security."

Because nuclear fission emits no greenhouse gases, some environmental groups have grudgingly concluded that nuclear power is preferable to global warming. Others still argue that aggressive conservation and a dramatic increase in solar, wind, thermal and biofueled production can meet future electric needs.

"The voices of opposition have drastically decreased," Yanase said in his office in Tokyo. "They obviously won't say they totally support" nuclear power, "but they are giving a tacit consent."

Industry advocates say the old complaints about nuclear technology have been addressed with simpler and cheaper designs, faster regulatory review, improved security and more operating experience.

"Things have changed," said Adrian Heymer, director of new plant deployment for the Nuclear Energy Institute in Washington. The industry expects U.S. companies to apply for 11 construction permits by the end of the decade. "When you put it all together, nuclear becomes an attractive package," he said.

Companies and countries that build nuclear plants are riding that pitch. Westinghouse Electric Co., which has made about half the world's reactors, signed a deal with China in December to help in construction of four nuclear plants there.

"There is a lot of opportunity now -- in Southeast Asia, in the Near East and Europe," Valery Arabkin, an official at Rosenergoatom, the Russian entity that competes with Westinghouse, said in an interview in Moscow. "These are good markets for Russia."

Russia is building two reactors in China, two in India and one in Iran. It just signed a $5.1 billion deal to build two reactors in Bulgaria and is sniffing out business in Finland, Indonesia and Egypt.

Russia's own nuclear industry is rebounding after years of neglect. President Vladimir Putin wants to sell the country's natural gas abroad and offset the exported energy by increasing nuclear power production, now provided by 31 reactors. That involves an ambitious program to build 42 more reactors in Russia by 2030, Sergey Kiriyenko, director of the Federal Nuclear Agency, or Rosatom, said in testimony before parliament last month.

"I don't think it can be done," said Vladimir Slivyak, co-chairman of Ecodefense, which has been urging the government to use more of the country's natural gas at home and develop wind and hydropower.

Critics say that when the emissions from uranium mining and plant construction are counted, nuclear power is not "carbon-free," as advocates assert. Such environmental concerns have put Germany on an opposite course from most European countries. Six years ago, Germany committed to shutting down all of its 17 nuclear power plants by 2021, prodded by the Greens party, then part of the government.

The most populous country in Western Europe, Germany will be hard-pressed to compensate for loss of its nuclear power while also meeting promises to reduce greenhouse gas emissions and cut back on gas and oil deliveries from its chief supplier, Russia. Some people are calling for an extension of the nuclear deadline.

But nuclear power remains unpopular among Germans, who often express strong pride over the giant windmills that are an increasingly common sight on the country's plains.

DOJ_NMG_0114041

"There really is no support in Germany to rely on nuclear energy as a means to help get rid of fossil fuels," Reinhard Buetikofer, co-chairman of the Greens, said in an interview. "We would have to build another 50 to 60 nuclear power plants in Germany. This is unthinkable."

The EU's Ugly Little Challenge (LAT)

By Colum McCann

The Los Angeles Times, January 6, 2007

Adding Bulgaria and Romania may force it to confront a reflexive hatred of Gypsies.

ON NEW YEAR'S day, the European Union swelled by another 28 million people. The inclusion of Romania and Bulgaria in the European fold is cause for celebration in the streets of Bucharest and the courtyards of Sofia. For two of Europe's poorer countries, inclusion in the EU brings innumerable benefits, not the least roads, recognition, grants, travel access and a sundering of the Soviet past.

Yet for many Europeans — in Paris, in Dublin, in Brussels and perhaps even in Bucharest and Sofia — it spells the inclusion of 3 million potential problems: yet more Gypsies.

In a week that also heralds 2007 as "The European Year of Equal Opportunities for All," the word "Gypsy" still holds negative freight, even among those to whom it applies: the Roma. With ethnic and cultural roots stretching back to ancient India, the Roma are a diaspora community to rival the Irish and the Jews. Nonterritorial, they number anywhere from 12 million to 14 million worldwide, of whom roughly 10 million are found in Europe.

Yet European newspaper editors are stumped by how they should address the largest minority on the continent. Town mayors all over Eastern Europe often avoid the term altogether and talk instead of "whitening out" their inner cities.

If a society recognizes itself, and ultimately critiques itself, on how it treats its most downtrodden, then surely the acid test for the EU is its ongoing treatment of the Roma. They can be found living in the housing projects of Paris, the toxic dumps in Kosovo, the ruined outskirts of villages in eastern Slovakia, the warren of backstreets in old Polish towns and the gray flatlands of Dublin. Each place has its own — sometimes tiny — community. But when taken together, these groups form a giant cultural mosaic, one that leans overwhelmingly toward poverty.

There are, of course, Romani doctors, psychologists, poets and scholars who have called for a new era of consciousness. They point to Romani contributions to the world of arts, politics and music by figures of Gypsy descent as diverse as Pablo Picasso, Django Reinhardt, Bob Hoskins, Charlie Chaplin, flamenco legend Carmen Amaya and even President Clinton.

But the old cliches of lying, cheating, stealing and breaking curfew with violin endure.

"The persistent, relentless portrayal of Roma as rootless, lawless, immoral, childlike thieves … will ensure that anti-Gypsy prejudice will remain firmly a part of Euro-American attitudes," says Ian Hancock, a Romani scholar at the University of Texas.

In Bratislava one afternoon — while I was researching the situation of the Roma in Slovakia — a young intellectual engaged me in a debate on civil rights in the U.S. He knew of Martin Luther King Jr., of Stokely Carmichael, even the poetry of Daniel Berrigan. He was a staunch and eloquent defender of the marginalized, but when I asked him about contemporary issues of sterilization, school discrimination and burnings of Romani houses in his own country, he said without rancor: "Of course, yes, but they're just Gypsies." Malice is sometimes another name for silence.

The young girl paddling through the polluted streambed in Kosovo isn't likely to have heard of the "Year of Equal Opportunities." The boy huffing glue in the broken elevator of the Saint-Denis project is probably not aware that the decade from 2005 to 2015 is supposed to be "The Decade of Roma Inclusion."

It is important, of course, not to turn any culture into a list of sorrows and benedictions. The Roma themselves have a deep ambivalence about their identity. Although they are as internally diverse as any other group, it's the roving gangs, the scams, the illiteracy, the violence — and the silence — that often get the headlines.

"If I were a Chechen or a Palestinian, I'd be out there throwing rocks," one activist told me in Hungary. "When you don't have a voice, you sing into the bottle."

Scholars such as Ian Hancock have called on governments, poets, journalists, activists and the general public to remember that the Roma, like African Americans, were enslaved in Central Europe only 150 years ago. The Holocaust sent Gypsy ash up the chimneys. This, and other bedrock history, is the story that must unfold into a larger understanding if, this week, the 3 million Roma from Bulgaria and Romania are not to be considered "just Gypsies."

"The struggle of man against power is the struggle of memory against forgetting," says Czech novelist Milan Kundera.

The European call for inclusion is decent and right. The politicians and bureaucrats behind the sound bites mean well. Why not be in the habit of hoping for a better world?

Yet so much about Romani history is still wrapped up in a willful forgetfulness. It is not that Europe or America doesn't care — dozens of conferences and nongovernmental agencies confront "the Roma question" in capital cities each year, and 2007 promises to be a bonus year — but the prevailing attitude still echoes the old Slovakian joke: "What is small, dark, filthy and knocking on the door?" The answer is not just the future, but the past as well.

DOJ_NMG_0114042

COLUM MCCANN's new novel, "Zoli," will be published Tuesday by Random House.

With Friends Like These... (WSJ)

By Fania Oz-Salzberger

The Wall Street Journal, January 6, 2007

An Israeli gal like me cannot afford to be too picky about her friends, certainly not in Europe. Recent European polls proclaimed Israel the single most dangerous country on earth, the guiltiest monger of global conflict, and, to crown it all, the least desirable place to live. Most Israelis, busy with their thriving economy under a warm Mediterranean sun, tend to forgive such pronouncements coming from dismal Düsseldorf and snowbound Stockholm. But a new challenge has now cropped up. We seem to have gained new European friends, and not quite for the right reasons.

These new pro-Israel voices base a love of Jews upon the hatred of Muslims. Last September the European Coalition for Israel convened in Brussels, its most prominent speakers lamenting the loss of European Jewry alongside the rise of European Islam. The tone was belligerent, the linkage crude: "The enemies of Israel are also a threat to Europe," delegates were told. And also: "In only two generations, most parts of Europe will be under Islamic law." Other self-declared friends grimly speak of Londonistan and augur the coming of the European Caliphate. Such statements may reflect genuine concern, but are disconcerting when made on European soil.

Unlike the late Oriana Fallaci, whose commitment to the Jews stemmed from her heroic anti-Fascist youth, and whose harsh critique of Islam came from an enraged liberal soul, many of these new friends are Muslim-bashers first and Israel-backers second. Their blanket condemnation of Muslim communities on their continent rings eerily familiar. Their sweeping verdict against a whole civilization has that strange déjà-vu feel. And their rather sudden nostalgia for Europe's lost Jews is, I'm sorry to say, far too late and somewhat suspect. As the Mishna wisely warns, "Any love that depends upon some thing, when that thing is no more, the love is no more." You see, we have a very long experience with human relationships.

I, for one Israeli, would be grateful to my newfound buddies if their sympathy for me did not rely on the trashing of another religion. Unlike them, I'm touched by the sight of young Muslim women in European university campuses. They remind my of my own grandmother, a student in Prague who had to flee after the Nazi rise to power, and of all the other young and hopeful Jews whose dreams and lives were shattered by the European culture they so admired. I will therefore not solicit support based on unqualified dislike of other human groups, least of all on the continent that kicked out my grandparents.

To be sure, Israelis could use more friends in Europe: sober, reliable, critical friends. And Europeans who care to look find some of their own best ideas well-implemented in Israel, from the rule of law to the bright application of technology for human well-being. They can trace their own literary, artistic and musical traditions flourishing among the country's diverse cultural origins. Most important, they may realize that gaining Israel's ear can yield political fruit and bring Europe closer to Middle Eastern peacemaking: Ask the German government, whose sensitive involvement in the aftermath of the second Lebanon war makes good footing for future diplomacy.

Jewish people have a long memory, whereas the European Union often seems short of the asset. It may be our role to remind today's Europeans of the medieval past, the great centuries when Islam was young, tolerant to minorities and philosophically minded. There would be no Maimonides, no glorious Sephardi Jewish tradition, without the Arab world. Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad may be threatening the existence of Israel today, but no Muslim power has ever dealt the Jews such calamities as brought upon them by Europe.

Israelis probably deserve a better European opinion, warranted by our history, culture, science and freedom. Not for being the targeted foes of Islam. Beware of Islamophobes bearing gifts.

Ms. Oz-Salzberger is director of the Posen Research Forum for Political Thought and senior lecturer at the Faculty of Law and School of History at the University of Haifa.

DOJ_NMG_0114043

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, January 09, 2007 7:55 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Tuesday, January 09, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070109.pdf; dojclips070109.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, JANUARY 9, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Padilla Wants Statements Made In Navy Brig Suppressed (AP) 4
Man Gets 30 Years In Subway Bomb Plot (NYT) 5
Pakistani Sentenced To 30 Years For New York Subway Bomb Plot (AFP) 6
Would-be NY Subway Bomber Gets 30 Years (BOS/AP) 7
30 Years For Bomb Plotter Is A Milestone, Kelly Says (NYS) 8
Subway Bomb Plotter Sentenced To 30 Years (NSDY) 8
Herald Square Bomb Plotter Gets 30 Yrs. (NYDN) 9
Prosecutors: Suburban Man Bankrolled Terrorists (CHIT) 9
U.S. Prosecutors Wrap Up Case Against Alleged Hamas Financiers (FINDLAW/AP) 10
Who Is The Mysterious Informant Jack Mustafa? (SOUTHNH) 11
Supreme Court Refuses Case Challenging Group's Designation As Terrorists (NYT) 12
High Court Won't Block Terror Trial (LAT) 13
Court Turns Down Iran Opposition Group (WP/AP) 14
Outgoing Detroit Chief Defends FBI (DEN) 14
German Court Hands Moroccan Max For 9/11 (AP) 15
Accomplice In 9-11 Attacks Gets 15-year Sentence (MCT) 16
9/11 Associate Is Sentenced In Germany To 15 Years (NYT) 17
More Gitmo Detainees Join Hunger Strike (AP) 18
Lawyer To Face Court-Martial (NYT/AP) 19

Homeland Response:

House Democrats' Security Bill Draws Doubts (NYT) 19
House Bill Backs Additional Reforms From 9/11 Report (WP) 20
House Nears Passage Of Resolution To Add Intelligence Oversight Panel (WP) 22
Democrats Defend Intelligence Panel Plans (WT) 22
Security Bill Picks Up Ideas Of 9/11 Panel (CSM) 23
A Bad Investment (WP) 24
Adapt, Change Or Die (WP) 25
Court Challenge Of ID Requirement Fails (USAT) 26
Package Is Second False Alarm At Port (MH) 27
Authorities: Miami Package Was Harmless (NSDY/AP) 27
False Alarm At Miami Port -- Again (UPI) 28
Charges Dismissed After Port Scare (MCT) 28
Dead Birds Litter Street In Austin; Tests Continue (USAT) 29
For Airport Screeners, More Training About Muslims (CSM) 29
TSA Screeners May Get Union Rights (WP) 31
A Rotten Smell Raises Alarms And Questions (NYT) 32
Public Safety And Profit: On The Same Wavelength? (WP) 33
Study: People Outside Senate Office Infected With Anthrax (USAT) 35
State Farm Is Settling Gulf Claims (NYT) 35
In New Orleans, These Gumshoes Can Float Your Boat (WSJ) 37

War News:

Bush Considers Expansion Of Up To 20,000 Troops (USAT) 38
Bush To Reveal New Iraq Strategy (WT) 40
White House Gears Up To Sell Plan For Troop Increase In Iraq (NYT) 41
A Big Speech Is A First Step; Follow-up Key (USAT) 42
Lawmakers Get Private Surge Pitch (LAT) 43
Bush Works To Rally Support For Iraq 'Surge' (WP) 44
Not All Republicans Convinced Of Bush's Iraq Plan (LAT) 46
Most Say No To Iraq Buildup (USAT) 46
Senator: Bush Plans Iraq Troop Surge (AP) 47
Bush's Task: Thrusting New Strategy On 'a Sovereign Nation' (NYT) 49
Bush Policy Means Second Tours In Iraq, Military Says (LAT) 50
Third Round In Iraq To Test US Troops (CSM) 51
The Bravest Front Of All (WP) 53
Working Syria, Iran Into Talks On Iraq (LAT) 55
Crafting An Iraq Plan (WSJ) 56
Widening War? If Iraq Worsens, Allies See 'Nightmare' Case (WSJ) 57

Past Time To Get Real On Iraq (NYT) 60
No More Middle East Crusades (LAT) 61
An Escalation Of American Blood (NYT) 62
The Least Immoral Choice (WP) 63
Democrats Split Over Their Approach To Iraq (NYT) 64
Democrats May Deny Funds For Iraq Surge (AP) 65
Congress Is Loath To Pull Purse Strings (LAT) 67
Dems Grapple With 'surge' (HILL) 68
Murtha Outlines Strategy To Restrict Troop Surge (WSJ) 69
Bush To Name Khalilzad For U.N. Job (AP) 70
Iraq-linked Reshuffle Continues With Switch Of US Baghdad Envoy (AFP) 71
Bush Ready To Announce New Iraq Plans (FT) 72
Our 'Viceroy' To The U.N. (LAT) 73
U.S. Strike Targets Al-Qaida In Somalia (AP) 73
U.S. Airstrike Aims At Qaeda Cell In Somalia (NYT) 74
U.S. Warplanes Fly Missions Over Somalia (AP) 75
U.S. Strike In Somalia Targets Al-Qaeda Figure (WP) 75
U.S. Strike In Somalia Aims At 3 Fugitives (LAT) 76
Interim Leader Rejects U.S. Approach In Somalia (MCT) 78
Rain Slows U.S. Offensive (LAT) 79
Hussein's Voice Speaks In Court In Praise Of Atrocities (NYT) 80
Saddam's Voice, Aura Still Fill Courtroom (WT/AP) 82
Court Drops Kurd Charges Against Saddam (AP) 83
New Video Of Saddam's Corpse On Internet (AP) 84
Execution Sparks Arab Support For Saddam (AP) 85
Saddam's Trial Stirs Obama Ire (HILL) 87
Irrational Is As Irrational Does (WP) 88
Iraqi American Escapee Plans Return To U.S. (WP) 89
British Troops Winning The Conflict With The Taliban, Commander Says (AFP) 90

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney Christie Says He's Staying In His Job (AP) 90

Corporate Scandals:

Ex-Aspen Technology Head Surrenders On Securities Fraud Charges (FINDLAW/AP) 91
Stock Options Backdating Issue Haunts Jobs (USAT) 91
CEO Politics (WSJ) 93

Criminal Law:

House Democrats May Aid Corruption Inquiry (NYT) 94
CIA Digs In Its Heels (WSJ) 94
Judges Look To New Congress For Changes In Mandatory Sentencing Laws (NYT) 96
Criminal Complaint: Alderman Accepted Bribe (CHIT) 98
Ald. Troutman Arrested On Corruption Charges (CHIST) 100
Chicago Alderman Accused Of Taking Payoff (AP) 100
Bevilacqua To Wait In Jail For Court Hearing (PROJO) 101
Judge Allows 2 More Parties Into Polygamist Leader Evidence Case (SDUT/AP) 102
Battle Over Evidence Expands In Jeff Case (DESERET) 103
Twins' Birth Mother Returns To U.S. To Face Kidnapping Charge (AP) 104
Birth Mom Heads To U.S. Leaves Cda To Face Kidnapping Charge (CP) 105
Man Reportedly Accused Of Extorting Oprah Winfrey Waives Preliminary Hearing (MACT) 105
Five Plead Guilty In FEMA Fraud Cases (BSH) 105
Judge Delays Dowie's Sentencing In Fraud Case (LAT) 106
Towers Perrin Laptops, Client Data Stolen (WSJ) 106
Duke President Renews Call For District Attorney To Leave Case (NYT) 107

Civil Law:

Framed Men Take Stand At Trial (BOS) 108
Wrongly Convicted Men Describe Decades In Prison (AP) 109

Civil Rights:

Former Terrorism Suspect Can Sue County Over Treatment In Jail, U.S. Judge Rules (FINDLAW/AP) 110
Brooklyn Man, 38, Dies After Jolt From Police Taser (NYT) 110
Killing Stirs Racial Concerns In North Woods Of Wisconsin (NYT) 111

Antitrust:

GE Sets Private-Equity Limits (WSJ) 112
GE Reportedly Shopping Plastics Business (AP) 114
GE Seeks $10 Billion For Plastics Unit, People Say (Update1) (BLOOM) 114
GE Imposes Private Equity Conditions On Plastics Deal (FT) 115
Waste Services Buy Of Fla. Unit Gets OK (AP) 116
Caremark Rejects Bid From Express Scripts (WP/AP) 116
Express Scripts Moves To Derail A Merger (NYT) 116
Express Scripts Seeks Caremark Seats After Rejection (Update16) (BLOOM) 118

Environment/Indian Affairs:

EU Calls For New Low-Carbon Power Era (AP) 119
Polluted Waters Stain D.C.'s Shining Vision (WP) 120
Tribe Keeps Fighting For Treaty Rights (AP) 122

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Seven Programs To Watch In 2007 (GCN) 124

DOJ_NMG_0114046

Farmington Hills Pot Bust Is Oakland's Second In Four Days (DN) 124
Oakland County Drug Bust Nets $33,000, Marijuana (FREEP) 125
Owners Of Medical Marijuana Dispensary Arrested (KESQ) 125
CannaHelp Owner And Managers Being Booked At Indio Jail (DS) 125
3 From Pot Store Facing Charges (PE) 126
Robbers Posed As DEA (AT) 127
Tape Shows Robbers Dressed As Feds (KRQE) 127
Meth Smoke Taints Motels (DENP) 127
Federal Officials Pursuing More Gun-related Prosecutions (AP) 129

Immigration:

Illegal Immigrants' Rearrest Rate High (AP) 130
Some Illegal Immigrants Arrested Repeatedly, Report Finds (MCT) 130
U.S. Supreme Court Refuses To Hear Asylum Case Of Colombian Drug Informant Fearing For His Life (AP) .. 131
Hispanic Leaders Call For Reform On Immigration Within 100 Days (HILL) 131
Guardsmen Retreat At Border Deemed Appropriate (WT) ... 133
Illegals Become Repeat Criminals (WT) 133

Congress-Administration:

Fielding Picked For White House Counsel (AP) 134
Bush Picks Reagan White House Counsel Fielding To Succeed Miers (WP) 135
Bush Turns To Capital Insider (LAT) 136
Reagan Lawyer Ready To Return To White House (NYT) ... 137
Fielding Subpoenas (WSJ) 139
Bush Issues Democrats Challenge On Earmarks (WT) 139
Reid's 'earmark' Gets Veto Of Home County (HILL) 140
House Votes To Tighten Rules On Tariff Breaks (WP) 142
White House To Unveil Medicare Overhaul (FT) 143
Bush, Lawmakers Meet On Education Bill (AP) 144
Republicans Seek Flexible School Funds (WT) 145
Democrats Push For Changes To No Child Left Behind Law (NYT) 146
Senate Torn Over Ethics Panel Measure (AP) 147
Senate Takes Up Ethics Bill Promoted By Democrats (WT) 148
Senate Democrats Begin Work On Ethics Law Changes (BLM) 149
Freshman Democrats Back Senate Ethics Bill (CQ) 150
Push For Lobby Database Fades (RC) 150
Bundles Of Influence (WP) 152
Senators Vow Ethics Reform, But Will Deeds Match Words? (USAT) 152
Campaign Photo Shows Bush With Abramoff (AP) 153
Jersey Judge Up For Circuit Court Post (NSL) 154
Tenet Memoir Under Scrutiny (WT) 154
An Instant Raise For Federal Judges (NYT/AP) 155
Senate Restores Pay Raise For Judges (AP) 156
Poll: Americans Want Democrats, Not Bush, At Helm (USAT) 156
Donnelly, Freshman Democrats Tell Pelosi To Stick To The Center (BLOOM) 157
Industry Measures Up Dems, Picks Its Battles (HILL) 158
Military Seeks Oil Savings (WSJ) 159
White House Honors Cultural Institutions (AP) 161
Inside The Beltway (WT) 161
The Reliable Source (WP) 162
PIN Money (WSJ) 164
Common Sense On The Census (NYT) 165

Other News:

Health-care Spending Rose At Twice The Rate Of Inflation In '05 (USAT) 166
Healthcare Spending Eases Off (LAT) 167
Health Care Spending Up 6.9 Pct. In '05 (NYT/AP) 168
Growth In U.S. Health-Care Spending Slows Again (WSJ) ... 168
Sweeping State Health Plan Governor's Proposal: Coverage For All Californians -- Everyone To Share Cost (SFC) . 170
Schwarzenegger Proposes Universal Health Coverage (WP) 171
Calif. Gov Calls For Universal Coverage (AP) 172
Gov. Seeks Sweeping Health System Reforms (LAT) 173
Schwarzenegger Proposes Health Plan (USAT) 174
Schwarzenegger Embarks On Fight For Health Plan (WSJ) 175
California's Governor Seeks Universal Care (NYT) 176
Gov. Offers Bold Prescription (LAT) 178
A Flawed Cure (LAT) 181
Life At America's Bottom Wage (CSM) 181
Fed's No. 2 Chills Hopes For A Rate Cut (WSJ) 184
Drop In Oil Price And Some More Mergers Lift Shares (NYT/AP) 185
Dow Industrials Gain 25.48 While Oil's Early Rally Fades (WSJ) 186
Reapportionment: Good News For GOP? (RC) 187
In Fla., GOP Hopes For Two Pick-ups Where It Just Suffered Two Losses (HILL) 189
New Districts Cause Headaches For Ga. Reps. (RC) 190
Sununu Has Big Target On His Back (RC) 191
Johnson's Re-election Plans On Hold (RC) 193

DOJ_NMG_0114047

Romney Makes It Official And Asks For '08 Cash In A Big Way (NYT) 194
Romney, High-profile Friends Call For Election Cash (WT) 195
Romney Kicks Off Fundraising Campaign (AP)....196
Romney Raises $6.5 Million In One-Day Blitz (WP)....198
Mitt Rakes In Dough, Proves His Political Viability (SLT)....198
Romney Event Nets More Than $6.5m (BOS)....200
Decisions On The Horizon (NYT)....202
Obama's Folly Of Youth Shouldn't Hinder Rise (USAT)....202
Roberta Wohlstetter, Codebreaker (WSJ)....203
Europe, US Squeeze Iran On Nuclear Plans (FT)....203
Iranian Leader Vows To Resist U.N. Sanctions (NYT)....204
Israeli Defense Minister Proposes New Peace Plan (AFP)..205
Fatah Frees Kidnapped Hamas Official (AP)....205
Don't Play With Maps (NYT)....206
Condi Gets Israel's R-E-S-P-E-C-T (WSJ)....207
A Green Line In The Sand (NYT)....209
Bush: Important To Complete Doha Talks (AP)....210
Bush, Barroso Discuss Trade, Darfur (AFP)....211
Some Progress In Global Trade Effort (NYT)....211
U.S. Sub And Japanese Vessel Collide (NYT)....213
Chavez To Nationalize 'Strategic' Sectors (WT/AP)....213
Chávez To Nationalise Telecoms, Power (FT)....215
Venezuela's Chavez: Nationalize Electricity, Phones (USAT)215
Chávez Moves To Nationalize Two Industries (NYT)....216
Chavez Sets Plans For Nationalization (WP)....218
Chávez Moves New Socialism To Faster Track (WSJ)....219
Bolivia Leader Lets Venezuela Send Soldiers, Angering Foes (NYT)....221
Bush Discusses Cooperation With Nicaragua's Ortega (AFP)222
Russia Shuts Oil Pipeline To Europe (FT)....223
Russian Oil Cutoff Rouses Europe's Doubt (WSJ)....224
Belarus And Russia Spar Over Crude Oil Cutoff (NYT)....225
Belarus Cuts Off Russian Oil To Europe (CSM)....227
Moscow Stops Oil Exports To Belarus (WT)....228
Oil Line To Europe Is Cut Off (LAT)....229
Russia Halts Oil Flow To Belarus In Dispute (WP)....230
Moscow-Minsk Dispute Leaves Europe In A Quandary (FT)232
Russian Extortion, Continued (WP)....232
The Face Of El Salvador's Charm Offensive (WP)....233
South Africans See Hope Of Unity In A Prospect For Presidency (WP)....235
U.S. To Drop Charges In '99 Uganda Killings (WT)....236
The Troubles Of Sista P. (NYT)....237

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Padilla Wants Statements Made In Navy Brig Suppressed (AP)

By Jennifer Kay
AP, January 9, 2007

MIAMI - Attorneys for alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla asked a federal judge Monday to keep statements he made during his detention in a Navy brig out of evidence in the U.S. government's terror support case against him.

Padilla has claimed he was tortured during 3 1/2 years in military custody as an "enemy combatant" - allegations the Justice Department and Pentagon officials have repeatedly denied.

The former Chicago gang member's prolonged confinement and abuse from interrogators renders any statements he made during his time in the brig involuntary, according to a motion filed in U.S. District Court.

"The action of the government agents in this case constitute police coercion and overreaching at its highest. Consequently, the government has forfeited the right to use these statements for any purpose at Mr. Padilla's trial," the motion states.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office declined comment Monday. Messages left for Padilla's federal public defenders were not immediately returned.

Federal prosecutors, meanwhile, asked the court Monday to reconsider its deadline for completing mental examinations to determine if Padilla is competent to stand trial.

DOJ_NMG_0114048

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke last week gave prisons officials until Friday to complete the examinations, which she insisted be finished before his scheduled Jan. 22 trial date so she can rule on a number of other outstanding issues, including Padilla's claim that the case should be dismissed because he was tortured in military custody.

Two mental experts hired by the defense have concluded that Padilla suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder and is unable to adequately assist his attorneys. The competency tests were originally supposed to be completed by Jan. 5.

Bureau of Prisons officials want until Jan. 30 to finish the tests, and until Feb. 15 to submit their report. They have said in court papers that Padilla is not "compliant with psychological testing" and must be observed by staff members to complete the evaluation.

"The deadlines set by the court may negatively affect the examination process and may prejudice the government's ability to demonstrate the fallacy of Padilla's competency allegations as well as the court's ability to make adequate findings, subject to appellate review, regarding this issue," the prosecutors' motion reads.

Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen, is charged along with two others in the U.S. with being part of a support cell that provided money, recruits and supplies to violent Islamic extremists around the world. All three have pleaded not guilty. Two others charged in the case are in custody overseas.

Padilla was arrested in 2002 at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport for what U.S. officials originally called a plot to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in the United States. President Bush designated him an "enemy combatant" and he was held without criminal charge at a Navy brig in South Carolina until he was added to the Miami terror support case in late 2005.

The "dirty bomb" allegations are not mentioned in the Miami indictment.

Aside from the competency issue, the Jan. 22 trial date is in jeopardy because federal prosecutors have appealed Cooke's dismissal of a key terrorism count in the case. The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals is scheduled to hear oral arguments on that issue Wednesday in Atlanta; Cooke has said the trial will not proceed until that question is settled.

The dismissed count carries a potential life prison sentence, while the two remaining terror support counts carry possible 15-year sentences each. Cooke ruled that the dismissed count improperly duplicated other parts of the same indictment.

Man Gets 30 Years In Subway Bomb Plot (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

A federal judge sentenced a 24-year-old Pakistani immigrant yesterday to 30 years in prison for plotting to bomb the Herald Square subway station in 2004, moments after the defendant apologized to the judge and prosecutors but blamed a police informer for his fate.

The immigrant, Shahawar Matin Siraj, who has been held without bail since he and another man were arrested on Aug. 27, 2004, three days before the Republican National Convention, stood with his shoulders slumped as the judge, Nina Gershon of United States District Court in Brooklyn, meted out his sentence.

Dressed in a blue short-sleeved prison smock with a white long-underwear shirt beneath it, Mr. Siraj offered a brief, disjointed apology before the judge pronounced sentence. He paused briefly to take two long sips of water when his voice began to break.

He cited statements he had made about his plan to blow up the subway and his anger at America, statements that were secretly recorded by a Police Department informer who defense lawyers argued lured him into the plot. The tapes were played at the trial.

“Your honor I want to apologize about whatever I said in the tapes — I wish I could take those words back but it already happened, I already said those things,” he said. “I’m taking responsibility for 34th Street, but I was manipulated by this person.”

But the jury in the case, which deliberated 10 hours over two days, rejected his entrapment defense. It had centered on the paid informer, who defense lawyers said had stoked Mr. Siraj’s rage with images of Muslims abused at the hands of Americans, including photographs of soldiers abusing inmates at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq. Mr. Siraj was convicted on May 24 on four counts of conspiracy, including the most serious, plotting to bomb a public transportation system.

DOJ_NMG_0114049

Judge Gershon, when she handed down the sentence, noted that while some of the recordings captured Mr. Siraj saying the attack should occur at the time the station was the least busy, it would nonetheless have been deadly and devastating.

"The crimes committed here were extremely serious," she said. "They had the potential, if not thwarted, to wreak havoc with the New York City transportation system, indeed, the tristate-area transportation system."

She added that such an attack would have meant enormous economic losses, disruption and loss of life.

The men never obtained explosives, there was no timetable for an attack, and the men were not linked to any known terrorist group.

Indeed, the informer, Osama Eldawoody, 50, told Mr. Siraj and the other man who was arrested, James Elshafay, that he worked for a fictitious group called the Brotherhood and said he would be able to provide the explosives for the plot. Mr. Elshafay began cooperating with prosecutors shortly after his arrest and also testified against Mr. Siraj.

Under federal sentencing guidelines, Mr. Siraj, who came to the United States from Pakistan with his parents in 1999, faced 30 years to life in prison. He had turned down a plea deal offered by prosecutors under which he would have been sentenced to 10 years in prison.

The hours of tapes played at trial revealed an angry man who raged against America, praised Osama bin Laden and predicted additional terror attacks in the United States, all while discussing his bomb plot.

Yesterday, the courtroom was crowded, largely with news reporters and law enforcement officials. Mr. Siraj's parents, appearing stunned when the sentence was dispensed, were also in the courtroom, and his uncle sat in the last row. His mother, Shahina Parveen, dressed in a patterned light blue tunic and pants, and a white head scarf, clutched a string of pale green prayer beads that she had carried during the trial.

After the proceeding, she began to cry as she sat on a bench outside the courtroom and talked to one of her son's lawyers, Khurrum B. Wahid, slipping a tissue behind her glasses. Later, she spoke briefly to reporters, maintaining her son's innocence and saying he would appeal.

"The N.Y.P.D., through a paid informant, tricked my son and got him stuck in this," Ms. Parveen said, as Mr. Wahid translated from the Urdu. "He didn't do anything. I didn't get any justice. It was not a fair sentence."

But the Police Department, which investigated the case, the first in which a terrorism inquiry by its Intelligence Division led to a prosecution in federal court, hailed the sentence, calling it "a milestone in the safeguarding of New York City."

"It says that those who conspire against New York will pay a severe price," Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly said in a statement, praising the Intelligence Division, saying it "uncovered a murderous plot in its infancy and stopped it before lives were lost."

After the sentencing, Mr. Siraj's lead lawyer, Martin J. Stolar, called the prison term "outrageous."

"The New York City Police Department was able to create a crime in order to solve it, and claim a victory in the war on terror, and that's what he was sentenced as, rather than a dimwit who was manipulated" by an informer, he said.

But the prosecutors in the case, Todd Harrison and Marshall L. Miller, argued that Mr. Siraj was in control.

"He knew exactly what was going on and was the initiator of all the steps," Mr. Harrison said. He added that Mr. Siraj had come up with the plan, conducted surveillance of the station on his own and directed how the bombers should dress, where the bomb should be placed and what their escape route should be.

Pakistani Sentenced To 30 Years For New York Subway Bomb Plot (AFP)

AFP, January 9, 2007

A Pakistani man was sentenced to 30 years in jail for his part in a plot to blow up a New York subway station just ahead of a major Republican Party congress being held nearby in 2004.

Shahawar Matin Siraj, 24, was convicted in May last year of conspiring to plant explosives at the 34th Street subway station near Madison Square Garden, ahead of the Republican National Convention there.

"Thanks to the extraordinary work of law enforcement, the defendants' plot did not advance beyond the planning stage, and the public was never at risk," prosecutor Roslynn Mauskopf said after the sentence was handed down.

"We remain steadfast in our commitment to stop would-be terrorists before they act, and will apply all available resources to secure the safety of our residents," she said.

Another man, James Elshafay, pleaded guilty in October 2004 to participating in the plot and later testified against Siraj. He has yet to be sentenced.

The federal jury in Siraj's five-week trial heard hours of secretly recorded conversations between him and an Egyptian nuclear engineer who became a paid informant for the New York City Police Department, the Justice Department said.

In the calls, Siraj declared his hatred for the United States and openly discussed his desire to place explosives on various bridges and in subway stations in New York, including his plan to bomb the 34th Street station, the department said.

Siraj and Elshafay scoped out the subway station on August 21, 2004, and later drew diagrams as part of their plot, it said. They were arrested six days later, even though they were not in possession of any explosive material.

Would-be NY Subway Bomber Gets 30 Years (BOS/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

The Boston Globe, January 9, 2007

NEW YORK --A Pakistani immigrant was sentenced to 30 years in prison Monday for hatching an unsuccessful plot to blow up a busy Manhattan subway station as revenge for wartime abuses of Iraqis.

Shahawar Matin Siraj, 24, was arrested on the eve of the 2004 Republican National Convention. Though there was no proof he ever obtained explosives or was linked to any terror organizations, prosecutors said his intentions were ominous: He wanted to blow up the Herald Square subway station, a bustling transportation hub located beneath Macy's flagship department store.

Siraj showed no reaction as the sentence was read. He faces deportation when his prison term is completed.

Defense attorneys had sought to convince U.S. District Judge Nina Gershon that Siraj's sentence should not exceed 10 years, arguing in recent court filings that their client was "not a dangerous psychopath but more of a confused and misguided youngster."

Siraj claimed he was entrapped by a paid police informant who inflamed him by showing him photos of inmates being abused at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and then secretly recorded his escalating threats -- called "trash talk" by his lawyer -- against the United States.

"I apologize for all the stuff I said on those tapes," Siraj said before sentencing. "I'm taking responsibility for 34th Street, but I was manipulated by this person."

Prosecutors countered that Siraj deserved at least 30 years behind bars as the "driving force" behind a "workable terrorist plot."

Siraj was convicted of conspiracy last year based partly on the testimony of a police informant, Osama Eldawoody, who was recruited to monitor radical Muslims at mosques and elsewhere following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Inside an Islamic bookstore near a Brooklyn mosque, Eldawoody wore a wire and chatted up an employee who lived with his parents in Queens -- Siraj. When the topic turned to the war in Iraq, Siraj ranted about rumors among radicals that U.S. soldiers were sexually abusing Iraqi girls.

"That was enough for me," he said in one of series of secretly recorded conversations played for the jury. "I'm ready to do anything. I don't care about my life."

Eldawoody, assuming the role of a co-conspirator, assured Siraj that any plan he concocted would have the backing of a fictitious faction called The Brotherhood. Siraj considered other options to harm the U.S. economy, including destroying several New York area bridges or killing Microsoft founder Bill Gates.

Testifying in his own defense, Siraj admitted taking preliminary steps to attack the subway station, including scouting locations to place a bomb, but only at Eldawoody's prompting. He also claimed he never had a violent thought before he fell under the spell of the 50-year-old Eldawoody.

Siraj said the older man became a mentor and instructed him that there was a fatwa, or religious edict, permitting the killing of U.S. soldiers and law enforcement agents.

DOJ_NMG_0114051

Outside court Monday, Siraj's mother, Shahina Parveen, said the informant "tricked my son and got him stuck in this."

"My son is innocent," she said. "He didn't do anything."

In a statement, police Commissioner Raymond Kelly called the outcome a "milestone" in safeguarding the city. He said, "Our detectives uncovered a murderous plot in its infancy and stopped it before lives were lost."

30 Years For Bomb Plotter Is A Milestone, Kelly Says (NYS)

By Joseph Goldstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, January 9, 2007

The clerk at an Islamic bookstore who plotted to put a bomb in the Herald Square subway station will spend the next 30 years in prison, a federal judge decided yesterday. Police Commissioner Kelly, whose department led the investigation that resulted in the arrest of Shahawar Matin Siraj, lauded the sentence.

"The Siraj sentence is a milestone in the safeguarding of New York City," Mr. Kelly said in a statement sent via email. "It says that those who conspire against New York will pay a severe price."

Lawyers for Siraj, 24, had asked for a sentence as short as five years. When the judge, Nina Gershon of U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, said she was instead considering imposing a sentence of between 30 years and life, Siraj jerked his head in surprise toward two of his lawyers. Later, when he was led away by deputy marshals, Siraj raised a hand in greeting to his mother and father, who stood in the back of the courtroom. Siraj offered no other reaction to the sentence.

Federal prosecutors from the U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn had based their request for a strict sentence not only on the bomb plot for which Siraj was convicted, but also because they said they believed Siraj would resume plotting if released.

Prosecutors arrived at this assessment from a recorded statement Siraj made to a police informant that was introduced as evidence at trial, according to a letter to the court from assistant U.S. attorneys Todd Harrison and Marshall Miller.

Subway Bomb Plotter Sentenced To 30 Years (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 9, 2007

A Pakistani immigrant convicted of plotting to bomb the 34th Street subway station at Herald Square was sentenced to 30 years in prison yesterday by a federal judge who called the crime an "extremely serious" attempt to wreak havoc on the city's economy.

Rejecting defense arguments that Shahawar Matin Siraj, 24, was nothing more than a dupe of a police undercover operative, Brooklyn federal Judge Nina Gershon said the defendant played a central role in the bombing conspiracy.

Gershon, who presided over last year's trial of Siraj, said the evidence showed that he intended the planned bombing to lead to severe economic disruption in the city and surrounding metropolitan area, and to result in loss of life.

"The defendant's role in the bombing plot was central," said Gershon, adding that there was ample evidence that Siraj lied during a pretrial hearing and also during his trial, in an effort to deceive the jury.

Siraj was convicted in May of the bombing conspiracy and faced a possible life term. Investigators said he aimed to set off the bomb around the time of the August 2004 Republican National Convention in Manhattan.

Evidence showed that Siraj came up with ideas about setting off bombs on Staten Island and on the Verrazano-Narrows Bridge. Prosecutors introduced evidence that Siraj, who had failed to win asylum in the United States, had made statements supporting jihad and Osama bin Laden when he talked with a New York Police Department undercover detective.

In a statement, Police Commissioner Ray Kelly said detectives uncovered the plot in its infancy and moved with federal prosecutors to stop it. He praised the sentence as a "milestone in the safeguarding of New York City.

"It says those who conspire against New York will pay a severe price," he said.

But Siraj's attorney Martin Stolar blasted the sentence.

"I think it is pretty outrageous that they are sentencing him as a terrorist," Stolar said. "The NYPD created a crime to claim a victory in the war on terror."

Stolar had argued before sentencing that Siraj was of subpar intelligence and was easily manipulated by informants and the detective. He later told reporters Siraj was sentenced as a hardened terrorist "rather than a 24-year-old dimwit."

DOJ_NMG_0114052

Siraj gave a brief statement of apology to Gershon and said he wished he could take back the anti-American statements that were caught on surveillance tapes. Admitting he was part of the plot to bomb the subway station, Siraj nonetheless insisted he was manipulated by the undercover detective.

Siraj's mother gave a tearful statement outside the courtroom to reporters. Speaking through an interpreter, Shahina Pareeven said her son was innocent and was ensnared into the plot by the NYPD.

"My son is not a terrorist," Pareeven said. "He didn't do anything. I didn't get justice."

Herald Square Bomb Plotter Gets 30 Yrs. (NYDN)

By John Marzulli, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, January 9, 2007

Insisting to the end that he was unfairly duped by an NYPD informer, a Queens man was slammed with a 30-year jail sentence yesterday for plotting to bomb the Herald Square subway station.

"I told [the informer], 'I don't want to do it,'" Shahawar Matin Siraj, 24, whimpered in a last-minute plea for mercy to Brooklyn Federal Judge Nina Gershon. "I told him I wanted to ask my mother's permission."

Siraj, 24, had admitted planning to slaughter commuters and wreak havoc on the city's economy because he was angered by the U.S. government's treatment of Muslims in Iraq.

"I take responsibility for 34th St., but I was manipulated by this person," Siraj said. "I wish I could take those words back."

Despite Siraj's apology for the hatred he spewed on hours of secretly recorded tapes in which he also discussed destroying city bridges and attacking cops, Gershon said the sentence must be sufficient to punish Siraj and deter other would-be terrorists.

The Pakistani immigrant, who never obtained explosives, could have gotten life in prison.

Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly credited his revamped Intelligence Division with thwarting the scheme before anyone was hurt and hailed the verdict as a "milestone in the safeguarding of New York City."

"It says those who conspire against New York will pay a heavy price," Kelly said.

But defense lawyer Martin Stolar said Siraj was a dimwit who was manipulated by a crafty paid informer trying to impress his police handlers. Siraj was arrested just before the Republican National Convention opened in New York in 2004.

"The NYPD was able to create a crime in order to solve it and claim a victory in the war on terrorism," Stolar said.

Siraj's mother, clutching green prayer beads, wept in the courthouse hallway.

"My son is innocent. It was not a fair sentence," Shahina Parveen said.

Prosecutors: Suburban Man Bankrolled Terrorists (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush

Chicago Tribune, January 9, 2007

Muhammad Salah distributed hundreds of thousands of dollars to militant operatives in Gaza and the West Bank while coordinating violent plots as a leading member of the Palestinian group Hamas, federal prosecutors argued Monday.

For nearly seven hours, Assistant U.S. Atty. Joseph Ferguson chronicled the case against Salah, a Bridgeview businessman accused of serving as a top Hamas commander, and Abdelhaleem Ashqar, a university professor from suburban Washington, D.C.

Ferguson's closing argument was aimed largely at undermining defense claims that Israeli authorities tortured Salah into falsely admitting he was a Hamas operative in 1993.

He reminded jurors that they had witnessed an unprecedented event, the testimony of two Israeli security agents in a U.S. courtroom.

Jurors could judge for themselves whether the interrogators, who appeared under the aliases "Nadav" and "Benny," testified truthfully that Salah was well-treated, Ferguson said.

He also pointed to evidence he said corroborated Salah's confession, including information Salah allegedly provided about the hidden burial site of a murdered Israeli soldier and a series of money transfers between him and Hamas leader Mousa Abu Marzook.

DOJ_NMG_0114053

"There's only one conclusion to draw from that," Ferguson said of information Salah provided about the dead soldier's body. "Muhammad Salah is Hamas. He is the Hamas military. He's part of the inner-sanctum of trusted individuals."

The soldier Ferguson referred to, Ilan Sa'doan, was kidnapped and murdered by Hamas in 1989. His body was buried in an undisclosed location.

Salah was arrested by Israeli authorities in Gaza in January 1993 on suspicion of transferring hundreds of thousands of dollars for the Hamas military wing.

Ferguson argued that Marzook had provided Salah with information about Sa'doan's body, which Salah tried to use as a bargaining chip with his interrogators.

"This was about control," Ferguson said.

Far from being a tortured detainee willing to tell his interrogators anything they wanted to hear, Salah was playing cat and mouse with his captors, the prosecutor said.

Israeli authorities did launch a search for Sa'doan's body in 1993 based on Salah's information, the prosecutor said.

The body was not found, however, until 1996 in a location 3 miles north of the site Salah allegedly described.

Ferguson argued Salah's information was all but "dead on" about the site.

"They were one juncture off. He got the wrong exit [off the highway]," Ferguson said.

Throughout the day, Ferguson outlined a money trail he said further corroborated Salah's guilt.

He was captured in Israel with $100,000 in cash. Bank records show Marzook had transferred him nearly $1 million, the prosecutor said.

Before he was captured, he had put some $240,000 in the hands of militant operatives, Ferguson argued.

Salah's lawyers have argued that he never provided money for violence but carried money to Gaza and the West Bank to provide charitable services to Palestinians suffering under a stifling and oppressive Israeli occupation.

Salah, an American citizen, was set up by Israeli authorities to help convince the U.S. government that Hamas was actively creating cells in this country, his lawyers have argued.

Ferguson referred regularly Monday to a series of confessions Salah gave Israeli interrogators as well as to a handwritten statement he provided to fellow prisoners he allegedly believed were fellow Hamas members.

The statement to the fellow prisoners, known as "the Birds," is perhaps the most damning piece of evidence against Salah and something his attorneys have argued was manufactured out of whole cloth by abusive interrogators and Palestinian collaborators.

Ferguson sought to show that the statement was a voluntary attempt to communicate with other Hamas members.

When an Israeli interrogator confronted Salah with it in March 1993, Salah was recorded asking his captors how they got the statement.

"That tells you he gave it to somebody he thought was Hamas," Ferguson said.

Ferguson is expected to continue his argument Tuesday morning. Salah's attorney, Michael Deutsch, is expected to respond in the afternoon.

U.S. Prosecutors Wrap Up Case Against Alleged Hamas Financiers (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mike Robinson, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 9, 2007

(AP) - CHICAGO-Federal prosecutors wrapped up their case against two men accused of aiding the militant Palestinian group Hamas, saying the men furnished funds and fresh recruits to spread "death, destruction, fear and terror."

Former Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah and co-defendant Abdelhaleem Ashqar were "important players" with the Hamas terrorist network, Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph M. Ferguson told a federal court jury in closing arguments capping a three-month trial that included testimony by torture experts and Israeli agents adopting assumed identities.

"The Hamas organization engaged in a purposeful and strategic campaign to spread death, destruction, fear and terror in pursuit of its overall objective to remove the State of Israel from the map," Ferguson said.

Salah, 53, and Ashqar, 48, a former assistant professor of business at Washington's Howard University, are charged with a racketeering scheme that provided money and men to the Hamas organization in the early 1990s.

Both men deny that they are Hamas members and say that nothing they did violated the law, even though they hold strong anti-Israel views.

The first two prosecution witnesses were Israeli Shin Bet agents who interrogated Salah after his January 1993 arrested in Israel, where he served about five years in prison.

The agents testified under aliases in a courtroom cleared of spectators to protect them against possible reprisals by Hamas. Reporters were allowed to hear their testimony on closed-circuit TV in another room.

Both men denied Salah ever was tortured. Salah did not take the stand, but his attorneys say he was put in a freezing cell with no blanket, forced to wear a foul-smelling hood and otherwise mistreated for weeks.

Defense attorneys have not yet delivered their closing arguments.

Ferguson warned jurors not to allow themselves to be diverted from their main task by being caught up in the Israeli-Palestinian debate and the nuances of Mideast politics.

"People have been in conflict over that little plot of land for hundreds and thousands of years," Ferguson said. He said the issue was that the two men have violated American laws against financing murder, kidnappings and terror.

Ferguson said Mousa Abu Marzouk, the deputy head of Hamas' political bureau who is in , furnished Salah with "cold hard cash" to deliver to Hamas forces in Israel. Abu Marzouk is in exile in Syria.

Who Is The Mysterious Informant Jack Mustafa? (SOUTHNH)

By Ray Hanania

Southwest (Chicago) News-Herald, January 9, 2007

I've tried everything to reach the man they call "Jack Mustafa," aka "Jawad al-Arouri," but have failed.

Mustafa is the informant the U.S. Justice Department used to build a "terrorism" case against Mohammed Salah and co-defendant Abdelhaleem Ashqar.

Months after the Iraq invasion, U.S. Attorney John Ashcroft alleged Salah provided "material support" to terrorists.

The nation sighed. President Bush needed to point to someone having failed to capture the real terrorist, Osama Bin Laden. Salah was a far better "terrorist" than Jose Padilla, the high school dropout we're told who knew enough to build a "dirty bomb."

Salah's arrest was based on two things: He pled guilty in an Israeli court to being associated with Hamas, which the U.S. declared was a terrorist group long after Salah had left the group. If Salah was really a threat, why did the Israelis release him after only fives years in prison?

Ironically, a deal was about to be signed letting Salah off the hook when Sept. 11 happened. Our failed "war on terrorism" needed a trophy to hold high, and Salah was the best they could come up with.

The second more important evidence Ashcroft relied upon was the "testimony" of Jack Mustafa, who was paid as much as $6,000 a month.

By the time they got to trial three years later, Salah's defense attorneys asked to see all information on the mysterious Mustafa.

In response to that simple request, the Justice Department dropped their "material support" for terrorism charge.

As it turns out Mustafa probably made up all the evidence turned over to the FBI. Why not? At a reported $6,000 a month, you could probably get evidence to arrest half the customers at Wal-Mart.

That left two remaining "charges," the broader "racketeering conspiracy" charged used to nail people who don't commit crimes but are members of criminal organizations, like the Mafia. And, the last charge, "making false statements" to the government, maybe something that government might consider against Mustafa?

One must wonder why the government continues with this case.

Hamas is involved in terrorist activities in Israel. But that's not surprising since any idiot knows Palestinians and Israelis don't get along and have been warring with each other since 1948.

I know what Salah is going through.

In 1975, after I completed two years active duty in the Air Force during the Vietnam War, the FBI investigated me.

They spent thousands of dollars interviewing neighbors and "informants" like Mustafa. They produced a revealing 45-page report that began claiming I was "suspected" of terrorist involvement. The report failed to mention my father and uncle served during World War II, or that I served 10 more years in the Illinois Air National Guard, while the probe was being conducted.

They hassled so many people, I lost friends faster than disgraced Florida Congressman Mark Foley.

After all the talk, the BS and lies, two years of investigations, thousands of wasted taxpayer dollars, and 45 useless pages, the "Hanania investigation" concluded I just wanted to help my community become more involved in America.

You just hope somewhere, someone has enough common sense to stop wasting taxpayer dollars and valuable time so our country can focus on "real" terrorist threats.

Now that the case is about to go to the jury, I'm hoping Salah's judge, U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve, might just be that kind of person.

(Ray Hanania writes about everything under the sun. You can reach him at rayhanania@aol.com.) Visit www.tvchicagoland.com to view Hanania's interviews with local Chicagoland politicians and community leaders.

Supreme Court Refuses Case Challenging Group's Designation As Terrorists (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — The Supreme Court refused on Monday to intervene in the federal prosecution of seven Iranian refugees for providing financial support to an opposition group in Iran that the State Department has designated as a terrorist organization.

The seven defendants, who are now all United States citizens, argue that they are constitutionally entitled to challenge the validity of that designation as part of their defense. The law under which they were charged, enacted in 1996, gives limited appeal rights to a group that is officially labeled a terrorist organization, but specifically precludes individual defendants, charged with supporting such an organization, from challenging the designation at their trial.

Under the statute, providing financial or other material support to a foreign terrorist organization is a crime that carries a prison sentence of up to 10 years. The seven defendants were indicted in Los Angeles in March 2001 for soliciting money for an organization usually known as the People's Mojahedin of Iran, which the State Department designated as a foreign terrorist organization in 1997.

That designation has been heatedly disputed, both in federal court and in Congress. After a ruling by the federal appeals court here in 1999 found the designation improper, the State Department reissued it and was permitted by the appeals court to make the new designation retroactive to 1997, which is when the defendants began their fund-raising activities.

A brief submitted to the Supreme Court on the defendants' behalf by a group of members of Congress described the People's Mojahedin as "a legitimate political opposition group that Americans should be able to freely and openly support."

The brief, filed on behalf of the Iran Human Rights and Democracy Caucus of the House of Representatives, described the organization as "the primary opposition group in Iran" and as "a legitimate political resistance movement that seeks a transition from the current theocratic regime to a secular democracy."

Noting that President Bush has described the current government in Iran as part of the "axis of evil," the brief said the People's Mojahedin was not the type of organization Congress had in mind when it gave the executive branch broad authority to designate foreign terrorist organizations and to bar all types of contributions to them.

The justices on Monday made no comment in turning down the case, Rahmani v. United States, No. 06-241. The prosecution has received relatively little publicity as it has made a slow way through the federal courts. But a trial, if one finally takes place, could shine a spotlight on the sweeping authority that Congress handed the secretary of state in the 1996 statute, the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act.

DOJ_NMG_0114056

Originally, a terrorist designation was to last for two years, renewable at the discretion of the secretary of state. A 2004 law, the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act, gave the secretary added power by making an initial designation permanent. In another change, the USA Patriot Act increased the maximum sentence to 15 years from 10.

The defendants in the case before the court on Monday were originally successful in persuading the Federal District Court in Los Angeles to dismiss their indictment. But a three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, after considering the case for more than two years, reinstated the indictment in October 2005.

The appeals court said that while "no doubt Congress was well aware that some might claim that 'one man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter,' " Congress nonetheless chose to give the president and the State Department the authority to designate a group as a terrorist organization "and to keep such policymaking authority out of the hands of United States attorneys and juries."

Consequently, the court said, "it does not matter whether the designation is correct or not." The crime occurs, it explained, when someone gives support to such an organization, whether or not properly designated as a terrorist group.

An 11-judge panel of the appeals court then considered whether to rehear the case and split 6 to 5 in deciding to let the original decision stand. Judge Alex Kozinski, writing for the five dissenters, said the case "perfectly illustrates the patent unconstitutionality of the terrorist organization designation process." Judge Kozinski added that Roya Rahmani, the lead defendant, "is being prosecuted — and will surely be sent to prison for up to 10 years — for giving money to an organization that no one other than some obscure mandarin in the bowels of the State Department had determined to be a terrorist organization."

In their appeal to the Supreme Court, the defendants argued that the "sweeping implications" of the appeals court's decision would permit the government "to criminalize activities that would otherwise be First Amendment-protected" and to bar judicial review of its determination.

Urging the justices not to hear the case, the government said the issue was not one of free speech but rather of the "broad authority" that the court has long recognized for the regulation of "financial interactions between United States nationals and foreign entities."

In another case on Monday, the justices turned down an airline passenger's challenge to the airport screening policy adopted in an unpublished directive by the Transportation Security Agency.

The passenger, John Gilmore, was not permitted to board domestic flights from San Francisco and Oakland, Calif., because he refused to show identification. He argued that a secret directive actually gave passengers the choice of submitting to an intensive screening as an alternative to providing identification. The government lacked a basis for refusing to make the full policy public, he argued.

Responding to Mr. Gilmore's lawsuit, the government did not concede that it had such a policy. Nonetheless, the Ninth Circuit granted the government's request to dismiss the case, holding that whatever identification policy existed did not violate any constitutional rights, including the right to travel and the right against unreasonable search and seizure. The case was Gilmore v. Gonzales, No. 06-211.

High Court Won't Block Terror Trial (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court refused Monday to block the trial of seven Los Angeles residents charged with raising money for an Iranian opposition group that was designated a "foreign terrorist organization" by the U.S. government.

Lawyers for the seven had argued the charges were unconstitutional because they had a free-speech right to raise money for a political group. That claim was rejected by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, which noted the Iranian opposition group — Mujahedin Khalq, also known as the MEK — had a record of supporting assassinations and bombings.

"Sometimes money serves as a proxy for speech, and sometimes it buys goods and services that are not speech. Guns and bombs are not speech," said Judge Andrew J. Kleinfeld for the appeals court.

In their appeal, the lawyers said the accused deserved the right to challenge the group's designation as a "foreign terrorist organization" as part of their defense.

DOJ_NMG_0114057

Although the justices turned down the appeal without comment, they could take up the issue later if the seven are convicted of the charges.

"We are very disappointed the court decided not to hear this case. We believe the decision poses a threat to the civil liberties of any person who wants to contribute to a political organization in this country," said Stacey M. Leyton, a lawyer in San Francisco.

She said the law was written so broadly that organizations such as Greenpeace or the African National Congress in South Africa could be deemed foreign terrorist organizations. And once the group is on the government's list, "the individual doesn't have a right to challenge it," she said.

In the Antiterrorism Act of 1996, Congress gave the secretary of State the authority to designate foreign groups that "engage in terrorist activity" that threatens the security of Americans. Once a group makes this list, it is a crime for anyone to "knowingly" provide "material support" to it.

The MEK was founded as an Iranian Marxist group in the 1960s with a mission of overthrowing Mohammed Reza Shah Pahlavi and establishing a Marxist regime. But after the shah's fall in 1979, the new Iranian regime was dominated not by Marxists but by Muslim clerics.

Later, the MEK participated in terrorist activities that targeted Americans, the government said. In a federal court in Washington, the group also admitted it supported assassinations of Iranian officials and mortar attacks on Iranian facilities.

The group first made the list of "foreign terrorist organizations" in 1997. Over the next four years, the seven defendants were charged with soliciting contributions at Los Angeles International Airport and wiring at least several hundred thousand dollars to an MEK bank account in Turkey.

Court Turns Down Iran Opposition Group (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Supporters of an Iranian opposition group lost a Supreme Court appeal Monday that was intended to let them challenge the United States' designation of the group as a foreign terrorist organization.

Justices declined to review the case of seven people who were indicted in 2001 on charges they raised money for the People's Mujahedeen, also known as the MEK. The State Department first said in 1997 that the group engaged in terrorist activities.

In 2002, 150 members of Congress called on the State Department to withdraw the designation.

The seven people have sought to dismiss the charges against them by demonstrating that the Iranian group has no terrorism ties. The 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals said the indictment could proceed.

They were accused of soliciting money from travelers at Los Angeles International Airport. The indictment, in March 2001, followed a three-year FBI investigation.

The People's Mujahedeen participated in the 1979 ouster of the former shah of Iran, Mohammad Reza Pahlavi. But it fell out with the clerical government and launched a campaign of assassinations and bombings. For years it fought Iran's Islamic rulers from Iraq with the backing of Saddam Hussein's regime.

During the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, the U.S. military briefly bombed MEK camps until the group capitulated and agreed to disarm.

The case is Rahmani, etal., v. U.S., 06-241.

Outgoing Detroit Chief Defends FBI (DEN)

By Paul Egan

Detroit News, January 9, 2007

Roberts supports using economic charges in terror fight

The outgoing top man at the Detroit FBI defended the agency from criticism Monday that it is purporting to fight terrorism by charging defendants with fraud and other economic crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0114058

Daniel Roberts, the special agent in charge of Detroit who is leaving to become deputy director of the FBI's criminal division in Washington, said it's important to use the charges that are most likely to get convictions when targeting suspected supporters of terrorism.

Roberts made his comments Monday as he packed up his office, preparing to start his new job next week. Roberts' successor, Andrew Arena, starts in March.

In the case of Detroit-area restaurateur Talal Chahine and others, critics have pointed out the government has alleged, but not charged, links to terrorism that are virtually impossible to defend.

"Chahine I'd love to see come back, if he had the guts to do it," Roberts said.

Chahine, the owner of the La Shish restaurant chain, is charged with tax evasion. He is a fugitive, having flown to Lebanon after his offices were searched but before he was indicted last May. The government says Chahine owes about $20 million in taxes, interest and penalties and used money skimmed from his restaurants to support Hezbollah.

Chahine has denied supporting terrorism.

Dearborn Heights lawyer Nabih Ayad said Detroit's Muslim and Arab community feels unfairly targeted. The FBI would uncover economic crimes in any ethnic community put under scrutiny, he said.

"If you're saying that you're fighting terrorism, how come we have so many individuals charged with mortgage fraud, insurance fraud, so many matters that are not terrorism related?" he said.

Roberts, 46, who headed the Detroit FBI office since July 2004, conceded that authorities in Detroit have brought few charges of supporting terrorism. But he said there have been many more terrorism-related cases.

Most involve monetary support for terrorist causes and the use of illegal means to raise that money, he said.

Roberts said he is proud to leave Detroit after a series of major events -- including the Ryder Cup, Major League Baseball's World Series and the National Football League's Super Bowl -- that went off without major incidents.

"Because of my 20 years in the FBI, I've had a chance to be assigned across the country," Roberts said. "The law enforcement community gets along better here than anywhere else I've ever worked."

You can reach Paul Egan at (313) 222-2069 or pegan@detnews.com.

German Court Hands Moroccan Max For 9/11 (AP)

By Simone Utler

AP, January 9, 2007

A Moroccan man convicted of aiding three of the four suicide pilots who committed the Sept. 11 attacks was sentenced Monday to the maximum of 15 years in prison for his role in the terror plot.

A German federal appeals court convicted Mounir el Motassadeq in November of knowingly helping the hijackers and sent the case to a state court in Hamburg for sentencing.

"Anyone who helped in this has earned stiff punishment," presiding Judge Carsten Beckmann said after announcing Monday's verdict. Defense lawyers said they would appeal.

Shortly before the verdict was announced, the 32-year-old defendant exchanged emotionally charged words with an American whose mother died on one of the two planes that crashed into the World Trade Center.

Dominic Puopolo Jr. fought back tears and held up pictures of his mother, Sonia Morales Puopolo, an American Airlines flight attendant, as he joined prosecutors in calling for the maximum penalty. He urged the judges to consider the "human and emotional cost" of the 2001 attacks. The American man is a co-plaintiff in the case under the German court system.

When the court granted El Motassadeq a final chance to speak, the slightly built, bearded man turned to Puopolo to say: "I understand your suffering. ... The same thing is being done to me, my kids, my parents, my family — my future is ruined."

Puopolo said he forgave el Motassadeq, and reminded him that he will one day be freed.

"You have a chance to rebuild your life and be back with your family. Others don't," Puopolo said. "Your life is not over, but my mom's is."

DOJ_NMG_0114059

The federal appeals court had ruled that the Hamburg judges wrongly acquitted el Motassadeq in 2005 of direct involvement in the attacks, even though the Hamburg court sentenced him to seven years in prison for belonging to a terrorist group.

The appeals court convicted el Motassadeq as an accessory to the murder of the 246 passengers and crew members aboard the four jetliners used in the attacks, and ordered the state court to set a new sentence.

El Motassadeq's attorneys said they intended to challenge the sentence before a federal appeals court. They have already appealed the conviction to the Federal Constitutional Court, arguing that the court failed properly to hear evidence from other terror suspects. It is unclear when that court, Germany's highest, will consider the complaint.

Defense lawyer Ladislav Anisic said they might also appeal to the European Court of Justice.

"We have a clear mandate, and that is to ensure that our client receives the acquittal," he said.

El Motassadeq was a close friend of pilots Mohamed Atta, Marwan al-Shehhi and Ziad Jarrah when they lived and studied in Hamburg. He has acknowledged training at an al-Qaida camp in Afghanistan and that he was close to the three hijackers although he insists he knew nothing of their plans.

However, the federal appeals court said evidence showed el Motassadeq knew that the men planned to hijack and crash planes. It found that his actions — for example, transferring money, and helping the hijackers keep up the appearance of being regular university students by paying tuition and rent fees — facilitated the attacks.

The federal court also said it was irrelevant to el Motassadeq's guilt whether he knew of the plot's timing, dimension or targets.

Monday's decision was the latest step in a tangled legal saga that started with el Motassadeq's arrest in November 2001 and featured two full trials.

He was convicted and sentenced to the maximum 15 years in prison in 2003, but that verdict was overturned by a federal court the following year — largely because of a lack of evidence from al-Qaida suspects in U.S. custody.

At a retrial that resulted in the 2005 conviction, the U.S. provided limited summaries from the interrogation of, among others, Ramzi Binalshibh, a suspected liaison between the Hamburg hijackers and al-Qaida.

El Motassadeq has already spent about three years in custody, time that would count against a final sentence.

Asked by reporters outside the court if he felt German laws were too lenient, Puopolo said it was "a little bit frustrating" but praised the work of the prosecutors.

"It's not going to bring my mom back, but it's a part of a process of closure. I'm glad that I came to Hamburg."

Accomplice In 9-11 Attacks Gets 15-year Sentence (MCT)

By Matthew Schofield

McClatchy Newspapers, January 9, 2007

BERLIN - The last remaining member of the Hamburg sleeper cell that planned and carried out the 9-11 terror attacks was sentenced to 15 years in prison in a German courtroom Monday.

"My future is ruined," exclaimed Mounir el Motassadeq, a 32-year-old former engineering student from Morocco, after the verdict.

El Motassadeq received the harshest penalty possible under German law for the crime - accessory to murder for the 246 people who died on the four airliners that crashed on Sept. 11, 2001.

Dominic Puopolo Jr., whose mother was on one of the planes that crashed into the World Trade Center in New York, had asked the court to "consider the human and emotional cost" for the crime and deliver a harsh sentence.

"I understand your suffering," el Motassadeq later said in court, addressing Puopolo. "The same thing is being done to me, my kids, my parents, my family. My future is ruined."

Puopolo responded: "You have a chance to rebuild your life and be back with your family. Others don't. Your life is not over, but my mom's is."

DOJ_NMG_0114060

El Motassadeq was first convicted in 2003 of being an accessory to the deaths of all the victims of the Sept. 11 attacks, and he was sentenced to 15 years in prison. But a German federal court ruled on appeal that there wasn't enough evidence to prove that el Motassadeq knew the scope of the attacks.

A sticking point throughout the trials was el Motassadeq's contention that testimony from alleged co-conspirators being held at the Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba would vindicate him.

The Bush administration was unwilling to allow Ramzi Binalshibh, another suspected facilitator of the attacks, to testify or be deposed by German court officials. As a result, el Motassadeq was convicted for membership in a terrorist organization rather than as an accessory to murder.

Following another appeal and a decision by the German high court, German prosecutors reinstated the accessory to murder charge but narrowed the scope to include only those who died on the four jetliners.

El Motassadeq was a close friend of 9-11 hijackers Mohamed Atta, Marwan al Shehhi and Ziad Jarrah. He had signed wills, taken over power of attorney for the hijackers and wired money for logistical support, including flight training, according to German investigators.

El Motassadeq remained quiet through the five years of prosecution, until Friday, when he screamed out that he was innocent, and again on Monday, when he claimed that he was little more than a piece in a game.

"There was nothing in Hamburg," he said, spitting out his words. "You're twisting everything to fit the way you want. To you, this is nothing but a game, with winners and losers. But I'm asking you to think about what you've done to me."

Judge Carsten Beckmann, in announcing Monday's verdict, noted that, "Anyone who helped in this has deserved stiff punishment."

9/11 Associate Is Sentenced In Germany To 15 Years (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

FRANKFURT, Jan. 8 — A German court on Monday sentenced a friend of the Sept. 11 hijackers to 15 years in prison for being an accessory in the murders of 246 people aboard the commercial planes used in the terrorist attacks.

The sentencing of the man, a Moroccan named Mounir el-Motassadeq, is a potentially decisive milestone in a complex and politically delicate case that has wended its way through the German courts for five years.

In 2005, the court, in Hamburg, found Mr. Motassadeq, 32, guilty of belonging to a terrorist organization — a lesser crime — and sentenced him to seven years in jail. But last November, an appeals court overturned that ruling, saying he had played a direct role in plotting the hijackings.

“It was a violent crime that was carried out,” the presiding judge of the Hamburg court, Carsten Beckmann, said Monday, explaining the sentence, which was the stiffest possible under the criminal guidelines.

In one way, the 15-year prison term brings the case full circle: after his first trial, in 2003, Mr. Motassadeq was found guilty of 3,066 counts of accessory to murder and sentenced to the same jail term by the Hamburg court. But that verdict was overturned on appeal and he was put on trial a second time.

Mr. Motassadeq, who came to Germany in 1993 to study engineering and fell in with a radical Islamic group in Hamburg that included two of the hijackers, Mohamed Atta and Marwan al-Shehhi, is one of only two people to be convicted in the 9/11 attacks. The other — Zacarias Moussaoui, a French citizen of Moroccan descent — is serving a life sentence in Colorado.

German prosecutors struggled to build a case against Mr. Motassadeq, in part because of what they said was a lack of cooperation from the United States in sharing evidence obtained from other terrorism suspects. On Monday, however, the court handed them a clear victory.

Mr. Motassadeq’s lawyer, Udo Jacob, said he planned to appeal, either to the European Court of Human Rights or by demanding a third trial in Hamburg based on new evidence. He has already filed an appeal with the Federal Constitutional Court, the highest German court.

“This ruling was not a surprise,” he said in an interview. “The court had no choice but to give him a tough punishment.”

DOJ_NMG_0114061

Witnesses in the courtroom said Mr. Motassadeq reacted impassively as the judge read the sentence. But earlier, when given a chance to address the court, Mr. Motassadeq turned to the son of one of the victims, Dominic J. Puopolo, and delivered an emotional statement.

"I understand your suffering," Mr. Motassadeq said, according to The Associated Press. "The same thing is being done to me, my kids, my parents, my family; my future is ruined."

Mr. Puopolo, a 40-year-old computer consultant from Miami Beach, Fla., whose mother was on one of the planes flown into the World Trade Center, replied that Mr. Motassadeq would be free one day.

"You have a chance to rebuild your life and be back with your family," said Mr. Puopolo, who represented the victims as co-plaintiffs. "Your life is not over, but my mom's is."

In a telephone interview later, Mr. Puopolo said the confrontation caught him off guard. More than that, though, he said the outburst showed Mr. Motassadeq's desperation in the waning moments of his trial. During most of his court appearances, Mr. Motassadeq, a slight man with a long beard, had projected a tranquil, even occasionally cheerful, demeanor.

"This is the end of the road for him," Mr. Puopolo said. "It's real justice for the 9/11 families, and for my family."

Mr. Motassadeq's links to the hijackers were never in dispute. He was a friend of Mr. Atta and Mr. Shehhi while they lived in Hamburg, and had wired money to Mr. Shehhi. He also admitted to attending a terrorist training camp in Afghanistan sponsored by Osama bin Laden.

But Mr. Motassadeq denied knowing about the impending attacks and said he had helped the hijackers unwittingly. In 2005, the Hamburg court accepted his contention that he played no direct role.

The appeals court, however, ruled that the evidence showed that Mr. Motassadeq was aware of the plot to hijack and crash commercial airlines, even if he did not know the targets of the attacks.

Because there was no proof that he knew about the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, he was charged in his second trial with accessory to murder in the deaths of those on the planes, rather than in the deaths of everyone killed.

Mr. Jacob says he can present new evidence from another Moroccan, Abdelghani Mzoudi, who was acquitted of complicity in the 9/11 attacks by a Hamburg court in 2004. Mr. Mzoudi, who was deported from Germany, has offered to testify on behalf of Mr. Motassadeq.

For that to happen, however, the court would have to rule that the evidence is vital enough to warrant yet another trial.

More Gitmo Detainees Join Hunger Strike (AP)

By Michael Melia

AP, January 9, 2007

The number of Guantanamo Bay detainees participating in a hunger strike has more than doubled in recent weeks to 11, including five who are being force-fed, the U.S. military said Monday.

Military officials describe the hunger strike as an attempt to build public sympathy and opposition to the detention center, which on Thursday marks its fifth anniversary of existence at the isolated U.S. military base in Cuba.

"The hunger strike technique is consistent with Al-Qaida practice and reflects detainee attempts to elicit media attention to bring international pressure on the United States to release them back to the battlefield," said Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, a Guantanamo Bay spokesman.

A Human rights group said the strike reflects prisoners' despair.

"I don't see it as at all curious that they should be desperate enough to starve themselves," said Jumana Musa, advocacy director for Amnesty International USA.

The number of participants stood at five just one month ago, officials said. No information on who the new hunger strikers are was immediately available. The military rarely releases details on individual detainees.

The jump in the number of strikers comes as Guantanamo's critics are using its fifth anniversary to call for the prison to close.

DOJ_NMG_0114062

The U.S. government says it needs to keep men deemed "enemy combatants" under guard, but many prisoners protest they are innocent. Guantanamo Bay received its first prisoners on Jan. 11, 2002, and currently holds about 395 foreign men on suspicion of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban.

Among the hunger strikers are two prisoners who began refusing food in August 2005, near the start of a hunger strike that reached a peak participation of 131 that year, Durand said. Most detainees abandoned the protest as the military adopted more aggressive force-feeding methods, including a restraint chair.

Those on the hunger strike have not made any specific demands or requests, Durand said.

Lawyer To Face Court-Martial (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

A Navy lawyer accused of passing secret information about detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, to an unauthorized person was ordered to face a court-martial, the Navy said. The lawyer, Lt. Cmdr. Matthew M. Diaz, who was stationed at the base at Guantánamo from July 2004 to January 2005, could face more than 36 years in prison if convicted. No trial date was set. The Navy has said the recipient of the information notified the authorities; it has declined to identify that person. A complaint does not specify what type of information Commander Diaz is accused of copying and transmitting, but a Navy spokeswoman previously described it as a document containing names and other identifying information about detainees. Commander Diaz's civilian lawyer, Victor Kelley, did not return a call seeking comment.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Democrats' Security Bill Draws Doubts (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — House Democrats intend to fulfill a campaign promise this week by passing broad new antiterrorism legislation, but some Senate Democrats and the Bush administration object to security mandates in the plan, citing concerns about their cost and practicality.

The House measure, the Sept. 11 Commission Bill, is intended to write into law recommendations by the group that investigated the 2001 terror attacks. They include initiatives intended to disrupt global black markets for nuclear weapons technology and to enhance cargo inspection.

"Today marks a giant leap forward toward a safer and more secure America," said Representative Bennie Thompson, Democrat of Mississippi, the new chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security, as he unveiled the bill Friday.

But the proposed legislation, which could come to a vote as early as Tuesday, goes beyond what the Sept. 11 commission recommended, taking up measures previously favored by Democratic lawmakers but opposed by the Department of Homeland Security.

The bill requires that within three years, all cargo on passenger jets be inspected for explosives, as checked baggage is now. The House bill also requires that within five years all ship cargo containers headed to the United States be scanned overseas for components of a nuclear bomb.

Homeland Security Department officials say there is no proven technology for such comprehensive cargo screening, at least at a reasonable cost or without causing worldwide bottlenecks in trade. The screening for air cargo is estimated to cost $3.6 billion over the next decade, and ship inspections could cost even more. "Inspecting every container could cause ports to literally shut down," said Russ Knocke, a Homeland Security spokesman.

Many Republicans and some Senate Democratic committee chairmen said that the goal of 100 percent inspections was worthy, but that they were not convinced that mandates should be included in the bill.

"Airplane passengers must be assured that any cargo on a passenger jet will not pose a terrorist threat," said Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, independent of Connecticut, who now leads the Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0114063

"But we must achieve these goals in an efficient manner to allow for the free flow of commerce without placing undue economic burdens on importers or bringing air traffic to a standstill."

The Sept. 11 commission said in its 2004 report that any proposed new security measures must be carefully considered, weighing the cost and benefit of any one step, like inspecting cargo, against others that could be taken, like protecting planes against shoulder-fired missiles.

The commission recommended, for example, that passenger planes be equipped with hardened, bomb-resistant containers for some cargo, instead of moving immediately to inspect every cargo shipment.

Homeland Security Department officials said they were researching ways to inspect more air and sea cargo. The agency has tests planned this year at three ports in Pakistan, Honduras and England, where all ship containers headed for the United States will be checked for radioactive substances or dense objects that might be hiding a bomb.

Until then, the department intends to follow its existing security procedures, which include mandatory inspections of the small fraction of cargo containers deemed suspicious because of the sender, the destination or the contents, among other factors.

Currently, about 30 percent of air cargo on passenger planes is inspected by dogs or screening devices, while about 5 percent of all incoming ship containers are sent through a device like an X-ray machine.

Mr. Lieberman and Senator Daniel K. Inouye, Democrat of Hawaii, the new chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, want the security department to complete its tests on new technology before mandating inspection of all cargo.

But Mr. Thompson, the chief author of the House bill, and Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said the timetables were essential to push the department to move faster.

"We need firm deadlines to end the administration's foot-dragging," Mr. Schumer said Monday.

The push for 100 percent screening of all ship cargo containers first became a top priority for Democrats last year after the Bush administration proposed allowing a Dubai company to assume management of a half-dozen United States ship terminal operations. Democrats said then that they recognized the idea was compelling not only to increase security, but also as a political pitch as they tried to buttress their credentials as a party that takes domestic security seriously.

Part of the skepticism about the mandate for 100 percent screening is that even if the equipment is installed, it is not clear it would do much to prevent an attack, some security experts said.

The radiation detection equipment now in use, for example, probably would not pick up a crucial radioactive substance for a nuclear weapon if the material was shielded. And even if all cargo containers were checked, terrorists could find other ways to smuggle weapons into the United States, including on private boats or ships that carry cars, which would not be not covered by the inspection mandates.

"Tax dollars should not be spent on what makes for the best election-year bumper sticker, but on initiatives that offer the most security for the dollar spent," said James Jay Carafano, a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative research group in Washington, and a critic of the 100 percent inspection requirement.

Aside from the cargo inspection mandates, other security measures proposed by Democrats have a greater chance of becoming law.

The House bill calls for changes in the way some $2 billion a year in state and local domestic security grants are distributed, so that the money is more based on risk. A separate bill has been introduced in the Senate that would provide antiterrorism grants for Amtrak, freight railroads and other transit systems, a plan that previously passed the Senate but was opposed by House Republican leaders.

Mr. Thompson said that with the Democrats now in charge the party had a chance to push forward at least some of these measures, although he said he recognized compromise might be necessary before they were signed into law.

House Bill Backs Additional Reforms From 9/11 Report (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114064

House Democrats announced legislation yesterday aimed at implementing many of the remaining reforms suggested by the Sept. 11 commission, including calls for more thorough cargo screening, better emergency communications and more money for cities at the highest risk of terrorist attack.

Democratic leaders plan to push through votes this week on a long list of Sept. 11-related changes that were rejected by the previous Republican-controlled Congress. The proposals signal an early willingness on the part of House Democrats to pressure their colleagues in the Senate, where lawmakers from both parties are cooler to some of the ideas and where no similar package of legislation has been proposed.

Democrats say that the House proposals would implement nearly all the remaining reforms recommended in 2004 by the bipartisan commission on the 2001 attacks, including ways to beef up funding and training for first responders as well as calls to rewrite many U.S. policies for controlling weapons of mass destruction and nuclear proliferation.

Former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), who served as vice chairman of the panel, estimated that the previous Congress had enacted half the commission's recommendations, including creating a director to oversee the federal government's intelligence agencies. He said the "American people will be safer" if the remaining proposals become law.

"It carries out the recommendations that we have made," Hamilton said at a news conference yesterday with House Majority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and other Democrats. "And if this bill is enacted, then almost all of the recommendations of the commission will have been put into law."

Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said the changes would, among other things, result in "100 percent" screening of air cargo and baggage and major ports' cargo within four years.

The legislation calls for the establishment of a presidential office to coordinate prevention of terrorism and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. Supporters of the measure described it as necessary to direct activities and budgets on an issue that is now spread among numerous departments and agencies. The bill also would create an outside commission to monitor government nonproliferation initiatives.

The Sept. 11 commission gave the administration a grade of D in following up on its general recommendations for preventing the development and spread of weapons of mass destruction. The Democratic legislation proposes a wide range of initiatives to expand the scope of international cooperation and sanctions for countries that do not cooperate.

Noting that the commission called for a significant expansion of resources for international broadcasting and promotion of democracy, the bill calls for a "surge capacity" of additional funding "to support United States foreign policy objectives during a crisis abroad."

Congress's ability to push for change in these areas is limited.

"When you start on the domestic side, Congress has a lot more room to act," said Andrew Grotto, a nonproliferation expert at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank. "On public diplomacy and the proliferation elements, Congress's role starts to shift from direct action to more oversight and to funding."

Republicans on the Homeland Security committee offered immediate criticism of the package, arguing that Democrats had not followed through on promises to enact all of the remaining commission recommendations. They complained that Democrats were limiting debate and that many Democrats previously opposed the changes that they are now advocating.

Ranking Republican Rep. Peter T. King (N.Y.), whom Thompson replaced, called it a "missed opportunity."

The Sept. 11 commission report focused heavily on reorganizing the U.S. intelligence community and congressional oversight, the global dimension of terrorism in Afghanistan, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and elsewhere, and the threat of weapons of mass destruction. Domestic recommendations focused on border security, transportation security and protection of critical infrastructure.

The GOP-controlled Congress acted on many of those findings, including targeting terrorist travel, consolidating watch lists and securing commercial aviation. But many of the other changes stalled, such as attempts to set up a biometric border entry and exit system, establish secure ID documents for all Americans and develop plans to protect key private-sector targets.

While the House considers its legislation, the Senate's homeland security panel plans to hold a hearing today on the status of commission recommendations and expects to vote on a bill by the end of the month, said a spokeswoman for the committee's chairman, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.).

DOJ_NMG_0114065

But the Senate has opposed some of the key proposals in the House bill, such as reducing grant funds awarded to all states in favor of those most at risk, and it is unclear how much the new Democratic majority will alter that stance.

Michael O'Hanlon, a security analyst at the Brookings Institution, said House Democrats' embrace of their interpretation of the Sept. 11 commission's recommendations was designed to make a political point of swift action, not necessarily to make the best policy.

"I don't understand why we have to assume that everything that came out of the 9/11 commission is accurate and it should be axiomatic that the House should approve everything they proposed," O'Hanlon said.

Michael Greenberger, a University of Maryland law professor who heads the Center for Health and Homeland Security there, praised House Democrats for taking on the proposals but said they will have a tough time convincing many of their colleagues in the Senate.

"It's a very aggressive proposal, more aggressive than I would have thought," Greenberger said. "I wouldn't be optimistic that it will all make it through the Senate, but I'm surprised it got this far."

House Nears Passage Of Resolution To Add Intelligence Oversight Panel (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

The House is scheduled to pass a resolution as early as today to add a select intelligence oversight panel within the Appropriations Committee, but this change is far different from the proposal to enhance congressional oversight of intelligence proposed in 2004 by the Sept. 11 commission.

In past years, the House and Senate intelligence committees authorized intelligence spending, and the two chambers' appropriations panels approved the funding for the director of national intelligence and the 17 agencies that make up the community.

The panel on the 2001 attacks had recommended a House-Senate committee or smaller, single committees in each chamber that would both authorize and appropriate funds for the intelligence community -- thereby reducing the number of lawmakers involved but giving a sharper focus to oversight.

It also recommended that the overall intelligence budget, now an estimated $42 billion a year, be made public. The House resolution to be voted on soon does not deal with the overall budget number, whose disclosure the Bush administration opposes.

The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, which last year approved making the overall number public, is expected to pass this week or next the still-pending fiscal 2007 Intelligence Authorization Bill, which contains the public-disclosure language.

However, neither the House nor Senate appears ready to accept the idea of merging the authorization and appropriation functions. Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.), chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, said his panel "had to fund the Army, Navy, Air Force, as well as the intelligence community, and so we didn't feel that there ought to be a single-shot appropriations operation."

The resultant "hybrid" 13-member panel, he said, would have 10 lawmakers from Appropriations and three from the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. In addition, it would have what Obey described as a "beefed-up staff" to replace the staff member assigned to the issue last year, as well as subpoena power to carry out its own oversight investigations.

As for funding, however, the new panel would only "make recommendations" and prepare a report for the Appropriations defense subcommittee, which would continue to prepare the classified intelligence spending bill.

Yesterday, the Republican staff of the House Homeland Security Committee criticized the idea of the new panel within the Appropriations Committee as "another layer of bureaucracy to intelligence oversight." It said the new panel would have "no real appropriations power" and could only "make recommendations to the appropriators, who can choose to completely ignore those recommendations."

Democrats Defend Intelligence Panel Plans (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114066

House Democrats yesterday deflected criticism that their plan to create a dual committee to oversee funding and oversight for intelligence agencies does not conform to the recommendations of the September 11 commission.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said the hybrid panel is a first step toward reducing the number of committees with oversight over intelligence and homeland security.

"Reducing the number of committees ... will happen, but we have to be assured that this panel will work," Mrs. Pelosi said.

Democrats were criticized by Republicans and some members of their own party last week for veering from the recommendations of the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States.

"The commission recommended a merger of authorization and oversight, and we could not do that because appropriations has to allocate spending to areas of intelligence outside of the intelligence community for the Army, Navy and other armed services," said Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat and chairman of the Appropriations Committee.

Under the plan, intelligence agencies will report to the hybrid panel and the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. The hybrid panel will have control of agency spending, and the intelligence committee will have oversight.

The hybrid panel, whose members would be appointed by Mrs. Pelosi, would have subpoena powers and be required to issue an annual report on classified and unclassified intelligence spending.

"This is so the intelligence community knows that they are not just dealing with the individual members of the panel, but the speaker of the House," Mr. Obey said.

Republican leaders said Democrats are playing politics and using smoke and mirrors.

"This is one of the most baffling, incoherent and discombobulated 'streamlining' proposals the House has ever seen, and we're not just talking about catering contracts for the Capitol cafeteria. This is our national security," said a Republican leadership aide. "Whether this was the result of ineptitude or an inability to make legislation out of a silly campaign sound bite, it's pretty frightening."

Democrats are ready to begin House debate on a bill to implement the remaining recommendations of the September 11 commission.

They hope to increase the share of homeland security grants to cities at highest risk of a terrorist attack, and to create a stand-alone grant program to provide first responders with direct communications among different agencies.

"We will have 100 percent cargo screening at airports within three years, 100 percent of in-line baggage screening for explosives in three years, and 100 percent scanning of U.S.-bound shipping containers in five years," said Rep. Bennie Thompson, Mississippi Democrat and chairman of the Homeland Security Committee.

The bill also creates a U.S. coordinator for the prevention of weapons of mass destruction proliferation and terrorism and a blue-ribbon commission to recommend further reforms strengthening efforts to eliminate nuclear black-market networks.

Security Bill Picks Up Ideas Of 9/11 Panel (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON

In a bid to fulfill campaign promises, House Democrats are bringing to the floor - without new hearings or, perhaps, even the possibility of amendment - a sweeping bill to implement more of the 9/11 commission recommendations.

The bill includes new directives for allocating more homeland-security resources on the basis of risk and threat assessment, requiring inspection of all sea and air cargo, and adding funding for the interoperability of first responders. It also moves up reporting deadlines for the department of Homeland Security on work to improve aviation security, terrorist trafficking, port security, and a system to track foreign visitors.

"Let us be the Congress that strongly honors our responsibility to protect the American people from terrorism," said Speaker Nancy Pelosi in her acceptance speech last week. On the eve of last November's elections, then-minority leader Pelosi promised that Democrats would implement all the 9/11 commission recommendations in their first day in office.

But it leaves out key provisions of that prestigious panel that were considered and rejected in the GOP-controlled Congress:

• It does not take up panel recommendations to declassify the top line of the intelligence budget.

• It would not shift covert paramilitary operations from the Central Intelligence Agency to the Defense Department.

• It skirts the lead recommendation of the 9/11 commission for members of Congress: to dramatically reduce the number of committees that claim oversight over homeland security.

"In only their first few days in the majority, House Democratic leadership has already fallen short on the key security promise they made to the American people," chided Rep. Peter King of New York, the ranking Republican on the Committee on Homeland Security. "Republicans have already enacted an overwhelming majority of the recommendations, and the opening of the 110th Congress was a terrific opportunity to finish the job. Unfortunately, it is amounting to nothing more than a missed opportunity."

Others take a more optimistic view. "The 108th Congress passed half of the 9/11 commission reforms. The 109th Congress did nothing. The 110th Congress seeks to finish the job and pass all the remaining reforms," says Timothy Roemer, a former 9/11 commissioner.

He praised Pelosi for creating a new subcommittee in the House Appropriations panel to include representatives of both authorizing and spending committees. "We recognize that congressional oversight is one of the most difficult reforms yet and one of the most important. It's a very important step to tie intelligence oversight to the budget," he adds.

A key recommendation of the 9/11 commission was to allocate limited homeland-security resources by setting "risk-based priorities," rather than using a formula based on population or political clout. Democrats protested that rural states, such as Wyoming, were awarded bigger grants per capita than target cities like New York and Washington in fiscal year 2006.

"Hard choices must be made in allocating limited resources. The US government should identify and evaluate the transportation assets that need to be protected, set risk-based priorities for defending them, select the most practical and cost-effective ways of doing so, and then develop a plan, budget, and funding to implement the effort," said the panel, known officially as the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States, in its final report in 2004.

In a nod to the 9/11 commission recommendation to streamline congressional oversight, House Democrats are creating the House subcommittee that includes both appropriators and authorizers. But leaders of the Department of Homeland Security still appear before dozens of congressional panels.

"Gov. Tom Ridge [former secretary of Homeland Security] estimated that he spent at least 40 percent of his time, maybe more, testifying before Congress. The number of committees with oversight has been reduced from 80 to 55," says Al Felzenberg, former spokesman for the 9/11 commission.

"Of all our recommendations, strengthening congressional oversight may be among the most difficult and important," said the 9/11 commission in its final report. "Few things are more difficult to change in Washington than congressional committee jurisdiction and prerogatives."

Meanwhile, the Senate is also planning to take up a bill to implement the 9/11 commission's recommendations as one of its first pieces of legislation in the new Congress. This will include enhanced screening of containers and cargo in ships and planes at the point of origin, improved security at chemical and nuclear plants, and more resources for first responders.

The bill also calls for greater diplomacy and programs for "enhancing the authority of moderates and undermining violent extremists in the Middle East." And it would call for securing "loose nuclear materials" that terrorists could use to build nuclear weapons or dirty bombs.

A Bad Investment (WP)

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

WHAT'S MORE important, Coast Guard patrols or collecting fingerprints at border crossings? Running checked bags through X-ray machines at airports or installing blast barriers at nuclear plants?

Given a limited amount of money and an endless list of programs and procedures that could make Americans safer, it's essential to buy the most homeland security possible with the cash available. And as the little list above demonstrates, that can be a tough job. That's all the more reason not to waste money on the kind of political shenanigan written into a sprawling Democratic bill -- up for a vote in the House this week -- that would require the Department of Homeland Security to ensure that every maritime cargo container bound for the United States is scanned before it departs for American shores.

DOJ_NMG_0114068

Container scanning technology is improving, but it is not able to perform useful, speedy inspections of cargo on the scale House Democrats envision. Congress has already authorized pilot programs to study the feasibility of scanning all maritime cargo. The sensible posture is to await the results of those trials before buying port scanners, training the thousands who would be needed to operate them and gumming up international trade.

The Democrats don't offer a realistic cost estimate for the mandate they will propose today. But the cost to the government and the economy is sure to be in the tens of billions and quite possibly hundreds of billions annually. The marginal benefit isn't close to being worth the price. Under recently expanded programs, all cargo coming into the country is assessed for risk and, when necessary, inspected, all without the cost of expensive scanning equipment, overseas staff and long waits at foreign ports. Perhaps that's why the Sept. 11 commission didn't recommend 100 percent cargo scanning.

The newly installed House leadership will bring the bill, which contains a range of other homeland security proposals both deserving and undeserving, directly to the floor, bypassing the Homeland Security Committee. Luckily, the Senate will give more thought to its homeland security bill and probably won't approve a 100 percent container inspection plan. House Democrats can figure those odds as well as anyone. But why not score some easy political points in your first 100 hours?

Adapt, Change Or Die (WP)

By Tim Roemer

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

As our republic enters 2007, Washington is still primarily organized to prevail in the Cold War against the former Soviet Union. Yet today, America and the community of democracies face very different threats -- evolving terrorism, global warming and energy supply disruptions. Recognizing this, the new Democratic leadership has pledged to pass all of the remaining recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission this week, in the first "100 hours" of the 110th Congress. This is essential -- yet it is only a first step.

The Sept. 11 commission recommended 41 reforms; roughly half of those have been implemented. These reforms represent the most basic fixes to the vulnerabilities exploited by al-Qaeda more than five years ago. A terrorist attack or natural disaster could wreak as much damage and confusion today as happened on Sept. 11 or during Hurricane Katrina. Our executive and legislative branches need to finish the job.

As Congress gets to work, it must legislate first and oversee second. Communications spectrum needs to be transferred to our first responders, and interoperable, survivable networks need to be established. Fissile materials must be decommissioned, secured and inventoried around the world, accelerating the timetable of measures such as the Nunn-Lugar program. Homeland security funding must be allocated on the basis of objective criteria. Emergency response plans must be put in place by states and localities -- and they must be practiced regularly. But congressional committees preparing to use their investigative powers cannot point their fingers at other federal shortcomings without fixing their own dysfunctional oversight system.

Once Congress does its legislative work, members must turn to overseeing the executive branch. FBI reform has been far too slow. Information sharing among government agencies is still lagging. Airplane baggage and cargo, incredibly, are still largely unscreened. Passenger screening against a comprehensive terrorism watch list still eludes the Transportation Security Administration. The Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board needs independent, strong powers to protect the foundations of our democracy. And our foreign policy must support effective public diplomacy, ensuring that our actions and words win the battle for hearts and minds and defeat the seductive message of Osama bin Laden.

Even the best congressional oversight cannot overcome the personnel problems plaguing the Bush administration. The resignation of John Negroponte as director of national intelligence is a reminder of how important it is to have the right people stay in the right jobs long enough to build the foundations for change. Instead, we find the Office of the Director of National Intelligence engaged in a game of musical chairs. The critical deputy position under Negroponte has been vacant since Gen. Michael Hayden's departure to the CIA last spring. Instead of the streamlined and steady agency that the Sept. 11 commission recommended, we have tumultuous turnover.

Competent, capable and stable leadership is indispensable. And passing and implementing the Sept. 11 commission reforms would provide an essential foundation for our security. But together these fundamentals are no longer sufficient; they will get us only to where we should have been in 2004. The threats facing America in 2007 are different from what our commission addressed when we first convened nearly four years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0114069

In the near term, al-Qaeda continues to evolve and adapt. It is utilizing the Internet, motivating more suicide bombers and communicating with millions of people through its TV production unit, al-Sahab. Al-Qaeda is spreading around the globe and popping up in self-generated cells in London, Madrid and Bali. Its shadow is looming in Europe.

The bigger picture is even more unsettling. Our ground forces are tied down in the asymmetrical Iraq war, yet most federal agencies and congressional committees are structured to fight the Cold War. We are backsliding in Afghanistan as well as losing ground in the broader Middle East. Global warming is an undeniable transnational threat, trade imbalances are staggering and our energy supply is tenuous.

It will take tough, bipartisan work to compose a comprehensive strategy to address these converging threats.

That requires a positive, long-term vision founded on a sustainable global economy, an expanding community of democracies and a sharing of the global security burden. Harry Truman, with diplomat George F. Kennan's help, launched a strategy that would contain the Soviets with our military and our allies but would defeat them with our economic opportunity and freedom.

America needs to change now as much as it did after World War II, embracing government's vital role and reorganizing government to execute and oversee a new global strategy. The alternative is too dire to contemplate.

The writer, president of the Center for National Policy, was a member of the Sept. 11 commission and is a former member of the House intelligence committee from Indiana.

Court Challenge Of ID Requirement Fails (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court on Monday rebuffed a challenge to the federal government's policy of requiring airline passengers to show identification before they board flights, spurning arguments that the well-known but unpublished policy would lead to more secret laws.

John Gilmore, a founder of Sun Microsystems and an advocate of libertarian causes, sued the government because it has long refused to disclose the text of the regulation that forces air travelers to present an ID.

The question before the justices was whether travelers have sufficient notice of the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) ID policy to satisfy constitutional due process of law, which typically requires a law to be published so people know how to comply with it.

On July 4, 2002, Gilmore tried to board two flights from California to the Washington, D.C., area without showing identification. Airline workers told him that if he would not show an ID, he would have to undergo more extensive screening. He refused.

"I believe I have a right to travel in my own country without presenting what amounts to an internal passport," Gilmore told USA TODAY in 2004. "I have a right to be anonymous."

Gilmore's lawsuit drew support at the high court from several media groups, including the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, the Electronic Frontier Foundation, the American Association of Law Libraries and the Electronic Privacy Information Center.

In court briefs, the groups stressed the importance of the public knowing what the law says and the need to hold officials accountable as they impose anti-terrorism measures.

U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement told the justices in a brief that telling passengers about the ID requirement at airports is sufficient, and he emphasized that the TSA directive is part of "sensitive security information." He said the directive is part of a broad policy aimed at preventing hijackings and other potential threats to passenger jets.

In denying Gilmore's appeal, the high court gave no explanation and had no public vote, as is its usual practice in declining to hear cases. The justices let stand a lower court's ruling that said Gilmore had enough notice of the policy because airline workers had told him about it.

DOJ_NMG_0114070

Gilmore's attorney, Thomas Goldstein, said the federal government's refusal to disclose the TSA directive has the effect of misinforming people. "Passengers are consistently advised that federal law requires them to show identification," Goldstein wrote in the appeal. "Passengers in reality can generally travel even without showing proper identification … (if) they undergo a more extensive security screening."

Package Is Second False Alarm At Port (MH)

By Luisa Yanez, Erika Beras And Evan S. Benn

The Miami Herald, January 9, 2007

A sensor detected explosives in a package of sprinkler parts being loaded onto a cruise ship getting ready to depart Monday at the Port of Miami-Dade. Police dogs and a bomb squad soon determined the metal parts were harmless, and passengers evacuated from a Royal Caribbean ship were allowed to reembark.

The day before, another scare at the port started when three Middle Eastern men aroused suspicions of security officers. Police later described the incident as a misunderstanding, and misdemeanor charges against the men were dropped Monday.

"The fact that we've had several incidents here recently is indicative of the type of screening and how serious we take security here," said James Maes, the port's assistant security director. ``Travelers can rest assured at the decisive reactions to these types of potential threats."

Screeners checking baggage and supplies going onto Royal Caribbean's Majesty of the Seas got a positive signal for military-grade C-4 explosives about 2 p.m., according to Michael Sheehan, a spokesman for the Miami-based cruise company. The suspect package was tested six times, each time resulting in a detection of explosives.

Passengers, who had already boarded the ship before its scheduled 5 p.m. departure, and several other people in a nearby port terminal were ordered to evacuate.

Police dogs were unable to detect explosives in the small pallet, which contained metal parts for the cruise ship's sprinkler system. The Miami-Dade bomb squad detonated the package about 3:30 p.m. in a secure area of the port, determining that no explosives or explosives residue were present.

"It doesn't look like there was anything particularly menacing in the package," Maes said.

The sprinkler parts had similar chemical characteristics to C-4 explosives, which may have caused them to set off the sensors, but they did not contain any actual dangerous substances, said Miami-Dade police Detective Robert Williams.

The ship's 2,340 passengers were allowed back on the ship, which departed about 6 p.m., an hour after its scheduled time. The delay would not affect the cruise's four-night itinerary around the Bahamas, Sheehan said.

On Sunday, federal, state and local agents rushed to the port after an Iraqi man tried to enter the port in an 18-wheel cargo truck without proper paperwork.

Amar al Hadad, 28, was driving the truck along with two passengers: his brother Hussain al Hadad, 24, and Hassan el Sayed, 20. The Hadad brothers are from Iraq, and Sayed is from Lebanon, police said. All are legal U.S. residents who live in Dearborn, Mich.

Police charged the men with trespassing and resisting arrest without violence, but the charges were dropped Monday, court records show.

During a standard security check, a port security officer thought Amar al Hadad told him he was alone in the truck. But when officers saw the two other men, one of whom had no identification, the three men were detained for questioning while the cargo in their truck was inspected.

The truck contained electrical wiring for cars, which were listed on the truck's cargo manifest.

"We wanted to be as prudent and deliberate as we could in conducting a thorough investigation in one of our nation's busiest ports," Williams wrote in a release.

Miami Herald staff writer Rob Barry contributed to this report.

Authorities: Miami Package Was Harmless (NSDY/AP)

By Kelli Kennedy, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114071

MIAMI -- The Port of Miami was hit by its second terrorism scare in two days Monday when a package that was to be loaded onto a cruise ship tested positive for plastic explosives. Authorities later determined it was just a box of sprinkler parts.

The package was initially tested six times, and each time it came back positive for the military-grade explosive known as C4, the Coast Guard said.

The package was destroyed, and a Miami-Dade County police bomb squad determined the sprinkler parts contained a substance that "closely resembles" plastic explosives, said police spokesman Bobby Williams.

Williams said the instruments used to test the package sometimes give false positives.

"We still need to check it out," Williams said.

The package was included in provisions that were to be loaded aboard Royal Caribbean International's Majesty of the Seas. Explosives detection instruments gave the positive reading about 2 p.m., the cruise line said.

The FBI was monitoring the situation, spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said.

The developments came a day after three Middle Eastern men in a cargo truck sparked a brief terrorism scare at the port. After a bomb squad search, authorities concluded that the men were carrying automotive parts and that the scare stemmed from miscommunication. A judge dropped all charges against the three men Monday.

The Port of Miami is among the nation's busiest. More than 3.6 million cruise ship passengers traveled through it in 2005, making it the world's top terminal for cruise vacationers.

False Alarm At Miami Port -- Again (UPI)

United Press International, January 9, 2007

MIAMI, Jan. 8 (UPI) -- For the second day in a row, authorities rushed to the Port of Miami because of unfounded reports there were dangerous explosives on the premises.

Security at the port Monday discovered what was thought to be explosives amid cargo belonging to a cruise ship at the port.

A police bomb squad removed the suspicious item and destroyed it in a controlled explosion. Later authorities said the item was in fact a part of a sprinkler system and not considered dangerous, a police official told United Press International.

Monday's incident follows another false alarm at the port when a truck driver arriving at the entrance drew the suspicion of security personnel when he said he was uncertain of the contents of his truck. The driver -- reportedly of Middle Eastern descent -- and two other men were detained and questioned by authorities. FBI officials said there was no threat and the incident was the result of miscommunication.

Charges Dismissed After Port Scare (MCT)

By David Ashenfelter, Detroit Free Press

McClatchy Newspapers, January 9, 2007

A judge dismissed misdemeanor charges Monday against three Middle Eastern men from Dearborn, Mich., who were arrested during a mix-up Sunday that triggered a terrorism scare at the Port of Miami.

Authorities said they arrested the men because they were suspicious, but an Arab-American civil rights group in Dearborn called it another case of so-called driving while Arab.

"We understand that mistakes happen, but when they happen this often, it makes you wonder," Imad Hamad , regional director of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee in Dearborn said, referring to the arrests last summer of five Middle Eastern men in Marietta, Ohio, and Caro, Mich., on terrorism charges after they bought hundreds of cell phones for resale.

Terrorism charges in those cases eventually were dropped.

The men in Sunday's incident - Amar Al Hadad , 28; his brother, Hussain Al Hadad , 24; and Hassan El Sayed , 20 - were taken into custody after Amar Al Hadad allegedly told a security guard that he was alone in a cargo truck that was delivering a load of automotive parts.

The FBI said the guard directed the driver to a Miami-Dade police checkpoint to obtain the proper credentials to enter the port. When an officer at the second checkpoint asked the driver if anyone else was in the vehicle and he didn't reply, the officer climbed into the cab and found the other two men. One of the men, El Sayed, couldn't produce identification.

DOJ_NMG_0114072

Amar Al Hadad, who insisted that he never told anyone he was alone in the truck, was charged with resisting an officer without violence. His companions were charged with trespassing. The Al Hadad brothers are from Iraq. El Sayed is from Lebanon. All are permanent U.S. residents.

Miami-Dade County Court Judge Gerald Klein dismissed the charges during a short bond hearing in Miami, agreeing with a public defender that there was no evidence that they had done anything wrong. They were released a short time later.

Authorities said the arrests were warranted.

"Due to a miscommunication between the gate security personnel and the truck driver, we believe there was a discrepancy in the number of people in the vehicle," Miami-Dade police spokeswoman Nancy Goldberg said. "This, and the fact that one of the individuals did not have any form of ID, raised our level of concern."

Hamad said all of the men would continue to live under a cloud because the charges are part of their criminal records.

Despite early media reports, the Port of Miami wasn't closed Sunday and the Dearborn men didn't appear on a terrorist watch list.

The families of the men could not be reached to comment.

Dead Birds Litter Street In Austin; Tests Continue (USAT)

By William M. Welch, Usa Today

USA Today, January 9, 2007

Ten city blocks in front of the Texas Capitol in Austin were closed and the city triggered its terrorism-response plan Monday when dozens of dead birds were discovered along a main thoroughfare.

Congress Avenue was reopened before 1 p.m. after city officials and health experts concluded there was no threat to people.

Initial tests provided no explanation for the deaths of 63 birds. The birds — pigeons, sparrows and grackles — were sent to state and federal veterinary labs for tests.

Adolfo Valadez, medical director of the Austin/Travis County Health and Human Services Department, said the birds may have been deliberately poisoned. Grackles — which are large, noisy blackbirds — and pigeons are often regarded as nuisances.

"We don't have a final cause," Valadez said. "Given all the information we have … we do not feel this was any type of terrorist threat, an intentional poisoning trying to hurt humans."

Police found the dead birds about 3 a.m., city spokesman Gene Acuna said. City officials ordered Congress Avenue and adjacent streets closed well before workers began arriving at downtown offices. Workers in hazardous-materials suits tested the air for contaminants, and workers dissected one of the birds in a search for an obvious cause of death.

"Downtown Austin was shut down pretty much until noon as additional testing was done," Acuna said. "There was nothing in our air sampling that we found that posed any public threat."

Concern about a threat was heightened by the location, directly in front of the state Capitol, and the timing, a day before the Texas Legislature convenes for its 2007 session. That led officials to trigger the terrorism-response plan as a precaution, Valadez said.

"If anything, we've become much more suspicious and prepared" since 9/11 and the anthrax attacks of 2001, he said.

Dead birds were sent to the Texas A&M University veterinary school in College Station and the U.S. Department of Agriculture's National Animal Disease Center in Ames, Iowa. It could take several weeks for tests to be completed, Valadez said.

Besides poisoning, the labs are looking for signs of bacteriological or viral diseases. "These birds might have died a natural death due to infection," Valadez said.

For Airport Screeners, More Training About Muslims (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, January 9, 2007

NEW YORK

DOJ_NMG_0114073

Say you're a security screener at the airport. You notice a large group of people wearing white robes, speaking a strange language. The women have head scarves and the men long beards. They look nervous. One of them is holding a Koran. Another appears to be praying. What do you do?

According to the Transportation Security Administration (TSA), simply assume they're devout Muslims returning from the annual hajj in Mecca.

During the next few weeks, as many as 20,000 American Muslims will be returning to the United States from their pilgrimage to Saudi Arabia. The TSA has ramped up cultural-awareness training for all 43,000 of its screeners. The goal: to remind screeners what to expect from devout Muslims and how to go about screening them so it's in concert with their religious beliefs.

Arab-American and Muslim-American leaders are applauding the effort. But they say it's part of a much-needed larger cultural and political conversation about Islam and Arab culture that can help the nation as it heals from the aftereffects of 9/11.

"Their efforts are a modest but important beginning," says Jack Shaheen, professor emeritus of mass communications at Southern Illinois University. "But until such time that we react to the vilification of and discrimination against Arabs in the same way we react to the vilification of others like Jews, blacks, and Hispanics, I'm not going to go dancing in the streets."

The 9/11 attacks ushered in a new era for the nation's Arabs and Muslims. Many of the almost 7 million who have lived in the country for years, if not generations, suddenly felt suspect simply because of their religion or the way they looked. A poll conducted last year by the Council on American-Islamic Relations found that almost half of Americans have a negative view of Islam, even though 60 percent say they're not knowledgeable about it. More than 1 in 4 believes such statements as: "The Muslim religion teaches violence and hatred." Heightened sensitivities at airports

And it's at the airports, with the intense focus on security, that many American Muslims and Arab-Americans say they are more keenly aware of those misperceptions.

"After 9/11 things were bad, but they weren't as bad as they are now," says Rafat Arain, a dentist and mother of four from Brookfield, Wis.

Dr. Arain, who's lived in the US for 30 years, wears a head scarf known as the hijab. Every time she's flown in the past five years, she's been taken aside for extra screening, whether she was traveling to Europe, Pakistan, or Saudi Arabia for the hajj. She believes, in part, that's because of her head covering. Immediately after 9/11, she says, she understood the extra scrutiny: The country had been traumatized. Now, she's simply come to expect it.

A year ago, when she was at Chicago's O'Hare Airport, she realized that time for one of her five daily prayers was running out. She went to a corner and quietly began to pray. A few minutes later, she noticed a security guard standing at her side.

"He didn't say anything to me. I finished my prayer, then I said 'Hi' to him and just walked away," she says. "But I could tell the people around were scared of me, and that's not good for us or good for our children."

In its hajj training refresher, the TSA is reminding officers that devout Muslims pray five times a day, and to expect it. The TSA also maintains that it does not in any way target individuals based on their background or religious affiliation.

"Our model looks only at behavior and in a way is the antidote to racial profiling," says Christopher White, a TSA spokesman.

He also says the TSA and other law-enforcement agencies are working hard to ensure that no one's civil rights are violated, which is why officials believed the hajj merited additional training.

"We expect a large number of pilgrims, and the hajj training involves providing our security officers reminders about how to screen individuals with head coverings [and] our policies concerning the transport of holy water and other Muslim religious practices, like praying," says Mr. White.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations applauds the special attention. It says it will be checking airports around the country during the next few weeks to ensure all goes smoothly. Complaints about detentions

But at the same time, the civil rights organization says it's seen an increase in reports about perceived discrimination against Muslims, or people who look Muslim. Many of the complaints concern incidents such as individuals being routinely detained for several hours at the airport and being asked intimate questions about their beliefs - whether they pray and at which mosque. "These are things that really aren't the business of security personnel," says Ibrahim Hooper, spokesman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations.

DOJ_NMG_0114074

Muslim-American leaders say their goal is to reach out to all Americans so they can understand Islam as a religion of peace, respect for neighbors, and devotion to God.

"We're afraid of what we don't understand, and these people look different from us. They have different sounding names," says Nawar Shora, director of diversity and law-enforcement outreach at the American Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee in Washington. "In the post-9/11 era, there's an absolute need for the average Joe and the average Jane to be able to look at their neighbor that looks like one of those brown people and know that different isn't necessarily bad."

TSA Screeners May Get Union Rights (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

Take it as a sign of the times.

As part of a bill to follow through on recommendations of the 9/11 commission, House Democrats have included a provision that would give union rights to about 43,000 airport screeners at the Transportation Security Administration.

The TSA has not allowed federal screeners to join unions -- like other federal employees -- since Congress created the agency in 2001 after the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The Bush administration's ban has drawn steady opposition from federal unions, especially the American Federation of Government Employees.

The provision in the House bill, scheduled for floor action today, is based on a measure sponsored last year by Rep. Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.) aimed at permitting screeners to engage in collective bargaining. The Lowey proposal drew bipartisan support but failed to move out of committee by one vote.

The decision by Rep. Bennie G. Thompson (D-Miss.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, to include the union-rights provision can be taken as a signal that the new Congress will be open to the arguments of organized labor on federal personnel issues.

Thompson's provision would require the Homeland Security Department to apply the same management system to all TSA employees, including screeners. With that change, screeners would have the right to decide whether they wanted to be represented by a union and would be given job protections if they blow the whistle on waste, fraud and abuse.

The 9/11 commission did not address union rights or personnel rules but urged improvements in airport screening operations. AFGE maintains that collective bargaining rights help smooth agency operations because labor-management contracts provide a structure for addressing employee issues, including job performance.

Peter Winch, an organizer with AFGE, said the union had asked Democrats to put bargaining rights for TSA screeners "on the agenda for the first 100 hours." He continued, "It does not make sense to keep these employees from collective bargaining rights when other Department of Homeland Security employees have those rights."

The TSA has said that collective bargaining is not appropriate for airport passenger and baggage screeners because of their national security mission and because the agency requires the ability to make personnel staffing changes rapidly in response to threats. In the law creating the TSA, Congress left it to the Bush administration to determine such issues as union rights for screeners.

Asked for a comment yesterday, a spokesman for the Homeland Security Department said he could not discuss pending legislation.

AFGE has fought the TSA ban but has been rebuffed in federal courts. The union has signed up about 1,500 screeners as members and helps them deal with disciplinary actions, workers' compensation and equal employment opportunity, Winch said.

The House provision, if approved, would go to the Senate. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, will support the House provision, his spokeswoman said yesterday.

"The senator doesn't see any national security reason to single out the TSA screeners," spokeswoman Leslie Phillips said. "Other security personnel like customs agents and the Border Patrol have the right to collective bargaining, and that has not impaired their ability to protect American security."

DOJ_NMG_0114075

John Gage, AFGE president, said yesterday that "now is the time for change." The screeners, he said, "deserve equality."OPM Nominee

Howard C. Weizmann has been selected by the president to serve as the next deputy director at the Office of Personnel Management, the White House announced.

Weizmann is the president of the Private Sector Council, a part of the nonprofit Partnership for Public Service.

The council, founded in 1983 by David Packard and other executives, grew out of the Grace Commission, which was chartered by President Ronald Reagan to find ways to save taxpayer dollars and improve government efficiency.

Weizmann has worked for nearly 30 years in a variety of corporate and nonprofit positions. He is a former managing consultant for the Washington, Philadelphia and Richmond offices of Watson Wyatt Worldwide, the human resources consulting firm. His nomination requires Senate confirmation.

A Rotten Smell Raises Alarms And Questions (NYT)

By Sewell Chan

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

It was the odor associated with natural gas — the telltale, unpleasant sulfur scent that typically signals a gas leak. But this time, it was lingering in many areas of Manhattan and northeastern New Jersey, coursing through buildings and leading to fears that it could ignite or that a dangerous chemical had been deliberately released.

Schools and office buildings were evacuated. A subway station was shut, and commuter trains were rerouted. Government security officials were put on alert. Fire trucks raced through the streets, while Coast Guard vessels patrolled New York Harbor, communicating with tugboats and container ships. Twelve people with complaints of minor illnesses or injuries were taken to hospitals.

The source of the odor? As of last night, city officials still did not know. But it lingered for an hour after first being reported around 9 a.m., leaving New York with another mystery on its hands and more than a few conspiracy theories to sort through.

With anxieties about gas leaks rattling the nerves of the city, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg held a press conference to assure residents that the city's air-quality detectors had found no cause for alarm. He hypothesized that the odor could have been caused by the release of mercaptan, a compound that smells like rotting eggs and is added to natural gas so people can detect and report leaks.

Throughout the day, possible culprits — among them a minor gas leak in Greenwich Village and natural-gas pipelines in northeastern New Jersey — were considered and ruled out.

The olfactory mystery in the New York region was matched by strange activity elsewhere. In Austin, Tex., police cordoned off 10 blocks of the downtown business district early yesterday after more than 60 birds were found dead overnight along Congress Avenue, which leads to the State Capitol. Air testing there failed to find a cause, but preliminary results determined that people were not at risk.

In New York, the piercing odor was the talk of Manhattan, and it called to mind another mystery: the maple syrup odor that people reported smelling on separate days in late 2005 and whose source has never been established. In yesterday's case, several people said they were overcome by the odor.

"I feel faint," said Ivolett Bredwood, a legal assistant who noticed the odor once she stepped off a New Jersey Transit train at Pennsylvania Station around 8:45 a.m. The smell trailed her as she walked to her office, at 99 Park Avenue, which was briefly evacuated. "It's an awful, nasty smell."

The widespread uncertainty and potential for danger led the authorities to take numerous precautions as thousands of reports of the odor flooded into 911 and utility hot lines.

The Metropolitan Transportation Authority briefly closed the subway station at 23rd Street and Avenue of the Americas, as well as a control tower at West Fourth Street. Service was temporarily halted on PATH lines terminating at 33rd Street.

The major gas utilities — Consolidated Edison in New York and Public Service Electric and Gas in New Jersey — checked their transmission lines and reported no leaks, changes in pressure or other abnormalities.

DOJ_NMG_0114076

The city's Department of Environmental Protection dispatched a mobile laboratory to the West Side with meters to test for ammonia, chloride, cyanide, methane, carbon monoxide, hydrogen sulfide and volatile organic compounds. "That's the hardest part, finding the source," said Christopher Haas, a department specialist in hazardous materials. "Air is very dynamic."

Officials were reluctant to discuss terrorism precautions in great detail, but they said that the city regularly monitors the air with machines that can detect the presence of chemical, biological or radiological substances.

At the Port Authority Bus Terminal, some alarmed passengers thought that their buses had problems. And at the Equitable Center, on Seventh Avenue between 51st and 52nd Streets, air vents were closed to keep the odor out. Two schools were evacuated. Norman Thomas High School in Midtown was emptied for about 50 minutes beginning at 9:30 a.m., while students at Public School 11 in Chelsea were taken to Public School 33 nearby.

Jeremy Fleishman, a worker at a computer repair shop in Chelsea, said it smelled as if "somebody left the Bunsen burner on" in chemistry class. By 10:30 a.m., he said, "it mostly dissipated — or maybe we just got used to it."

At 980 Avenue of the Americas, a building that was briefly evacuated, a guard, Ralph Supino of Secaucus, N.J., said he called Con Edison but reached only recorded messages. "They were overwhelmed," he said.

For some, it seemed logical that the odor was tied to some sort of terrorist plot. At 1250 Broadway, which was also briefly closed, a guard, Miguel Contreras of Irvington, N.J., said that thought raced through his mind when he noticed the smell upon arriving at the bus terminal on his way to work.

"You pray to God that everything is fine and it's just a leak somewhere," he said.

Adding to the alarm was the strength and duration of the odor, which may have been aggravated by a weather phenomenon known as a temperature inversion. Inversions, which often occur when a warm front moves over a cooler, denser air mass, cause the temperature closer to the ground to be cooler and the air higher up to be warmer — a reversal of the usual pattern. Inversions can trap pollutants and odors, preventing them from being dispersed upward.

David Wally, a meteorologist at the National Weather Service's forecast office in Upton, N.Y., said a warm front approached the city between 7 and 8 a.m., making it "very possible" that an inversion trapped the pollutants and gaseous odor closer to the ground. The inversion eroded later in the morning, he said.

The city recorded 4,500 more 911 calls than usual between 9 and 11 a.m., with most of the increase in Manhattan. The Fire Department responded to 450 calls, 41 of them for emergency medical assistance.

Dr. Kristin E. Harkin, an emergency-medicine physician at NewYork-Presbyterian Hospital/Weill Cornell Medical Center, said that strong odors can worsen the symptoms of people with chronic respiratory ailments like asthma and emphysema.

Some suspicion fell on New Jersey, given the path of the prevailing winds and the prevalence of chemical and petroleum facilities in the state. Calls about the smell were received in West New York,Weehawken and other places.

In Hoboken, the downtown police headquarters and several office buildings were briefly evacuated, according to Mayor David Roberts, who said he took an anxious call about the smell from his wife.

Jack Burns, coordinator of the Hudson County Office of Emergency Management, in Secaucus, said that officials had ruled out the possibility of a mercaptan spill there. He added, "If it's in New York and people can smell it in western Hudson County, that's a lot of it, whatever it is."

Michael Williams, an accountant in Jersey City, said he delayed taking a smoking break for more than an hour because the odor was so intense. "I didn't want to spark an explosion or anything," he said.

Public Safety And Profit: On The Same Wavelength? (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

Morgan O'Brien got rich the old-fashioned way, cobbling together small companies to make a big one that you've come to know as Nextel Communications.

Now O'Brien wants to get rich the Washington way -- using lobbyists. He's hired a bunch of big guns to get control of more than $5 billion worth of broadband spectrum. He wants it for a noble cause: to help first responders communicate during emergencies. But O'Brien also hopes to manage the valuable space, and that work just might make him his second fortune.

DOJ_NMG_0114077

Several lawmakers, economists and interest groups are outraged. They wonder why the government should, essentially, hand over such a prime asset. "It's a get-rich-quick scheme to the tune of billions of dollars," said Jeffrey A. Eisenach, a former policy aide at the Federal Trade Commission and the White House budget office.

O'Brien defends his idea as a prudent investment for Americans who have too often seen medical and police services fall apart when serious crises strike. "I can't imagine a better or more satisfying business," he said.

O'Brien's company, Cyren Call Communications, wants Congress to set aside 30 megahertz of radio spectrum (that's a lot) now scheduled to be auctioned off early next year. Cyren Call's consultants include Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates, the Fritts Group (run by Eddie Fritts, the ex-president of the National Association of Broadcasters), and soon (O'Brien hopes) Tom Ridge, the former secretary of Homeland Security.

Cyren Call wants the government to place the spectrum into a trust, which would, with private funding, build a nationwide wireless network for emergency workers intended to prevent the kind of communications breakdowns that happened after Hurricane Katrina and the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. When first responders are not using the system, commercial customers could.

By managing the venture, Cyren Call hopes to make its money. Thanks to the company's prodding, the proposal has been endorsed by the International Association of Chiefs of Police and the Association of Public-Safety Communications Officials-International, among other first-responder groups.

"It's a Robin Hood plan," Fritts said. "It takes from the rich and gives to the poor -- first responders."

But others see it as a money grab using first responders as a front, and they are fighting to stop it. "O'Brien's proposal is based on a lot of promises that we believe he can't keep," said Christopher Guttman-McCabe of CTIA-the Wireless Association. Also opposed are Rep. Fred Upton (R-Mich.), former chairman of the House's telecommunications subcommittee, and the Consumer Electronics Association.

Opponents note that public safety agencies are already guaranteed by law to receive 24 megahertz of spectrum and have not found a way to use it all. They also question O'Brien's financing and doubt that he can attract enough money to construct the system.

At first, O'Brien wanted the spectrum to be placed into trust without any fees to the U.S. Treasury. But after an outcry, he now proposes to pay $5 billion, an amount he would raise with the aid of federal loan guarantees -- a distinction without a difference to Cyren Call's many critics.

O'Brien said he chose the company's name because it is a high-tech version of "siren," which means both a mythological nymph whose beautiful songs lured ancient ships into the rocks and a loud blast that warns people to get out of the way.

So far, it has a lot of people wailing.The Majority Begins to Cash In

If you're a lobbyist, you can't even buy a burger for House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) under new House rules. But on Jan. 31, you can give "Hoyer for Congress" $1,000 and join him at a reception at the Hay-Adams Hotel.

For $5,000 from your political action committee, you can get really cozy with him at a "VIP private reception" that same night.

Hoyer's event will benefit his own reelection committee. But the Democratic National Committee is looking to cash in on its members in top spots on the Hill and will be featuring some new committee chairmen at fundraisers in the coming months.

Next Wednesday it's soliciting up to $15,000 per PAC for an event at Johnny's Half Shell honoring the new chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, Rep. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.).

Lobbyists will donate lavishly and show up in droves, but they will also point out the hypocrisy. "I am prohibited from buying a staff member a $20 lunch, but I can pay $1,000 or more to talk with that staffer's boss at a political fundraiser," said Howard Marlowe, former president of the American League of Lobbyists. "That's not what I call reform."Stop That Spin

Democrats have promised to practice the highest ethics as they take the reins on Capitol Hill. But the House's new travel ban is "being hyped as broader than it is," said Jan W. Baran of Wiley Rein & Fielding.

For instance, lobby groups can still take lawmakers and staffers on short trips -- limited to a day and a night or, possibly, two nights. Institutions of higher education, which spend hugely on lobbying, and nonprofit foundations can provide travel without restrictions. And lawmakers can use campaign funds to visit lobbyists' meetings -- and then hold a fundraiser once they get there to offset the costs.

DOJ_NMG_0114078

"It's a partial ban," said Baran, one of Washington's top ethics experts. "But it doesn't have as many holes as the gift ban, which has 23 exceptions."Democratic Hires of the Week

The Federalist Group, to no one's surprise, was once all-GOP, but it's been on a Democratic hiring spree. Its latest addition: Moses Mercado, ex-deputy executive director of the Democratic National Committee. It also plans to change its name to something less, well, Republican-sounding.

Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld last week snared a top Democratic tax lobbyist, Robert J. Leonard, formerly chief counsel of the Ways and Means Committee. Citigroup has hired two D's: Paul Thornell, who worked in the Clinton White House, and Robert D. Getzoff, formerly with Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.). And the law firm Covington & Burling added former representative Michael Barnes (D-Md.) as a senior of counsel.

The revolving door rotated the other way, too. Daniel A. Turton, a former lobbyist for Timmons & Co., which represents corporate clients such as the American Petroleum Institute and DaimlerChrysler, is chief of staff to the House Rules Committee. Sean Kennedy, a former lobbyist for AT&T, has also returned to Congress as chief of staff to Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.).

Study: People Outside Senate Office Infected With Anthrax (USAT)

By Steve Sternberg

USA Today, January 9, 2007

A Navy-led analysis of the anthrax attack on Sen. Tom Daschle's office in October 2001 has uncovered evidence that anthrax spores released in the Hart Senate Office Building infected people outside the building.

The researchers could not pinpoint where the four exposed people worked or where they encountered the airborne spores. They apparently fought off infection without getting sick, but they turned up in a group of 20 people who were "outside the building and presumed to be unexposed," says the study in the Jan. 15 Journal of Infectious Diseases.

"We couldn't believe it," says Navy Cmdr. Daniel Freilich, one of the study's authors.

Samples from people who were exposed and from those outside the building were collected during the initial investigation, when epidemic investigators collected 6,000 swabs from noses and throats of people in and near the Hart Building and tested them for anthrax. The investigators also collected blood from people who were known to have been exposed and from people serving as controls.

The surprise finding supports previous analyses indicating that the spores were engineered to float long distances in the air. Environmental samples revealed that spores penetrated so far into the Hart Building that the structure had to be fumigated.

The study's objective was to examine how the body's defenses respond to inhaled anthrax. Researchers focused on 124 people inside and outside the Hart "exposure zone." Two subjects had been vaccinated against anthrax before the attacks. All those with known or presumed exposure were vaccinated and given antibiotics.

Researchers found for the first time that anthrax exposure activates both major arms of the immune system. It unleashes biological antibodies to the anthrax bacteria's two deadly toxins and activates killer white blood cells that wipe out infected cells.

The presence of white blood cells in samples taken from those far from the exposure zone tipped researchers off that people outside the Hart Building were infected. The finding suggests that, in future attacks, these cells may help identify infected people and map the exposure zone, Freilich says.

Stephen Morse of the Center for Public Health Preparedness at Columbia University says the paradox that those outside the Hart Building were infected by anthrax but didn't get sick suggests that if you're young and healthy, "you might be able to get a few spores, get an immune response that's protective and survive."

Morse, who wasn't involved in the study, says it "reopens a critical question: How big a dose is necessary to cause disease?"

An encouraging finding is that anthrax vaccine, designed to protect against one of two toxins that make anthrax lethal, boosts immunity to both in people who are injected after they've been exposed.

"If you give antibiotics and vaccine early on, no matter how high the exposure, it looks like people generally will do fine," Freilich says.

State Farm Is Settling Gulf Claims (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0114079

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

State Farm, the biggest home insurer in the nation, is in the final stages of settling hundreds of lawsuits over its payments for homes wrecked by Hurricane Katrina along the Mississippi Gulf Coast, lawyers briefed on the talks said yesterday.

The settlement of 639 lawsuits for $80 million could be the first step in resolving a bitter legal battle between homeowners and their insurers that had threatened to drag on for years and has already slowed Mississippi's recovery since the storm in August 2005.

As part of the proposed deal, which other insurers are expected to adopt, State Farm has agreed to review and possibly increase payments to as many as 35,000 additional homeowners. In some cases, these homeowners received only a few thousand dollars for homes along the Mississippi coast that suffered major damage or were destroyed.

The talks do not apply to homeowners in New Orleans and the rest of Louisiana.

State Farm, under the tentative accord, would provide an average of about $125,000 to homeowners who filed lawsuits, although the payments would range from as little as about $2,000 to about $2 million.

The treatment of those cases would serve as a guide for increasing payments to any of the 35,000 homeowners who request a review of their claim, according to lawyers privy to the details.

Similar settlements with the dozen or so other insurers in Mississippi could provide hundreds of millions of dollars for recovery along the coast. It would also close a painful chapter in the public relations history of the carriers who have been portrayed by opposing lawyers as coldhearted in refusing to pay for much of Katrina's devastation.

"This is an opportunity to change public perception," said Randy Maniloff, a lawyer in Philadelphia who represents insurance companies, and who has not been involved in the talks.

The heart of the dispute in Mississippi as well as in Louisiana has been over the coverage of flood damage. Flooding was far worse in Katrina than in most previous hurricanes.

The insurers argued successfully in Mississippi that their policies did not provide coverage for any kind of flooding. But Judge L. T. Senter Jr., of Federal District Court in Gulfport, Miss., rejected the argument by insurers that if any flooding damaged a house, the insurers then had no responsibility for any other damage caused by Katrina's high winds.

More than 2,000 homeowners in Mississippi alone filed suit against their insurers. Under terms of the tentative settlement, State Farm would pay at least $50 million for claims that were previously closed, and some lawyers say the cost for State Farm could run into the hundreds of millions of dollars, depending upon how many homeowners requested their files be reopened and the extent of damage to their houses. A similar deal with other insurers could lead to an estimated 100,000 other closed claims being re-examined, lawyers briefed on the talks said.

Insurance experts said State Farm's willingness to engage in settlement talks should not be interpreted as a concession that it did anything wrong. They said a final agreement would almost certainly say, in effect, that State Farm was neither acknowledging nor denying objectionable practices. Further, they said, State Farm would not want to set precedent on future payments for flood damage from hurricanes.

"They're willing to settle," said Gary S. Thompson, a Washington lawyer who represents individual and commercial policyholders, "because they know they would have to go through a long, arduous journey examining each and every claim."

That could take years, some lawyers said. In the meantime, State Farm's reputation would be further battered and, facing any jury drawn from the ranks of Mississippi's hurricane victims, State Farm could easily "lose most of the cases," Mr. Thompson said.

Jury selection began yesterday in federal court in Gulfport for the first trial against State Farm over Katrina damage. That case, which was not part of the settlement talks, was filed by Norman and Genevieve Broussard. Only the foundation slab of their home in Biloxi remained after the hurricane. State Farm refused to pay their claim, saying all the damage was caused by floodwaters.

The insurers have already paid $5.2 billion for damage to homes throughout Mississippi for Katrina and $10.3 billion for damage in New Orleans and other parts of Louisiana.

To close the deal, State Farm wants the approval of Mississippi's attorney general, Jim Hood, and the state's insurance regulator, George Dale, lawyers close to the talks said. As a condition of the deal, these lawyers said, Mr. Hood would be required to drop a criminal investigation into State Farm's handling of claims as well as a civil lawsuit against State Farm and other insurers.

In a statement late yesterday, Mr. Hood said: "I am working day and night attempting to get our coastal residents a fair shake in the insurance litigation." He added, "It would not help our negotiations to disclose any details at this time."

Lee Harrell, a deputy to the insurance commissioner, would not comment on the talks but said that the regulators consistently monitored insurance agreements to make sure that they were fair to both policyholders and the insurers.

Phil Supple, a spokesman for State Farm, acknowledged that the insurer had been in settlement talks but he said that a final agreement had not yet been reached. "At this point," he said, "we have no settlement."

He said State Farm would absolutely like to settle the cases: "We see it in the best interest of policyholders, the Gulf Coast of Mississippi and State Farm."

Richard F. Scruggs, who has been leading a team of about a dozen lawyers against State Farm, said that talks toward a settlement began early last fall and that he hoped to see a final agreement this week. "All the details are finalized," he said.

The last element, he said, was the approval of the attorney general and the insurance commissioner. "We are awaiting," he said, "a decision from the state officials who have helped craft the settlement."

In New Orleans, These Gumshoes Can Float Your Boat (WSJ)

By Daniel Machalaba

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

NEW ORLEANS -- Scott Chappuis was relieved when he returned to his New Orleans neighborhood after Hurricane Katrina and saw that his house had survived a 17-foot-high surge of flood water.

But there was one problem. A big shrimp trawler called the Chris & Shane was marooned in the yard. More than a year later, it was still there.

Nobody showed up to claim the 63-foot boat. The U.S. Coast Guard refused to haul it away because it is responsible only for vessels in navigable waterways. A contractor who had volunteered to help quit when the Chris & Shane started leaking diesel fuel. He didn't want to incur potential environmental liability.

The mess landed on the desks of John Rogers and R. Bruce Hammatt, of the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality. They became gumshoes of last resort for an estimated 1,000 to 2,000 commercial and recreational boats that are still strewn across parking lots, roads, marshes and other odd spots throughout southeastern Louisiana.

It takes a lot of detective work to reunite orphaned boats with their owners. Many phone lines were never restored after the hurricane. Some owners scattered by the storm haven't returned, while others either figured that their boats had sunk or had been sucked out to sea. Some just don't care because they were paid off by insurers. Katrina also left some boat owners too poor to afford removal costs that can run as high as $90,000 for large vessels that need cranes, trucks and other heavy equipment to haul them away.

The flotilla of abandoned boats is a reminder of the fitful recovery. The city's population is still less than half the prestorm level of about 437,000 in July 2005. Population has rebounded in some suburbs, but many areas remain wrecked. Whole neighborhoods that were flooded, such as the Lower Ninth Ward, are largely empty and uninhabited. Currently only 49% of the public schools have reopened and only 17% of city buses in New Orleans are running, according to Brookings Institution, which publishes monthly updates on the city's post-Katrina recovery.

One pontoon dock beached near the hurricane-ravaged city of Slidell sprouted a cypress tree, and residents had plans to trim it with Christmas lights, tinsel and ornaments. "We were going to make a real party out of it," says Danny Green, a retired state trooper. But after the Times-Picayune ran a newspaper story about it, local officials had the hulk hauled away by truck.

Ruptured fuel tanks are seeping diesel fuel and oil into the ground and marshes. Cars must maneuver around a thicket of fishing vessels encroaching on a state highway in eastern New Orleans. About six boats are piled up at one end of a bridge in

DOJ_NMG_0114081

Empire, La., near the mouth of the Mississippi. After Katrina, the Coast Guard quickly restored boat traffic up and down the river, but many marshes and bayous remain snarled with boats and debris.

Coast Guard officials removed about 800 boats that were deemed a threat to shipping. Then a joint state-federal disaster-management team asked the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality to take over the job, which involves dealing with frazzled boat owners and residents.

Messrs. Rogers and Hammatt barely knew each other before they teamed up in May, when Mr. Hammatt started wrangling with contractors hired to remove marooned boats. An administrator and adviser at the Department of Environmental Quality, he brought intensity to their detective work. "It's Hammatt, like damn it," said Mr. Hammatt, 52 years old, to one property owner recently.

Mr. Rogers, 61, spent weeks on the case of a pontoon-style party barge bearing a registration number that didn't pop up in a computer search. The break came when he realized that a "6" in the number actually was a storm-battered "8." The owner didn't want the boat, so it was sold for $1,251 through an online auction, with the proceeds going to the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which picks up certain boat-removal costs.

Once or twice a week, the two men sign out a vehicle from the DEQ motor pool in Baton Rouge and hit the road to hunt for clues and wrestle with the paperwork and personalities that must be navigated in every boat rescue. Lyle Stockstill, who runs his family's fuel dock and the Ugly Duck bar in Empire, was cooking oxtail soup last month when Messrs. Rogers and Hammatt pulled up with a "right to entry" form that would give a contractor permission to haul away crushed boats near his three-story house.

"It's terrible," Mr. Stockstill said later. "I have my place fixed up, but I have this junkyard in front." He said his wife would sign the form, adding that he would be happy to see the boats removed.

Messrs. Rogers and Hammatt are patient with struggling boat owners who show signs of trying to take responsibility for their beached vessels. At a stop to check on a trawler called Lucky Boat, they saw wooden blocks under the boat and a cleared section of sugar-cane field. "This is excellent," Mr. Hammatt said.

They have spent the past six months working on the Chris & Shane project next to Mr. Chappuis's house. It wasn't hard to track down the shrimp boat's owner, Jules B. Kain Sr., who had tied the craft to a dock as Katrina was approaching. Mr. Kain didn't have the money to move his boat, named for the children of its original owner. He lives in a FEMA trailer because Katrina wrecked his house in the Violet community of St. Bernard Parish.

"The last two years of trawling weren't that great," says Mr. Kain, 70. "We were just surviving."

This time, the roadblock was that Mr. Chappuis, a New Orleans Fire Department captain, refused to sign a "hold harmless" agreement waiving his right to sue over any damage or injuries that might occur during the boat's removal. Mr. Rogers, who had lined up $114,000 in federal funding to pay for getting rid of the trawler, says that for months the department cajoled Mr. Chappuis to sign the document. Finally, he threatened to simply leave the Chris & Shane in Mr. Chappuis's yard forever. The homeowner relented.

Last month, giant air bags were inflated under the boat, and a tractor pushed on the stern, plunging the Chris & Shane back into the water. A work boat towed away the freed vessel to be sliced into scrap metal.

Mr. Rogers joked that Mr. Chappuis wouldn't have the "biggest lawn ornament" anymore. "Right," Mr. Chappuis replied, then walked away. He says he'll miss the boat "like a headache or a hemorrhoid."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Considers Expansion Of Up To 20,000 Troops (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush will address the nation at 9 p.m. ET Wednesday about his new approach for the war in Iraq, the White House said. Bush is expected to announce an increase of up to 20,000 U.S. troops.

DOJ_NMG_0114082

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Monday that Bush "understands there is a lot of public anxiety" about the war. On the other hand, he said that Americans "don't want another Sept. 11" type of terrorist attack and that it is wiser to confront terrorists overseas in Iraq and other battlegrounds rather than in the United States.

Snow said he contacted television networks Monday morning to request air time for the president's speech, to be delivered at the White House. He said the administration welcomes a debate about Bush's new policy.

ON DEADLINE: Your comments | Video

"I think it's important to get congressional support," the spokesman said. Yet he would not say whether Bush will seek specific congressional approval for his new strategy.

"Rather than me jumping out and talking about resolutions and budget items and all that, I'm not going to do it," Snow said. "But there will be a debate about the particulars in the way forward, as there should be. We welcome it."

Bush's decisions, more than two months in the making, already are drawing criticism from new Democratic leaders in Congress who say it is time to begin ending the war, not to send in more U.S. forces.

The proposal also includes new programs for jobs, reconstruction and political assistance in Iraq, according to two administration officials who have been briefed on it.

The officials, who spoke on the condition they not be identified because the president has not made final decisions, said increases would come in phases that could add up to 20,000 troops over the next several months. It is unclear how long the additional troops would stay.

The plan includes up to $1 billion in economic assistance, such as job creation and reconstruction projects, the officials said. It also calls for political assistance, including help for human rights groups and political organizations, in an effort to promote peaceful reconciliation among warring Shiite and Sunni factions.

Previous reconstruction efforts have faced serious problems and controversies, including repeated power outages and the awarding of no-bid contracts to U.S. companies.

Elements of the plan emerged over the weekend in The Wall Street Journal and The New York Times.

The Times reported today that the new policy will set out a series of benchmarks that the Iraqi government will be expected to meet to try to ease sectarian tensions and stabilize the country politically and economically.

The newspaper, quoting unidentified senior administration officials, said these goals would include measures to bring more Sunnis into the political process, finalize a plan for distributing oil revenue and ease the government's policy toward former Baath Party members.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has announced plans to increase the number of local forces in Baghdad.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., appearing on CBS' Face the Nation, said Sunday that Bush would have to justify any troop hike to the new Congress. "This is new for him because up until now, the Republican Congress has given him a blank check with no oversight, no standards, no conditions," she said.

On Friday, Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., sent a letter to Bush opposing any U.S. troop increase. The letter said, "Surging forces is a strategy that you have already tried and that has already failed."

White House spokesman Alex Conant noted that Pelosi said she wants to succeed in Iraq, and "we're interested in any ideas that lead to success."

"The president looks forward to addressing the American people next week on the way forward in Iraq," Conant said.

In developing a new Iraq policy, the administration has changed the military leadership in Iraq.

Gen. David Petraeus, a supporter of U.S. force increases in Iraq, will head the multinational force there. He'll replace Gen. George Casey, who expressed skepticism over whether an increased U.S. military presence would be productive, and is being promoted to Army chief of staff.

Bush has also accepted the Pentagon's recommendation that Adm. William Fallon replace the retiring John Abizaid as head of the U.S. Central Command, which includes Iraq.

The administration is stepping up diplomatic efforts in the region. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to the Middle East soon to discuss negotiations between the Israelis and Palestinians. Bush has been skeptical, however, about direct talks with Syria and Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0114083

Bush would have support for a troop surge from at least two prominent senators, John McCain, R-Ariz., and Joe Lieberman, I-Conn. Both said a troop increase would help quell sectarian violence.

Bush To Reveal New Iraq Strategy (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

President Bush is hoping to reset the political debate tomorrow night and spur Congress to reconsider what can be accomplished in Iraq when he lays out his new war strategy, which is expected to include a temporary increase of 20,000 troops.

The president put the finishing touches on the new diplomatic and military teams yesterday that will put his plan into place, tapping the current ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, to become ambassador to the United Nations and naming Ryan C. Crocker, the ambassador to Pakistan, to replace Mr. Khalilzad in Baghdad.

That comes two months after Mr. Bush named a new secretary of defense and just days after he nominated new military leaders to oversee the conflict.

The Pentagon has drawn up options for sending about 20,000 troops, or four brigades, whose main task would be to quell the violence in Baghdad, block by block, and not let insurgents return once they are routed.

Some of the increase would come from keeping some units in Iraq longer than planned, sending other units earlier than planned and possibly diverting troops from other regions.

The White House is also creating an economic package that will be tied to certain conditions. The figure of $5 billion has been mentioned. Congress has appropriated more than $30 billion in reconstruction and redevelopment money since the war began in 2003.

White House press secretary Tony Snow would not talk about details of the president's 9 p.m. speech but said the president knows he has a job to do persuading lawmakers and the American public to support the effort.

"It's important to rebuild the sense of political unity," he said.

Many Democrats have already lined up against the strategy, saying Mr. Bush is trying to escalate U.S. involvement rather than begin withdrawing U.S. forces, as they want. But it was not clear what options are open to them.

Sen. Barack Obama yesterday said he is "investigating" whether Congress could block funding for a troop surge "without potentially reducing the resources that are available to the troops that are" in Iraq.

"It's not clear that that can be done, that you can segment off budgets for the troops that are already there from additional troop levels," said Mr. Obama, Illinois Democrat. "It creates a difficult situation for Democrats."

House Appropriations Committee Chairman David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat, said it is "very complicated" to chop a troops appropriations bill into pieces, and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said withholding funds for U.S. troops is "off the table."

Mr. Snow said the White House hopes critics take time to evaluate what Mr. Bush proposes.

"I know it's tempting to think: Boy, this is going to set off big old political firestorm, and it very well may. But on the other hand, it may actually set off a period of reflection and constructive activity," Mr. Snow said.

The president does have some supporters.

Sen. Joe Lieberman yesterday renewed his calls for Congress to support sending roughly 20,000 more troops to Iraq.

"In war, there are two exit strategies. One is called victory. The other is called defeat," said Mr. Lieberman, Connecticut independent. "America has too much on the line in Iraq to accept defeat."

He and Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, sent a letter to the president urging him to increase troop levels and calling redeployment and withdrawal "the option of losing."

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Mr. Bush's strongest Iraq war ally, said he will make it clear this week that Britain will not send more troops to Iraq, London's Daily Mail reported. It said Mr. Blair will insist that the United Kingdom will stick to its own strategy of gradually handing over to the Iraqi army.

In the run-up to the speech, Mr. Bush has revamped his diplomatic and military teams.

DOJ_NMG_0114084

Last week, Mr. Bush nominated John D. Negroponte to assume the open slot as deputy secretary of state and tapped retired Navy Adm. Mike McConnell to take Mr. Negroponte's old post as director of national intelligence.

As for the military team, Mr. Bush accepted the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld a day after the November elections, saying he wanted a "fresh perspective" on Iraq. He is also replacing Gen. John Abizaid, his top regional commander for Iraq, with his Pacific commander, Adm. William J. Fallon. In doing so, he is bypassing the man who many thought would get the job, Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, who served last year as the tactical commander in Iraq.

The top commander in Iraq, Army Gen. George Casey, is being replaced by Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who led the training of Iraqi forces earlier in the war. Gen. Casey will be nominated as Army chief of staff, as Gen. Peter Schoomaker retires.

White House Gears Up To Sell Plan For Troop Increase In Iraq (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — The White House is planning an aggressive effort to sell Congress and the American public on President Bush's new strategy for Iraq, beginning with a prime-time address to the nation on Wednesday night, followed Thursday by a presidential trip to Fort Benning, Ga., and appearances on Capitol Hill by the secretaries of state and defense.

With Democrats vowing to oppose any plan to send more troops to Iraq, and some Republicans openly skeptical, Mr. Bush and his aides are already in the thick of an intense sales pitch. It began on Monday, when the president had back-to-back meetings with Republican senators, urging them to hear him out before passing judgment on his plan.

The sessions stood in stark contrast to the bipartisan meetings Mr. Bush held with lawmakers on Friday. Senators attending those sessions said that Mr. Bush was careful not to reveal his thinking about whether he was committed to the plan to increase troops. By Monday, though, he made his intentions clear.

"It was clear that he has thought long and hard about this change in strategy," said Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, who supports the troop increase. "He emphasized that this is not just about more troops. That's just one small component of it. It's a change in economic, military and political strategy."

White House officials were still planning details of the speech on Monday. The president's aides were contemplating having Mr. Bush deliver it from the White House Map Room, a site replete with the history and imagery of World War II — imagery that Mr. Bush has invoked as he has sought to compare the campaign against terrorism to the struggle against totalitarianism and the Nazis. But the Oval Office, a more traditional setting, was also being considered.

Mr. Bush's aides are planning a highly orchestrated introduction of the plan. Before Wednesday night's speech, which is expected to last about 25 minutes, reporters will receive briefings from senior administration officials, and leading members of Congress will be notified of the president's intentions.

On Thursday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates are scheduled to testify before Congress, and both are expected to make trips to the Middle East soon to drum up support from international allies.

"All the world is really watching," the White House press secretary, Tony Snow, said Monday, "and it is important to get this right."

The president himself will go on the road on Thursday, to Fort Benning, a site chosen because its soldiers are heavily involved in operations in Iraq. A senior administration official involved in shaping the strategy said the president would follow Wednesday night's speech with less formal remarks to the troops.

"He will thank them, and explain, just like he will have the night before to the American people, some of the specifics of the new way forward," the official said.

The official said the strategy also included continuing consultation with members of Congress. "It's not just one speech. This is so complicated you couldn't do it all in one speech. So there will be an ongoing and sustained effort to educate the American people."

Despite Mr. Bush's insistence that he does not govern by polls, the White House is acutely aware that the vast majority of the American public disapproves of the job Mr. Bush is doing in Iraq. But advisers to the president believe that the public is willing to give Mr. Bush another chance — especially if he puts forth a policy that is heavy on specifics.

DOJ_NMG_0114085

The president's advisers are also mindful of polls showing that while the public wants the situation to improve in Iraq, it does not necessarily favor immediate withdrawal.

"They're going to cast it as a choice between withdrawal and surge," said one Republican strategist close to the White House. "The public is not for immediate withdrawal or even a quick withdrawal, but they're not for the status quo. I think they feel as if the public is more likely to support the president's position, which is putting a stake in the ground in Iraq and saying were going to try to win."

The hope is that Mr. Bush can win over the public, and bring Congress along. But it might be a tough sell. At the White House, Mr. Bush told skeptical senators that he came away from a recent meeting in Jordan with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq persuaded that Mr. Maliki was committed to moving toward national reconciliation.

At least two Republicans, Senators Gordon Smith of Oregon and Olympia Snowe of Maine, said they were not convinced.

"I expressed reservations," Ms. Snowe said. "I said, 'Why should we expect any different result than previously,' that I didn't believe the Maliki government had demonstrated the political will or capacity or resoluteness for reconciliation, that the reason Americans are not supporting the war is because they see Iraqis fighting among themselves rather than for themselves, and I didn't see the surge addressing the root causes of the violence."

Mr. Smith, who delivered a speech on the Senate floor before Christmas saying he was at the end of his rope on Iraq, said: "What this sets up is a classic war powers confrontation between the White House and the Congress. Clearly he has the powers to commit troops; the question is whether the Congress has the convictions to deny funding."

The senator said he, for one, does not have the appetite for that. "It would be a dishonorable thing," he said, "to budget away the bullets."

A Big Speech Is A First Step; Follow-up Key (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — When President Bush addresses the nation Wednesday about a "new way forward" in Iraq, it will be just the first of many steps he'll take to sell his plan to Congress and the public.

Presidents have long made the most of their bully pulpit to set the tone for the nation or to deliver news, whether it was Franklin Roosevelt telling a Depression-ravaged nation in 1933 that "the only thing we have to fear is fear itself" or Lyndon Johnson shocking the country in 1968 by using a speech about Vietnam to say he would not run for re-election.

Whether a presidential speech can make a difference depends on the follow-up, analysts say.

"All he can do is start a long-term process, which is going to require performance much more than promise," says George Edwards, a political science professor at Texas A&M University.

Bush addresses the nation at 9 p.m. ET Wednesday, then goes to Fort Benning in Georgia on Thursday to discuss the war in Iraq with Army troops there. Bush has been considering many options for the Iraq war, including a temporary increase in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq.

Members of Bush's Cabinet, including Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, will explain the plan to Congress during hearings that begin Thursday.

Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center at the University of Pennsylvania and co-author of a book on presidential rhetoric, Deeds Done in Words, says it is rare for presidents to turn around public opinion with a single speech. Major addresses, however, can set the stage for public support later if policy changes are working.

"He's confronting the public perception this is a failed policy," Jamieson says.

Presidential counselor Dan Bartlett declined to discuss details of Bush's speech or the marketing plans for any policy changes. He says the address will explain a new strategy and try to convince the country that failure in Iraq would undermine national security.

"The American people need a steady diet of information and context for what's happening," he says.

Bartlett played down expectations for Bush's speech. "Facts on the ground and events determine public opinion more than anything," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0114086

Bush's speech comes nearly four years after the war in Iraq began. Since then, the public has grown more skeptical that the war can be won, according to the latest USA TODAY/Gallup Poll.

Diane Heith, an associate professor of government and politics at St. John's University in New York City, says the public could reward Bush for attempting to change course in Iraq. She notes, however, that the public has become "almost used to the negativity associated with the war. I think they're going to be pretty skeptical about a change of plans."

Bush hopes words will carry weight

President Bush has delivered several memorable speeches during his six years in office, most of them dealing with the aftermath of the 9/11 terrorist attacks. Bush has billed these addresses as critical to building support for his initiatives, but the results have been mixed.

Lawmakers Get Private Surge Pitch (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush began a weeklong hard sell of his new Iraq policy Monday, meeting with groups of senators at the White House in an effort to convince them that the best way to bring U.S. troops home from Iraq is to send more, at least for a while.

Some said the president accomplished that goal; others said he did not.

"Iraq is the central front in the global war against radical Islamic terrorism. If we abandon that nation today, we risk the very same situation that gave rise to the Taliban in Afghanistan and one that created a safe harbor for terrorists like Al Qaeda to plan attacks against our people," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee who attended one of the meetings.

"I'm not for the surge," said Sen. Gordon H. Smith (R-Ore.), who attended another. "Does political process beget security or does security beget political process?

"I think he understands that he's betting his presidency, his place in history, on this coming out well."

Bush did not detail the proposal he will lay out Wednesday evening, senators said. But Smith said the president appeared to be planning to send 20,000 additional troops to Iraq, primarily to stop sectarian violence and foster a better climate for political reconciliation.

"It was clear to me that a decision was made for a surge of 20,000 additional troops," said Smith, who also serves on the Armed Services Committee. "He did not affirm that that would be the number, but he said roughly … that amount. I understood it as a hypothetical."

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who supports a troop increase and is also on the committee, said Bush "understands that giving the Iraqis the ability to stabilize their government … is not an unending commitment by the American people."

But Graham said Bush believed that setting a timeline would be a mistake.

"He'll be supportive of benchmarks, but not timetables," Graham said.

The outcome of November's election — in which public dismay over the war led to large Republican congressional losses — has put the administration under increasing pressure to withdraw U.S. forces from Iraq.

That pressure was heightened by the report of the Iraq Study Group, also known as the Baker-Hamilton commission, which called for troops' return to start by 2008.

Instead, military leaders and the White House have begun to argue for a troop increase, which they say will turn the tide against the insurgency.

Critics deride the "surge," as it is known in Washington, as an escalation that will lead to more American deaths.

In his meetings Monday, Bush made his case for the surge, arguing that it was more likely than previous plans to work because it was drafted by Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and his government.

In particular, Smith said, Maliki is to pledge a specific number of Iraqi troops, reduce factionalism in his own forces and stop shielding key Shiite militia leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0114087

The troop increase "is based on the president's belief that the political processes have been overtaken by sectarian violence, and sectarian violence needs to be quelled so political processes can be restored," Smith said. "It is his faith in Prime Minister Maliki that leads him to tack into the winds of American public opinion."

Smith is one of a number of moderate Republicans who are skeptical of the president's plan. Most Democrats oppose it.

Bush is expected to meet with more members of Congress today.

"My own sense is that what is driving the president is his belief that this is winnable — that the Iraqis are now coming to the table to keep their part of the bargain and that ultimately the American people want victory and a way forward to success," Smith said.

"He hopes to lay out a path to that success [Wednesday] night that will rewin the support of the American people. There are a lot of ifs in that."

On Thursday, Bush plans to fly to Ft. Benning, Ga., the home of Army infantry, to visit with soldiers.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said that despite the opposition of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) to an increase in troops, they and the president were not necessarily headed for collision.

He suggested that when the scope and details of the plan became known, some criticism might be toned down. He took issue with the idea that the speech represented Bush's last chance to win support for the war.

Bush understands, Snow said, that "there's a real sense of urgency within the United States for assurance" that the administration has a plan for Iraq that will boost American security, and that Iraqis will take "leading positions sooner rather than later."

Bush Works To Rally Support For Iraq 'Surge' (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

President Bush yesterday began promoting his plan to send more troops to Iraq, bringing more than 30 Republican senators to the White House as part of a major campaign to rally the American people behind another effort to stabilize the country.

Senators who met with Bush said the president made it clear that he is planning to add as many as 20,000 U.S. troops to help quell violence in Baghdad. They also said the president is arguing that his new plan has a better chance for success than past plans because of a greater willingness of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to commit Iraqi forces against all perpetrators of violence, including Shiite militias.

"It was clear to me that a decision has been made for a surge" of at least 20,000 additional troops, Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) said in a conference call with reporters. Smith said Bush believes "that the political processes have been overtaken by sectarian violence and that sectarian violence must be quelled so political processes can be restored."

Aides said Bush will formally unveil his new plans for Iraq in a nationally televised address from the White House tomorrow night; the speech looms as one of the most significant of his tenure. Even administration officials and friendly Republicans said the bar is much higher for Bush than with past speeches on Iraq, given the widespread disenchantment over the war and the deep skepticism, shared even by some Republicans, that more troops are part of the answer.

In the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll, six in 10 respondents said the war is not worth fighting, three-quarters disapproved of how Bush has handled the situation, and there was no consensus about how the United States should adjust its policies in Iraq. Only 17 percent called for an increase in U.S. forces, the "surge" believed to be a centerpiece of the new Bush plan.

Bush intends to present his revised strategy as being in support of Maliki's new plan for securing Baghdad, which the prime minister outlined on Saturday, senior U.S. officials said. The mission will include an understanding that joint U.S.-Iraqi forces will confront the Mahdi Army -- the biggest, best-armed militia and one that Maliki, a fellow Shiite, has been reluctant to face down -- as well as other illegal armed factions, both Shiite and Sunni.

DOJ_NMG_0114088

The United States hopes to avoid conducting large-scale operations that take it into Sadr City -- the capital's sprawling Shiite slum, with about 2 million people who overwhelmingly support Mahdi Army leader Moqtada al-Sadr. "Iraqis will take on this plan and lead it. We will be there to support them and be there to help them hold it," said a senior U.S. official briefed on the plan.

But in practice, U.S. forces have often ended up in the forefront of joint combat operations.

The president will also announce expanded U.S. teams, combining civilian and military personnel, to deploy immediately after neighborhoods have been cleared of insurgents or sectarian militias, a U.S. official said.

"It's the biggest speech of his six years," said Ken Duberstein, who was White House chief of staff under President Ronald Reagan. "If the American people tune him out, the next two years will be very rocky. He really needs to sell the American people that this is a strategy that can be accomplished."

Duberstein said Bush "needs to explain to the American people the lessons that he has learned, which will persuade them that he has gotten the message for a new approach to Iraq."

Glen Bolger, a Republican pollster, said the speech is "going to be a crucial component of how the American people re-look at the president for the last two years" of his term. The challenge facing the White House, he said, "is people have to view the speech and say, 'Oh, this is something different, and he's got a plan and it's got a shot at improving the situation. It's not just, quote, stay the course, unquote.' "

As they began previewing the speech, administration aides indicated that the president plans to address the skepticism head-on. They indicated that he will talk about the lessons the United States has learned from the past several years of failing to quell the insurgency, as well as explain why he has confidence that the Maliki government can deliver on promises that it has not met so far.

One senior White House official acknowledged it will seem "counterintuitive" to many Americans that Bush believes it is necessary to add troops in the short term to be able to withdraw them in the future. But the official -- like others, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the president has yet to formally disclose his plans -- said Bush has concluded more troops are needed to arrest the violence that he believes is impeding the Iraqi government's ability to achieve political reconciliation and economic improvements.

This official noted that the president will be proposing many more steps, including political benchmarks for the Iraqi government and an economic development program that will be heavily shaped by additional spending by Baghdad.

"An increase in troops is not a strategy in and of itself," this official said. "It is a tactic to make the new strategy successful."

Democrats continued to voice skepticism that much new and effective will come from the White House. "This is a historic speech the president is about to make. The president, faced with a choice, is choosing escalation," said Richard C. Holbrooke, a U.N. ambassador in the Clinton administration and a leading Democratic voice on foreign policy. "I don't understand what he thinks is going on in Iraq, but whatever it is, he doesn't care about politics or the Congress or his successor when it comes to Iraq. He wants to either win the war or, since that is an impossibility, pass it on to his successor."

Only Republican senators came to the White House yesterday, a sign perhaps of the president's desire to rebuild his base on the eve of a critical speech. Several seemed mixed in their comments about the president's course.

"He seemed very confident," said Sen. Thad Cochran (Miss.), the ranking Republican on the Appropriations Committee, who was in one group. "I'm convinced he's come up with a proposal that he thinks will work."

But he said he was struck by the degree of discord at his meeting. "I think I was the only senator who acted like he would be supportive," Cochran said. "I was surprised that no one said it but me."

Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.), who met with Bush on Friday and yesterday, said he is "convinced that this plan is substantially different than anything that has been tried in the past." He added: "I am convinced that the American people want to prevail. This gives us a chance to do that."

Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) said he "felt much better" about the plan after his 20-minute meeting with Bush, although he was reserving judgment until he saw the details. Domenici said the president's plan has been mischaracterized in recent weeks and is more complex than just a buildup of troops in Baghdad, adding that the Iraqis have agreed to spend at least $10 billion and will be in charge of the security plan.

DOJ_NMG_0114089

"The plan is not 20,000 soldiers -- I wouldn't even consider the plan if it was 20,000 American soldiers, because that's too small a number for a surge," he said. "The people coming out of these meetings saying it's the lead ingredient just didn't get it. There are a lot of other important elements."

Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) said the president was asked during her meeting what would be different about his new plan, and he replied that Maliki has had a "sea change" in attitude. But she said she came away unconvinced.

"I have deep skepticism about it -- about a surge addressing the root causes of the mistrust and hatred that sects have for each other," Snowe said. "That's what I expressed. The fact of the matter is that the American people don't support this war and the way it has evolved because they see the Iraqis fighting among themselves instead of for themselves."

Staff writers Peter Baker, Jon Cohen, Lyndsey Layton, Shailagh Murray and Robin Wright contributed to this report.

Not All Republicans Convinced Of Bush's Iraq Plan (LAT)

By Joel Havemann And Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush held a second day of meetings today with senators about his stance in Iraq, but at least one senator of his own party came away unconvinced of the wisdom of Bush's reported plan to beef up U.S. troops.

Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) said he didn't want American forces caught in the crossfire of sectarian violence that has broken out in Iraq since the United States toppled Saddam Hussein.

But Smith said he would not support a resolution to "cut off money for bullets" for the American troops ordered into combat by the commander-in-chief.

Bush had better luck today with two other senators who urged a troop build-up.

"We believe that America has too much on the line in Iraq to accept defeat," said Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, an Independent, who caucuses with the Democrats. "We also believe, based on our most recent visit there, that victory is still attainable."

"Withdrawal and redeployment is a heartbreaking signal to send to those who are fighting and dying for their freedom in Iraq," added Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), "and it is welcomed news to the extremists who want to own that country."

Bush has scheduled a nationally televised address from the White House at 6 p.m. (PST) Wednesday to disclose his Iraq plan. He is expected to announce additional troops, although such details as the size of the reinforcements apparently remain uncertain.

Smith was one of about a dozen senators invited to the White House to talk Iraq strategy with the president. He was the only one who spoke with reporters waiting outside the White House.

At a similar session last Friday, Bush heard some hardliners, including Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), urge him to make sure the "surge" in American troops strength contained enough muscle to be effective.

McCain predicted that most of the Senate's 49 Republicans, who are now outnumbered by the 51 Democrats, would ultimately fall in line behind Bush.

Smith, at least for now, did not.

"We went there to knock off a dictator, a tyrant," he said. "We've done that." Now it's up to Iraq's political leaders to put together the kind of country they want.

"I think he's betting his presidency — his place in history — on how this comes out," he said.

Smith said it would take more than the additional 20,000 U.S. troops that are commonly discussed — on top of the roughly 140,000 now in Iraq — to defeat insurgents and quell sectarian violence between Sunnis and Shiites. American forces would need at least a decade to accomplish these goals, he said.

Most Say No To Iraq Buildup (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush will outline his "new way forward" in Iraq on Wednesday to a nation that overwhelmingly opposes sending more U.S. troops and is increasingly skeptical that the war can be won.

DOJ_NMG_0114090

A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Friday through Sunday shows a daunting sales job ahead for the White House, which is considering a plan to deploy up to 20,000 additional U.S. troops to Iraq.

POLL RESULTS: Bush approval | Feelings on Iraq

Those surveyed oppose the idea of increased troop levels by 61%-36%. Approval of the job Bush is doing in Iraq has sunk to 26%, a record low.

"He certainly has the wind in his face," says Michael Franc, a former congressional aide now at the conservative Heritage Foundation. "But that's not to say if he were to pursue a change in policy that proved to be successful, that those numbers wouldn't flip."

Views of the war will be difficult to change with rhetoric alone, says Steven Kull, director of the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland. And if the public expresses strong opposition to Bush's plan, he says, Congress "may feel emboldened to exert what control they have to stop or at least make it more difficult for the president to move forward."

The survey of 1,004 adults, which has a margin of error of +/—3 percentage points, shows Americans pessimistic about the war and inclined to hold Bush responsible.

Among key findings:

•Nearly half of those surveyed say the United States can't achieve its goals in Iraq regardless of how many troops it sends. One in four say U.S. goals can be achieved only with an increase in troop numbers.

•Eight in 10 say the war has gone worse than the Bush administration expected. Of those people, 53% say Bush deserves "a great deal" of blame; 41% place a great deal of blame on Iraqi political leaders.

•By 72%-25%, Americans say Bush doesn't have a clear plan for handling the situation in Iraq. Congressional Democrats fare only a little better: 66%-25%.

Even so, Democrats take control of Congress amid a wave of good feeling. By 2-to-1, Americans say they want congressional Democrats, not Bush, to have more influence over the direction of the nation.

The president's overall job approval rating is 37%, up 2 percentage points from mid-December.

White House spokesman Tony Snow parried with reporters Monday over congressional and public opposition to the idea of sending more troops.

"I think the public opinion and public support is a very important part of this, and it is not static," he said. "You know, this is going to be fairly complex, and it's going to take people a little bit of time to think through, and we will spend a lot of time talking about it because it's important to do so."

While Bush has often said his war strategy won't be based on polls, three of four Americans say the government's decisions on Iraq ought to be influenced at least a moderate amount by what the public wants.

Views on increased troop levels differ sharply by party. Even among Republicans, though, 30% oppose the idea; 67% support it. Independents are against it by nearly 2-to-1. Democrats oppose it, 85%-12%.

And there is a yawning gender gap: 69% of women oppose an increase, compared with 52% of men.

Senator: Bush Plans Iraq Troop Surge (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, January 9, 2007

President Bush will call for sending more American troops to Iraq to calm two troubled areas — Baghdad, where sectarian violence flares daily, and the western Anbar Province, a base of the Sunni insurgency, a Republican senator said Monday. Another GOP lawmaker put the number of additional troops at 20,000.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas, one of about 30 lawmakers who discussed Iraq with Bush at the White House on Monday, said the president offered no specifics on how many extra U.S. troops would be involved. The White House remained mum on the details of Bush's revamped strategy for the nearly four-year-old war, saying the president would announce them during a speech to the nation at 9 p.m. EST Wednesday.

"There will be surge in those two (areas), but it wasn't clear how much," Hutchison said. White House officials did not dispute her remarks.

DOJ_NMG_0114091

Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore., said Bush told the senators that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki presented him with the plan for a U.S. troop increase several weeks ago when they met in Jordan. Bush indicated to the lawmakers he was willing to send more troops because the Iraqis pledged to meet certain criteria, which he did not outline.

"I wish I had the faith in Maliki that Bush did," Smith said of the prime minister, who has failed in the past to meet agreed-upon goals.

Smith said the president only hypothetically discussed increasing troop numbers by specific amounts, "but it was clear to me a decision has been made for 20,000 additional troops."

About 140,000 troops are in Iraq now.

Military officials have said that Bush is considering sending two to five more brigades — between about 8,000 and 20,000 troops — to fight alongside promised additions of Iraqi security forces. Some military officials familiar with the discussions say the president could initially dispatch 8,000 to 10,000 new troops to Baghdad, and possibly to Anbar Province, and leave himself the option of sending more later.

The war has claimed the lives of more than 3,000 members of the U.S. military and was a major factor in the Republican Party losing control of Congress in the November election. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., told the president last week that "we do not believe that adding more U.S. combat troops contributes to success."

Some leading Republicans have echoed those concerns, as have top military officials who worry that sending more troops would overly strain the armed forces without assurances of success.

A central aim of the long-awaited address is to explain why success in Iraq matters to the average person. The White House knows the public is weary of war and has seen several previous campaigns by Bush to show changes in policy and win back support.

An intense campaign for the plan's rollout will unfold the day after the speech.

Bush will hold a White House ceremony to give the Medal of Honor posthumously to Marine Cpl. Jason Dunham of Scio, N.Y., who was killed in 2004. Afterward, the president will travel to Fort Benning, Ga., to talk with soldiers. Bush plans a series of other appearances in the coming days.

Smith said the president told lawmakers that he wants to "re-win the support of the American people."

The changed political reality in Washington will deny the White House complete message control.

The day after Bush's speech, Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice are due on Capitol Hill for tough questioning on the president's policies at hearings convened by the newly-in-charge Democrats.

The White House, meanwhile, pushed back against the widespread criticism of a troop increase.

Presidential spokesman Tony Snow noted that some military officials have said, if done right, it could help bring the day closer when Iraq would be stable enough for the U.S. military presence to end. Snow also asserted that Bush's plan will include political, diplomatic and economic components that will answer many critics' concerns.

"I think what you have to do is to take a look at the whole package and how it fits together," Snow said. "What will happen is that, when the president's plan becomes known in detail, then people will be able to talk sensibly."

In addition to the troop increase, Bush is likely to call for the Shiite-led Iraqi government to take certain steps, such as reining in Shiite militias that have terrorized the Sunni minority, particularly in Baghdad. Bush also wants the Iraqi leadership to make the political process more attractive to Sunnis by enacting a plan to distribute oil revenues and easing the government's policies toward members of former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's Baath Party.

The military escalation is expected to be accompanied by short- and long-term jobs programs. Also on Bush's agenda is a renewed effort to jump-start Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

Bush will talk in broad terms about the cost of such efforts, with more specific budget numbers to be fleshed out later, Snow said.

Since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Congress has approved about $500 billion for Iraq, Afghanistan and other terrorism-fighting efforts. The White House is working on its largest-ever appeal for more war funds — a record $100 billion, at least. It will be submitted along with Bush's Feb. 5 budget.

DOJ_NMG_0114092

Many of the approaches Bush is expected to embrace are not new. A year ago, for example, he touted efforts to remake U.S. reconstruction programs to focus on smaller goals that make more of an immediate difference in everyday Iraqis' lives.

But the Bush administration hopes that by doing such things differently — alongside an Iraqi government that, while still fragile, has matured — they will meet with greater success this time.

Snow said the White House will not seek specific congressional approval for Bush's new strategy.

While Democratic leaders have indicated that they are not considering cutting off funding for troops already in Iraq, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., said it is "under discussion" whether to prohibit any money from being spent on a troop buildup.

Bush's Task: Thrusting New Strategy On 'a Sovereign Nation' (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — It's a refrain that President Bush and his top deputies have uttered many times over:

"Iraq is a sovereign nation, and we stay because they have asked us to be there," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in October.

"Iraq is a sovereign nation which is conducting its own foreign policy," President Bush said in November.

"It's a sovereign nation; it's their system, they make those decisions," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the American command's chief spokesman in Iraq, said last week.

Now, as President Bush prepares to unveil his new strategy for Iraq on Wednesday night, the question is this: Can American officials compel the Iraqis to follow the new American plan?

"Let me put it this way: at the end of the day, we're going to have to do some forcing," said Kenneth M. Pollack, an expert on Iraq at the Saban Center for Middle East Policy at the Brookings Institution.

"We have to make it impossible," he said, for Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki "not to do the right thing; for him to say, 'Look, we have no choice, the Americans are forcing us.' "

But Mr. Pollack and other foreign policy experts said that may require American ultimatums that, thus far, the Bush administration has been unwilling to issue.

Taking American officials at their word, Iraq has embraced its sovereignty. Mr. Maliki exercised it in October when he contradicted American officials who said the Iraqi government had agreed to a timetable for security measures.

He exercised it again in November when he ordered United States forces to abandon checkpoints and roadblocks they had set up in Baghdad to look for a missing American soldier. He did it one more time in the last days of 2006, when he ignored American requests that Saddam Hussein's execution be delayed until legal issues were cleared up.

The tension between American will and Iraqi action — or inaction — has been growing ever since the United States transferred sovereignty back to Iraq in 2004.

That has left the United States facing a paradox. An assertive Iraqi government, responsible for security and for running the country, is needed if American troops are ever going to be able to hand over control to Iraqi soldiers and leave. But an assertive Iraqi government may not always do what it is told, which could result in an American script that the Iraqis refuse to follow.

Part of the problem is uncertainty over whether American and Iraqi leaders even have the same objectives. The Bush administration favors reconciliation, in the form of an Iraqi government representative of the country's major ethnic and religious groups: Shiites, Sunni Arabs and Kurds.

But the heavy-handed approach taken by Mr. Maliki's Shiite-dominated government toward Mr. Hussein's execution has raised questions about its commitment to reconciliation, some experts say.

Brian Katulis, director of democracy and public diplomacy with the Center for American Progress, a research and advocacy group, said he could not reconcile Mr. Maliki's approach, which caused outrage among Iraq's Sunnis, "with his stated expression in favor of national unity."

Mr. Bush's new Iraq strategy also calls on Mr. Maliki to complement h an expected American troop increase with an increase in Iraqi troops. But already, administration officials acknowledge that doubts remain about whether the promised Iraqi force, to be made up of Kurdish militia units from northern Iraq, will actually show up in Baghdad committed to quelling sectarian fighting.

DOJ_NMG_0114093

The United States has requested more Iraqi troops in the past and then been disappointed. Last summer, American military commanders asked for six Iraqi battalions, as part of an effort aimed at quelling violence in Baghdad.

But that effort foundered when the United States and Iraqi authorities failed to marshal sufficient forces to hold neighborhoods after they were cleared of insurgents and militias.

"I do think it's a very serious problem in Iraq because so much of what we need done depends on the Iraqis," said Daniel P. Serwer, the former diplomat who served as executive director of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

To be sure, the United States is not without significant leverage — 140,000 American troops — to prod Mr. Maliki's and Iraqi leaders to dance to the American tune.

Zalmay Khalilzad, the outgoing American ambassador to Iraq, has often sought to warn Iraq's leaders that American support is not unlimited. But that effort has not had much resonance, Iraq experts say, in part because Mr. Bush has repeatedly assured the Iraqi leadership that the United States will not desert Iraq.

"We're totally going to have to start being a little more arbitrary," said Mr. Pollack of the Brookings Institution. "We hand them back sovereignty and now we continue to live by that charade."

He said that with the exception of the radical anti-American cleric Moktada al-Sadr, most of the Shiite militia leaders do not want to see the United States pull out of Iraq, and that the United States should try to use that sentiment as a lever to push its agenda.

Certainly, the Bush administration could have forced the issue of Mr. Hussein's execution, to delay it; he was, after all, in American custody, and it was an American unit that turned him over to Iraqi officials in the early hours of Dec. 30.

"My guess is if we really wanted to delay the execution of Saddam, we could have done it," said Mr. Serwer, who is also a vice president at the United States Institute of Peace. But, Mr. Serwer said, "you can't do that every day," or American officials would undercut their own protestations that Iraq is sovereign.

Bush Policy Means Second Tours In Iraq, Military Says (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

Washington — Top U.S. military officials, expecting President Bush to order an increase in the size of the force in Iraq, have concluded that such a buildup would require them to reverse Pentagon policy and send the Army's National Guard and reserve units on lengthy second tours in Iraq, defense officials said Monday.

Under Pentagon policy, guard and reserve units have been limited to 24 months of mobilization for the Iraq war. Under that rule, most reserve units already sent to Iraq are ineligible to return.

But the Joint Chiefs of Staff have concluded that a significant buildup would require the Pentagon to overturn the policy and send Guard and reserve units for additional year-long tours.

Such an order likely would be controversial among state governors, who share authority over the Guard, and could heighten concerns in Congress over the war and Bush's plans for a troop increase.

In addition, National Guard leaders also are skeptical of calls for additional combat tours, which they fear could hurt recruiting and retention.

"If you have to sustain a surge long term, you have to use the Guard and reserve," said a defense official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the president has not unveiled his strategy shift.

Bush, set to announce his new policy Wednesday, met Monday with about a dozen Republican senators to discuss the plan. After the meeting, Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore., said Bush appeared to be planning a surge of 20,000 troops.

Any boost in combat forces would require some increase in reserve support units, such as engineering or intelligence teams. Because of training requirements, National Guard infantry forces are unlikely to be part of the initial surge. However, they would be needed later in the year to sustain a higher level of forces.

DOJ_NMG_0114094

Defense officials say it would be difficult to build up an extra 20,000 soldiers and Marines quickly. Although there is a reserve brigade in Kuwait, building up to the full expansion might take until late March or April, an Army official said.

The increase is likely to rely heavily on speeding up the deployments of units that had been scheduled to ship to Iraq in the summer, while extending the tours of Marine Corps and Army units already in Iraq that had been due to return home in the late spring and summer.

It is unclear which National Guard units would be tapped to go, although officials said it is likely that the first Guard units sent into Iraq would be considered for the first return tours.

In early 2005, the National Guard and reserves made up nearly half the fighting force In Iraq. Today, of the 15 combat brigades in Iraq, one is from the National Guard, although there are other smaller reserve units also deployed there.

Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, a member of the Joint Chiefs, has complained publicly that the policy against involuntary second tours has forced the National Guard to cobble together units from dozens of states, rather than sending whole battalions or brigades that have worked and trained together.

"Current policies restrict our ability to remobilize reserve component units, and, in my view, the current policies are more restrictive than need be under the law and hamper our ability to remobilize the best-trained, best-led and best-equipped units," Schoomaker said in December.

In the internal debates over whether the military should send extra troops into Iraq, the service chiefs have been persuaded that sustaining an increase would require sending National Guard combat brigades for return tours as part of what the military is calling "assured access" to the reserves.

"If you increase (the force in Iraq), part of that requirement will require assured access to the guard," said a second Army official. "If you look at the brigades that are available you are going to have to require the assured access."

Some civilians inside the Department of Defense remain deeply skeptical of a change in policy -- in particular, David Chu, the undersecretary for personnel and readiness, a defense official said.

Chu and other officials have argued that the military should try to find other ways to fill the need for reservists -- by tapping Navy and Air Force units, for example -- rather than sending Guard and reserve units for second tours.

Pentagon officials said leaders of the National Guard remain skeptical of calling up their combat brigades for a second tour. Before a surge was considered, no National Guard brigade combat team was scheduled to deploy to Iraq until 2009, to give the force time to replace personnel and equipment.

National Guard officials have argued that their units can sustain one-year deployments every six years. But recruiting and retention could suffer if the policy is changed and Guard units are remobilized too quickly, a Pentagon official said.

"They can sustain 1 in 6. Anything other than that becomes problematic," said a Pentagon official opposed to sending the Guard as part of a surge. "If there is a real and imminent danger, the National Guard people will go. They are willing to go, but they have to believe in what they are doing."

Nearly 206,000 Army National Guard soldiers have been deployed to Iraq or Afghanistan. Under current policy, those soldiers would be sent for a second tour only if they specifically volunteered. According to the Pentagon, more than 23,500 Army Guard soldiers have been on more than one deployment.

"Depending on how they execute the formula, it could leave everyone who has deployed eligible (to return) since our deployments are typically 18 months," said a National Guard officer.

National Guard leaders, the Pentagon official said, are worried that employers would be less likely to support Guard participation by their employees if units are sent to Iraq more often.

"We have the soldier, we have the employer and we have the family," the official said. "All of these need to support the war effort and if they don't, we have problems."

Times staff writers Maura Reynolds in Washington and Rone Tempest in California contributed to this report.

Third Round In Iraq To Test US Troops (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114095

HINESVILLE, GA.

When he returned from Baghdad to Hinesville, Ga., last February, Army Pvt. Eric Mapes had an immediate goal: to get back to Iraq as fast as he could.

The lanky Chicagoan found in Iraq the ultimate adventure - part gritty war, part dusty romance of counterterrorism patrols that hunted insurgents across Baghdad. By contrast, he sees Hinesville, the military town outside the gates of Fort Stewart, as offering little but a Wal-Mart, seedy apartment buildings, and the detritus of a broken courtship.

"For a lot of these guys, they can't have steady girlfriends, they can't settle down, so there's nothing left for them in the US," says Private Mapes. "A lot of them - including me for a time - would rather be in Iraq."

As Mapes's Third Infantry Division redeploys this month - the first Army unit to pull three tours in Iraq - the war's wear on soldiers poses a challenge for the Pentagon and, in all probability, President Bush. The president's purported plan to boost US troop levels in Iraq, set to be unveiled this week, would require longer stays in Iraq and shorter rotations at home, raising concerns among experts and some Army brass that the new demands will push America's foot soldiers past the limits of physical and mental endurance.

"War is coming to be a constant. These [soldiers] are expatriates spending more time there than they are back here, and they're facing this experience without people back here really understanding very well what that means," says Tom Palaima, a classics professor at the University of Texas-Austin who specializes in the experience of war through history. In the thick of the action

The soldiers of the Third Infantry Division have continuously found the thick of the action. In the 19-day charge into Iraq, they stormed Baghdad. In the division's second tour, which lasted 14 months, it tried to keep the peace in the run-up to elections in December 2005. Now the Third is headed into the mouth of the dragon again: Anbar Province, one of the most deadly corners of Iraq for US troops.

The division's troubleshooting duties have taken their toll: more than 300 deaths, or about 10 percent of total US troop losses, since the war began in March 2003.

Of the Army's 650,000 soldiers who have been to Iraq so far, about 170,000 have served more than one tour, according to the Army. The incidence of post-battle stress goes up by over 50 percent for the second tour, Army surveys show. Moreover, battlefield dangers are ubiquitous: 76 percent of soldiers know someone who has been killed or seriously injured, and 55 percent have experienced a nearby explosion of an improvised bomb.

Outgoing Army Chief of Staff Peter Schoomaker told Congress on Dec. 15 that the existing deployment policy is untenable in the long term unless the Army can add a massive number of soldiers or get access to more reservists to relieve active-duty troops.

"These units continue to hit the mark when it comes to their effectiveness, their cohesion, the willingness of their leaders to stay the course," says retired Army Col. Andrew Bacevich, an international relations professor at Boston University and the author of "The New American Militarism."

"Yet I would take seriously the expressed concerns by [Schoomaker] that a continuation of this tempo will break the Army," adds Mr. Bacevich. "He's sending up a flare that says, 'This is serious,' and his concern is very serious." Watching for stress signs

The core of the concern is the physical and mental health of the ranks, says retired Army Col. Bob Killebrew, a military analyst. He classifies soldiers into three types - those who love war, those who don't like fighting but enjoy the rest of military experience, and those who treat it as a serious profession with a duty to both country and the Army as an institution.

It's that third group, made up mostly of noncommissioned officers (NCOs), that is the most crucial to watch, says Mr. Killebrew.

"If the sergeants start leaving, then it's like the canary in the coal mine," he says. "But the NCO ranks are holding very, very firm and getting better all the time, though they're probably overtaxed."

Pvt. Jordan Brasseur, a 19-year-old from the cold reaches of Newport, Vt., leaves Tuesday for his first trip to Iraq. In an interview before going, he said the enthusiasm of the officers in his Third Division unit has rubbed off.

"All the guys have been telling me what a great time it is," said the tank mechanic. "I feel like the training has been really excellent and that I'm ready to go."

DOJ_NMG_0114096

That bravado is evident in Hinesville. Around base, when they're not practicing on the Red Cloud Alpha tank range, soldiers drive beefy new trucks and souped-up Asian cars, many purchased using combat bonuses. Even the bumper stickers have attitude: "US 2, Iraq 0," one reads. Another one, on a truck plastered with Army slogans, reads: "2 MUCH 4 U." Spirits droop as public support sags

Yet all is not well in Hinesville, says Mapes, the private from Chicago. Behind the busy preparation, he describes a simmering despair, with morale dipping as soldiers see an ambivalent US public. There's also the old training equipment - which a soldier in the field takes as a sure sign of faltering public support. Mapes says the prevalence of billboards that warn of the dangers of drunken driving or of riding motorcycles too fast is the Army's acknowledgment that some problems exist.

A Military Times survey of soldiers, released Dec. 30, found that almost four years of war has hardly dented Army morale - but that fewer soldiers support Mr. Bush's course in Iraq and that a growing number believe the US public is no longer behind the military.

One difficulty for the Army is that some veterans appear to have trouble adjusting to public attitudes outside their base towns, say war experts. Part of that can be attributed to the challenge, described by soldiers throughout history, of describing their wartime experiences to civilians. In the field, battlefield realities quickly trump ideology - but the former are difficult for nonveterans to understand, says poet Charles Patterson, a Vietnam vet and author of "The Petrified Heart."

"You aren't fighting for any kind of ideology," says Mr. Patterson. "You're fighting solely to keep everybody alive. All this [stuff] about whether it's right or wrong [that] we're there doesn't matter at all" to the wartime soldier. A disquieting desire for war

In that way, overzealousness to return to the front can be a warning sign. It reminds Mr. Palaima, the classics professor, of an account written by Xenophon, a writer-soldier of ancient Greece, who described one comrade as looking happy "[only] when there was the prospect of fighting, basically exhibiting all the symptoms of post-traumatic stress," says Palaima.

Xenophon might also have been describing Mapes. After two combat tours, he begged the Army to return him to Iraq - an insistence his superiors found disquieting.

After counterterrorism patrols that netted him 10 medals, dozens of firefights, and at least three close calls with mortars and snipers, Mapes says he has received counseling for post-traumatic stress and has decided to leave the Army at the end of his contract. He will not be going for a third time to Iraq, and plans to return to Chicago to work for his dad.

He says he feels disillusioned with the war, betrayed by Bush and the military leadership, and resentful of the physical and emotional effect the fighting has had on him, including sleepless nights and a "jumpy" demeanor.

"I consider myself a realist, and I did learn something from the experience," Mapes says. "But I've come to realize I need a new chapter in my life."

The Bravest Front Of All (WP)

By Tamara Jones

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

On the day that he left, the alarm clock went off just after 4, in that shadow hour between darkness and dawn. L'Angel Hardgrove slipped out of bed while her husband was showering to brew their favorite coffee, and would remember the cozy aroma of hazelnuts filling up the hotel room. She put on a pink sweater and matching eye shadow, and Mike buttoned his uniform.

They made their way across the parking lot to Shoney's, where the tables were full of men in fatigues. The Fredericksburg National Guard Armory was just down the road, and this past Sunday was the morning the 116th Brigade Special Troops Battalion was leaving. Mike was going to Iraq.

He was wide awake already, full of nervous energy. L'Angel watched Mike pick at some fruit, but she couldn't eat at all. They'd been married for 2 1/2 years, but she would say it was only now that she realized he belonged more to his country than to her.

At the armory, they sat on folding chairs in an auditorium full of families in huddled farewell. She nuzzled his shoulder and he breathed in the shampoo scent of her silky brown hair.

On the day that he left, she promised him that she wouldn't cry.

DOJ_NMG_0114097

Mike is 25, a sergeant with intense, dark eyes and a stripe of thick black hair across the top of his shaved head. In civilian life, he was training to become the manager of a GNC vitamin store, but his voice fills with a passion L'Angel can't ignore when he says he always wanted to be a soldier. His uncle was a Marine, and his grandfather was on the USS Missouri during World War II. Mike dabbled in college for a while but joined the Guard and dreamed of becoming an officer. A high school friend introduced him to L'Angel, and they were engaged when Mike got orders for Afghanistan. He deployed a month after the wedding and was gone for a year.

L'Angel is 24, working as a babysitter and tutor in their Fauquier County home and thinking she might go back to college this fall. She thought they were both looking for their way in the world, and didn't fully grasp that he had found his until he announced that he would join the Army full time after this 18-month tour. L'Angel is still surprised to find herself a military wife. They grew up in this area, and she figured they would save their money, buy a house and raise a family here.

They hoped L'Angel would get pregnant before Mike left, but it didn't work out that way. So the spare room in their Strasburg, Va., apartment won't be a nursery, after all, while Mike is away. L'Angel might put a sewing machine in there instead. A hobby like that might be good to fill the hours alone.

On the day that he left, Mike reminded L'Angel to send him SpongeBob fruit gummies. And Swedish fish, but remember, only the red ones.

The commander called the Alpha Company to formation, and Mike lined up with the other men and shouted "Sir, yes, sir!," looking straight ahead now, not at L'Angel. A soldier in the front row had tears streaming down his ruddy face.

A giant vinyl backdrop of white stars against a field of blue decorated the stage where officers and local dignitaries waited importantly to wish the soldiers Godspeed. Vending machines hummed against the wall, and a Christmas tree still twinkled beneath the basketball scoreboard.

One by one, the speakers mentioned sacrifice and courage and pride and patriotism, and no one said the word "war."

Mike has his ex-history-major's explanation for joining Operation Iraqi Freedom, and he has the one he would remember giving his 4-year-old nephew when the little boy called him as he readied for deployment.

Where you at, Uncle Mike?

I'm with the Army guys.

Why?

We have to go fight the bad guys.

Why?

So the bad guys don't come here and hurt you.

Mike and L'Angel spent these last weeks together savoring the everyday rituals, knowing this time around that it was the ordinary moments they would miss most, like tuna fish sandwiches for dinner and watching TV together on the couch.

"Give them hell, Alpha Company!" a speaker shouted, and the men whooped back while their families applauded.

"You are the face of America! God bless you, and God bless America!"

Then the commander ordered his men to move out. The chartered buses were waiting out front.

L'Angel staked out a spot on the damp grass, and a stranger handed her a small souvenir flag. Behind her, two little girls jumped up and down in their ruby-glittered "Wizard of Oz" shoes, shouting "Bye, Daddy! Bye, Daddy!" while their mother stood silently weeping. A bulldog of an old man in an American Legion uniform held a stiff salute, waiting for the last bus to pull away.

Mike lumbered up, loaded down with his duffel, rucksack, laptop and a box lunch for the ride to Fort Dix, N.J., where Alpha Company would train briefly before shipping out to Iraq.

"Are you . . . ?" L'Angel started to ask.

"I'm going to drop my stuff," Mike answered, heading for the first bus in line. "I can't hold you with all this."

He came back and opened his arms.

"All right," he said softly.

They held each other and kissed, swaying gently back and forth, a slow dance to the rumble of bus engines. He kissed her neck, her lips, the top of her head. "Do you want me to cry?" she teased. They had talked about this already. She knew it would just make it harder for him. Joking was the only way she could hold it together now. "I can cry if you want me to."

DOJ_NMG_0114098

No, no, please don't cry.

Mike's best friend came up to give L'Angel a friendly nudge to the shoulder. "Peace out," he said, heading toward the bus. "Take care of him!" she called back.

Mike hugged her hard, and she promised to give the cats a kiss from him, and he said he would call tonight after they reached the base, and the big numbers on his soldier's wristwatch read 9:18 when he turned and walked away.

He held a piece of paper to the grimy bus window.

I {heart} you.

She blew him a kiss.

She cried on the drive home.

She stopped at the grocery store and found herself reaching for a package of razors before remembering he wasn't there to need them. She spent the afternoon dusting and vacuuming, because cleaning distracts her. She made herself some chicken noodle soup, and Mike called to say good night and tell her how proud he was of her, how strong she was, on the day that he left.

Working Syria, Iran Into Talks On Iraq (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — Although President Bush has rejected proposals for direct talks with Syria and Iran over the future of Iraq, officials in his administration are working to find a way to include those countries in negotiations in a way that might be acceptable to Bush.

The president and top aides have insisted they will not talk to Iran until it suspends its nuclear program, and they have shunned Syria over its meddling in Lebanon. However, the White House has come under growing domestic and international pressure to negotiate with the two countries as it revamps its troubled strategy in Iraq.

Bush plans to address the nation within days on a new U.S. war strategy, which is expected to involve additional troops and stepped-up pressure on the government in Baghdad to devise political compromises to share power and oil revenue.

Last month, the Iraq Study Group, a U.S. commission whose report has topped best-seller lists, urged the administration to hold talks with Iran and Syria as a necessary step toward addressing the violence in Iraq and potential instability throughout the Middle East.

The White House brushed off the panel's recommendation that the diplomatic efforts begin before the end of 2006. But administration officials said a new multinational effort not yet underway could involve Iran and Syria.

One U.S. official familiar with administration talks said there was substantial support for "revitalizing" the effort to involve influential neighbors in seeking solutions on Iraq.

"This is something that Iran and Syria could be part of, if they wanted, but that would not be seen as us reaching out specifically to them," said the official, who declined to be identified because of the sensitivity of the talks.

The official said the effort might entail expanding a United Nations-led effort to help Iraq's economy "into the political realm" — allowing regional neighbors and world powers to use their influence to calm sectarian violence.

By including political issues, the new effort would be broader than either the U.N.-led effort, called the International Compact for Iraq, or a U.S.-led collaboration involving the United States, six Persian Gulf Arab states, Jordan and Egypt.

Those familiar with the White House discussions said they weren't certain whether any such diplomatic initiative would be announced as part of the shift in Iraq strategy that Bush is expected to lay out in his upcoming speech. One official speculated that any announcement would come later in the year.

It is unclear whether Bush approves of the efforts to find a way to involve Iran and Syria. He and top officials have opposed direct talks with either country, saying Iran is using its civilian nuclear program to develop atomic weapons and Syria is working to destabilize Lebanon.

But top aides have said those concerns don't exclude the possibility of group collaborations that could put U.S. officials in close contact with Syrians and Iranians on issues of mutual interest.

DOJ_NMG_0114099

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, for example, noted in a recent interview that U.S. officials met with representatives of Syria, Iran and more than 30 other countries last fall to discuss the International Compact for Iraq, a 3-month-old effort.

"We need an international approach to Iraq…. It's been our policy for some time," Rice said then.

Administration officials said such group talks differed from one-on-one negotiations.

"This is not at all equivalent to having direct bilateral talks," said a State Department official, who also declined to be identified. "But we have no objection to being in the same room with all of Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria. We want Iraq to have good relations with all of its neighbors."

Former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell and other U.S. officials worked side by side with Iranians and Syrians in an international conference convened by the Iraqi government in November 2004 in Sharm el Sheik, Egypt. The gathering, aimed at building more international support for Iraq's U.S.-appointed government, was supported by the Bush administration.

The Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), said a new effort could help push Iraq toward political reconciliation.

"Iraq's leaders may not be able to come together unless they receive the necessary signals and support from abroad," the panel said in its report. "This support will not materialize of its own accord, and must be encouraged by the United States."

Syrian officials indicated a willingness to meet with U.S. counterparts after the release of the report, but Iran's government rebuffed a recent U.S. offer for a meeting involving Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq.

Although the administration has rejected the Iraq Study Group's recommendation for "extensive and substantive" talks with Syria and Iran, some proponents point out that the collaboration now under consideration could lead to a quiet broadening of the conversations.

James Dobbins, a former administration envoy and advisor to the Baker-Hamilton commission, predicted the administration would take part in a new regional collaboration on Iraq involving Iran and Syria.

"That's probably how the administration will square the circle of needing to move forward without actually appearing to be inconsistent" with demands that Iran and Syria cease their objectionable conduct, he said.

But Dobbins questioned whether such meetings would be fruitful without one-on-one conversations on broader differences.

"You've had multilateral meetings before, but they haven't amounted to much," said Dobbins, director of the Rand Corp.'s International Security and Defense Policy program. "The question is whether the administration takes advantage of this to engage in the kind of bilateral exchanges that would make the gatherings productive."

Other experts doubt the administration would talk to Tehran and Damascus.

"Bush is committed to the idea that these guys just aren't going to help us," said Steven A. Cook, a Middle East analyst at the Council on Foreign Relations.

*

paul.richter@latimes.com

Crafting An Iraq Plan (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON -- When President Bush addresses the nation tomorrow night, the strategies he offers for Iraq will represent months of work by J.D. Crouch, an academic turned deputy national security adviser.

Mr. Crouch, who once led graduate students on hikes, now aims to chart a new path to stabilize Iraq. He will see his belief in American military power reflected in the president's expected call to send tens of thousands of additional U.S. combat personnel to Iraq. The 48-year-old volunteer sheriff has been an advocate of the so-called surge of new troops to Iraq, administration officials said. In addition to the call for new troops, aides said tomorrow Mr. Bush also will seek a U.S.-funded effort to spur job creation and economic growth in Iraq.

The president and senior officials like Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice are the administration's public face when it comes to foreign policy. But as in other policy arenas, the crafting of specific proposals falls to mid-level aides like Mr. Crouch. Although few in Washington know his name, Mr. Crouch has become one of the most influential figures in the administration when it comes to Iraq, the signature issue of Mr. Bush's presidency.

DOJ_NMG_0114100

"He has what is definitely an inside job," said National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, Mr. Crouch's boss. "But if you care about the nuts-and-bolts of policy making -- and he does -- it's an important position to hold."

Mr. Crouch, who declined to comment for this article, received a doctorate in international relations from University of Southern California.

He came to Washington to work as an officer in the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency during the Reagan administration. When George H.W. Bush became president, Mr. Crouch moved to the Pentagon, where he was deputy to Mr. Hadley, then an assistant secretary of defense. By the early 1990s, Mr. Crouch was ready for a change. When his mentor at USC, William Van Cleave, offered him a tenure-track position at Southwest Missouri State University, Mr. Crouch accepted. Mr. Crouch was asked to return to Washington after George W. Bush took office in 2001. But his nomination as Mr. Bush's assistant secretary of defense for international security policy set off fireworks on Capitol Hill, where Democrats derided Mr. Crouch as a conservative ideologue during his confirmation hearing.

The Democrats expressed alarm over an academic article he wrote in 1995 that called for dispatching more troops to South Korea, redeploying American tactical nuclear weapons to the country, and bombing North Korea if Pyongyang refused to abandon its nuclear program. Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the top Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, described Mr. Crouch's North Korea proposals as "reckless."

Mr. Van Cleave said the portrait painted by Democrats at the hearing was unfair. "J.D. has principles about national security: He recognizes that arms-control agreements haven't always worked well, that American strength depends on our military power, and that there are times when we need to use the military," Mr. Van Cleave said. "But those aren't 'radical' positions. The only thing he's fanatical about is USC football."

Mr. Crouch was ultimately confirmed by the Senate, and served in the Pentagon for two years before Mr. Bush named him ambassador to Romania. Mr. Crouch returned to the White House in January 2005 after Mr. Hadley asked him to serve as his deputy, and has since been in the catbird seat on a range of key national security issues.

Last fall, Mr. Hadley asked Mr. Crouch to lead an internal administration review to identify weaknesses in current U.S. policy on Iraq and to propose ways to fix them.

Mr. Crouch assembled a team of 12 midlevel aides from the Pentagon, State and Treasury departments, intelligence community, and the office of Vice President Dick Cheney. Members of the panel included Meghan L. O'Sullivan, deputy national security adviser for Iraq and Afghanistan, and John Hannah, Mr. Cheney's national security adviser.

The team began a review of the situation in Iraq. Mr. Bush wanted to sit down with senior members of his national security team the Sunday after Thanksgiving to discuss what Mr. Hadley describes as "the general contours of the way forward in Iraq," so the team met daily through November.

The panel, which held face-to-face meetings and regular videoconferences with senior U.S. commanders in Baghdad, quickly came to two conclusions about Iraq: that the situation in Iraq was dire and deteriorating, and that there weren't enough U.S. military personnel in the country to stabilize the country, said participants in Mr. Crouch's review.

The panelists had a harder time reaching consensus on how to move forward in Iraq. Participants said they considered, and rejected, an array of possible policy shifts. One idea that was ultimately discarded was the "80-percent" solution, which called for the U.S. to abandon its outreach efforts to Iraqi Sunnis and instead focus on the country's Shiites and Kurds, who together comprise about 80% of the country's 26 million residents.

Mr. Hadley said the U.S. decided to instead redouble efforts to build a coalition of moderate political figures from all three sectarian groups. This idea, along with the troop surge and the new economic-growth initiative, will be among the main themes of Mr. Bush's speech to the nation this week, other administration officials said.

Widening War? If Iraq Worsens, Allies See 'Nightmare' Case (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114101

WASHINGTON -- As President Bush prepares to unveil his latest Iraq strategy, Arab allies are worried about what might happen if the plan fails: that worsening strife could engulf the entire region, sparking a wider war in the middle of the world's largest oil patch.

The potential of a much larger regional conflict that pits Sunnis against Shiites is increasingly on the minds of both Arab leaders and U.S. military planners, according to regional diplomats and U.S. officials. Some are calling such a possible outcome the "nightmare scenario." A wider conflict appears more plausible now because, even as Iraq is separating along sectarian lines, regional dynamics are shoving neighboring nations into two rival camps.

On one side is a Shiite-led arc running from Iran into central Iraq, through Syria and into Lebanon. On the other side lie American allies Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt, along with Persian Gulf states such as Qatar and the United Arab Emirates. These Sunni regimes are horrified at the emerging, increasingly radicalized Shiite bloc, largely financed and inspired by Iran, Arab diplomats say.

In the middle is Iraq, which looks less and less like a buffer between these two axes of Middle East power, and more of a no-man's land that is bringing them into conflict. Arab officials fear that if the U.S. withdraws from there, or diminishes its troop numbers in ways that Iraq's own weak military can't fill, the two sides could come into direct and bloody conflict.

The U.S. is now eager to tamp down these rising jitters over a wider clash within the Arab world. Mr. Bush, in a televised speech tomorrow night, will detail plans for reconstruction aid and a temporary surge in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq. The troop boost is meant in part to calm regional fears of a U.S. pullout. Mr. Bush is expected to send Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to the region soon to help explain his new Iraq strategy in what could be her most comprehensive trip there in more than a year.

The U.S. is also pushing a wide-ranging strategy to persuade its Sunni allies that it is serious about counteracting the rise of Iran -- in exchange for Arab help in Iraq and the Palestinian territories.

Key to the effort is the continued promise to keep U.S. forces in Iraq for as long as necessary. But the U.S. is also beefing up U.S. forces in the Persian Gulf and plans to deepen security cooperation with Gulf allies. The Pentagon has proposed sending a second carrier battle group to the Gulf region. There are also advanced plans under way to knit together the air-defense systems of the six smaller Gulf states, including Qatar, Oman and the United Arab Emirates, and to build a U.S.-administered missile-defense system. Similarly, the Air Force is laying plans to step up exercises with Arab allies in the region. One proposal calls for the U.S. to hold combined air exercises with Oman and the UAE.

Contingency Plans

Arab governments are putting in place their own contingency plans in case Iraq begins to fall apart.

The Saudis have warned the Bush administration that they are prepared to aid the Sunni militias in Iraq if the Sunni population there becomes imperiled, a Saudi diplomat said. Jordanian officials have told the Pentagon that they may move troops into Iraq's uninhabited western desert as a buffer if events there spiral out of control, according to U.S. military officials. Turkish officials, who are grappling with a separatist Kurdish movement in their country, say they would oppose the creation of an independent Kurdistan in northern Iraq. They also say they are prepared to defend Iraq's Turkmen population, who share a common ethnicity with Turkey's majority population, should it come under attack. Even Syria, which the U.S. alleges has been abetting the conflict, is expressing alarm over the potential fracturing of Iraq.

"Can you imagine the effect of Iraq breaking apart and each group looking for a regional or international power to support their territorial claims or their ethnic claims?" asks Imad Moustapha, Syria's ambassador to Washington. "The repercussions will be terrible, not just for Iraq but for all the countries."

An all-out civil war in Iraq that drags in bordering countries would send shockwaves through the global oil market, potentially pushing oil prices to more than $100 a barrel, oil analysts predict. Iraq, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Iran together hold about two-thirds of the world's proven oil reserves.

Two scholars, Kenneth Pollack at the Brookings Institution and Daniel Byman of the Rand Corp., have worked for months on a study that lays out possible consequences in a worst-case scenario, from skyrocketing oil prices to huge, destabilizing refugee flows. They argue that Iraq could become the world's premier sanctuary for terrorism and that strife there could spark minority uprisings in Saudi Arabia, Iran, Syria -- and even among Turkey's sizable Kurdish population.

DOJ_NMG_0114102

Iraq's neighbors fear the increasing reach of Shiite Iran, whose expansion has been held in check for centuries by the Sunnis of Iraq. Among all of Iraq's neighbors, Iran is the one country that could clearly benefit from a possible breakup of Iraq along sectarian lines. The emergence of a large, oil-rich and devoutly Shiite Arab state carved from Iraq's southern half, with a government closely tied to Iran, would radically alter the face of the Middle East and grant more leverage to Shiite leaders in Tehran.

Core Fear

Another core fear is that a sectarian bloodbath in Iraq could draw in neighboring states, which would feel pressed to defend their own interests or to protect their brethren in Iraq.

Last month's bipartisan Iraq Study Group report sketched out such a potential sequence of events, based on interviews of senior Arab diplomats by the panel's top advisers. In one of the bleakest public assessments to date of what it called the "consequences of continued decline in Iraq," the report describes a potential cauldron of ethnic cleansing in Iraq that could draw in the country's main neighbors: Turkey from the north to prevent the Iraqi Kurds from declaring independence; Iran from the west to secure the country's south and gain control over oil fields in that region.

"Ambassadors from neighboring countries told us that they fear the distinct possibility of Sunni-Shia clashes across the Islamic world," the report notes. "Such a broader sectarian conflict could open a Pandora's box of problems -- including the radicalization of populations, mass movements of populations, and regime changes -- that might take decades to play out."

Some of the study group's top advisers contend that the process of ethnic cleansing, particularly by Iraqi Shiites trying to rid cities and regions of their Sunni populations, is already under way. "We may be about one-third through the process, with little ability to do anything about it," says Wayne White, a former Middle East intelligence official at the State Department.

But critics of the panel's core recommendation -- that the U.S. begin a rapid drawdown of American combat forces in Iraq that would culminate in a full withdrawal of combat troops by early 2008 -- say such a move would leave a military vacuum in Iraq that could open the way for an upsurge in Shiite violence against the Sunnis in Iraq.

The Sunni-Shiite split goes back to the early days of Islam, when a bloody feud broke out over which of the Prophet Muhammad's descendants should lead the Muslim faithful. Sunnis now predominate throughout the Middle East, with the exception of Iran. Shiites have recently experienced a resurgence in influence in the region, not just with the rise of Iran but also with the Shiite ascendancy in Iraq and Hezbollah's success in fighting Israel in Lebanon last summer.

High-level Arab officials have been warning for months that if left unchecked, the current slide into chaos in Iraq could spark a regional sectarian clash, according to U.S. and Arab diplomats. They have begun to share their contingency plans with top U.S. officials, in part because they hope to jolt the Bush administration into taking stronger action in Iraq and to secure the continued presence of U.S. troops there.

Jordanian officials have suggested that if Iraq were to fall into a full-out civil war, Jordan would push troops to the border, and possibly across it, as far west as Rutbah about 80 miles inside Iraq, to stem an expected flow of Sunni refugees, says a U.S. military planner who recently met with leaders in the region.

"The danger is that if the Jordanians carve out a security zone or buffer zone inside Iraq, that the Syrians, Saudis and Turks will all follow," says the military planner. The Syrians could move into western Nineveh province, while the Turks could send troops to protect the Sunni Turkmen population in the north, he says.

Jordanian officials say they are driven by two main concerns. The first is that Sunnis fleeing Shiite oppression could turn Amman into the center of Sunni resistance against the Shiite-dominated government in Baghdad. Already the Jordanian capital is home to about 900,000 Iraqis, who make up as much as 15% of the population. The Jordanians worry that Iraq's Shiite militias could send small teams of militants to Amman to launch assassination campaigns or terror attacks against the Sunni insurgency.

"We have quite enough instability in Jordan as it is," says one senior Jordanian official.

Jordan's other big fear is shared by the U.S.'s other Sunni allies throughout the region -- that an Iraqi Shiite government closely allied with Iran could dominate the region. Jordan is one of the most uniformly Sunni countries in the Gulf. But when U.S. military officials visited the region recently, their Jordanian counterparts described with alarm how 200 of their Sunni citizens had converted to Shia Islam in recent months. The Jordanians said the converts were motivated by the Shiite-dominated Hezbollah's tough stand against Israel over the summer and the growing power of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0114103

"It seems preposterous, but it shows how hyper-reactive they are to it," says the U.S. military planner.

Saudi Arabia, which has a Sunni-majority population but significant pockets of Shiites in many of its oil-rich provinces, has also voiced alarm over the growing popularity of both Hezbollah and the Sadr movement in its own eastern expanses. "The Shiites in those provinces love Sadr and Nasrallah," Hezbollah's leader, the U.S. military planner says. Saudi officials also fret over the prospect of a deepening civil war in Iraq.

Huge Challenge

A huge challenge for the U.S. is that many of its Sunni allies in the region already view the current situation in Iraq as a defeat for their cause and a near-complete victory for Iran. "They refer to the Shiite Islamic parties in Iraq as the Persians," the military planner says, using the historical term for Persian-speaking Iranians.

In recent weeks, some of the U.S. allies in the Gulf have quietly advocated breaking up the Iraqi government in favor of a military dictatorship, governed by a secular Shiite, a Sunni and a Kurd, according to the military planner. The military dictatorship would rule until the country could be stabilized and new elections held. Religious parties, like those that currently dominate Iraqi politics, would be banned from participating in future elections.

U.S. officials have ruled out such an option, saying that it runs contrary to their desire to bring democracy to Iraq and that it would never be accepted by Iraq's Shiites, who are already largely in control.

Some Middle East analysts dismiss the possibility of intervention in Iraq by its Sunni-led neighbors, saying these fragile regimes are interested foremost in their own survival. But U.S. officials say the paranoia surrounding Iran and the rise of Shiite influence could lead them to conclude that their survival depends on intervening on behalf of Iraq's Sunni minority. Some of the war-gaming, both within the Bush administration and among outside experts, focuses on such potential scenarios.

Under one scenario, sketched by Mr. White of the Iraq Study Group, Iraq's Shiites would launch an extensive campaign to drive the Sunnis out of large areas of central Iraq. Fearing a rout of the Sunni population, Saudi Arabia would finance a large-scale counteroffensive, funneling aid to former Iraqi military officers through Jordan, which has longstanding ties to Iraq's Sunni military class. Egypt would do its part by providing guns, munitions, artillery and vehicles.

"What people forget is that the Sunnis comprise nearly the entire top brass of the former Iraqi army and nearly all of the old Republican Guard," says Mr. White. "You give them the guns and proper equipment and they will become a formidable force against the Shiite militias."

The possibility of a full-blown civil war in Iraq dissolving into a regional conflict "is a scenario that nearly everyone was rejecting just a few months ago," he says. "Not anymore."

Past Time To Get Real On Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

We've been down this road before. This time, it has to be different.

There have been too many times that President Bush has promised a new strategy on Iraq, only to repeat the same old set of failed approaches and unachievable objectives. Americans need to hear Mr. Bush offer something truly new — not more glossy statements about ultimate victory, condescending platitudes about what hard work war is, or aimless vows to remain "until the job is done."

If the voters sent one clear message to Mr. Bush last November, it was that it is time to start winding down America's involvement in this going-nowhere war.

What they need is for the president to acknowledge how bad things have gotten in Iraq (not just that it is not going as well as he planned) and to be honest about how limited the remaining options truly are. The country wants to know how Mr. Bush plans to end its involvement in a way that preserves as much of the nation's remaining honor and influence as possible, limits the suffering of the Iraqi people and the harm to Iraq's neighbors, and gives Iraqi leaders a chance — should they finally decide to take it — to rescue their country from an even worse disaster once the Americans are gone.

The reality that Mr. Bush needs to acknowledge when he speaks to the nation tomorrow night is that the Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki is feeding rather than restraining Iraq's brutal civil war. The Iraqi Army cannot be relied on to impose order even in Baghdad, while the Iraqi police forces — dominated by sectarian militias — are inciting the mayhem.

DOJ_NMG_0114104

Mr. Bush must acknowledge that there is no military solution for Iraq. Whatever plan he offers needs to start with a tough set of political benchmarks for national reconciliation that the Iraqi government is finally expected to meet. It needs to concentrate enough forces in Baghdad to bring some security to streets and neighborhoods, giving Iraq's leaders one last opportunity to try to bargain their way out of civil war.

His plan needs to lay out tight timetables in which the Iraqis must take major steps to solve fundamental issues, including equitably dividing their oil wealth and disarming vengeful militias. There must also be a clear and rapid timetable for achieving enough stability in Baghdad to hand back significant military responsibilities to the Iraqis.

The last time America presented Mr. Maliki with a set of political benchmarks, he bluntly rejected them. If he does that again, there is no way America can or should try to secure Iraq on its own. Mr. Bush must make clear to both Iraqis and Americans that without significant progress, American forces will not remain.

We're under no illusions. Meeting those challenges is going to be extremely tough. And Iraq's unraveling may already be too far gone.

For Mr. Bush, this means resisting any vague Nixonian formula of "peace with honor" that translates into more years of fighting on for the same ever-receding goals. Democrats in Congress should also resist euphemistic formulas like "phased redeployment," which really means trying to achieve with even fewer troops what Washington failed to achieve with current force levels.

Nor can America simply turn its back on whatever happens to Iraq after it leaves. With or without American troops, a nightmare future for Iraq is a nightmare future for the United States, too, whether it consists of an expanding civil war that turns into a regional war or millions of Iraq's people and its oil fields falling under the tightening grip of a more powerful Iran.

Mr. Bush is widely expected to announce a significant increase in American troops to deploy in Baghdad's violent neighborhoods. He needs to explain to Congress and the American people where the dangerously tapped-out military is going to find those troops. And he needs to place a strict time limit on any increase, or it will turn into a thinly disguised escalation of the American combat role.

The Washington Post reported yesterday that just under 23,000 Iraqi civilians and police officers died violently in 2006, more than 17,000 of them in the last six months. That is a damning indictment of the Maliki government, and of current American military strategy.

That is the Iraq that Americans want Mr. Bush to deal with tomorrow night.

No More Middle East Crusades (LAT)

By Dimitri K. Simes, Dimitri K. Simes Is Publisher Of The National Interest Magazine.

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

Europeans couldn't export Christianity 1,000 years ago; what makes us think we can export democracy now?

JUST 10 DAYS after Iraq's government managed to transform Saddam Hussein's execution from an act of justice into a sectarian revenge killing, the Bush administration is planning a troop "surge" to try to help a leadership that is simultaneously too brutal and too wimpy to bring stability and democracy to Iraq.

But sending more brigades to pursue the same crusade is unlikely to bring success — at least not on an American political timetable. The problem is not just the incompetent management of the war's aftermath. The problem is that the crusade to reshape the Middle East that led to the U.S. invasion of Iraq precludes anything that could be legitimately called victory.

The debacle that is Iraq reaffirms the lesson that there is no such thing as a good crusade. This was true a thousand years ago when European Christian knights tried to impose their faith and way of life on the Holy Land, pillaging the region in the process, and it is equally true today. Divine missions and sensible foreign policy just don't mix.

For President Bush and his neoconservative supporters, the invasion of Iraq was from the outset about much more than dismantling (as we now know nonexistent) weapons of mass destruction, cutting Hussein's (also nonexistent) ties to Al Qaeda and removing a murderous and unpredictable dictator from power. They also sought to depose an Iraqi regime hostile to the United States and Israel — and to demonstrate to Arabs and others in the greater Middle East who was the real master of the region.

DOJ_NMG_0114105

The dismantlement of the Iraqi army and government machinery, now conveniently blamed on L. Paul Bremer III, was a logical outcome of the crusading mind-set. Bush wanted an Iraqi government to catalyze his transformational plan for the region. That is why less radical approaches than "remaking" Iraq were contemptuously dismissed.

Instead, group-think buttressed the shaky propositions that democracy could easily take root, that a democratic Iraq could move to recognize Israel and continue to contain Iran, that a small force could get the job done. That Iraq's neighbors — which in 2003 were often and quite publicly warned that they were next in line for forcible regime change — would accept American-style stabilization of Iraq defies belief.

Yet faith is once again demanded of the American people. Just as the Crusaders a millennium ago blamed their defeats in the Middle East on a lack of faith, we are told today that it is the realists — those heretics with an insufficient faith in the ability of American values and power to rapidly transform the world — who are poised to sabotage the entire project for spreading freedom throughout the region, that the realists and their false gods of stability and national interest will seduce Americans away from their true calling of spreading liberty throughout the world, even at the barrel of a gun.

The truth is that no surge and no amount of faith can rescue this crusade from failure. The alternative is not to "cut and run" or to withdraw troops but rather to seek a difficult solution that is the only plausible one: reshape U.S. policy in the Middle East to establish a manageable political context for the war. The Iraq Study Group was right on two counts: Sending more troops to Iraq and continuing to work with the current Iraqi government is a nonstarter. And Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, need a stake in stabilizing Iraq and won't help without U.S. assurances that they will not be next in line for regime change.

A new approach to the Israeli-Palestinian dispute is also essential. The perception that the United States fully supports Israeli policies makes it more difficult for friendly neighbors of Iraq, such as Saudi Arabia and Jordan, to provide much help. And we should accept that democracy in Iraq, to say nothing about a democratic Iraq as a role model for the region, might have to wait for better times.

Under current circumstances, the emergence of a tough but relatively benign leader who could establish law and order may not be the worst outcome. Of course, it is not appropriate for the United States to select a new strongman for Iraq. But many Iraqis are now tempted to put someone in charge who could quell the chaos. Washington might do well to ponder the limits of the U.S. responsibility to defend the corrupt and inept government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki — a government heavily infiltrated by the very militias that the troop surge is supposed to destroy.

While not as murderous as Hussein, such a leader is unlikely to look like a knight in shining armor in the Bush administration's pro-democracy crusade — but he may just allow the United States to get out of the Iraqi quagmire without losing its prestige or leaving a sanctuary for Al Qaeda.

An Escalation Of American Blood (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

A surge in the number of troops in Iraq might have helped in 2003 or early 2004.

But in 2007, President Bush's plan seems to represent a warmed-over variant of approaches that have already been tried and mostly failed, that are opposed by some top American military commanders and ordinary Iraqis alike, and whose most likely outcome will be many more Americans in body bags or wheelchairs.

The reality is that we've already tried surges. There was one of 20,000 troops in early 2004, a similar one in the fall of 2005, and one a bit smaller in the summer of 2006.

As recently as July, Mr. Bush cheerily described a plan "to deploy additional American troops and Iraqi security personnel in Baghdad in the coming weeks." He explained that this would "bring greater security to the Iraqi capital ... [and] root out those who instigate violence."

By October, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the chief U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, was acknowledging that the recent troop increases "had not met our overall expectations of sustaining a reduction in the levels of violence."

DOJ_NMG_0114106

Proponents of escalation cite the example of Tal Afar, a town in northwestern Iraq. U.S. forces there have met some genuine success since September 2005 with the "clear, build and hold" strategy that Mr. Bush apparently now favors for Baghdad.

But Tal Afar is only about one-thirtieth the size of Baghdad, and it isn't even Arab: its people are mostly members of the Turkmen minority. Trying to replicate that (limited) success in Baghdad is a fool's errand.

In Tal Afar, there was one U.S. soldier for every 40 residents. Using the same ratio in Baghdad would require 150,000 troops, sustained for more than a year. That's impossible.

Mr. Bush's surge may be just big enough to expose more troops to danger and to let the Iraqi government off the hook, without being big enough to achieve security.

Don Rumsfeld was wrong on just about everything in Iraq — except the downside of additional troops there: "More forces, U.S. and coalition forces, create the impression of an occupation," he said. Indeed, any expansion of our military presence is likely to bolster anti-American radicals, like Moktada al-Sadr.

Sure, Iraq promises to help in the crackdown. But my bet is that — once again — Iraqi leaders will make big pledges and then let us do the heavy lifting.

In any case, sending in even more young Americans won't help counterinsurgency efforts when, according to an American-sponsored poll conducted in September, 78 percent of Iraqis believe that the American troop presence is "provoking more conflict than it is preventing." That's why Iraqis overwhelmingly favor a timetable for a U.S. withdrawal, and it's one reason I do as well.

Mr. Bush is right about the risks of withdrawal: our pullout could be followed by a vast bloodbath and by a regional war in which Iran backs Iraqi Shiite militias and Saudi Arabia and Jordan back Iraqi Sunnis (with Turkey marching into Kurdistan). But all that may unfold anyway, and the prospect of withdrawal may be the best hope to galvanize Iraqi factions to take steps to avert such a catastrophe.

If Mr. Bush succeeds in escalating our military involvement, it's almost inevitable that many more Americans will be killed and injured. The focus has been on fatalities, but by some counts there have been 16 American service injuries for every death. That's partly a tribute to improvements in military medicine, for in Vietnam there were 2.6 injuries per American fatality.

All told, between 22,000 and 50,000 Americans have been injured so far in Iraq (depending on who does the counting); the higher number is one-third as many as in the entire Vietnam War. Linda Bilmes, a Harvard scholar who has written a new report on the war injuries, notes that the backlog for veterans' disability claims has risen more than fivefold since 2000, and she cites horror stories like that of a staff sergeant who suffered severe brain injuries and then had his pay stopped and utilities cut because of a bureaucratic error.

"If the new Congress really wants to support our troops," Ms. Bilmes writes, "it should start by spending a few more pennies on the ones who have already fought and come home."

That's a responsibility Mr. Bush should assume as well. And when he speaks to the nation to urge more troops in Iraq, he needs to explain why the back alleys of Baghdad are the best places to invest additional buckets of American blood.

The Least Immoral Choice (WP)

By Sally Quinn

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

I am an Army brat. I have seen the effects of war firsthand. My father fought in World War II and in the Korean War. I lived on Army posts and saw or heard about the human devastation of war each day.

During the Korean War my father served on the front lines, leaving us behind in Tokyo. Every day I read in the newspaper Stars and Stripes about soldiers being killed. I fell ill because of the emotional stress of having him at war, and at age 10 I ended up in Tokyo General Hospital.

The hospital was filled with severely wounded soldiers who had been airlifted from Korea. It was decided that having parents visit their sick children would be too disruptive, so my mother wasn't allowed to see me for months at a time.

DOJ_NMG_0114107

Finally, after nearly nine months, I was transferred to Brooke General Hospital in San Antonio. My mother, younger brother, younger sister and I were placed on an Army hospital plane with the most seriously wounded soldiers, who were to fly back with us. There were no seats on the plane, only three rows of litters, five high, all filled with badly wounded and dying soldiers, most of them still kids themselves. I was strapped to my litter, as they were, but my mother, brother and sister were ambulatory.

The thing I remember most vividly is the soldiers screaming in pain and crying out for their mothers. My mother went up and down the aisles holding their hands, stroking their brows, giving them sips of water. My sister helped light their cigarettes. Many of them were amputees. Some had no stomachs, some had no faces.

The soldiers in the litters above and below me both died, blood dripping from their wounds. Many other soldiers died while we were in the air. We had to stop in Hawaii overnight to refuel and to leave the bodies.

I hope that when President Bush discusses sending more troops to Iraq, knowing that we will have to pull out sooner rather than later, that the conversation comes around to the human suffering. Does anyone at the table ask about the personal anguish, the long-term effects, emotional, psychological and financial, on the families of those killed, wounded or permanently disabled?

When I hear about the surge, all I can think of is those young soldiers on the plane to Texas. We have already lost more than 3,000 soldiers, and many more have been wounded and disabled.

We have three choices here. All three are immoral. We can keep the status quo and gradually pull out; we can surge; or we can pull out now. When I think about those young soldiers on that plane coming back from Japan years ago, I believe pulling out now is the least immoral choice.

The writer is a co-moderator of On Faith, an online conversation on religion athttp://newsweek.washingtonpost.com/onfaith.

Democrats Split Over Their Approach To Iraq (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — The new Democratic majority in Congress is divided over how to assert its power in opposing President Bush's plan to send more troops to Baghdad, as leaders explore ways to block financing for a military expansion without being accused of abandoning American forces already in Iraq.

While Democrats find themselves unusually united in their resistance to a troop increase, party leaders are locked in an internal debate over how far to go in objecting to the administration's Iraq strategy. The White House has invited some Democrats to meet with Mr. Bush before he gives his Iraq speech on Wednesday, even as others have scoured the history books to find cases when Congress has reined in the commander in chief.

In the most aggressive of the new tactics, Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, has said he will introduce legislation on Tuesday to require the president to gain new Congressional authority before sending more troops to Iraq. The bill is the first proposal in the Senate that would prohibit paying for an increase in American troops over their level on Jan. 1.

"Is there any American in this country who thinks the United States Senate would vote to support sending American troops into a civil war in Iraq today?" Mr. Kennedy said Monday in an interview. "Is there any American that believes this? I don't think so, but that is what's happening, and we have to do everything we can to insist on accountability."

The Kennedy plan is intended to provide Democrats with a road map for how to proceed in Iraq. Mr. Kennedy, as he begins his 45th year in the Senate, recalled that Congress interceded during conflicts in Vietnam and Lebanon, and he said Democrats should not hesitate to do so in Iraq.

The new House speaker, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, has similarly suggested that Democrats consider blocking financing for a troop increase, and the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, vowed Monday "to take a look at it."

But the House majority leader, Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, has not endorsed the idea. Other Democrats, either looking ahead to a possible presidential candidacy or their own re-elections, have also distanced themselves from such a proposal, fearful of being cast as opposing the troops.

"I don't think we should be pulling back any funds," said Senator Amy Klobuchar, a Minnesota Democrat who was elected in November. She said she would oppose a proposal to block money for a troop increase.

DOJ_NMG_0114108

The Democratic Party sailed to victory in midterm elections in the fall on a promise to change course in Iraq. Still, there is little consensus over how to proceed.

Some Democrats are urging an immediate withdrawal of troops and a drastic reduction in war spending. Others are calling for a gradual re-deployment of troops to move them out of Iraq. Still other Democrats are waiting for Mr. Bush to present his plan before criticizing it.

The expectations set by the elections, Democrats say, present a complicating challenge as they begin to govern.

Take, for example, Mr. Reid, who said on Dec. 17 that he would support a plan for a temporary increase in increase troops. Two weeks later, he announced his opposition, saying his change had nothing to do with other Democratic senators having spoken out against it, but rather with military officials having disagreed with a call for more troops.

Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, said he believed that his party lost the White House in 2004 because of Iraq. “My concern now is that too many Democrats are going to want to play it safe on this issue and not take the strong stand that American people demand,” he said Monday.

The pressure from war critics on the Democratic left has been particularly intense. “The bottom line is that they were elected on a mandate to get the nation out of the mess in Iraq,” said Eli Pariser, the executive director of MoveOn.org, a liberal political action committee.

By law, Congress can limit the nature of troop deployments, cap the size of military deployments and cut financing for existing or prospective deployments.

Since 1970, there have been dozens of occasions in which Congress has tried to step into military action, from Haiti to Bosnia to Kosovo, according to a memorandum being sent Tuesday to lawmakers by the Center for American Progress, a liberal policy group.

Representative Adam Smith of Washington, vice chairman of the moderate New Democratic Coalition, said he feared that withholding financing — even for new troops being sent to Iraq — could have a detrimental effect on all forces.

“I don’t want our troops to be caught between the president and Congress in a political fight,” said Mr. Smith, who was to receive a briefing on Tuesday at the White House. “If there are any risks that our efforts to slash the budget would place them at greater risk, that would be unacceptable to me.”

But Democrats who are trying to stop Mr. Bush’s proposed troop increase, a group led by Mr. Kennedy, say their proposal to block financing will apply only to new troops. Mr. Kennedy said he hoped that his legislation would be urgently considered by the full Senate, but acknowledged that it remained an open question whether his Democratic leaders would schedule it for a quick vote.

“The importance of this legislation is that it will apply now before we could get the escalation,” he said. “If you wait, this thing is going to be past. I’m not sure that all of our colleagues in the Senate understand that, quite frankly.”

Democrats May Deny Funds For Iraq Surge (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 9, 2007

In a blunt challenge to President Bush, the leader of the Senate's new Democratic majority said Monday he will "look at everything" within his power to wind down the war in Iraq, short of cutting off funding for troops already deployed.

"I think we've got to tell the president what he's doing as wrong. We've got to start bringing our folks home," said Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, in remarks that portend a struggle if, as expected, Bush announces plans later this week for an increase in troop strength of 20,000.

Another senior Democrat, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, said one option under consideration would be for lawmakers to vote on denying the use of funds for any increase in the U.S. deployment. Officials said late Monday night that the Massachusetts Democrat was preparing legislation that would require Congress to approve the deployment of more troops, and was hoping for a roll call on the topic swiftly — before any increase is implemented.

More broadly, Reid signaled that Bush's expected call for an additional $100 billion for the war would receive close scrutiny from newly empowered Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0114109

"We have a platform we didn't have before, Leader Pelosi and I, and we're going to ... focus attention on this war in many different ways," said Reid. Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., suggested over the weekend using Congress' power of the purse to restrain any troop buildup.

More than 3,000 U.S. troops have lost their lives in Iraq in a war nearing the end of its fourth year, and many Democrats attribute their success in last fall's elections to public opposition to the conflict.

The election results, combined with an assessment by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group that the situation in Iraq was "grave and deteriorating," coincided with Bush's effort to begin work on a revised policy.

He is expected to make a nationwide televised address on the issue on Wednesday. Several officials have said one leading option for Bush is a so-called "surge" in troop strength, in which about 20,000 troops would be added to the force already in place, in hopes that sectarian violence can be quelled.

The debate over the war has overshadowed the early days of the new Democratic-controlled Congress and a politically potent domestic agenda that leaders had planned.

The Senate began debate Monday on legislation to toughen ethics rules and crack down on lobbyists' influence. The bill is a response to what Democrats have called a Republican "culture of corruption." In the House, Democrats have already passed some ethics changes.

On security matters, they intend to begin work Tuesday on legislation to implement nearly all of the remaining recommendations of the commission that investigated the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. "If this bill is enacted, funded and implemented, the American people will be safer," said Lee Hamilton, who was a member of the commission.

That legislation carries no price tag, and the money to pay for the increased protections will have to be approved separately. At a news conference, Pelosi sidestepped when asked about the cost, saying that any increases in spending would be offset to make sure they did not increase the deficit.

Legislation that Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., proposed in the Senate last year would have implemented the 9/11 commission's recommendations at an estimated cost of $53.3 billion over five years.

Bush met with several members of Congress during the day, part of a series of meetings held in advance of announcing his new Iraq policy.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said the president "understands there is a lot of public anxiety" about the war. Yet he said that Americans "don't want another Sept. 11" type of terrorist attack and it is wiser to confront terrorists overseas in Iraq and other battlegrounds rather than in the United States.

As commander in chief, Bush has wide constitutional authority to direct the military. Congress' principal power lies in its ability to control federal funding.

Yet the Democratic takeover in Congress means that for the first time since the war began, persistent critics of the administration's policy are in control in both the House and Senate.

"We ought to insist that the Congress and the Senate take action, so that before we're going to have a surge (of troops), the members of Congress and the members of the Senate will have an opportunity to speak on this issue," said Kennedy.

He noted that Congress could prohibit the money it authorizes for Iraq from being spent on a troop buildup. "It's something that's under discussion," said the Massachusetts Democrat.

Other alternatives have emerged in recent days, although several officials said Democratic leaders had not yet settled on a course of action.

Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the Senate's second-ranking Democrat, has suggested a limit on the number of troops that could be deployed to the war.

"It is time for us to announce we achieved our goals in Iraq and now the American people need to hand this responsibility over to the people of that nation in Iraq," he said.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., a potential presidential candidate, said that while he opposes any measure that would increase the risk to troops already deployed, "the central question then becomes, is there a way of conditioning appropriations so that the president is constrained and that's something that we're investigating right now."

DOJ_NMG_0114110

Other Democrats have discussed the possibility of forcing votes on nonbinding legislation calling on Bush to begin a troop withdrawal — the type of measure that served as a flashpoint in the election-year debate over the war.

In addition, Democrats intend to require senior administration officials to run a virtual gantlet of hearings at which the war policy could be explored in great detail — from the mission of the troops to alleged fraud in the use of funds to rebuild Iraq.

Officials said a few Democrats have discussed holding a fresh vote on authorizing the war, which Congress approved before Bush dispatched troops more than four years ago.

Bush's recent decision to name a new ambassador to Baghdad and shuffle the military commanders in the region will lead to Senate confirmation hearings.

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said another option is to limit "a particular military program or effort." He offered no elaboration.

Congress Is Loath To Pull Purse Strings (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — As they prepare for weeks of oversight hearings on the war in Iraq, Democratic congressional leaders are ruling out funding cuts to force President Bush to withdraw American troops.

But such cuts would hardly be unprecedented.

Since the early 1970s, Congress has intervened in at least five foreign conflicts on three continents by dictating what U.S. forces could do or how long they stay.

In the most dramatic and politically provocative cases, including during the latter years of the Vietnam War, lawmakers used their power over the federal budget to dramatically restrict operations they opposed.

At other times, they passed laws that specified where American forces could operate in Central America in the 1980s and set a timeline for withdrawing American troops from Somalia in the 1990s.

In the late 1970s, Congress barred the CIA from participating in a civil war in Angola.

*

No appetite for showdown

"This isn't a monarchy. The president doesn't have the authority to do anything he wants," said former Rep. Sam Gejdenson (D-Conn.), who worked to limit President Reagan's support for the Nicaraguan Contras two decades ago. "When Congress wants to move, it clearly has the authority to force the president to cease and desist."

Democratic leaders have shown no appetite for such a showdown.

Although House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) last week sent Bush a letter urging him to begin pulling out troops, Pelosi reiterated Monday that Democrats would not force the issue by withholding funding.

There is a long history of congressional discomfort with challenging the commander in chief over how to conduct a war.

"Congress is very sensitive of being accused of not supporting the troops," said Louis Fisher, a constitutional law specialist at the Library of Congress who has written extensively about struggles between the White House and Congress over war powers.

Even when popular opinion turned against the Vietnam War, congressional war opponents took years to muster the majorities necessary to impose restrictions on the conflict.

But after President Nixon's controversial 1970 expansion of the war into Cambodia, the tide began to turn.

That year, Sens. John Sherman Cooper (R-Ky.) and Frank Church (D-Idaho) overcame months of legislative opposition and attached an amendment to a foreign aid package that barred the use of U.S. troops in Cambodia.

The next year, Congress went further, approving a measure sponsored by Sen. Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) that required Nixon to set a timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops from Vietnam.

Only after U.S. forces withdrew following the 1973 peace accords did Congress actually cut funding for assistance to South Vietnam. Two years later, after more congressional funding cuts, the country succumbed to a North Vietnamese invasion.

The fall of Saigon in 1975 fed accusations that Congress had undermined the U.S. war effort in Southeast Asia.

DOJ_NMG_0114111

Within a year, however, lawmakers on Capitol Hill imposed new limits on American intervention in another foreign conflict.

In 1976, Congress prohibited the CIA from conducting military operations in Angola, which was in the middle of a fierce civil war that pitted a Soviet-backed government against rebels supported by America's allies.

And less than a decade after the end of the Vietnam War, Congress faced off against the White House over another controversial foreign war, this time in Central America.

In the mid-1980s, the Reagan administration was aggressively trying to overthrow the Marxist government of Nicaragua and to prop up an American-backed government in El Salvador against communist-backed rebels.

"There was a great deal of unhappiness with the way the Reagan administration was characterizing the conflict," said Cynthia Arnson, a former congressional aide who now directs the Latin American program at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars.

Amid reports of atrocities committed by America's allies, Democrats on Capitol Hill grew increasingly wary of U.S. involvement.

Then-Rep. Edward P. Boland (D-Mass.) led a congressional effort to prohibit the use of funding from the CIA or the Defense Department in support of the Contras in Nicaragua.

Lawmakers later went further, restricting U.S. forces from operating in Nicaragua and within 20 miles of the Nicaraguan border in Honduras and Costa Rica. (At the time, U.S. troops were still advising the Contras.)

Those limits would become central to the Iran-Contra scandal in which Reagan administration officials sought to fund the Contras by using the proceeds of arms sales to Iran.

Congressional intervention in Southeast Asia and Central America proved politically controversial for Democrats.

And wariness over being accused of abandoning America's allies diminished congressional interest in limiting support for the government of El Salvador, Arnson said.

*

Continuing limits

Yet even into the 1990s, lawmakers continued to place limits on American military action abroad.

In 1991, Congress authorized President George H.W. Bush to use military force only to liberate Kuwait rather than fight on into Iraq.

And after 18 American soldiers were killed in a 1993 firefight in Mogadishu, Somalia, Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) led a successful effort to set a deadline for withdrawing U.S. troops from Somalia.

Today, Democrats are again challenging an administration over a war. But advocates of legislation to require the withdrawal of U.S. troops — such as Sen. Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis.) — remain a minority.

None of the new Democratic congressional committee leaders who plan hearings on Iraq over the next month have expressed interest in legislation that would place limits on U.S. forces in Iraq.

And last week, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) would only say that he might reintroduce a nonbinding resolution calling on the president to set a timetable for withdrawing troops.

Dems Grapple With 'surge' (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, January 9, 2007

Having quickly pivoted last weekend to address the Iraq war during their 100-hour legislative blitz, House Democratic leaders are hurrying, amid the new pressures of having to govern, to craft a unified response to President Bush's plan to increase the number of U.S. troops deployed there.

Democrats appeared to have a chaotic and busy Monday as freshman lawmakers returned from a Congressional Research Service retreat in Virginia and other members remained in their districts or attended the Bowl Championship Series football game between the University of Florida and Ohio State University.

As they address the president's plan for Iraq, House Democrats will also begin the 100-hour offensive by considering reforms suggested by the commission that investigated the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. While the commission's recommendations address spending priorities, port and aviation security and other security issues, Democrats have proposed creating a new intelligence oversight panel within the House Appropriations Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0114112

The goal is to make oversight more focused by reducing the number of committees involved but increasing Congress's power to scrutinize intelligence spending and programs. The new panel will have more authority and more staffers to review intelligence agency budgets.

Former Rep. Tim Roemer (D-Ind.), who served on the 9/11 Commission, told reporters yesterday that the congressional moves were "bold," but he acknowledged that this is "a first step in a long path toward reform."

The panel, if created, would also enhance the power of Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) because she would appoint its Democratic members. During the past week, Pelosi has moved to augment her power by continuing to place term limits on chairmen and place staff in key jobs within her caucus.

Meanwhile, antiwar lawmakers revved up their opposition this week and put themselves on a collision course with Democratic leaders who oppose the hard-line tactic of changing Iraq policy by cutting off funds for operations there.

At a press conference yesterday, Pelosi reiterated that she opposes cutting off funding for military operations in Iraq. But there is a wide gulf between her liberal rank-and-file members of the caucus.

"Many of the new members know how they got here," said Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), who was in New York City yesterday pitching a plan to withdraw U.S. forces from Iraq. "We'll make sure [the second 100 hours] is about Iraq."

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), a former Marine whose opposition to the war gave Democratic candidates political cover during the election to emphasize the issue, plans to begin hearings "shortly" in his new perch as chairman of the Defense Appropriations subcommittee, said House Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.).

The chairwomen of the Progressive Caucus are hosting a forum this Friday with former Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.), who has authored a book offering a plan to withdraw from Iraq. Murtha has maintained a low profile since the campaign and his unsuccessful bid to become majority leader. But in conversations on the House floor, he told Rep. Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.) that he would attend the forum with McGovern.

Murtha is scheduled to offer the first response to McGovern, said Bill Goold, a spokesman for Woolsey.

As liberal lawmakers voiced greater opposition to escalating the war, the White House appears to be trying to ward off criticism for appearing to ignore the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, which proposed more diplomacy, notably with Iran and Syria.

President Bush has conducted a series of bipartisan briefings with lawmakers. He is meeting today with 14 lawmakers, including Reps. Todd Tiahrt (R-Kan.) and Adam Smith (D-Wash.). Last Friday, the president met with seven Republicans and six Democrats who serve on the Armed Services Committee. These included Rep. Chet Edwards (D-Texas), who represents Bush's hometown of Crawford, and freshman Rep. Chris Carney (D-Pa.), who served in the Pentagon as a Naval intelligence officer during the Iraq war.

Some of the newly elected Democrats, who aggressively criticized Bush on the campaign trail, are taking a much more cautious approach in the wake of their victories.

"Instead of sending more American troops overseas, we should be training Iraqis to handle the jobs themselves. For every Iraqi battalion we train, we need to bring an American battalion home. This should be our focus," said Carney.

Rep. Heath Shuler (D-N.C.) said he wants to hear from military leaders in Iraq that more soldiers are necessary, said Andrew Whalen, Shuler's press secretary.

Rep. Brad Ellsworth (D-Ind.) is skeptical of an increase in troops, said Elizabeth Farrar, his spokeswoman.

Murtha Outlines Strategy To Restrict Troop Surge (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON -- With President Bush seeking more U.S. forces in Iraq, a House Democratic chairman outlined options that would restrict any troop surge if it meant depleting readiness at home or extending the tours of troops now in the war zone.

DOJ_NMG_0114113

The strategy laid out by Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.) is the clearest statement yet on how House Democrats may respond to anticipated White House proposals to add 20,000 troops and pump new money into economic programs to help Iraqi civilians.

Mr. Bush will address the nation tomorrow on Iraq, and the Pentagon is preparing to add four brigades plus support personnel in the coming months. In the same period, Congress will be considering an emergency bill to pay for continuing overseas military operations, and the restrictions could be added prior to enactment in late March and before the White House has deployed all the added brigades overseas.

Mr. Bush is sure to claim wide discretion as commander in chief under the Constitution; most Democrats want to avoid what they see as a fruitless and politically damaging fight to deny money for the war. "We're not about to cut off funding for troops," House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton (D., Mo.) said.

But Mr. Murtha, chairman of the House Appropriations defense subcommittee, believes the November election results show voters want Congress to be more of a check on Mr. Bush's handling of Iraq. His goal is to build bipartisan support by focusing the debate on whether increasing troop levels would be too much of a strain on the military.

"Most of the military commanders say we can't afford to send more troops," Mr. Murtha said, and he has urged the president's national-security adviser, Stephen Hadley, to expedite submission of the war-funding requests to facilitate hearings and debate.

The chairman met recently at the White House with Mr. Hadley, Vice President Cheney and the president regarding Iraq policy, but remains skeptical of the administration's approach. He is planning a set of hearings beginning this month on the state of Army and Marine Corps readiness; as chairman, he can recommend that the restrictions be part of the text of the funding bill and challenge others to take out the language.

"They will say we're micromanaging the Defense Department. Well they need to be micromanaged," he said. "What we decide is the direction of the country on this war."

Among the options is a provision that proscribes the use of new funds to extend the deployment of Army and Marine troops beyond 365 and 210 days, respectively. A second provision would bar the dispatch of more troops if a fixed percent of units left at home fall below readiness standards.

The readiness of Army units for combat is measured on a scale of one to four. Units rated at the lower ends of the spectrum -- three and four -- are missing key leaders, training or pieces of equipment that make them ineligible to deploy. The exact readiness levels of U.S. units are classified. But senior Army officials and lawmakers have acknowledged in recent weeks that almost all the big active-duty combat brigades in the U.S. currently aren't ready to deploy.

Forcing the Bush administration to maintain a certain percentage of units in the U.S. at high readiness levels could constrain the president's ability to follow through on his plan to "surge" troops into Baghdad. It could also force the administration to call some National Guard and reserve units back for a second year-long tour of duty in Iraq.

Bush To Name Khalilzad For U.N. Job (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

President Bush will nominate Zalmay Khalilzad to be the U.S. envoy to the United Nations and veteran diplomat Ryan Crocker to replace him as ambassador to Iraq, the administration said Monday.

Both changes had been revealed in news reports last week.

"If confirmed, Ryan and Zal will have two of the hardest and most consequential jobs in the world," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said announcing the changes. White House spokesman Tony Snow had confirmed the plans earlier Monday.

Khalilzad, who is Afghan born, has also served as ambassador to Afghanistan. He will replace John Bolton, who could not win Senate confirmation and resigned last month as his temporary appointment as U.N. ambassador was about to expire.

Crocker, a four-time ambassador who is now U.S. envoy to Pakistan, will replace Khalilzad in Baghdad.

Bush is shuffling his teams of military and diplomatic advisers as he plans to announce a new Iraq strategy on Wednesday.

"The next two years may well be the most significant ones in this mission so far," Rice said. "New challenges on the ground call for changes to our strategy."

DOJ_NMG_0114114

"There will be new leadership in both our military and our diplomatic efforts, and the person President Bush wants to lead Embassy Baghdad is Ryan Crocker," she said.

Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander overseeing the military theater that includes Iraq, will be succeeded by Adm. William Fallon, now Abizaid's counterpart in the Pacific. Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus is the president's choice to be the new chief commander in Iraq, replacing Gen. George Casey.

Casey in turn will replace the retiring Gen. Peter Schoomaker as Army chief of staff.

Bush has also decided to shift John Negroponte, the national intelligence director, to the State Department to become No. 2 to Rice. Replacing Negroponte will be retired Vice Adm. Mike McConnell, a veteran of more than 25 years in intelligence.

Iraq-linked Reshuffle Continues With Switch Of US Baghdad Envoy (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, January 9, 2007

President George W. Bush pursued a major reshuffle of his Iraq policy team by nominating the current ambassador to Baghdad as the next US envoy to the UN and replacing him with one of Washington's most experienced diplomats.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice confirmed the long-expected decision to name Zalmay Khalilzad, an Afghan-born Muslim who has been the US ambassador in Iraq for 18 months, to the United Nations.

He will be replaced in Baghdad by Ryan Crocker, a fluent Arabic speaker who has already served as US ambassador to Syria, Kuwait, Lebanon and, since November 2004, Pakistan, she said.

Both appointments must be confirmed by the US Senate, though they are not expected to encounter stiff resistance from the opposition Democrats who won control of Congress in November elections.

"If confirmed, Ryan and Zal will have two of the hardest and most consequential jobs in the world," Rice said in announcing the nominations.

"But President Bush and I have the utmost confidence that they are more than equal to the challenges of their posts," she said.

The nominations followed a flurry of other changes in the upper echelons of Bush's intelligence and military teams that included replacing his top commanders for Iraq and the Middle East and shifting his top intelligence aide, John Negroponte, to the State Department to become Rice's deputy.

The reshuffled leadership will be tasked with implementing a new Iraq strategy that Bush is scheduled to unveil in a nationally televised speech Wednesday night.

The new plan is expected to include a "surge" in US troop numbers to curb sectarian and insurgent violence while shifting security responsibility to Iraqi forces to allow for an eventual drawdown of the US presence.

The choice of Khalilzad, 55, the Bush administration's highest-ranking Muslim, had been expected since former UN envoy John Bolton resigned in December after failing to gain Senate endorsement.

Rice said the past year of intensive diplomacy at the United Nations, which resulted in sanctions against North Korea and Iran over their nuclear programs as well as action to end conflicts in Lebanon and Sudan's Darfur region, had "shown very clearly how important the UN is for America".

"This work is a tall order. It demands a skilled and experienced diplomat ... and few Americans have distinguished themselves in this regard as much as Zal," she said.

While considered an effective diplomat, Khalilzad, a Sunni Muslim, struggled during his 18 months in Baghdad to gain the confidence of Iraq's now dominant Shiites and failed to bring about the national reconciliation that had been one of his primary duties as ambassador.

The appointment of such a high-profile figure to the UN was welcomed by some foreign policy experts as a sign that Bush intends to continue pursuing important diplomatic goals through the world body he once famously dismissed as a "debating society."

But some have worried the diplomat may focus too much on Iraq to the detriment of other pressing issues.

DOJ_NMG_0114115

Edward Luck, an expert on international organizations at Columbia University's School of International and Public Affairs, said Khalilzad's close ties to Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney would be a plus at the UN, as long as he was not seen as tasked "simply to push an American agenda regarding Iraq and a smoother exit strategy" for Washington from the embattled nation.

Rice hailed Crocker, 57, as a near perfect choice to replace Khalilzad in Baghdad.

"Few diplomats have the kind of experience in the broader Middle East that Ryan has amassed in his three decades of service," she said.

"He knows the language and the culture of the region, as well as the leaders and the societies that they lead."

Crocker will need all his diplomatic talents to carry out Bush's new policy in Iraq, which for him should focus on forging a political accommodation among Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds, while reviving moribund efforts to get the Iraqi economy back on its feet.

But he is no stranger to turmoil, having survived the 1983 bombing of the US embassy in Beirut as well as perilous assignments in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Bush Ready To Announce New Iraq Plans (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 9, 2007

President George W. Bush will announce his new war plans for Iraq in a prime-time address to the nation on Wednesday night that is expected to focus on a combined military-economic push for victory.

The final link in the reshuffled team to carry out the new strategy was revealed by the White House on Monday. Ryan Crocker, a veteran diplomat and Arabist, is to become the next US ambassador in Baghdad, replacing Zalmay Khalilzad who is nominated to fill the vacant post of envoy to the United Nations. Mr Crocker will oversee the largest US embassy, working with Lt Gen David Petraeus, the counter-insurgency expert named last week to take over from Gen George Casey as commander of multinational forces in Iraq.

Democrats in Congress have warned Mr Bush that he should not expect an easy ride in gaining approval for the emergency supplemental budget of at least $100bn (€77bn, £51bn) he is likely to request for Iraq next month.

Many Republicans are sceptical, too, saying this is the “last chance” for the Iraqi government led by Nouri al-Maliki, the Shia prime minister, whose botched handling of the execution of Saddam Hussein has lowered his standing even further in Washington.

But the appointments of Mr Crocker and Lt Gen Petraeus, both respected and already veterans of the Iraq war, will help the administration get through three weeks of tough committee hearings in the Democrat-controlled Congress.

Senator Barbara Boxer, a Democrat on the foreign relations committee, gave a taste of what lies in store, commenting in reference to Gen Casey’s early removal: “It looks like the president went shopping for a general who agreed with him.”

Lt Gen Petraeus, who led the drafting of the military’s new counter-insurgency manual, is said to have disagreed with the “light footprint” strategy of Gen Casey. He is expected to have an infusion of up to 20,000 more troops for a long-term attempt at “clear and hold” in Baghdad.

The neo-conservative camp that appears to have achieved success in lobbying Mr Bush to ramp up the US’s military and economic commitment wants the focus on clearing “high-violence Sunni and mixed Sunni-Shia neighbourhoods”.

Analysts say this approach, if adopted, would place Mr Crocker in a difficult position of carrying out the other expected half of the Bush plan, a broad-based push for reconciliation with the Sunni – the former ruling minority – backed by more money.

Mr Khalilzad, the departing ambassador, pursued this approach but ran into opposition from the Shia-dominated coalition. His background as a Sunni Muslim (he is Afghan by birth) also raised suspicions that some former officials say made his position untenable.

Mr Crocker is not only an experienced Arabist who served in hot-spots, including Beirut. He is one of the few remaining US diplomats with experience in Iran before relations were severed following the 1979 Islamic revolution.

DOJ_NMG_0114116

Mr Crocker, currently ambassador to Pakistan, was involved in successful talks with Iran in late 2001 after the fall of the Taliban in Afghanistan that led to the formation of the Karzai government.

His two predecessors in Baghdad – Mr Khalilzad and John Negroponte – both received the green light to make contact with their Iranian counterparts. It is not known if Mr Crocker will receive similar dispensation.

Tony Snow, White House spokesman, rejected suggestions that the new strategy represented the "last chance" for success. But he also dodged questions on whether Mr Bush would talk about achieving "victory". Pressed whether the speech would tackle the consequences of failure, Mr Snow said

Our 'Viceroy' To The U.N. (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

An Afghan-born Sunni Muslim, Zalmay Khalilzad would be a strong symbol in representing the U.S.

ZALMAY KHALILZAD is not the kind of soft-spoken diplomat who goes over well at the United Nations. President Bush's choice for U.S. ambassador to the U.N., dubbed "the viceroy" during his stint as ambassador to Afghanistan from 2003 to 2005, is a neoconservative hawk known for his autocratic style. Yet he is also charismatic and can be charming; certainly compared to his predecessor, he's a breath of fresh air.

Former Ambassador John R. Bolton was a spectacularly poor choice for the U.N., given that he was appointed at a time when the U.S. should have been focusing on mending fences with the international community after ignoring its reservations on the invasion of Iraq. His arrogant refusal to compromise in a forum in which compromise is a necessity for progress only exacerbated American isolation. Bush's decision in 2005 to install him as a recess appointment when it became clear that he wouldn't be approved by the Senate was an unconscionable end run around constitutional checks and balances.

Khalilzad is a polished and experienced foreign service official who is quite capable of flexibility, as he proved during tough negotiations over the governance of both Afghanistan and Iraq. Insiders expect him to sail through the Senate confirmation process.

In what would be a testament to this nation's diversity, the Afghan-born Khalilzad would become the first Muslim U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. His religious and ethnic background have strong symbolic value in countering Muslim suspicions that the U.S. is engaged in a religious crusade against Islam around the world. It also makes him particularly qualified to mediate conflicts over the best approach to such hotspots as Iran and Lebanon.

Khalilzad has been an able U.S. representative in Baghdad, even if his religious affiliation has caused some Iraqis to grumble about his allegiances. A Sunni Muslim, he has been a strong advocate for increasing Sunni participation in Iraqi politics and for cracking down on Shiite death squads accused of murderous rampages against Sunnis, going so far as to say that the militias pose the greatest threat to Iraq's stability. He is right, and Bush's choice for Khalilzad's successor in Iraq — experienced diplomat Ryan C. Crocker — will no doubt continue making this case.

U.S. Strike Targets Al-Qaida In Somalia (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

The U.S. military launched a strike against several suspected members of al-Qaida in Somalia, a government official said Monday night.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the operation's sensitivity, said at least one AC-130 gunship was used in the attack.

CNN, NBC and CBS first reported the military action. Citing Pentagon officials, CBS said the targets included the senior al-Qaida leader in East Africa and an al-Qaida operative wanted for his involvement in the 1998 bombings of the American embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

The same operatives are also believed responsible for a 2002 attack on Israeli tourists in Kenya and an attempt to shoot down an Israeli aircraft the same day, NBC News reported.

The 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania killed more than 250 people. The 2002 attack on an Israeli-owned hotel in Kenya killed 15.

DOJ_NMG_0114117

The White House on Monday night would not confirm the incident. Air Force Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Defense Department spokesman, said he could neither confirm nor deny the reports of an airstrike.

There was no confirmation that the Air Force had killed either of the al-Qaida targets.

Air Force AC-130 gunships are heavily armed aircraft with elaborate sensors that can go after discreet targets — day or night. They are operated by the Special Operations Command and have been used heavily against the Taliban in Afghanistan.

U.S. Navy vessels have been deployed off the coast of Somalia to make sure al-Qaida or allied jihadists don't escape the country, the State Department said last Wednesday.

Somalia's effective central government fell in 1991, when clan-based warlords overthrew a military dictator and then turned on each other. The government was formed two years ago with the help of the United Nations, but has been weakened by internal rifts.

Soldiers loyal to Somalia's U.N.-backed government and Ethiopia's military late last month drove out a radical Islamic group that had been in control of the country for six months.

The U.S. has believed for years that a group of al-Qaida operatives has been hiding in Somalia.

U.S. Airstrike Aims At Qaeda Cell In Somalia (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — A United States Air Force gunship carried out a strike Sunday night against suspected operatives of Al Qaeda in southern Somalia, a senior Pentagon official said Monday night.

The attack by an AC-130 gunship, which is operated by the Special Forces Command, is believed to have produced multiple casualties, the official said. It was not known Monday night whether the casualties included members of a Qaeda cell that American officials have long suspected was hiding in Somalia.

Special Forces units operating from an American base in Djibouti are conducting a hunt for Qaeda operatives who have been forced to flee Mogadishu, the Somali capital, since Islamic militants were driven from there by an Ethiopian military offensive last month.

The American attack was first reported by CBS News.

The Special Forces attack is the first military action in Somalia that Pentagon officials have acknowledged since American troops departed the lawless country in the wake of the infamous “Black Hawk Down” episode in 1993, when 18 American soldiers were killed in street fighting in Mogadishu.

American officials have long suspected that a handful of Qaeda suspects responsible for the 1998 embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania have been hiding inside Somalia, a country that has not had a central government since 1991.

The search for the terrorist suspects has driven American policy toward Somalia for several years.

Earlier this year, the Central Intelligence Agency began making cash payments to a group of Somali warlords who pledged to help hunt down members of the Qaeda cell.

After Islamist militias took control of Mogadishu in the summer, officials in Washington charged that the Islamists had ties to the terror suspects, and made demands for their handover to American custody.

The Ethiopian military offensive that began last month recently drove the Islamists from the seaside Somali capital, raising hopes within Washington that the Qaeda operatives might surface as they fled the protection of the Islamists. The Islamists have retreated to areas around the southern port city of Kismayo. Ethiopian officials have said they have intelligence reports that members of the Qaeda cell were hiding near the city.

The AC-130 gunship is a heavily armed propeller plane that, because of its slow speed, operates primarily at night and can direct an immense barrage of gunfire onto a target as it circles overhead.

The attack against suspected Qaeda operatives is the sort of targeted operation that senior Bush administration officials have been pressing the Special Operation Command, based in Tampa, Fla., to undertake in recent years.

But officials have said that Special Operations forces have had difficulty carrying out targeted strikes in the past because of the difficulty establishing the whereabouts of wanted terrorists or getting forces in place when a suspected militant is located.

DOJ_NMG_0114118

The Central Intelligence Agency has killed a small number of suspected Qaeda members, using a pilotless drone armed with a missile. Among them were five people killed in Yemen in 2002.

U.S. Warplanes Fly Missions Over Somalia (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, January 9, 2007

In a further escalation of American involvement in Somalia, the USS Dwight D. Eisenhower arrived off the war-ravaged country's coast and its aircraft have begun flying intelligence-gathering missions over Somalia, the military said Tuesday.

The U.S. Central Command reassigned the aircraft carrier to Somalia last week from its mission supporting NATO-led forces in Afghanistan, said U.S. Navy spokesman Lt. Cmdr. Charlie Brown in Bahrain, where the Navy's Fifth Fleet is based.

The announcement comes a day after at least one U.S. Special Forces AC-130 gunship carried out a strike against several suspected members of al-Qaida in Somalia. Brown said the Navy had no supporting role in the attack.

The carrier joins three other U.S. warships — two guided-missile cruisers and an amphibious landing ship — already conducting anti-terror operations off the Somali coast.

Brown said he did not know how long the Eisenhower's redeployment would last. "We'll be there as long as required," he told The Associated Press.

Soldiers loyal to Somalia's U.N.-backed government and Ethiopia's military late last month drove out a radical Islamic group that had been in control of the country for six months.

The U.S. military dispatched the Eisenhower from its battle station in the Arabian Sea to the Indian Ocean coastal waters of Somalia "due to rapidly developing events in Somalia," the Bahrain-based Fifth Fleet announced in a statement.

Brown said the guided missile cruisers USS Bunker Hill and USS Anzio and the amphibious landing ship USS Ashland were already patrolling the Somali coast in search of al-Qaida members thought to be fleeing Somalia in the wake of Ethiopia's December invasion.

Navy crews aboard the Bunker Hill, Anzio and Ashland have been boarding and searching commercial ships off the Somali coast, Brown said. No terror suspects have been found aboard any of the ships, he said.

"That's a sign that what we're doing is working," Brown said. "We're trying to deter the terrorists from using the sea. If we haven't detained anyone, that shows us that it's working."

The Eisenhower's complement of F/A-18 Hornet and Superhornet fighter-bombers, EA-6B Prowler electronic warfare aircraft and E-2C Hawkeye airborne command-and-control craft had been operating over Afghanistan, Brown said. The Eisenhower also carries H-60 helicopters.

U.S. Strike In Somalia Targets Al-Qaeda Figure (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

A U.S. Air Force AC-130 gunship attacked suspected al-Qaeda members in southern Somalia on Sunday, and U.S. sources said the operation may have hit a senior terrorist figure.

The strike took place near the Kenyan border, according to a senior officer at the Pentagon. Other sources said it was launched at night from the U.S. military facility in neighboring Djibouti. It was based on joint military-CIA intelligence and on information provided by Ethiopian and Kenyan military forces operating in the border area.

It was the first acknowledged U.S. military action inside Somalia since 1994, when President Bill Clinton withdrew U.S. troops after a failed operation in Mogadishu that led to the deaths of 18 Army Rangers and Delta Force special operations soldiers.

Sources said last night that initial reports indicated the attack had been successful, although information was still scanty.

"You had some figures on the move in a relatively unpopulated part of the country," said one source confirming the attack, who, like several others, would discuss the operation only on the condition of anonymity. "It was a confluence of information and circumstances," he said. The attack was first reported by CBS News.

DOJ_NMG_0114119

One target of the strike, sources said, was Abu Talha al-Sudani, a Sudanese who is married to a Somali woman and has lived in Somalia since 1993 -- the year of the attack against U.S. troops that was chronicled in the book and movie "Black Hawk Down." In a 2001 U.S. court case against Osama bin Laden, Sudani was described by a leading witness as an explosives expert who was close to the al-Qaeda leader.

More recently, Sudani was identified by U.S. intelligence as a close associate of Gouled Hassan Dourad, head of a Mogadishu-based network that operated in support of al-Qaeda in Somalia. Dourad is one of 14 "high-value" prisoners transferred last September from CIA "black sites" to the U.S. military base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The Office of the Director of National Intelligence then disclosed that Dourad "worked for the East African al-Qaeda cell led by . . . al-Sudani" and carried out at least one mission for him, related to a plan to bomb the U.S. military base in Djibouti.

Others have identified Sudani as the financier for Fazul Abdullah Mohammed and Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan, believed responsible for the 1998 bombing of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. All are among the senior al-Qaeda operatives the Bush administration has charged were sheltered by Somalian Islamic fundamentalists controlling Mogadishu, the country's capital. They are believed to have fled late last month when Ethiopian troops drove the fundamentalists out of the capital and toward the Kenyan border.

The Bush administration has been leading an international diplomatic effort to stabilize Somalia, including organizing an African peacekeeping force. It has called on leaders of Somalia's new transitional government to negotiate a power-sharing arrangement with moderate members of the Islamic leadership who are not seen as terrorist facilitators and who are supported by a significant segment of Somali clans.

Neither effort has met with much success. African countries have been reluctant to offer troops and the new Somalian leaders have resisted negotiations.

Sources would not confirm that U.S. forces are operating on the ground along the border between Somalia and Kenya, although one emphasized that "we are working very, very closely" with Kenyan forces.

The aircraft carrier USS Eisenhower was deployed in the Indian Ocean to provide air cover for the operation and, if needed, to evacuate downed airmen and other casualties. It joined several Navy ships from the Fifth Fleet, based in Bahrain, that have been patrolling the area to prevent al-Qaeda members from fleeing Somalia by sea, a Navy spokesman said. Approximately 1,500 U.S. personnel, including Special Operations forces, are assigned to the Djibouti-based Combined Joint Task Force-Horn of Africa.

The AC-130 gunship is a heavily armed aircraft, with four cannons and a six-barrel Gatling gun capable of firing 1,800 rounds a minute. But its most striking weapon is a computer-operated 105mm howitzer that juts sideways from the middle of the aircraft. An offensive behemoth that is relatively defenseless against counterattack, it is flown only at night.

The Bush administration has long claimed the right to launch discrete military attacks in other countries when terrorist targets have been identified.

A strike by a U.S. Predator drone was ordered by the CIA last January in response to intelligence placing Ayman al-Zawahiri, the second-ranking al-Qaeda leader and bin Laden's chief deputy, at a compound near the Afghanistan border in Pakistan. The attack killed a reported 17 people, including six women and six children, but not Zawahiri, who apparently was not at the compound at the time.

U.S. Strike In Somalia Aims At 3 Fugitives (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — Under cover of the Ethiopian move into Somalia, U.S. officials launched an intensive effort to capture or kill three key suspects in the bombings of U.S. embassies in Africa more than eight years ago that killed 224 people.

A U.S. Air Force Special Operations gunship struck a location in southern Somalia where some of the suspects were believed to be hiding, a U.S. Defense Department official said Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0114120

Witnesses and Somalian government officials said there were many people killed or wounded but that they had no exact numbers. U.S. military and counter-terrorism officials said they did not know whether the strike, made within the previous 24 hours, killed any of the three fugitives.

"It's not clear what the outcome is at this point," said the counter-terrorism official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the operation was classified.

Abdirahman Dinari, the Somalian government spokesman, said early reports suggested that among the dead were several leaders of the fleeing Islamic Courts Union recently driven from the capital, Mogadishu, along with "one of the leaders of Al Qaeda in East Africa." He declined to identify the leader.

The strikes targeted small villages in the vicinity of the port city of Kismayo, he said.

"The explosions shook our village," said Hussein Abdi, a resident of Afmadow. He said refugees from a nearby village told him at least six were killed.

A government official in Kismayo said soldiers captured 28 suspected Islamist fighters amid the chaos.

Dinari said leaders of the transitional government requested U.S. support and were aware of the impending strike.

U.S. officials have secretly been negotiating with Somalian clans who are believed to have sheltered the three embassy bombing suspects, hoping to obtain information about their locations. It could not be determined Monday whether the airstrike was based on information provided by the clans.

A U.S. intelligence official said it was unlikely that all three fugitives were traveling together but added that U.S. military operatives had been tracking the men for some time, waiting for an opportunity to strike.

"They were on the move, it was a thinly populated area, and this is what you got," the official said, adding that the AC-130 gunship used in the attack "is not the kind of weapon you generally deploy in downtown Mogadishu."

"This thing does some violence; it would not be the most surgical event," the official said.

The gunship was based in Djibouti, just north of Somalia. The strike was first reported by CBS News and independently confirmed by The Times.

CIA, FBI and military teams have been tracking the men, particularly their alleged leader, Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, for years, but the fugitives have proved elusive.

U.S. officials and their African and European allies in the negotiations believe that one Somalian sub-clan in particular has been harboring Mohammed and his associates, whom the U.S. describes as the leaders of an East African Al Qaeda cell. Mohammed, a native of the Indian Ocean island nation of Comoros, faces terrorism charges in the United States that could bring the death penalty if he is captured and convicted.

Intelligence gathered over the last week indicates that Mohammed and aides Abu Taha al Sudani of Sudan and Saleh Ali Saleh Nabhan of Kenya recently fled their haven in Mogadishu and headed for the Kenyan border as Ethiopian troops entered the capital and routed the Islamic militias that controlled it.

U.S. officials believe that influential members of the Ayr sub-clan, which they say has sheltered the three, have been in touch with the fugitives. Clan members could provide their pursuers with detailed intelligence about where the men might go and who else within their network of extremists might be hiding them, according to several U.S. counter-terrorism and diplomatic officials familiar with the negotiations.

"We are working through the clans to get at these people," one U.S. diplomatic official said. "That's a political reality in Somalia. The clan is the biggest institution, as much as there are any institutions."

But negotiations with the militant Ayr could raise questions about whether the Bush administration is bargaining with terrorists or those harboring them. The U.S. diplomatic official denied that, saying that engaging the groups, either directly or through intermediaries, was the only realistic way of gathering useful intelligence on the men and perhaps apprehending them.

Mohammed, who has a $5-million U.S. bounty on his head, was indicted in 1998 by a federal grand jury along with Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and others for his alleged role in the bombings that year of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

U.S. officials also accuse the three fugitives of involvement in the 2002 bombing of a hotel in which 15 people were killed and an attempt to shoot down an Israeli airliner, both near the Kenyan port city of Mombasa.

DOJ_NMG_0114121

It remains unclear whether U.S. authorities would take any of the three men into custody if captured, because Kenya and other countries also have expressed interest in trying them.

Officials said they could not discuss the details of the talks with Somalian clans, saying they were extremely sensitive and being conducted at a particularly delicate time. The International Contact Group on Somalia, composed of the U.S. and European and African nations, has recently begun working to disarm the various Somalian factions and provide foreign aid.

Although no one is offering clan leaders amnesty for harboring suspected Al Qaeda operatives, U.S. officials said, the negotiations aim for something just short of that, such as inclusion in the political process in exchange for cooperation on the counter-terrorism front.

The Islamic Courts Union, which last year seized control of Mogadishu and other key Somalian cities, is made up of at least 15 small, clan-based "courts," some of which are moderate, others showing signs of militancy. U.S. officials believe the Ayr sub-clan plays important roles in the Islamic courts, and that at least one of its influential members has direct ties to senior Al Qaeda leaders in Afghanistan, according to U.S. intelligence officials and reports by independent terrorism analysts.

Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, an Ayr cleric who has been instrumental in establishing and running the Islamic Courts Union, is wanted by the U.S. government for allegedly having ties to Al Qaeda leaders, including Bin Laden.

U.S. officials say Aden Hashi Farah Ayro, a young Ayr leader in charge of one of the union's most violent militias, received military training at an Al Qaeda camp in Afghanistan before the U.S.-led military invasion of that country in late 2001.

Ayr leaders have publicly denied such allegations.

U.S. officials described the hunt for the suspected Al Qaeda operatives as confounding, as they tried to figure out who could speak for the clan, whom to trust and who could deliver intelligence on the fugitives or hand them over to authorities.

One of those intermediaries is apparently Somalian Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi, who held a closed-door meeting Jan. 2 with Ayr leaders at a Mogadishu hotel and requested that they hand over their weapons and support the United Nations-backed transitional government he heads.

Jendayi E. Frazer, the U.S. assistant secretary of State in charge of African affairs, was unavailable for comment, as she was returning Monday from Nairobi, the Kenyan capital, where she had been part of the International Contact Group meeting, a spokesman said.

In congressional testimony in June, Frazer said the three suspects posed "an immediate threat to both Somali and international interests in the Horn of Africa…. We must deny them the ability to plan and operate."

She added at the time that the administration was "constantly reviewing and updating our approach to reflect the fluid dynamics inside Somalia," and that it would "continue working with Somalis, regardless of clan, religious or secular affiliation."

John Prendergast, a former Africa policy official in the National Security Council and State Department under President Clinton, said he was skeptical of the secretive talks.

Prendergast, who visits Somalia frequently as a senior advisor at the nonprofit International Crisis Group, said the clans are deeply mistrustful of the Bush administration, particularly because of clandestine efforts by the CIA to fund some warlords and undermine the authority of others.

Also, Prendergast said, though clan members may support the three fugitives, they don't control them and are extremely unlikely to engage in any betrayal of them unless other powerful Somalian clans and political leaders promise a significant prize in return.

What's more, Prendergast said, the fugitives have managed to elude capture for nearly a decade and are not likely to sit around and wait for someone to turn them in. "I'd be surprised if those guys didn't get out of the way a long time ago. They'd be stupid to have hung around this long," he said.

Interim Leader Rejects U.S. Approach In Somalia (MCT)

By Shashank Bengali

McClatchy, January 9, 2007

NAIROBI, Kenya - In a rebuff to the United States, Somalia's interim president, Abdullahi Yusuf, on Monday rejected U.S. requests to bring moderate Islamists into his weak transitional government.

DOJ_NMG_0114122

Negotiations with Islamists "will not happen," he told Al Jazeera television before flying to Mogadishu, Somalia's lawless seaside capital. "We will crack down on the terrorists in any place around the nation."

Yusuf had indicated the opposite position in meetings in the Kenyan capital over the weekend with assistant U.S. secretary of state Jendayi Frazer, U.S. officials said.

There was no immediate reaction from U.S. officials, but Yusuf's remarks underscored the difficulties that Western governments face as they try to shore up Somalia's fragile regime after Ethiopian troops ousted Somalia's popular Islamist rulers last month.

Frazer, the top U.S. diplomat for Africa, had said late Sunday in Nairobi that Yusuf's government, which was formed by an international conference in 2004 and has never controlled Mogadishu, needed to bring moderate Islamists into the regime.

"I support reaching out to the ... Islamic Courts," Frazer said. "We see a role in the future of Somalia for all who renounce violence and extremism."

The message signaled a more conciliatory U.S. stance on the Islamic Courts Movement, which had seized Mogadishu in June from U.S.-backed warlords. Initially U.S. officials based in Kenya had some contact with moderates within the movement, including Sheik Sherif Ahmed, a geography teacher who emerged as their leader.

But Ahmed soon was edged out by hard-liners, led by suspected al-Qaida operative Hassan Dahir Aweys, who laid claims to territory in neighboring countries and called for jihad against Ethiopia. Frazer made a series of statements starting in November claiming that al-Qaida terrorists had overrun the courts movement.

U.S. officials think that the militants are sheltering three terrorists who masterminded the 1998 attacks on U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. The Bush administration is widely thought to have given neighboring, Christian-led Ethiopia the green light to expel the Islamists.

The whereabouts of Sherif Ahmed, Aweys and other top Islamist leaders remained uncertain Monday as Ethiopian and Kenyan troops continued to pursue remnants of the fleeing Islamist militias in a heavily wooded area of southern Somalia, near the border with Kenya.

Analysts who had been critical of U.S. policy in Somalia said the Bush administration might be focusing on achieving political stability there after years of being preoccupied with preventing al-Qaida cells from taking root.

"If the U.S. is indeed doing more than making a few public statements in support of dialogue with moderates, then it does represent a shift in the public face of its policy," said John Prendergast, senior adviser to the International Crisis Group, a research center on global conflict.

The Islamists' ouster left a power vacuum in Mogadishu, where the transitional government has little support. The city's powerful Hawiye clan accuses Yusuf, who's of a rival clan, of being a puppet of Ethiopia.

"If southern Somalia is to stabilize, it is essential that the transitional government hold substantial power-sharing talks with the Hawiye clan elders and Islamic Courts officials," Prendergast said.

Trying to sweeten the deal, the U.S. has pledged $40 million in new aid to Somalia, including $14 million to support a proposed African peacekeeping mission. Frazer said the money wasn't conditional on the transitional government negotiating with the Islamists.

Rain Slows U.S. Offensive (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

30 Tamuz , Iraq — A five-day-old offensive into the troubled rural region east of Baghdad bogged down in the mud Monday after U.S. forces staged a bombardment of a warren of tunnels and canals where Sunni Arab insurgents were believed to be holed up.

An icy downpour turned rural dirt lanes into muck that stuck to boots and wheels like cement and stopped heavy armored American vehicles. U.S. commanders poised for what they described as a final push against al-Qaida in Iraq militants fired phosphorous shells to burn dead weeds and sent out foot patrols to search through fields and farm buildings. Despite the adverse conditions, U.S. military officials remained optimistic about their offensive in Diyala province.

DOJ_NMG_0114123

"Time is on our side," said Capt. Stephen Dobbins, a troop commander in the 5th squadron, 73rd Cavalry. "If the enemy is there in the canals they're running out of food, and we have just bombed the hell out of them."

U.S. and Iraqi forces have swept through sprawling farmland, combing isolated hamlets for fighters, weapons and intelligence. Soldiers have found numerous arms caches in the mostly Sunni 30 Tamuz village. One man led soldiers to a canal at the back of his house and pulled an AK-47 assault rifle and a magazine from the murky depths.

Most of the village's families have abandoned their homes or left only women and children behind since U.S. planes dropped leaflets last week indicating they were on their way.

U.S. soldiers had faced fierce resistance when they last pressed through the region in November, following the discovery of large weapons caches during reconnaissance flights. Highly trained fighters including organized squad-sized bands fought the Americans.

In the new offensive, about 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi government forces are on the move, backed with air support. On Sunday, the U.S. military said, 21 armed men were killed and a stash containing 1,169 Katyusha rockets, small arms and ammunition was uncovered.

Before dawn Monday, U.S. aircraft unleashed strikes in the region that continued into mid-morning, sending orange fireballs into the sky.

Throughout the day, soldiers observed small groups of men maneuvering through nearby canals. In one case, they said, it appeared that four insurgents were practicing an attack.

Insurgents have riddled the main roads leading to their hideouts with anti-tank mines, part of an elaborate defense system. After U.S. and Iraqi forces rolled through, they said individuals were seen planting mines in the road for their return.

"The IEDS are bad, the mud is worse," said Specialist Richard Cooper, still joking after spending more than an hour trying to maneuver a Humvee down a mud-slicked road.

As vehicles skidded and sank in the mud, Staff Sgt. Allen Brown, the squadron supply officer, rolled up in a Humvee to deliver diesel fuel to a mortar truck stranded in the muck. As a soldier tossed the jerry-cans to the other side of the canal, Brown popped his head out of the gun turret and yelled, "Welcome to hell."

"Any chance for some gloves?" shouted back Staff Sgt. Steve Robert Lynn, whose hands were red and raw from the cold. "I fell in the mud -- my gloves are useless now."

"Sure," Brown replied with a grin. "I got plenty back at Base Caldwell, drop by any time."

Lynn spent the better part of the day extracting his truck and a trailer full off mortar tubes and other equipment after they had slipped down an incline into a field. "It's not mud, it's slush."

A local farmer finally came to his aid, providing a tractor to haul out Lynn's trailer and a number of other vehicles.

As the temperature dropped to the low 30s and it started to rain again, soldiers kept themselves warm as best they could. A U.S. gunner wrapped himself in a plastic sheet inside his turret as a group of Iraqis huddled in the mud underneath the open-topped personnel carrier.

As darkness fell, soldiers pulled out sleeping bags and settled down in their trucks for a few hours of rest in between guard shifts.

Hussein's Voice Speaks In Court In Praise Of Atrocities (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 8 — The courtroom he dominated for 15 months seemed much smaller on Monday without him there to mock the judges and assert his menacing place in history.

But the thick, high-register voice of Saddam Hussein was unmistakable. In audio recordings made years ago and played 10 days after his hanging, Mr. Hussein was heard justifying the use of chemical weapons against the Iraqi Kurds in the late 1980s, predicting they would kill "thousands" and saying he alone among Iraq's leaders had the authority to order chemical attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0114124

In the history of prosecutions against some of the last century's grimmest men, there can rarely have been a moment that so starkly caught a despot's unpitying nature.

On one recording, Mr. Hussein presses the merits of chemical weapons on Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, his vice-president, and now, the Americans believe, the fugitive leader of the Sunni insurgency that has tied down thousands of American troops. Mr. Douri, a notorious hard-liner, asks whether chemical attacks will be effective against civilian populations, and suggests that they might stir an international outcry.

"Yes, they're very effective if people don't wear masks," Mr. Hussein replies.

"You mean they will kill thousands?" Mr. Douri asks.

"Yes, they will kill thousands," Mr. Hussein says.

Before he was hanged Dec. 30 for offenses in another case, Mr. Hussein had used the so-called Anfal trial, involving the massacre of as many as 180,000 Iraqi Kurds, as a platform for arguing that the chemical weapons attacks of the kind that devastated the town of Halabja on March 16, 1988, were carried out by Iranian forces then fighting Iraq in an eight-year war.

But the recordings told another story. Court officials gave no hint as to how they obtained the recordings, which Iraqis familiar with Mr. Hussein's voice said seemed to be authentic. But they appeared to have been made during meetings of his Revolutionary Command Council and of the Baath Party High Command, two groups that acted as rubber stamps for his decisions. Mr. Hussein regularly ordered meetings to be recorded, according to Iraqis who knew the inner workings of Mr. Hussein's dictatorship.

Mr. Hussein sounds matter of fact as he describes what chemical weapons will do. "They will prevent people eating and drinking the local water, and they won't be able to sleep in their beds," he says. "They will force people to leave their homes and make them uninhabitable until they have been decontaminated."

As for the concern about international reaction, he assures Mr. Douri that only he will order the attacks. "I don't know if you know this, Comrade Izzat, but chemical weapons are not used unless I personally give the orders," he says.

When Iraq resumed the genocide trial of its former leaders on Monday, Mr. Hussein's high-backed, black vinyl seat at the front of the dock was left ominously empty. Something about the six remaining defendants, including Ali Hassan al-Majid, Mr. Hussein's cousin, who was known among Iraqis as Chemical Ali for his role in overseeing the attacks on the Kurds, suggested that they felt orphaned without the commanding presence of Mr. Hussein.

Gone were the cries of "Mr. President!" as Mr. Hussein entered the court to join them in the dock, and gone, too, was the emboldened posture they took from Mr. Hussein, with frequent challenges and insults to witnesses, prosecutors and judges. Perhaps Mr. Hussein's hanging, and the humiliating taunts he endured from witnesses and guards as he stood with the noose around his neck, had broken the last illusions among those surviving him that they could somehow evade a similar end.

When the chief judge, Muhammad Ureibi al-Khalifa, began the proceedings by abruptly cutting the microphone as Mr. Majid stood to intone a prayer in memory of Mr. Hussein, the former dictator seemed to be judicially, as well as existentially, dead. But the anticlimactic beginning swiftly gave way to the most astonishing day of testimony since Mr. Hussein and his associates went on trial. Once more, it was Mr. Hussein, this time in an involuntary orgy of self-incrimination, who dominated.

In the sequence of scratchy recordings — some with the dialogue quite clear, some barely decipherable — Mr. Hussein repeatedly showed the ready resort to brutality that seized Iraq with fear during his 24 years in power. At one point, he is heard telling a general to summarily execute field commanders who fail to adequately prepare their defenses against Kurdish guerrilla raids.

He cites as a precedent "some commanders who abandoned their positions when they found themselves in an awkward situation, who deserved to have their necks cut, and did." At another point, he tells subordinates to execute any internal security officials who fail to stop Iraqi soldiers sneaking home from the Iranian front on fake passes.

"If you arrest any of them, cut off their heads," he says. "Show no mercy. They only joined the security to avoid having to join the army and fight Iran."

One recording revealed, more clearly than anything before, Mr. Hussein's personal involvement in covering up Iraq's attempts to acquire weapons of mass destruction, the program that ultimately led to President Bush sending American troops to overthrow him. Talking to the general who led Iraq's dealings with United Nations weapons inspectors until weeks before the 2003 invasion, he counseled caution in the figures being divulged on the extent of Iraq's raw supplies for chemical weapons, so as to disguise the use of unaccounted-for chemicals in the attacks on the Kurds.

DOJ_NMG_0114125

But it was Mr. Hussein's chilling discussion of the power of chemical weapons against civilians that brought prosecutors and judges to the verge of tears, and seemed to shock the remaining defendants. One of the recordings featured an unidentified military officer telling Mr. Hussein that a plan was under development for having Soviet-built aircraft carry containers, packed with up to 50 napalm bombs each, which would be rolled out of the cargo deck and dropped on Kurdish towns.

"Yes, in areas where you have concentrated populations, that would be useful," Mr. Hussein replies.

Another recording involves a General Thabit, who was not further identified by the prosecutors, telling Mr. Hussein that his forces had used chemical weapons in the northern sector of Kurdistan, but that "our supplies of the weapons were low, and we didn't make good use of the ones we had." The general notes that Iraq's production of mustard gas and sarin, a nerve gas, was "very low," and says they should be used sparingly. "We're keeping what we have for the future," he says.

Before they recovered enough to begin pleading their innocence, Mr. Hussein's erstwhile companions in the dock buried their heads in their hands, gazed at the floor, and glanced furtively toward TV cameras transmitting live coverage of the trial. Mr. Majid shifted uneasily in his seat as one recording had him telling officials to warn Kurdish refugees that they would be attacked with chemical weapons if they attempted to return to their villages.

The prosecutor, Munkith al-Faroun, came to court as almost the only person who attended Mr. Hussein's execution on Dec. 30 to emerge with an unsullied reputation. It was he, as he and others confirmed, who attempted to halt the taunts hurled at Mr. Hussein as he stood with the noose around his neck, moments before the trapdoor opened. Over the hubbub, an illicit camera phone recording showed Mr. Faroun calling out for silence, "Please, no!" he said. "The man is about to be executed."

But back in the courtroom, Mr. Faroun became, again, the man holding Mr. Hussein to account and, in one poignant moment, counseling restraint among those who have expressed outrage over the manner of the former ruler's execution. That moment came after the court watched television images taken after the Halabja attack, which more than any other event focused world attention on the atrocities committed under Mr. Hussein.

The video showed the horrors: a father wailing in grief as he found his children lying along a street littered with bodies; dead mothers clutching gas-choked infants to their breasts in swaddling clothes; young sisters embracing each other in death; and trucks piled high with civilian bodies. "I ask the whole world to look at these images, especially those who are crying right now," Mr. Faroun said, referring to the outpouring of sympathy for Mr. Hussein.

The recordings played at Monday's trial session, seemingly eliminating any doubt about Mr. Hussein's role in the attacks on the Kurds, may go a long way to answering criticism of the government for executing him before he was judged for the worst of his crimes.

American justice department lawyers, who have done much of the behind-the-scenes work in sifting tons of documents and other evidence gathered after the invasion of 2003, had never hinted that they held the trump card, judicially and historically, that the audio recordings seem likely to be.

Saddam's Voice, Aura Still Fill Courtroom (WT/AP)

By Lauren Frayer

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Saddam Hussein had been dead nine days but his voice resounded through the courtroom yesterday as he and his cousin "Chemical Ali" discussed killing thousands of Kurds in the 1980s, according to audiotapes played at their war-crimes trial.

Saddam's physical presence was gone -- his chair in the white metal pen where the defendants sit was empty -- but his aura still hung over the proceedings against his former regime members.

The trial reconvened for the first time since Dec. 21 and a little more than a week since Saddam was hanged for the killing of 148 Shi'ites after an assassination attempt in the town of Dujail in 1982.

Meanwhile, new video of Saddam's corpse shortly after the hanging was posted on the Internet. It showed a gaping wound on Saddam's neck, with his head unnaturally twisted at a 90-degree angle to his right.

DOJ_NMG_0114126

The court's first order of business yesterday was to dismiss all charges against Saddam. His co-defendants -- including his cousin Ali Hassan al-Majid, known as "Chemical Ali" -- remain in the dock on charges of killing 180,000 Kurds in the 1980s as Iraq fought a protracted war with Iran.

Prosecutor Munqith al-Faroon aired graphic video of scores of bodies in trucks and in piles on the street, overlaid with a voice purported to be that of al-Majid saying, "I will hit them with chemical weapons."

"Damn the international community if they say anything. I will strike them all with chemical weapons," the voice continued.

Another audiotape had a voice identified as Saddam's warning, "These weapons are used only at my orders." He also reassured colleagues that the weapons "kill by the thousands."

"It will force them out of their homes without water or food. It makes them evacuate their homes naked," the voice said.

In court, al-Majid described the video as painful, but said it showed the work of Iranian troops, not Iraqis. As for the audio, al-Majid did not deny the voices were his and Saddam's.

The tapes "not only condemn me, but the whole path that I was part of -- the path of Saddam Hussein," al-Majid said.

Legal analysts said they hoped Saddam's six co-defendants would be more forthcoming with the dictator no longer listening.

Also yesterday, the U.S. military announced the deaths of two more American soldiers: one from combat wounds in Salahuddin province, which includes Saddam's hometown, and another from small-arms fire north of Baghdad.

Iraqi police, meanwhile, reported the discovery of 27 tortured bodies in the capital and the deaths of 23 other persons, including nine Shi'ite workers shot in a minibus on their way to the Baghdad airport.

Meanwhile, in Geneva, the U.N. refugee agency made an emergency appeal yesterday for $60 million to help the 40,000 to 50,000 Iraqis who flee their homes every month and the 3.7 million who have been displaced.

"The current exodus is the largest long-term population movement in the Middle East since the displacement of Palestinians following the creation of Israel in 1948," said the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

Court Drops Kurd Charges Against Saddam (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

Saddam Hussein's trial for the killing of 180,000 Kurds in the 1980s resumed Monday with the late dictator's seat empty, nine days after he went to the gallows. The court's first order of business was to drop all charges against Saddam.

Six co-defendants still face charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity stemming from a military campaign code-named Operation Anfal during the 1980-88 Iraq-Iran war.

Shortly after the court reconvened Monday, a bailiff called out the names of the accused and the six men walked silently into the courtroom one after another.

Chief Judge Mohammed Oreibi al-Khalifa said the court decided to stop all legal action against the former president, since "the death of defendant Saddam was confirmed."

All seven defendants in the Anfal case, including Saddam, had pleaded innocent to charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity. Saddam and one other man also pleaded innocent to the additional charge of genocide.

Saddam was sentenced to death for the killing of 148 Shiites and hanged on Dec. 30 in a chaotic execution that has drawn global criticism for the Shiite-dominated government. An illicit video from inside the former leader's execution chamber showed him being taunted on the gallows.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair believed the manner in which Saddam was executed was "completely wrong," his office said Sunday.

"He believes that the manner of the execution was completely wrong, but that should not lead us to forget the crimes that Saddam Hussein committed, including the deaths of hundreds of thousands of Iraqis," a spokeswoman for Blair's office said on condition of anonymity in line with policy.

Human Rights Watch said Saddam's speedy execution illustrated the Iraqi government's disregard for human rights, and urged Iraqi officials to halt two upcoming hangings.

DOJ_NMG_0114127

"The tribunal repeatedly showed its disregard for the fundamental due process rights of all of the defendants," said Richard Dicker, director of Human Rights Watch's International Justice Program.

Saddam's half brother and former intelligence chief, Barzan Ibrahim, and former head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court, Awad Hamed al-Bandar, were sentenced to death after being convicted along with Saddam of involvement in the killings in the town of Dujail after a 1982 assassination attempt there against Saddam.

Their executions were postponed, however, until after the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Adha, which ended six days ago. They were expected in the coming days, though Jaafar al-Mousawi, the chief prosecutor in the separate Dujail case, said the timing would "be determined by the government."

Sami al-Askari, an adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, declined to give reasons for the delay and said only that "no date has been made yet" for al-Bandar and Ibrahim's hangings.

The six remaining defendants in the Anfal case _ all senior members of Saddam's ousted regime _ include his cousin Ali Hassan al-Majid, known as "Chemical Ali" for his alleged use of chemical weapons against Iraqi Kurds.

As al-Majid took his seat in court Monday, he tried to turn on his microphone to speak publicly. The judge quickly shut it off, preventing him from being heard.

The other defendants are former Defense Minister Sultan Hashim al-Tai, who was the commander of Task Force Anfal and head of the Iraqi army 1st Corps; Sabir al-Douri, Saddam's military intelligence chief; Taher Tawfiq al-Ani, former governor of Mosul and head of the Northern Affairs Committee; Hussein Rashid Mohammed, former deputy director of operations for the Iraqi Armed Forces and Farhan Mutlaq Saleh, former head of military intelligence's eastern regional office.

Legal experts said the Anfal trial would proceed more smoothly without Saddam.

"The trial will be more elastic and easy. It will clarify and expose more facts because Saddam Hussein's disappearance from dock will encourage other defendants to mention some facts that they were afraid to divulge when he was with them," said Tariq Harb, an Iraqi lawyer and legal expert.

In Monday's session, prosecutor Munqith al-Faroon presented a document allegedly signed by al-Ani, calling for the execution of 10 members of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, the party headed by current Iraqi President Jalal Talabani. Al-Ani later denied the handwriting was his.

"This is not my signature and I'm sure of that," he told the court.

The prosecutor also aired a video showing the aftermath of chemical weapons attacks on Kurdish areas, with dozens of dead men, women and children. Accompanying audio allegedly contained the voice of al-Majid saying "I will hit them with chemical (weapons)."

Another audiotape was played for the court, allegedly with Saddam saying, "These weapons are only used at my orders."

Violence continued Monday, with nine people killed in an ambush near Baghdad's airport. Gunmen attacked a bus full of workers en route to the airport, showering them with bullets, a hospital paramedic said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk to reporters. The victims were mainly Shiite Muslims from Baghdad's Sadr City neighborhood, the official said.

The U.S. military also reported the deaths of two American soldiers north of Baghdad a day earlier.

Six bodies were discovered in the primarily Sunni neighborhood of Dora in southern Baghdad, police said. They were a father and his three sons, and a mother and her son, who had been returning to Baghdad from relatives' funerals in Najaf, a police officer said on condition of anonymity out of security concerns.

A tribal council chief was kidnapped near Samarra, on his way home from the Muslim pilgrimage to Mecca, said Capt. Muthanna Ibrahim, director of the Salahaddin governor's office. Samarra is 60 miles north of Baghdad.

New Video Of Saddam's Corpse On Internet (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

AP, January 9, 2007

A new video of Saddam Hussein's corpse, with a gaping neck wound, was posted on the Internet early Tuesday, the second leaked release of clandestine pictures from the former leader's hanging.

DOJ_NMG_0114128

The video appeared to have been taken with a camera phone, like the graphic video of the hanging which showed guards taunting Saddam in the final moments of his life.

The footage pans up the shrouded body of the former leader from the feet. It apparently was taken shortly after Saddam was executed and placed on a gurney. He was hanged shortly before dawn on Dec. 30.

As the panning shot reaches the head region, the white shroud is pulled back and reveals Saddam's head and neck.

His head is unnaturally twisted at a 90 degree angle to his right. It shows a gaping bloody wound, circular in shape, about an inch below his jaw line on the left side of his neck. His left cheek is marked with red blotches, and there is blood on the shroud where it covered his head.

The newest video leak was likely to increase the angry reaction over the way the execution was carried out. There already has been a global outcry about the undignified manner in which the Shiite-dominated government hanged Saddam, a Sunni.

The 27-second video was posted on an Iraqi news Web site that is known to support Saddam's outlawed Baath Party.

"A new film of the late immortal martyr, President Saddam Hussein," the web site said in a headline over a link to the video.

Voices could be heard on the video. As the shroud is pulled back, one voice says, "Hurry up, hurry up. I'm going to count from one to four. One, two ... . Hurry up you're going to get us into a catastrophe."

Then another voice, apparently the man taking the pictures, says, "Just one second, just one second, Abu Ali. I'm about finished."

Then a third voice says, "Abu Ali, you take care of this."

It was the second clandestine video to have leaked, the first showing Saddam being taunted in his final moments. That clandestine video showed the former leader dropping through the gallows floor as he offered chanted prayers. It ends with his dead body swinging at the end of a rope.

The hanging video was in sharp contrast with an official video that was broadcast not long after Saddam's execution which showed him standing silently on the gallows as the noose was put around his neck. The official video was muted.

The leaked hanging video, however, was shot from the floor of the gallows chamber, looking up at Saddam. Voices could be heard taunting him with cries of "Muqtada, Muqtada, Muqtada," referring to radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, the leader of the Shiite Mahdi Army militia and a key support of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The prime minister pushed for Saddam to be executed before the end of 2006 and just four days after the death sentence was upheld by the appeals court. U.S. official sought to delay the execution.

Execution Sparks Arab Support For Saddam (AP)

By Nadia Abou El-magd

AP, January 9, 2007

Another leaked video from Saddam Hussein's execution carried fresh adulation Monday of the fallen dictator, who in death has become a martyr and hero of Arab nationalism for some in the Middle East.

Saddam's stature has grown since his execution — when he answered insults and taunts with disdain — overshadowing the memories in much of the Arab world of the massacres and other atrocities committed by his regime.

The new video, showing Saddam's corpse with a gaping neck wound, was posted on the Internet early Tuesday. It was apparently shot with a camera phone minutes after he was hanged Dec. 30.

"A new film of the late immortal martyr, President Saddam Hussein," the web site said in a headline over a link to the video.

The independent Egyptian newspaper Al-Karama splashed Saddam's photo over a full page Monday, with an Iraqi flag behind him, declaring him an "Arab martyr."

"He lived as hero, died as a man," another Egyptian opposition newspaper, Al-Osboa, proclaimed in a headline, showing a photo of Saddam at the gallows.

The praise has angered the governments of Iraq and Kuwait, which Saddam's soldiers invaded in 1990. On Monday, Kuwaiti lawmakers denounced Arab countries where Saddam has been lauded as a hero and demanded the government reconsider ties and financial aid to them.

DOJ_NMG_0114129

Indignation over the execution in the Sunni Arab world has increased resentment of the United States and Iraq's Shiite-led government. It could fuel support for Iraq's Sunni insurgency and complicate U.S. efforts to enlist Arab nations in efforts to reconcile Iraq's warring Sunni and Shiite communities.

In large part, it was the unruly scene at the gallows that catapulted Saddam to hero's status. In video footage smuggled out of the execution room, Shiite executioners are heard shouting curses at Saddam — who stands erect, and smiles contemptuously. "Is this manly?" he retorts.

The latest video seems only to have aggravated the anger provoked by the earlier video.

Saddam's iconic exeuction has, it seems, come to symbolize dignified Arab resistance in the face of humiliation at the hands of a Shiite government.

Some Arabs regard that government as illegitimate because it is backed by the U.S. military and closely allied to mainly Shiite Iran.

Some media reports compared Saddam to another hero of Arab nationalism who opposed Western domination: Omar al-Mokhtar, the leader of resistance against Italy's military occupation of Libya. He was executed by hanging in 1931.

Egypt's nationalist weekly newspaper Al-Arabi published a cartoon Sunday showing an open book with pictures of Saddam and al-Mokhtar on facing pages.

The reaction was in contrast to the shock that followed Saddam's capture by U.S. troops in December 2003. At the time, Saddam was shown bearded and bedraggled in photos as he was pulled out of the hole where he was hiding by U.S. troops.

The images sparked debate across the Middle East. Many pointed out his weakness in the face of U.S. forces. Over the years that followed, Arab media dealt more frankly with the mass killings carried out by Saddam's regime.

Languishing in U.S. custody, Saddam faded into irrelevance, and coverage of his trial waned in Arab media.

But after the execution, even some Arabs critical of Saddam said he had achieved a heroic status, despite his record of crimes and atrocities.

"Five sublime minutes at the hanging rope created the myth," columnist Abdel-Halim Qandil wrote in Al-Karama. "The story of Saddam the bloody dictator was over, replaced by Saddam's image similar to Omar al-Mokhtar."

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, a U.S. ally, suggested the execution could worsen the situation in Iraq.

"It was disgraceful and very painful," Mubarak said in an interview with Israeli daily Yediot Ahronot. "They (the Iraqi government) have made him into a martyr, while the problems within Iraq remain."

On Saturday, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki denounced other governments for criticizing the execution, accusing them of meddling in Iraqi affairs.

But the execution deepened opposition in the Arab world — where the majority of the population are Sunni Muslims — against Iraq's Shiite-led government.

Many also blamed the United States, which handed Saddam over for execution — even though U.S. officials said they tried to persuade al-Maliki to postpone the hanging and later criticized the way it was carried out.

On Friday, hundreds in the Egyptian capital demonstrated after prayers at al-Azhar Mosque, chanting against the United States and allied Arab governments, expressing support for the Iraqi insurgency.

In Jordan, columnist Ibrahim Jaber Ibrahim lashed out at the Iraqi prime minister, deriding him as "Emperor al-Maliki, standing on a precious Persian carpet" — a reference to the Iraqi Shiites' close ties Persian Iran.

Talal Salman, publisher of the Lebanese daily As-Safir, warned that the al-Maliki government's "vindictiveness, political blindness and shortsightedness ... are establishing divisions that will spare no one, whether in Iraq or in the territories around it, including all the Arabs."

Still, some voices in the Arab media insisted Saddam's crimes should not be ignored.

"One can't but be surprised at shameful Arab weeping (for Saddam) ... glorifying him and considering him a hero and martyr," wrote Palestinian writer Khaled al-Horoub in the United Arab Emirates daily Al-Itihad on Monday.

He warned that other Arab dictators will manage "to hide (their) crimes behind volatile speeches that stir up people's feelings but destroy their present and future."

DOJ_NMG_0114130

Sami Moubayed wrote in the daily Oman Times, that he "tried hard" to sympathize with Saddam while watching the execution. "But I could not find a single thing worth praising about Saddam."

"However, the fact that he was executed under the watchful eye of the United States, at a time when Iraq is occupied, makes him a national hero to the Arabs," he wrote.

Saddam's Trial Stirs Obama Ire (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, January 9, 2007

Potential 2008 presidential contender Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and other top Democrats sharply criticized the execution of Saddam Hussein as President Bush readied to introduce a new military and foreign policy strategy for the war-ravaged country the Iraqi dictator once controlled.

Obama, a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said Saddam was hanged before all charges against him were heard. In particular, Obama said that the court pushed aside testimonials about the mass murder of Iraqi Kurds in the late 1980s in order to rush Saddam to the gallows.

"I think that was unfortunate and did not assist in the process of bringing the country together," Obama said in a short interview last week.

However, Obama said in a statement released on the day of Saddam's hanging: "The Iraqi people have found justice in the death of a dictator who brutalized, tortured and killed thousands of innocent men, women and children." Obama also took the opportunity then to call on the Iraqi government to "work harder" to find a political solution to its burgeoning civil war.

On Monday, nine days after the former dictator's death, the Iraqi court dropped all outstanding charges against him. Six of his associates face charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity for their roles in the killing of 180,000 Iraqi Kurds during the Iraq-Iran war as part of a 1980s-era military campaign code-named Operation Anfal.

Saddam, a Sunni Muslim, was sentenced to death and hanged Dec. 30 for the killing of 148 Shiites. The trial and execution have drawn global criticism of the current Shiite-dominated government. Saddam's final moments were filmed on a cell phone, recording the sectarian jeers with which Shiite officials taunted him as he stood on the scaffold; the viral spread of the footage online has generated further outrage in the international community.

"I think that the fact that it became an Internet spectacle was very unfortunate and diminished the seriousness with which the whole process should have ended," Obama said last week.

Iraqi officials are defending the manner in which the execution was conducted, but Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government is investigating the circumstances surrounding it. President Bush said the hanging could have been held in a more "dignified way" but is leaving the probe to the Iraqis.

Another potential 2008 presidential hopeful, Sen. Joseph Biden Jr. (D-Del.), called on Iraq's leader to condemn publicly the hanging.

"If I were Maliki's adviser, I'd say, 'Now is the time you have to make a dramatic move to hold accountable the Sunnis who engaged in that,'" Biden said Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press with Tim Russert." Biden likened the fallout from Hussein's execution to that resulting from the military detainee torture scandal at Abu Ghraib prison: "It had the same […] poisonous impact."

Like Obama, Biden released a statement shortly after the execution saying it closed "one of the darkest chapters in [Iraq's] history and rid the world of a tyrant." Biden, the chairman of the foreign relations panel, is planning to hold hearings on Iraq this week.

Other top Democrats said that the execution created more problems within Iraq and in the Middle East.

"It was a disaster, it really was," said Sen. Chris Dodd (Conn.), another Democrat who may vie for a presidential nomination. "Saddam Hussein is a dreadful human being and I respect the right of the Iraqi people to bring him to justice, but the way the execution was handled created more problems," Dodd told The Hill last week.

DOJ_NMG_0114131

The chaos surrounding the hanging demonstrated a lack of organization in Iraq, according to Dodd, and before transferring custody of Saddam to the Iraqis, the United States should have better understood the mechanics of the planned execution.

"No one should shed any tears for Saddam Hussein; justice has been served," Dodd said in a statement released shortly after Hussein's sentence was carried out.

Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), a leading critic of the war who has been pushing for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq, said that the execution will worsen relations between Sunnis and Shiites.

"I think it was disastrous for Iraq to have the execution carried out in that manner," said Levin, who in recent months has insisted the solution to Iraq's problems is political rather than military.

Levin also said that he hoped his colleagues in the Senate would speak out about increased sectarianism resulting from Saddam's execution.

It is unclear whether Biden or Levin, both of whom are holding hearings on Iraq this week, will raise the issue of Saddam's hanging therein.

Even now that more details of the execution have emerged, not everyone in the Senate is concerned about the circumstances surrounding it.

Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) said that the execution was left to the people of Iraq to "do … in a way they thought was appropriate. It is not our business to comment" on how it was carried out, Chambliss said.

Minority Whip Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said the United States should not dwell on the execution and the video, but rather concentrate on how to move forward.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) said Sunday on "Meet the Press" that the way the hanging occurred was a "setback," but contended that the insult Saddam endured on the day of his death "pales in comparison to the way he treated his own people."

Other Republican senators, including John McCain (Ariz.), a top contender for the Republican 2008 presidential nomination, called the fallout from the execution "harmful."

Irrational Is As Irrational Does (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

George W. Bush has executed 153 people, 152 of them in Texas and one so far in Iraq. The Iraqi, of course, is Saddam Hussein, who went to his burlesque of a death with more dignity than the Iraqi government, which so hurried him to the gallows that in much of the world the hanging looked a lot like a lynching. The president, we are told, did not bother to view the spectacle on tape. Maybe he feared he would learn something.

I bring up Bush's appalling record of executions not because I have once again mounted my anti-capital-punishment hobbyhorse but because his record offers an insight into why the United States will stay in Iraq and with even more troops than before.

Let me explain. In Iowa, during the 2000 presidential campaign, Bush answered a question about why he so ardently supported capital punishment. He offered a number of reasons, but one -- deterrence -- prompted me to raise my hand and ask a follow-up: But, sir, there is absolutely no evidence that capital punishment is a deterrent. To my astonishment, Bush conceded my point: "You're right. I can't prove it. But neither can the other side prove it's not."

Ponder that answer for a while. What it means is not just that Bush embraced a famously irrational way of thinking -- the logical fallacy often called "proving a negative" -- but in this case he used it to overwhelm all evidence to the contrary. Once you know this, you can appreciate what Bush means when he calls himself The Decider. It means that evidence, arguments, proof and logic cannot be conclusive when, as is often the case, the president proceeds on what can be called a matter of faith. I am not referring here just to religion -- although surely that is paramount to Bush -- but to supremely secular matters of state: when to go to war, why go to war and when to remain at war. In Bush's mind, the bad guys will lose and the good guys will win and Iraq will become a democracy. This will happen not because Bush can prove that it will but because nobody can prove it won't.

DOJ_NMG_0114132

This is why we are in Iraq today and why we are going to stay there. All this time, it did not matter that Iraq was going to hell, or that the terrorists were never there in the first place, or that weapons of mass destruction were never present, or that Saddam Hussein had no role in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, or that democracy for Iraq was never really in the cards -- none of that mattered, because nobody could prove otherwise. All the things Bush believed were true because you, rational fool that you are, could not prove them false.

Up against this kind of mentality, the rational man seeks comfort in fantasy. It was our fantasy that a new Iraqi government, formulated months ago, would so turn things around that Bush would begin a phased withdrawal. It was our fantasy that the November congressional elections would make a difference -- and that Bush would be forced, when he saw the clear sentiment of the American people, to reverse himself. It was our fantasy that the report of the Iraq Study Group would compel the president to rethink everything -- so vast was the panel's expertise, so sound its reasoning and so comforting its appropriately thinning hair. In fact, so wasted was its effort. The members were the mullers. Bush was the decider.

And so those who have decided otherwise -- a couple of four-stars, maybe the chief spook and all those awfully smart people throughout government and academia -- are ignored and/or are heading out the door. Bush listened to them when he agreed with them and refused to listen when he did not. A so-called surge is a-coming, an escalation all decked out with an Orwellian-sounding name. An edifice built on a wobbly foundation -- a profound and enduring ignorance of Iraqi society -- will be patched up, but really, the whole thing is a tear-down. It will collapse no matter what we do.

The execution of Saddam Hussein was Iraq in a nutshell. Aside from the dead man at the end of the rope, nothing went the way the Americans wanted. It was sloppy, putrid with the stench of sectarian hatred and, as always, totally unnecessary. George Bush saw it differently by not, as is his custom, seeing it at all.

Iraqi American Escapee Plans Return To U.S. (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 8 -- Iraq's most publicly available fugitive held a news conference in the United Arab Emirates on Monday, announcing his plans to return to Chicago rather than the Baghdad jail he escaped from last month.

Aiham al-Sammarae, the former Iraqi electricity minister who escaped from an Iraqi-run jail inside Baghdad's fortress-like Green Zone on Dec. 17, told reporters at a Dubai hotel that he "didn't break any U.S. laws" and denied he was a fugitive from justice.

Sammarae, a dual U.S.-Iraqi citizen and engineer who lived outside Chicago for many years, was jailed last year on corruption charges and accused of misusing about $2 billion as electricity minister. He told reporters that he left Iraq because he was afraid for his life and that he would go to the United States if he was assured he would not face legal issues.

"All indications are that I can return," he said.

Radhi al-Radhi, head of Iraq's Commission on Public Integrity, an organization created by the United States that had been investigating Sammarae, said last month that he escaped with the help of private security agents who appeared to be American.

The Iraqi government insists it will attempt to bring Sammarae back to Baghdad, according to government spokesman Ali Dabbagh.

"There are many cases against him, and he should face these ones," Dabbagh said. Speaking of the U.S. government, Dabbagh said: "It is their job and their duty to ask al-Sammarae to come back in a different way if he is not coming back on his own."

U.S. Embassy spokesman Lou Fintor declined to comment about whether Sammarae would be allowed to live freely in the United States. But Fintor said that although an Iraqi court overturned his conviction, "we understand that there are additional charges against Mr. al-Sammarae."

Also on Monday, gunmen attacked a bus carrying janitors to work at the Baghdad airport. The gunmen killed four people and injured nine, said Raad Mohammed of the Interior Ministry. The passengers were believed to be Shiite Muslims and were attacked in a predominantly Sunni area near the airport. Reports of the death toll varied, with as many as 15 people said to have been killed.

DOJ_NMG_0114133

Two U.S. soldiers were killed Sunday, one by small-arms fire while on patrol in Baghdad, and another during unspecified "combat operations" in Salahuddin province north of Baghdad, the U.S. military said Monday. The soldiers' names were not released.

More than 35 other people were killed in Iraq on Monday in shootings, bombings and mortar attacks, according to Interior Ministry officials. Police also found 24 unidentified bodies at a cemetery near Haifa Street in Baghdad, where the Iraqi army clashed with insurgents last week. They had been shot in the head and exhibited signs of torture, said Brig. Salim Hassan of the Interior Ministry.

The violence in Iraq has precipitated a massive exodus of refugees, the largest displacement in the Middle East since the flight of Palestinians during the creation of Israel in 1948, according to the U.N. refugee agency. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees requested another $60 million to help deal with Iraq's refugee crisis. About 1.7 million Iraqis have been displaced within their country, and as many as 2 million have fled Iraq, the agency estimates.

British Troops Winning The Conflict With The Taliban, Commander Says (AFP)

AFP, January 9, 2007

British troops are inflicting heavy losses on a resurgent Taliban militia while "making great progress in winning the hearts and minds" of the people of Afghanistan, a British commander said.

Brigadier Jerry Thomas, the commander of the UK task force in Afghanistan, said the situation in the southern province of Helmand had improved "markedly" since September when a television documentary aired Monday night was filmed.

With harrowing footage showing bullets buzzing troops and the filmmaker, the documentary shown on Channel 4 television follows British and Afghan troops as they struggle to regain control of the key town of Garmsir.

The documentary also shows British troops gathering corn found in a nearby field because of supply problems.

"Since then (September), British forces have moved into new areas throughout the province, including Garmsir, and made real improvements to security," Thomas said in a statement distributed by the Ministry of Defence.

"We have inflicted heavy losses on the Taliban, denied them freedom of movement, and made great progress in winning the hearts and minds of the local people," he said in response to the documentary.

"This remains a very challenging mission, but we are winning," he said.

Thomas said that only last week Royal Marines "engaged and destroyed a Taliban training camp" in northeast Helmand, which will allow contractors to carry out repairs to a hydro-electric dam in Kajaki.

The facility will produce electricity for 1.8 million people in the south of Afghanistan "who until now have had none," he said.

"This success would not have been possible unless our forces were properly equipped and supplied," Thomas said.

"To be clear, I have not asked for additional helicopters and the supply system is working well, with no soldiers or marines running out of food," he said.

"It is the nature of the conflict that they do not take more supplies than they need to carry; but we have an extraordinary resupply system in place to ensure that they do not run out," he said.

Britain has about 5,600 troops in Afghanistan as part of the NATO-led reconstruction and security force, most of them in rugged and remote Helmand province.

Forty-four British troops have been killed in Afghanistan since US-led forces toppled the Taliban regime in 2001.

Around 120 foreign soldiers have been killed in action in the country this year, which has seen the worst Taliban-linked violence since the extremists were driven from power.

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney Christie Says He's Staying In His Job (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

TRENTON: The U.S. attorney for New Jersey, a Republican long rumored to be a contender for U.S. Senate, said today he plans to stay in his current job into next year, effectively ruling out a 2008 campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0114134

""I have every intention of being here through the end of '07 and into early 2008," Christopher Christie told The Associated Press on Monday. ""We'll see what happens when '08 starts."

Federal laws and Justice Department regulations bar a sitting U.S. attorney from running for political office. Political observers believe most candidates for U.S. Senate from New Jersey would have to start raising money for the costly campaign by June 2007.

Christie, 44, who also is considered by some to be a possible GOP pick for governor, was tapped by President George W. Bush in 2001 to be New Jersey's top federal prosecutor though he lacked criminal court experience. During the AP interview, Christie would not discuss a possible gubernatorial bid in 2009.Over the past five years, Christie has built a reputation as a tough corruption fighter by prosecuting cases including that of former Senate President John A. Lynch, now in prison for corruption, and some in Monmouth County that resulted in the arrests of more than a dozen public officials.

Christie's comments effectively end speculation he would challenge Democratic Sen. Frank Lautenberg, who has said he will seek re-election in 2008.

Come summer, Christie will have been in his current job longer than any U.S. attorney in New Jersey in the past 50 years.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ex-Aspen Technology Head Surrenders On Securities Fraud Charges (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-The former chief executive officer of software company Aspen Technology Inc. surrendered Monday to face securities fraud charges that he illegally inflated the company's software revenues as he competed to become its chief executive.

David McQuillin, 48, was accused in U.S. District Court in Manhattan of plotting to exaggerate the company's software revenues between January 2001 and September 2002.

Prosecutors alleged in court papers that McQuillin tried to inflate the revenues while he was competing against the company's other chief operating officer for the position of chief executive officer, which he received in October 2002. Aspen Technology develops and sells computer software to oil refineries and other industries.

Prosecutors said McQuillin and unidentified coconspirators manipulated Aspen's revenues by entering side agreements with a customer to control when certain revenues would be counted, by backdating software sales agreements into earlier financial quarters and by providing false information to its auditors.

McQuillin allegedly engaged in the scheme after learning at the end of December 2000 that Aspen was not going to meet the estimates of securities analysts, the government said.

In one instance, McQuillin sent a letter to an oil company saying he needed the company's support "on a matter of the most extreme urgency" prior to reporting quarterly earnings, prosecutors said.

They said he asked the oil company to let him include a software license it had conditionally signed with Aspen in its fourth quarter financial results "to meet our targets."

After Aspen signed a side letter with the oil company, McQuillin and other senior Aspen officers and employees later falsely represented to its auditor that the oil company sales agreement was not subject to side agreements, prosecutors said.

McQuillin was charged with one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud and one count of securities fraud.

If convicted, he could face up to 25 years in prison and more than $5 million (â,¬3.8 million) in fines.

Stock Options Backdating Issue Haunts Jobs (USAT)

By Greg Farrell And Jon Swartz

USA Today, January 9, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — When Steve Jobs steps to the podium today at the Macworld Conference here to introduce what is expected to be the newest Apple iPod, he won't be just another CEO hawking a fad product.

DOJ_NMG_0114135

Instead, Apple's iconoclastic founder will be greeted by most attendees as the visionary who changed the way the world works and the messiah who saved Apple from oblivion a decade ago. His address is considered the crowning achievement of the year for Apple and its legion of fervent customers.

Yet on the day of Jobs' triumphant moment, he finds himself on the defensive over an issue that swept through Silicon Valley and a swath of Corporate America in 2006 like a California brushfire: the backdating of stock options.

Federal prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission are poring over an internal Apple investigation that examined two huge options grants to Jobs in 2000 and 2001. The 2001 grant was the most problematic. It gave Jobs options to buy 7.5 million shares at $18.30 a share instead of the $21.01 market price of Apple's shares on the date the grant was finalized two months later.

The investigation also disclosed that more than 6,400 stock option grants made on 42 dates from 1997 to 2002 were backdated to give employees a lower strike price.

Apple's report on its internal investigation said that Jobs was aware of or recommended some favorable grant dates but that he did not appreciate the accounting implications. It found no evidence of misconduct by current management, it said.

The company also said Jobs didn't benefit financially from the backdating. Indeed, the two grants to Jobs, totaling 17.5 million options, were canceled in March 2003 (when Apple's stock price was below the options' strike price) and replaced with an award of 5 million shares of restricted stock.

According to data from Thomson Financial, Jobs has never sold shares of Apple stock for profit. His one sale of stock last March — in which he returned 4.5 million shares to the company for nearly $300 million — was to satisfy tax withholding requirements.

But Lucian Bebchuk, director of Harvard Law School's program on corporate governance, says that Jobs clearly gained from the favorable backdating.

Even if one accepts Apple's explanation that Jobs didn't benefit because his options were canceled, the options' replacement with a grant of restricted stock meant they were worth something, Bebchuk says.

Apple says it is cooperating with authorities. What happens next depends on whether the SEC or the U.S. Attorney's office in San Francisco determines that laws were broken.

The backdating of options grants isn't illegal if companies and recipients make the proper SEC disclosures and follow accounting and tax rules. In Apple's case, the improper accounting forced the company to make a financial restatement of $84 million to correct misdated grants from 1997 to 2006.

Apple's board has affixed all blame for the backdating on two unnamed former executives who have left the company. Lawyers for two former executives — former general counsel Nancy Heinen, who left Apple last year, and former chief financial officer Fred Anderson, who left Apple's board last year — deny that either of them did anything wrong.

Bebchuk has trouble believing that the widespread practice of options backdating at Apple was the work of only two executives.

"They are two former executives who had positions that usually don't involve primary responsibility for attracting and compensating people. What incentive did they have to engage in improper dating without implicit support from senior members of the executive team?" Bebchuk asks.

Like most of the 200-plus companies that have admitted to engaging in some form of options backdating, Apple also has to contend with civil suits claiming that shareholders were defrauded by the practice. A lawsuit filed last month in federal court in San Jose accuses Jobs and other top Apple executives of using backdating to benefit themselves. The lawsuit also alleges there was backdating at another company Jobs ran, the animation studio Pixar now owned by Disney.

Apple's report on its investigation, contained in SEC filings on Dec. 29, left legal experts with new questions. In particular, Apple said one options grant was recorded as approved at a special board meeting on Oct. 19, 2001, but no such meeting took place.

"The statement Apple put out is a little bit pregnant with ambiguity," says John Coffee, an expert in securities law at Columbia University. "It wasn't a strong statement, in which the board investigated and determined that he had done nothing wrong. Instead, they said, 'We haven't caught him red-handed.' "

DOJ_NMG_0114136

"When Apple said Jobs was aware of the options-granting process, and recommended them, they are saying Jobs tacitly orchestrated plans to produce phony records," says Christopher Bebel, a former SEC counsel and prosecutor.

But because Jobs did not exercise his options, it will make prosecutors hesitant to pursue criminal charges. "There was a wrong committed, but he didn't line his pockets," Bebel says.

As for the board's statement that Jobs did not "appreciate the accounting implications" of backdating, longtime observers were bemused. Jobs likes to keep track of everything at his company, they say.

"The notion that he doesn't know (the full implications of Apple's accounting procedures) is ludicrous," says Alan Deutschman, author of The Second Coming of Steve Jobs. He interviewed dozens of Apple employees, analysts and industry insiders shortly after Jobs returned to the company he co-founded.

Jobs' exacting attention to detail is most apparent when demanding minuscule changes to product designs or rehearsing for hours to perfect product introductions. And it is Jobs' perfectionism that rescued Apple from almost certain doom in the late 1990s. He pruned the company's then-bloated product line and engineered the release of mega-hit products such as the iPod, say financial analysts.

"Steve is the only person who could have saved Apple and made it what it is today," says analyst Charles Wolf, who has followed Apple for more than a decade, expressing a widely held view in the financial community. "Apple is Steve."

Most financial analysts and investors so far have shrugged off the ongoing stock-option scandal. They expect little impact as long as Jobs remains untouched. "We're not concerned, given the depth of Apple's internal review," says Gene Munster of Piper Jaffray.

Reflecting that faith, investors have boosted Apple's stock to $86.18 a share, near its 10-year high.

CEO Politics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

January 9, 2007; Page For an excellent example of why federal agencies so rarely admit mistakes, look no further than the recent uproar over the Securities and Exchange Commission's flip-flop on stock-option disclosure. House Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank is already planning to ride this error through the next election as part of his campaign against CEO pay.

The SEC has been under attack since it announced -- on the eve of Christmas weekend -- that it was modifying its July disclosure rule on executive compensation. The commission's new order tweaks the way stock option grants are disclosed, with the goal of making total annual compensation figures more accurate and consistent. Chairman Christopher Cox admitted that the SEC had inadvertently adopted the wrong version of one part of the rule, and was simply trying to set things right.

That mea culpa counted little with Mr. Frank, who denounced the SEC for loosening reporting requirements to provide a "Christmas Eve" gift to corporate America. He also declared that this "backtracking" by the agency meant his committee now had an obligation to dive into the "problem" of "unconstrained" executive compensation -- as if he needed an excuse.

This political opportunism is especially unfortunate because the new SEC rule is entirely in keeping with Mr. Cox's goal of bringing more "clarity and consistency" to corporate pay disclosure. Even Mr. Frank praised the SEC's decision last year to require companies to aggregate all of their top executives' compensation -- pay, bonuses, perks, options -- into one bottom-line figure. When these reports begin to become public later this year, investors will get a better look at management costs and be able to compare those numbers across companies.

Under the flawed SEC rule, companies would have had to include, in their annual total compensation reporting, any stock option grants awarded during the year. This would have been highly misleading to the extent such grants weren't yet exercisable and thus might never be "in the money." Under the new rule, companies will instead include any options that actually vest that year -- meaning options that executives can truly turn into cash or stock.

Contrary to most media descriptions, the new rule won't necessarily result in lower reported compensation numbers. Under the old rule, a big grant would only appear in the year it was awarded, then disappear in subsequent disclosures. Under the new rule, the final figure will include any and all previous option awards that vest in that year -- leading, in many cases, to more substantial bottom-line figures. Meanwhile, information about big annual option grants is still readily available to investors, albeit in a different section of the SEC compensation form.

DOJ_NMG_0114137

This change will also harmonize the new compensation disclosure forms with other corporate financial statements. Under current accounting rules, companies only expense options in their financial statements as the options become exercisable. Given that the SEC's goal with its disclosure rule was to make compensation figures more consistent and understandable for investors, it would have made little sense to set up two completely different ways of counting options.

The SEC's mistake is regrettable, but the agency might be forgiven for overlooking what was a relatively minor point in its gigantic 450-page July rule. And one reason it didn't hold a public meeting on the new amendment is that all five SEC Commissioners -- including its two Democrats -- unanimously agreed that the change was necessary.

Mr. Frank surely knows all this, but he is hunting bigger political game -- namely, running against "excessive" CEO pay and alleged "inequality" as Democrats gin up a campaign issue for 2008. The left believes its neo-populism paid off in November's election, and it wants to ratchet up the rhetoric this year in Congress.

As part of his investigation, we can only hope Mr. Frank explores the role that the last Democratic Congress played in encouraging CEO stock option grants by limiting to $1 million the amount of executive cash compensation that companies could deduct from taxes. (Bob Nardelli, Frank Raines and Hank McKinnell, among others, are grateful.) But then again, that would mean admitting that Congress made a mistake; it's so much easier to demagogue CEOs and the SEC.

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Democrats May Aid Corruption Inquiry (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — The new Democratic House leaders are negotiating with federal prosecutors about complying with subpoenas related to former Representative Randy Cunningham's corrupt sale of military contracts, potentially accelerating a dormant inquiry.

The subpoenas, disclosed late last month in the Congressional Record, request documents from the House Appropriations, Intelligence and Armed Services Committees and demand a response by Jan. 11.

Mr. Cunningham, a California Republican, pleaded guilty more than a year ago to steering tens of millions of dollars in federal money to military contractors in exchange for over $2.4 million in bribes, using his position on the House military spending panel to insert special provisions for contracts into military bills.

All these provisions required involvement by the panel's chairmen and staff as well as military or intelligence officials, so the investigation has the potential to ensnare others. A recent internal report by the House Intelligence Committee, for example, concluded that committee staff had supported Mr. Cunningham's requests despite many "red flags."

The subpoenas are also freighted with Constitutional issues, pitting an executive branch investigation against Congress's claims of immunity and confidentiality for its official business.

The federal prosecutors, based in San Diego, sought for months without success to reach agreement with the former House Republican leaders to obtain the documents without subpoenas. The subpoenas coincide with the takeover of the House by Democrats, who campaigned on a promise to replace corruption with honesty and openness. The Democrats also have less incentive to protect the Republican former committee chairmen and staff members.

People informed about the talks over the subpoenas say the prosecutors may extend the subpoena deadline while they try again to work out an agreement to disclose relevant documents.

"The House is actively working with the Department of Justice to resolve this issue," said Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Representative Nancy Pelosi, the California Democrat sworn in last week as speaker of the House.

CIA Digs In Its Heels (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114138

A federal criminal investigation of the Central Intelligence Agency's former third-highest official has stalled because of CIA reluctance to turn over classified documents requested by prosecutors, people close to the investigation say.

The U.S. attorney's office in San Diego has been investigating former CIA Executive Director Kyle "Dusty" Foggo to determine whether he committed illegal acts in influencing the awarding of CIA covert contracts. Mr. Foggo resigned from the CIA in May 2006, shortly after The Wall Street Journal disclosed the investigation1.

• The Issue: An investigation is delayed as federal prosecutors and the CIA wrangle over what classified data can be disclosed if former CIA executive director Kyle Foggo is indicted.

• What's Unique: Mr. Foggo was the third-ranking CIA official, with access to a huge range of secrets.

• What's at Stake: Prosecutors may have to alter or scale back charges they seek against him.

Among the contracts under investigation is one the CIA awarded to the company of a lifelong friend of Mr. Foggo's, Brent Wilkes, a California defense contractor. Last year, former Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham pleaded guilty to soliciting bribes from individuals including Mr. Wilkes.

The Foggo inquiry is part of a chain of pending criminal investigations sparked by the Cunningham case. Its progress is important both because of the nature of the contracts involved, and because a trial may shed light on additional contracting improprieties first hinted at in the Cunningham case.

Wrangling between prosecutors and the CIA isn't unusual in cases involving espionage or other criminal activity by agency employees, because of the risk that important secrets could be divulged in a trial.

Despite such difficulties, prosecutors have obtained espionage and other criminal convictions of some intelligence agency personnel. But no CIA official who held a position as high as Mr. Foggo's has ever been prosecuted. His case is sensitive because of Mr. Foggo's former top-level status at the agency, his knowledge of a huge range of covert activities, and the fact that the investigation involves the awarding of contracts that the CIA is reluctant to have disclosed, the people with knowledge of the inquiry said.

Mark J. MacDougall, Mr. Foggo's lawyer, declined to comment on details of the investigation, but said "Mr. Foggo has served his country with honor and has committed no crime and has violated no law in that service."

If there is an indictment in such cases, a common strategy by defense lawyers is to demand classified material they say is needed for the defense, hoping that the government will refuse and the case will be dismissed. So prosecutors try to work out ahead of time what information can be disclosed and sometimes tailor the specific charges to evidence only in declassified materials. But prosecutors also can try to get as much evidence as possible declassified in advance, in hope of persuading the accused to negotiate a guilty plea and averting a trial in which secrets might be divulged. That happened with CIA turncoat spy Aldrich Ames, now serving a life sentence after he pleaded guilty in 2004 to divulging secrets to the former Soviet Union.

Negotiations Stall Case

Officials at the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego declined to comment on the investigation, though people with knowledge of it say it still appears that the declassification conflicts with the CIA can be worked out. But slow negotiations have substantially delayed the case. Prosecutors in San Diego had expected to get a grand jury indictment of Mr. Foggo some months ago.

The CIA doesn't appear to be trying to prevent charges against Mr. Foggo, say those familiar with the investigation. Rather, it has taken the position that the Justice Department can successfully complete its investigation of him without getting access to all the classified material they requested.

CIA Spokesman Mark Mansfield said the agency wouldn't comment "other than to emphasize that the CIA has been cooperating with the Department of Justice in their investigation and continues to do so."

Jeffrey Smith, a former CIA general counsel, said the agency traditionally has been eager to help prosecutors convict agency employees who committed crimes. He noted that a federal law, the Classified Information Protection Act, was adopted specifically to make it possible to prosecute spies and intelligence agency employees while protecting vital secrets.

Former CIA Director Porter Goss in November 2004 named Mr. Foggo, then a mid-level CIA official, to take on the high-level post. Mr. Foggo's close friendship with Mr. Wilkes emerged in December 2005 as a result of the Cunningham investigation. The Journal reported last spring that Mr. Foggo attended poker games arranged by Mr. Wilkes in Washington hotel suites, and that prosecutors were investigating evidence that during some of these games Mr. Wilkes had supplied Mr. Cunningham with prostitutes in the suites. A CIA spokeswoman confirmed at the time that Mr. Foggo had been present in the hotel "hospitality suites," but said Mr. Foggo denied that anything improper had occurred while he was there.

DOJ_NMG_0114139

Arousing Suspicion

In May, Federal Bureau of Investigation and other federal agents searched Mr. Foggo's office at CIA headquarters in Langley, Va., and his home, days after he had announced his intention to resign. While Mr. Foggo was executive director, the CIA awarded at least one contract to one of Mr. Wilkes's companies, Archer Logistics, to provide water and other supplies to CIA agents in Iraq and Afghanistan. People close to the investigation say Mr. Wilkes paid for expensive vacations for Mr. Foggo and his wife, flying them on his corporate jet to Hawaii and Scotland, among other places. He also gave gifts to Mr. Foggo. An investigation by the CIA's inspector general, the results of which haven't been disclosed, looked into the contracts and whether Mr. Foggo, as required by agency rules, had informed the agency of the free trips and gifts.

Mr. Wilkes hasn't been charged but remains under investigation by San Diego federal prosecutors. His lawyers have strongly denied that he was involved in any illegal activity.

A House intelligence committee document made public in the fall disclosed that Mr. Foggo also has been under investigation for awarding contracts to the company of another individual, subsequently identified as Richard Wenzel, president of Global Transportation Systems in Sterling, Va. The firm received "several large contracts" from the CIA, the document said. People involved in the case say these included delivering equipment and supplies abroad, making use of the company's fleet of specialized Ilyushin 76 jet cargo planes. These aircraft can use makeshift runways and unload heavy cargo without requiring ground-based equipment.

Mr. Wenzel is aiding prosecutors and isn't a target of the investigation. His lawyer, James Hamilton, said, "My client is solely a cooperating witness."

Judges Look To New Congress For Changes In Mandatory Sentencing Laws (NYT)

By Lynette Clemetson

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — Federal sentencing laws that require lengthy mandated prison terms for certain offenses are expected to come under fresh scrutiny as Democrats assume control of Congress.

Among those eagerly awaiting signs of change are federal judges, including many conservatives appointed by Republican presidents. They say the automatic sentences, determined by Congress, strip judges of individual discretion and result in ineffective, excessive penalties, often for low-level offenders.

Judges have long been critical of the automatic prison terms, referred to as mandatory minimum sentences, which were most recently enacted by Congress in 1986 in part to stem the drug trade. Now influential judges across the ideological spectrum say that the combination of Democratic leadership and growing Republican support for modest change may provide the best chance in years for a review of the system.

“With a changing of the guard, there should at least should be some discussion,” said William W. Wilkins, chief judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, who was nominated by President Ronald Reagan.

The House Judiciary Committee, under the new leadership of Representative John Conyers Jr., Democrat of Michigan, is planning hearings on the laws, starting later this month or in early February. One of the first issues planned for review is the sentencing disparity between offenses involving powder and crack cocaine.

The possession or trafficking of crack brings much harsher penalties than those for similar amounts of the powder form of the drug. Mr. Conyers, a longtime critic of mandatory minimum sentences, favors treating both drugs equally.

The Senate Judiciary Committee has no immediate plans for hearings. But Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama, also supports some changes in the sentencing policy for crack cocaine convictions (though more modest than Mr. Conyers and some other Democrats favor), and Judiciary Committee staff members say a serious Senate review of the issue is likely in the current Congress.

Many law enforcement officials support tough, automatic sentences and argue that weakening existing laws will cause an increase in drug trafficking and violent crime. Many judges say current laws have clogged jails and too often punish low-level offenders. Some judges also argue that automatic lengthy sentences give prosecutors an unfair bargaining tool that they can use to tailor charges and press defendants into plea bargains.

DOJ_NMG_0114140

"These sentences can serve a purpose in certain types of cases involving certain types of offenders," said Judge Reggie B. Walton of Federal District Court in the District of Columbia, who was appointed by President Bush, "but when you apply them across the board you end up doing a disservice not just to individuals but to society at large."

Several judges say that broad inclusion in the coming Congressional hearings on sentencing would mark a notable departure from Judiciary Committee activity under the former Republican chairman, Representative F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. of Wisconsin, who many judges say maintained an antagonistic stance toward judges.

"There was no question that judges were targeted under the Sensenbrenner committee for speaking out," said Judge Nancy Gertner, a Federal District Court judge appointed by President Bill Clinton who teaches a course on sentencing policy at Yale Law School.

Judge Gertner and others point to the example of Judge James Rosenbaum, a Reagan appointee who, in 2003, faced a Congressional review of his sentencing decisions under a barrage of criticism that he and other federal judges were too lenient. Many in the judicial community argued that Judge Rosenbaum was singled out because he criticized a proposal to increase federal sentences in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee.

Most judges shy away from direct formal involvement in legislative matters. But many say private interactions with legislators that do not focus on specific cases but on policy matters of concern to the judiciary are appropriate.

Judge Wilkins, a former legislative assistant to Senator Strom Thurmond, said he believed private conversations on mandatory minimum sentences with his own congressman, Representative Bob Inglis, Republican of South Carolina, helped change the legislator's position.

Mr. Inglis, once a supporter of tough automatic sentences, said during a 1995 House vote that he would never vote for them again and has since become a Republican leader on sentencing reform.

"I was delighted that he took a principled stand, and I would like to think I was of some benefit to him in getting there," said Judge Wilkins, who served as the first chairman of the Federal Sentencing Commission, the body charged by Congress with developing sentencing guidelines and collecting and analyzing statistics.

Some judges have expressed displeasure with the system from the bench or in written opinions.

At a sentencing last January Judge Walter S. Smith Jr., of the Western District of Texas, was required to add 10 years to the already mandated 10-year sentence in a crack distribution case because a gun was found under the defendant's bed. During the sentencing, the judge stated, "This is one of those situations where I'd like to see a congressman sitting before me."

In an impassioned written opinion in 2004, Judge Paul G. Cassell of the Federal District Court in Utah, who was appointed by President Bush, called the mandatory 55-year sentence he was forced to give a low-level marijuana dealer who possessed, but did not use or brandish, a firearm "simply irrational."

In the opinion, Judge Cassell recommended a commutation of the sentence by the president, noting that the sentence, with consecutive 25-year terms for firearm possession, was longer than those required for an airport hijacker, second-degree murderer or a rapist.

The Supreme Court declined last fall to hear the case. But an amicus brief urging the court to take the case included signatures from legal figures like William Sessions, the former F.B.I. director; Janet Reno, attorney general during the Clinton administration; and Griffin Bell, attorney general under Jimmy Carter.

Many opponents of mandatory minimum sentences would like to see a full repeal of the laws. "After so many years of this, people have forgotten that we should be asking for the whole fix, not just little pieces," said Julie Stewart, president of Families Against Mandatory Minimums.

But most legal, legislative and judicial experts agree that repeal, or even broad-ranging overhaul of existing laws, is unlikely. More probable is serious review of crack cocaine sentencing laws.

Currently, possessing five grams of crack brings an automatic five-year sentence. It takes 500 grams of powder cocaine to warrant the same sentence. Similarly disparate higher amounts of the drugs results in a 10-year sentence. The 100-to-1 disparity, opponents of the law say, unfairly singles out poor, largely black offenders, who are more likely than whites to be convicted of dealing crack cocaine.

DOJ_NMG_0114141

At a sentencing commission hearing in November, Judge Walton, associate director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy under the first President George Bush and a onetime supporter of tough crack cocaine sentences, said it would be “unconscionable to maintain the current sentencing structure” on crack cocaine.

Mr. Sessions is a co-sponsor of a bill that would change the ratio for the two drugs to 20 to 1, increasing the amount of crack that brings a five-year sentence to 20 grams from 5, and lowering the powder cocaine trigger from 500 grams to 400 grams.

If judges say they are hopeful for new debate on sentencing policy, they are quick to add that they are not naïve. After all, many say, even politicians who are critical of current laws fear looking soft on crime.

“Candidly, the Democrats were never particularly courageous on this issue either,” Judge Gertner said. “But at least now it seems judges may be encouraged to be a part of the discussion. And if asked to speak up, I think many will.”

Criminal Complaint: Alderman Accepted Bribe (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen And Gary Washburn, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, January 9, 2007

Video: Alderman faces federal corruption charges

Chicago Ald. Arenda Troutman was charged Monday with taking bribes to grease a development in her ward in an undercover sting in which she was recorded brashly asking one informant: "What do I get out of it?"

Troutman, a minor player at City Hall despite her 16 years on the City Council, was arrested at her home early Monday by FBI agents who had to break a window to open a door. Authorities said she first spoke to agents from a third-floor window at 6:30 a.m. but had refused to come down.

The complaint alleged Troutman (20th) took $5,000 in cash and was promised $10,000 more to smooth licensing and zoning for a development at 57th and Halsted Streets, where she also had arranged to have a residence and commercial space. The development deal never existed; it was invented by the FBI as part of the sting.

After receiving the $5,000 on Nov. 29, Troutman allegedly went to work for the development immediately.

"Say no more, hand me that phone," Troutman allegedly said after the cash was in hand, placing a call to the city's zoning administrator on the developer's behalf.

The charges hark back to the days when the federal government snared one alderman after another in sting operations. Between 1972 and 1999, an average of one alderman a year was convicted of wrongdoing.

Troutman was allegedly caught on tape comparing politics with prostitution: "Most aldermen, most politicians are hos."

First Assistant U.S. Atty. Gary Shapiro described the complaint as another Chicago "civics lesson" in the history of corruption in the city.

"This time on how things get done in the 20th Ward of Chicago," Shapiro said.

"You want to build something? You want to improve your property? You need permits from the city?" Shapiro said. "You need zoning? You need the alderman's support? You want the alderman's support? You pay the alderman—you pay Arenda Troutman."

Troutman allegedly was taped by a cooperating witness who had fraudulently helped her refinance her mortgage in the past, prosecutors said. She allegedly lent money to the witness, taking it from a cash-filled box in her basement.

Witness was probe target

The witness was a target of a federal mortgage-fraud investigation until he came forward with information on his relationship with the alderman, authorities said. In addition to the cash payments and the space in the building, Troutman also demanded the contact buy $15,000 in tickets for a campaign fundraiser.

She directed her contact to have the developer simply pass on the cost of the extra bribe, authorities said.

"He know[s] 15 [expletives] ... his builder, his plumber ...," she allegedly said on the tapes.

DOJ_NMG_0114142

The federal complaint unsealed Monday outlines two bribery schemes, the one last year involving the fictitious development and the other alleged dealings that prosecutors said showed Troutman's propensity to accept bribes.

The first scheme spanned 2002 and 2003, authorities said, and involved a witness shaken down after an employee of Troutman's office noticed he was rehabbing a two-flat without permits. The witness paid $8,000 to finish the work without interference from the alderman, the complaint states, and another $12,000 for support for a zoning change.

Agents searched Troutman's home in the 6500 block of South Kimbark Avenue on Monday, along with her 20th Ward offices. Authorities said it took nearly a half hour from the time agents arrived at her home until she was taken into custody, and investigators said there was some evidence that a shredder had been used in the home.

Troutman was released on a signature bond Monday afternoon after a hearing before Magistrate Judge Michael Mason and was expected back at the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse on Friday.

Troutman had brushes with scandal before Monday's arrest. In 2004, it became public that she had an association with Donnell "Scandalous" Jehan, an alleged Black Disciples gang leader who is being sought on drug conspiracy charges. In 2005, the Chicago Sun-Times reported that members of Troutman's family ran a trucking company that won more than $1 million from the Hired Truck Program.

"I don't think the press treated me fairly with either of those things," Troutman said in an interview with the Tribune late last year. "There is a cloud over my administration, though I have done nothing wrong."

Her lawyer, Sam Adam Jr., said the bribery case was at worst an example of Troutman's trying to help someone in her ward and might constitute entrapment. He said Troutman would plead not guilty.

"I can tell you that we categorically deny every single allegation made in here," Adam said of the complaint. "This did not take place in the way, manner, shape and form that they claim."

No zoning change

Adam said there was no zoning change for the property and nothing was built there.

"Ald. Troutman never took money to do something," said Adam, who acknowledged Troutman has been aware the government has been interested in her activities for some time.

As for the FBI's having to break in to Troutman's home to arrest her, Adam said Troutman was not willfully avoiding authorities.

"The lady was asleep in her own home, with two kids," he said. "Sleeping, and, bam, her window breaks open with the FBI banging on her door."

In Springfield for the inauguration of Gov. Rod Blagojevich, Mayor Richard Daley declined to comment on the charges.

Some aldermen were supportive.

"Arenda is a sweet girl, and I am sorry to see her in any sort of difficulties," said Ald. Bernard Stone (50th). "I don't know anything about her problems, and whatever it is will work itself out." The charges against Troutman are the first criminal allegations against a council member since former Ald. Percy Giles was accused of racketeering, fraud and tax evasion in 1999 and was found guilty of the charges and sentenced to prison.

Troutman made her way to the City Council in tried and tested fashion—as a loyal member of the Regular Democratic Organization, with time on the streets as a precinct captain. .

Troutman was a member of the ward organization of the late Cecil Partee, the former Illinois Senate president, Cook County state's attorney and city treasurer, whom she considered a mentor.

Daley, a Partee ally, selected her to fill the vacant position of 20th Ward alderman in 1990. Troutman was elected by the voters of her ward the following year, re-elected in three subsequent races and is running for another term in the February election.

Degree in political science

Troutman, a divorced mother of three boys, attended Calumet High School and earned a degree in political science from Southern Illinois University. She once worked as a miner in Southern Illinois for Inland Steel and Coal.

Tribune reporters Todd Lighty, Ray Gibson and Dan Mihalopoulos contributed to this report.

jcoen@tribune.com

DOJ_NMG_0114143

gwashburn@tribune.com

Ald. Troutman Arrested On Corruption Charges (CHIST)

By Natasha Korecki And Fran Spielman, Federal Courts Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, January 9, 2007

Agents had to break a window to get in to Troutman's home. She wouldn't answer the door but had been seen peering through a window.

Among other acts, Troutman is accused of bribe-taking, a source with knowledge of the investigation said.

Troutman's attorney, Sam Adam Jr., said he was told his client is being accused of accepting a bribe in connection with a mall development in her ward.

"There are certainly some ugly allegations that are being spread, but we categorically deny any wrongdoing," Adam said. "She never accepted a bribe from anybody. This has to do with a mall somewhere in her ward. But I don't even think a mall went up."

Adam said he would not comment further until he sees the charges, which are expected to be unsealed this afternoon.

Troutman has been under scrutiny by law enforcement for years. Investigators are seeking her cooperation.

Searches were under way at her aldermanic office and home.

Troutman was questioned by the FBI in 2004 about her alleged love affair with fugitive Donnell "Scandalous" Jehan, a reputed street-gang leader, as part of an investigation into the Black Disciples street gang. In June, the FBI announced a $10,000 reward for information leading to Jehan's capture.

In a recent interview, Troutman said of Jehan: "There was never, ever anyone who proved there was any kind of relationship with anybody. Those were all allegations."

The Chicago Sun-Times subsequently reported that investigators wanted to know how an envelope addressed to Troutman with a return address of the Chicago Police Department ended up in the hands of the Black Disciples.

Troutman responded by holding a raucous news conference at her ward office at which she said she had met with top gang members under the impression they were legitimate businessmen and accepted their help during aldermanic elections. She would not discuss whether she had a personal relationship with Jehan.

The alderman said that two envelopes addressed to her from the police department might have ended up in Jehan's home because her office routinely recycles office materials. Asked whether Jehan had ever driven her Cadillac Escalade, Troutman said, "For years, I have let everybody drive my car."

Asked about her relationship with Jehan, Troutman responded by talking instead about her own family's struggle with drugs and say she would never associate with anyone bringing that "poison" into the community.

"There is no way I would be involved with any criminal activity. No way. I understand what dope has done to my community," she said then.

Three hours before that news conference, Troutman's brother was arrested in a drug-related sting.

Last summer, Troutman was embarassed again when the Sun-Times reported that her family had created and run Hobtat Trucking Co., which was paid more than $1.1 million by the city's Hired Truck Program. It was the first tme that an alderman's relatives had been linked to the scandal-ridden rogram.

At the time, the alderman said she never made a dime from the program and had "done nothing wrong."

Troutman was appointed by Mayor Daley in 1990, after the death of Ald. Ernest Jones (20th). The mayor stuck with her even after her opponents circulated police reports detailing her 1978 arrest for shoplifting. She admitted the crime, but the case was dropped.

Troutman is to appear before a federal magistrate judge at 2:30 this afternoon for her initial court appearance, a court clerk said.

Chicago Alderman Accused Of Taking Payoff (AP)

By Deanna Bellandi

AP, January 9, 2007

CHICAGO - FBI agents had to break a window at a city alderman's home to get inside Monday to arrest her on a federal bribery charge for allegedly accepting $5,000 to help a fictitious developer move forward on a building project, authorities said.

In return for the money and the promise of more, Alderman Arenda Troutman agreed to back the bogus developer in getting zoning changes and alley access for a proposed development in her South Side ward, according to federal authorities who unsealed a criminal complaint against Troutman on Monday after an undercover investigation.

First Assistant U.S. Attorney Gary Shapiro said the complaint offers a civics lesson on how things get done in Troutman's ward.

"You wanna build something, you wanna improve your property, you need permits from the city, you need zoning, you need the alderman's support, you want the alderman's support? You pay the alderman, you pay Arenda Troutman," Shapiro said.

For her support, Troutman also allegedly expected to receive another $10,000 cash and a $5,000 political contribution, authorities said. They said she also negotiated for both commercial and residential space at the proposed development.

Defense attorney Sam Adam Jr. said Troutman is innocent and plans to plead not guilty.

"I can tell you that we categorically deny every single allegation," Adam said after her court appearance.

Troutman's arrest comes just weeks before the Feb. 27 city election. Five opponents have filed papers to get on the ballot to challenge her. Troutman has served on the City Council since 1990, when Mayor Richard M. Daley appointed her to fill a vacancy.

Daley, who was in Springfield Monday, declined to comment on Troutman's arrest.

In court, federal Magistrate Michael T. Mason set a $10,000 unsecured bond for Troutman, releasing her on her own recognizance.

Troutman, who was rousted from her home and taken into custody about 7 a.m. Monday, wore a black track suit with a black and white checked hat pulled down over pig tails. Authorities also searched her ward office.

Troutman had opened a third-floor window when FBI agents knocked on the door of her home but closed it after the agents said they wanted to talk with her, according to Robert Grant, special agent in-charge of the FBI's Chicago office.

The agents also asked a nanny, who spoke through another window, to let them inside and made several telephone calls to the home with no response, Grant said. After 20-30 minutes, the agents broke a window to open a door and enter the house.

Troutman does not have to resign as alderman while dealing with the charges against her, but would lose her City Council seat if she is convicted.

Since 1971, 27 Chicago aldermen have faced a variety of corruption charges, said University of Illinois at Chicago political science professor Dick Simpson.

The charge against Troutman stems from a series of recorded conversations beginning in May 2006 between Troutman and an undercover informant, according to court documents. The informant is a target of a separate mortgage fraud investigation who began cooperating with authorities in April 2006, according to federal officials.

Troutman allegedly helped the bogus developer by sending a letter to the city's department of transportation supporting alley access at the proposed site and asking for permits to be issued, the court documents said.

Troutman has been the subject of public scrutiny before.

In 2004, she wouldn't say whether she had a personal relationship with an alleged high-ranking gang member as federal authorities investigated the Black Disciples. She said two envelopes addressed to her from the Chicago Police Department that the FBI found during a raid of the alleged gang member's home may have come from recycled office materials her aides use and somehow wound up elsewhere. Her attorney said then that Troutman was not a target of that investigation and was not suspected of any wrongdoing.

Troutman got more attention in 2005 when a published report said her relatives ran a trucking firm that had gotten business as part of the city's scandal-plagued program that outsourced hauling jobs to private trucking companies.

That investigation into the city's Hired Truck Program has since expanded into a broad look at City Hall hiring practices. More than 40 people have been convicted.

Bevilacqua To Wait In Jail For Court Hearing (PROJO)

By W. Zachary Malinowski, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, January 9, 2007

BOSTON — Joseph A. Bevilacqua Jr., once one of the state's more prominent criminal defense lawyers, is headed back to jail.

Bevilacqua, who had been serving the final portion of an 18-month sentence on work release, was ordered held at the Barnstable County House of Correction on Cape Cod after his arrest last week on charges that he participated in a scheme to pocket $150,000 from drug-dealer clients.

Yesterday, Bevilacqua, 57, of West Warwick, learned that he will remain locked up in the county jail through Jan. 17. The next day, he will be taken back to U.S. District Court in Boston to be arraigned on a felony count of conspiracy.

At that time, the court indicated that he would probably be released and placed on strict supervision by federal probation officials.

Bevilacqua, known for his fine-tailored suits during his days as a lawyer, shuffled yesterday into the seventh-floor courtroom of the John Joseph Moakley United States Courthouse in leg irons and handcuffs. Two federal marshals escorted him to the defense table.

Bevilacqua, who looked like he had lost weight in recent months, wore jeans and a yellow long-sleeved Ralph Lauren polo shirt. His hair was askew and it appeared that he had just awoken from a long slumber in the courthouse lockup.

Jonathan Shapiro, Bevilacqua's court-appointed lawyer, asked Judge Joyce London Alexander to let Bevilacqua serve out the final days of his sentence in work release.

"It doesn't make a lot of sense to lock him up for a week," he said.

Shapiro said that Thomas Tarro, of East Greenwich, will serve as Bevilacqua's lawyer.

In 2005, Bevilacqua was sentenced to 18 months in federal prison for leaking a confidential FBI videotape to Jim Taricani, a Rhode Island television reporter. The conviction led to Bevilacqua's disbarment from practicing law.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William D. Weinreb told the judge that it was the Bureau of Prisons — not the court — that determined Bevilacqua should return to jail. He pointed out that the federal prison system still has control over the former lawyer's freedom.

On Friday, Bevilacqua and John M. Cicilline, the brother of Providence Mayor David N. Cicilline, were charged in the same plot to manipulate the criminal-justice system through two clients who are admitted drug dealers. Cicilline, 49, of Cranston, was released on $10,000 unsecured bail.

The 21-page indictment, unsealed on the day of the arrests, alleges that the lawyers conspired with interpreters/paralegals, Juan A. Giraldo and Lisa Torres, to provide the authorities with information on other drug dealers, which would then be used to bargain for more-lenient sentences for their clients.

Giraldo, 41, who was close friends with both lawyers, is serving a federal prison sentence on drug charges in Youngstown, Ohio. No date for his appearance in federal court in Boston has been announced.

Torres, 39, appeared in court briefly yesterday and arraigned on charges of conspiracy, obstruction of justice and making false statements. She was ordered held, pending a detention hearing on Thursday.

Judge Allows 2 More Parties Into Polygamist Leader Evidence Case (SDUT/AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 9, 2007

LAS VEGAS – A federal judge on Monday broadened the legal tug-of-war over cash, computers and other materials seized from a vehicle during the southern Nevada arrest of polygamist church leader Warren Jeffs.

In a quick decision, U.S. District Court Judge Robert Jones said two other parties may join the government and Jeff's lawyers in arguing the civil case – the United Effort Plan Trust, which holds $110 million in Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints property, and a former Jeffs follower who won a $338,000 judgment from Jeffs after being fired from his job.

Lawyers for Jeffs did not oppose the motion.

The judge did not address questions about the materials, which have been held by the federal government since they were seized from a Cadillac Escalade during Jeffs' arrest Aug. 28 outside Las Vegas. Police reported seizing $54,000 in cash, letters and other papers, four laptop computers, 15 cell phones, and other items, including wigs. The contents of the letters and information on computers has not been made public.

"He didn't deal with the merits of the sealing or who gets access," said Jeffrey L. Shields, a Salt Lake City-based lawyer for the United Effort Plan Trust. "He just granted intervention."

Jeffs 51, the leader of the FLDS, remains in a Utah jail pending an April trial on two felony charges of rape as an accomplice stemming from allegations he arranged the 2001 marriage between a 14-year-old girl and her cousin.

Lawyers Richard Wright and Margaret Stanish, representing Jeffs, declined comment outside court.

Wright contends in court documents that the information is "sacred and confidential" because it includes matters of church doctrine and private communications between Jeffs and his followers.

Accountant Bruce Wisan, representing the trust, wants to know if Jeffs' papers and electronic records will lead to church assets that rightfully belong to the trust and should benefit all current and former church members.

A Utah judge made Wisan overseer of the trust in 2005 after finding Jeffs and other church leaders were fleecing it for personal gain. The trust is comprised of nearly all the property in Hildale, Colorado City, Ariz., and British Columbia, where church members live in assigned housing.

Lawyers for Shem Fischer, the former Jeffs follower awaiting payment after winning a court judgment last May, said the documents "may shed more information as to where (church) assets have been hidden, in what form they are held and where they are held."

In 2002, Fischer sued Jeffs, the church and a church-controlled cabinet company, for religious discrimination. Fischer said he was fired after he left the FLDS faith. He won a default judgment and now wants to collect the balance of what he is owed.

No date was immediately set for arguments about whether to release the seized evidence.

Battle Over Evidence Expands In Jeff Case (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, January 9, 2007

LAS VEGAS — The hearing lasted about as long as it takes to lose $20 at the slot machines.

Warren Jeffs But it was just enough time for a federal judge here to allow more lawyers to get involved in the fight over a trove of papers, ledgers, documents, cash and other items the FBI seized when it arrested Fundamentalist LDS Church leader Warren Jeffs.

With no one voicing any opposition, U.S. District Court Judge Robert Jones allowed lawyers for the court-appointed special fiduciary of the United Effort Plan Trust and an ex-FLDS member trying to collect on a civil judgment against Jeffs to intervene in the upcoming evidence fight.

The move allows the attorneys to try to get their hands on what the FBI found inside the red Cadillac Escalade that Jeffs was riding in when he was arrested during a traffic stop outside Las Vegas in August 2006.

"We felt like we needed to be involved," said Jeffrey L. Shields, an attorney for Bruce Wisan, the UEP's court-appointed special fiduciary. The $110 million UEP Trust, the financial arm of the FLDS Church, was taken over by a judge in Salt Lake City's 3rd District Court in 2005.

Just as the hearing ended, Jeffs' Las Vegas lawyer, Richard Wright strode in only to discover it was all over. Still, he did not object.

"One is a judgment creditor, the other an interested party," Wright told the Deseret Morning News outside of court. "It doesn't mean they acquire anything."

Shortly after Jeffs was arrested, Wright filed an emergency motion in federal court demanding the return of the evidence, claiming some of the documents constitute "sacred" and privileged communications between the FLDS leader and some of his followers.

DOJ_NMG_0114147

Lawyers pushing to see the evidence anticipate an uphill battle.

"I expect Mr. Wright is going to vigorously represent his client in a zealous manner," said William Bryson, another lawyer for the UEP fiduciary.

Among the $54,000 in cash, wigs, cell phones, computers and other evidence seized from the Escalade, FBI agents have told the Deseret Morning News they found ledgers that may detail who had been helping to keep Jeffs on the run. The FLDS leader was on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list until his capture.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Utah, which is handling the case, declined to comment Monday on the outcome of the hearing. An FBI agent from Salt Lake City was in the audience to keep track of the developments.

Shem Fischer, an ex-FLDS member who won a religious discrimination lawsuit against Jeffs, has been doggedly pursuing him through federal courts in several states trying to collect on a $338,000 judgment.

"There's probably data that shows where assets are. We want to be able to see that," Fischer's attorney James Stewart said outside of court.

So far, Stewart said Fischer has been able to collect approximately $132,000 — mostly from what authorities seized when they arrested Jeffs' brother Seth during a traffic stop in Pueblo, Colo., last year.

Seth Jeffs later pleaded guilty in a Denver federal court to harboring a fugitive, admitting he was a courier taking money and documents to help keep his brother on the run.

"There's some money we simply want to collect," Stewart said.

Meanwhile, the Utah Attorney General's Office wants to see what the FBI seized and is considering wading into the evidence fight.

"We are absolutely interested in taking a look at what's in the papers and the computer and whether it has any evidence of any crimes committed here in Utah," spokesman Paul Murphy said.

Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff has acknowledged his office is conducting an organized crime investigation into Jeffs and the FLDS Church.

Jeffs, 51, is scheduled to face trial in St. George's 5th District Court on two counts of rape as an accomplice, a first-degree felony. He is accused of forcing a 14-year-old girl into a marriage with her 19-year-old cousin. Jeffs remains in the Purgatory Jail without bail.

Those aren't the FLDS leader's only criminal problems.

Across the border in Mohave County, Ariz., Jeffs is facing numerous charges accusing him of arranging child bride marriages. Federal prosecutors in Utah and Arizona also have refused to drop a warrant against him for unlawful flight to avoid prosecution, threatening to seek grand jury indictments should he ever be granted bail.

Twins' Birth Mother Returns To U.S. To Face Kidnapping Charge (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

OTTAWA: A woman accused of kidnapping her 17-month-old twins from their adoptive parents returned to the United States, escorted by Canadian police.

Allison Quets waived her right to an extradition hearing. Her lawyer, Jeff Schroeder, said she did so to return home more quickly to continue the custody fight for the twins, whom she says she gave up while suffering from postpartum illness.

A custody agreement allowed Quets to take the children from Denise and Kevin Needham for a brief visit just before Christmas, but authorities said she never returned the twins.

The FBI said Quets crossed the Canadian border with the twins Dec. 23. They were found on Dec. 29 in Ottawa, Ontario.

Quets was released on bail Thursday after her lawyer argued she presents a low flight risk.

Today in Americas

Bush will seek Iraq troop increase

California's governor seeks universal health care

Chávez pushes closer to socialism

DOJ_NMG_0114148

In an affadavit, FBI Agent Michael Sutton wrote Quets and the Needhams argued over money and almost derailed the adoption in the first place.

Birth Mom Heads To U.S. Leaves Cda To Face Kidnapping Charge (CP)

Canadian Press, January 9, 2007

OTTAWA — A woman accused of kidnapping her 17-month-old twins from their adoptive parents headed back to the United States on Monday, escorted by RCMP and city police officers.

Released on bail Friday, Allison Quets returned to court after spending the weekend in nearby Renfrew, Ont. with friends. The couple, with whom she had stayed before she was arrested for suspected kidnapping Dec. 29, agreed to post money and bonds for her release and to vouch for her whereabouts until her court appearance.

Quets was turned over to police early Monday after she waived her right to an extradition hearing and special protection under a law which would have precluded her from being charged with anything other than the U.S. federal charge of international parental kidnapping once she crossed the border.

Her lawyer, Jeff Schroeder, said his client did that so that she could return home more quickly to continue to fight for the custody of the twins, whom she says she gave up while still suffering the effects of post-partum illness.

"I commend her for that," said Shroeder. "She decided upon reflection it was better for her to return, better for her children and the possibility of being reunited with them.

"She has an appeal before the Florida civil courts and that's what she wants to do."

Quets was to be met at the border by a U.S. marshall and taken to a magistrate's court in Syracuse, N.Y., for her first hearing.

She was arrested in Ottawa almost two weeks ago after fleeing to Ontario with the twins. An FBI warrant had been issued after the children were not returned to their adoptive parents following a scheduled visit in Raleigh, N.C., on Christmas Eve.

Man Reportedly Accused Of Extorting Oprah Winfrey Waives Preliminary Hearing (MACT)

By Megan Reichgott

The Macon Telegraph, January 9, 2007

CHICAGO - The case against an Atlanta man reportedly accused of trying to extort $1.5 million from Oprah Winfrey is likely headed to a grand jury.

Keifer Bonvillain, 36, was scheduled to appear before a federal magistrate on Monday but waived the preliminary hearing, said Randall Samborn, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office.

A grand jury may be asked instead to determine whether there is enough evidence to warrant a trial.

Samborn refused to confirm Winfrey was the target, and the criminal complaint only identified Bonvillain's aim as "Individual A," who was "a public figure and the owner of a Chicago-based company." The Chicago Tribune and the Chicago Sun-Times, citing unnamed sources, have reported his target was Winfrey.

There was no response to phone messages Monday seeking comment from Harpo Productions Inc., Winfrey's company.

Bonvillain's attorney, Kent Carlson, also did not return a phone call.

According to the complaint, Bonvillain met a California-based employee of the Chicago company at a party more than two years ago, then recorded conversations with the employee about the owner and her business.

In mid-October he sent the owner an e-mail, telling her an employee said awful things about her, the complaint states. A month later, Bonvillain sent a letter saying he had tapes of the conversations, an FBI agent alleges in the complaint.

Over the next few weeks, Bonvillain told the associate he wanted to publish a book based on the tapes and claimed he had received offers of $500,000 to $3 million from tabloids and book publishers, the complaint said.

The associate, who was working with the FBI, agreed to a $1.5 million price, wired Bonvillain $3,000 and arranged to meet him, the complaint said.

Bonvillain was arrested Dec. 15 in the parking lot of an Atlanta hotel and released on $20,000 bond.

Five Plead Guilty In FEMA Fraud Cases (BSH)

DOJ_NMG_0114149

By Robin Fitzgerald

Biloxi Sun Herald, January 9, 2007

GULFPORT - Five South Mississippi residents pleaded guilty today to fraud cases involving disaster-relief assistance from FEMA.

The defendants who appeared before U.S. District Judge Louis Guirola Jr. are Emily Fuqua, Duane Adams, Clarence Hall, Patty Richards and Hassie Baker. They remain free to await sentencing on April 9 at 9 a.m.

They each face a maximum penalty of five years in prison, three years of supervised release, a $250,000 fine and a mandatory $100 special assessment fee. Guirola said a lesser sentence may be considered as part of their plea agreements. They also could be ordered to pay back the money they weren't entitled to receive.

Four of them pleaded guilty to making a false claim for disaster-relief assistance following Hurricane Katrina. Fuqua pleaded guilty to making a false statement to FEMA on Adams' behalf. Fuqua and Adams both worked at FEMA's Biloxi office until they were arrested on the job in September 2006.

The Sun Herald provides details coverage of the court hearings in Tuesday's editions.

Judge Delays Dowie's Sentencing In Fraud Case (LAT)

By John Spano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

Judge will let the defense challenge the method of calculating the length of the PR executive's term.

A federal judge on Monday delayed sentencing for former public relations executive Douglas R. Dowie, but not before making comments favorable to both sides in the fraud case.

Dowie was convicted last fall of masterminding a long-running overbilling scheme that cost city taxpayers at least $6 million in unearned fees to public relations giant Fleishman-Hillard, whose local office he headed. Before joining the firm, Dowie was managing editor of the Daily News of Los Angeles.

"In my view, the government has more than adequately proved its case," U.S. District Judge Gary Feess said in court Monday. "I felt the jury's verdict was fully supported by the evidence. And I would have reached the same verdict."

But Feess delayed sentencing until Jan. 30 to allow full airing of a defense argument that prosecutors had miscalculated the number of months Dowie should serve in federal prison. The judge agreed that Dowie's lawyers could question an FBI agent who was responsible for the figures.

Defense lawyer Thomas E. Holliday said Dowie's maximum sentence should be 30 months in prison, while co-defendant John Stodder Jr. should face no more than 24 months — both well below the sentences sought by prosecutors. Stodder's sentencing also was delayed.

The scandal rocked Los Angeles City Hall, spurred ethics reform and helped persuade voters to elect Antonio Villaraigosa mayor. It bloodied one of the nation's top public relations firms. Two years ago, Fleishman-Hillard paid almost $6 million to the city of Los Angeles to cover the fraudulent billings. The firm was never charged with a crime, though a succession of top executives at its L.A. office including Dowie were alleged to having participated in the scheme.

Fleishman paid $1 million to defend Dowie, then dropped him. Dowie has run up $3 million in additional defense costs, largely unpaid. His lawyers tried hard to persuade Feess that his employer threw him to the wolves, thus compromising Dowie's constitutional rights.

When Holliday suggested, as he has at many earlier hearings, that others at Fleishman-Hillard should have been tried in addition to Dowie, Feess suggested the issue is interesting but legally irrelevant.

"I'd be very interested to see people above [Dowie and Stodder] in court," Feess said at one point.

john.spano@latimes.com

Towers Perrin Laptops, Client Data Stolen (WSJ)

By Theo Francis

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114150

Five laptops containing data about tens of thousands of retirement-plan participants at multiple companies were reported stolen by benefits consulting giant Towers Perrin last month, the latest in a string of thefts across industries raising concerns about privacy and identity theft.

Towers Perrin reported the laptops missing on Dec. 7, and New York City police made an arrest on Dec. 28, but the computers haven't been recovered, people familiar with the matter said. A criminal complaint filed in New York suggests the laptops were stolen from a locked room in the building housing Towers Perrin's Manhattan office on Nov. 27.

In a written statement late Monday, Towers Perrin confirmed the theft of "a small number" of laptops containing "personal information" about clients' "current and, possibly, former employees."

"We deeply regret the inconvenience this may cause," the company said in its statement. "We take seriously our commitment to safeguarding our clients' confidential information and notified our affected clients as quickly as possible."

Consulting firms can have access to considerable sensitive data about benefit-plan participants, including names, addresses, Social Security numbers and retirement-account information.

One person familiar with the investigation said the theft didn't appear focused on identity theft, but rather on selling the computer hardware.

In its statement, Towers Perrin said it has "no knowledge that any of this information has been misused," but said it would offer employees of its clients credit monitoring services and advice on identity theft. The company said it was working closely with police and a private investigation firm.

Towers Perrin is among the largest U.S. benefits-consulting firms, offering administrative services for pension and 401(k) plans, executive compensation and other benefits. The company's Web site says its clients include three-quarters of the world's largest companies and most of the largest U.S. companies.

A spokeswoman for the Manhattan district attorney's office said that Dewayne Rivers, 30, a Towers Perrin employee until mid-December, was arrested Dec. 28 and arraigned the next day before being released on $10,000 bail.

High-profile laptop thefts have repeatedly raised consumer privacy and identity-theft concerns in recent months. Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, a consumer-advocacy group, counts more than 80 thefts since early 2005 in which laptops containing sensitive employee, customer, student or patient data were stolen.

Last month, Boeing Co. fired an employee whose laptop -- containing the personal information on 382,000 workers and retirees -- was stolen after the employee left it unattended. It was the third such incident at Boeing in 13 months, prompting Chairman and Chief Executive Jim McNerney to take a tougher stance on protecting sensitive employment information. In a memo to employees, Mr. McNerney said Boeing had taken steps to safeguard such data, "but the best policies, procedures, encryption software and awareness-raising in the world can't force people to use them." In addition to firing the employee, the employee's managers were reprimanded.

In May 2006, thieves took a laptop from a U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs analyst's home that contained information on 26 million people. In March 2006, a laptop containing data on 196,000 current and former Hewlett Packard Co. employees was stolen from the rental car of an employee at Fidelity Investments, which manages H-P's 401(k) and pension plans.

In many cases, thieves have appeared intent on reselling the laptops, rather than using the sensitive data on their hard drives, but privacy experts say the information could still be available to subsequent users.

Duke President Renews Call For District Attorney To Leave Case (NYT)

By Duff Wilson

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

DURHAM, N.C., Jan. 8 — The president of Duke University renewed his call on Monday for the district attorney to step aside from the sexual offense case against three former lacrosse players and give control to an independent party "who can restore confidence in the fairness of the process."

In an open letter to the Duke community as a new semester began, the president, Richard H. Brodhead, reviewed recent events in the case and sought to explain the university's responses since last March, when a stripper accused three students of raping her at a lacrosse team party.

DOJ_NMG_0114151

Mr. Brodhead said that from the early, confusing days of the case, the university had been guided by two principles: If true, the accusations were "grave and should be taken very seriously." At the same time, "our students had to be presumed innocent until proven guilty through the legal process."

Now, he wrote, in the wake of developments that have raised questions about the district attorney's handling of the case, the need for a fair legal process demands that he recuse himself.

Early on, Mr. Brodhead recalled, the district attorney, Michael B. Nifong, said publicly that he was certain a rape had taken place. But on Dec. 22, Mr. Nifong dropped the rape charges, saying the accuser was no longer sure what had penetrated her. He is proceeding with sexual offense and kidnapping charges, which carry equally stiff sentences.

Given the certainty of the prosecutor's early statements, Mr. Brodhead said then and restated in his letter on Monday, the decision to drop the rape charges called the entire case into question.

"We entrust our conflicts to the law to provide a path to a fair resolution," Mr. Brodhead wrote. "But to earn this faith from the public, those who work in the legal process must behave with elemental fairness and regard for the rights of those involved. We need and deserve for that faith to be restored."

In recent weeks, Mr. Nifong has faced rising criticism and calls to step aside. At a court hearing in mid-December, it was revealed that he withheld potentially exculpatory DNA evidence from the defendants' lawyers; he could face a charge of prosecutorial misconduct. Two weeks later, the North Carolina State Bar filed ethics charges against him, saying he had made inflammatory statements about the team and had misled the public about evidence. And soon after, the North Carolina Conference of District Attorneys suggested he recuse himself "in the interest of justice."

Mr. Nifong did not respond to requests for comment. Previously, he has said he regretted some of his public statements. Last week, after he was sworn in for a four-year term at a private ceremony, he said he intended to do the job for which he was elected.

Over the course of the case, Mr. Brodhead himself has come under criticism from supporters of the lacrosse team for what they viewed as a failure to support the players' presumption of innocence.

Mr. Brodhead canceled the lacrosse season and sought the coach's resignation on April 4. He also set up five inquiries into the university and the lacrosse team. His letter on Monday referred to the Campus Culture Initiative, charged broadly with reviewing responsibility and respect across lines of sex, race and wealth.

The accuser is a local black woman and single mother of three, while the defendants are white.

Last week, because of what Mr. Brodhead's letter called the "new circumstances" of the case, Duke invited two defendants to return to school. They said they would consider it. The third defendant had already graduated.

CIVIL LAW:

Framed Men Take Stand At Trial (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 9, 2007

Tearfully recall decades in prison

Tears rolled down Joseph Salvati's face yesterday as he took the stand in federal court, recounting the family milestones he missed as his four young children grew up without him while he spent 30 years in prison for a murder he didn't commit.

Describing a jailhouse meeting with his parents shortly after his arrest in a 1965 gangland slaying, Salvati said, "I just sat with them and cried. I said: 'Don't believe none of this. This is a nightmare. It's a lie.' "

Salvati, who was 35 years old when he went to prison in 1967, spent 29 years and five months behind bars for the murder of petty thief Edward "Teddy" Deegan in a Chelsea alley before he was freed in March 1997, after William Weld, then governor, commuted his life sentence.

Four years later, Salvati's codefendant, Peter Limone , was set free and the convictions of both men were overturned after it was revealed that long-secret FBI documents indicated they had been framed by a Mafia hitman-turned-government witness, Joseph "The Animal" Barboza .

DOJ_NMG_0114152

"I couldn't believe the FBI would do a thing like that," said Salvati, wiping his eyes with a handkerchief. "These are people you look up to. They didn't care 40 years ago, and they don't care now."

Salvati and Limone testified yesterday in a civil trial over a wrongful imprisonment suit they have filed against the government, along with the families of two other men, Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco , who died in prison before they were exonerated in Deegan's slaying. They are seeking more than $100 million in damages.

Limone, also a father of four, who served 33 years in prison, described how Greco, a highly decorated World War II veteran and boxer, confided as he grew ill, "I'm going to end up dying in these prisons for nothing."

Salvati said he didn't know Deegan and suspected Barboza framed him because he had borrowed $400 from a loan shark, then got the better of bat-wielding thugs sent by Barboza to collect the debt.

Salvati said his wife of 53 years, Marie, visited him every week in prison while raising their children alone and "never doubted me."

Salvati's son, Anthony, who was 5 when his father went to prison, sobbed as he testified yesterday about how he tried to become the man of the family and was 8 years old when he gave his older sister away at her wedding.

"I cried my eyes out," said Anthony Salvati, now 44. "At 8 years old, I was taking his place. My father wasn't there so I knew it was my job to do it."

Salvati and Limone said they were able to go home on furloughs occasionally in the 1970s and 1980s, until the Dukakis administration halted the furlough program in 1987.

Anthony Salvati said his father missed his graduation, his wedding, and the birth of his two children .

Sharon Salvati, who was 11 when her father went to prison, broke into tears on the stand yesterday as she told the government lawyers that she was being forced to relive a nightmare by going through the trial.

"It's just very unfair for my family and all the families bringing this up," Sharon Salvati testified. "You took all our lives away, all of our childhoods. You'll never replace 30 years. You can never give it back to us. And, to think that you knew."

Wrongly Convicted Men Describe Decades In Prison (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

BOSTON - Joseph Salvati was 35, with a wife and four young children, when he was arrested in the 1965 gangland murder of Edward "Teddy" Deegan.

It would be more than 29 years, eight grandchildren and three great-grandchildren later before he left prison.

On Monday, Salvati, now 74, broke down and sobbed on the witness stand as he described his shock when he was arrested, his decades in prison and his feelings when he learned that the FBI knew he and three other men had been framed.

"I couldn't believe it - that the FBI could do a thing like this," he said. "This is people who protect you, people you look up to.

"They don't care - that's the bottom line," he said, burying his face in a handkerchief.

Salvati, Peter Limone Sr. and the families of two other men who died in prison - Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco - are suing the federal government for $100 million for false imprisonment.

The lawsuit accuses the government of malicious prosecution, intentional infliction of emotional distress, conspiracy and negligent supervision of FBI agents.

Salvati and Limone were exonerated in 2001 after a state judge found that FBI agents hid evidence from state prosecutors that could have cleared the men in order to protect an informant.

Lawyers for the men claim the FBI did not disclose that Joseph "The Animal" Barboza, a former mob hitman and FBI informant, and his cohort, Vincent "Jimmy" Flemmi were overheard on FBI wiretaps asking for permission to kill Deegan shortly before his murder.

The FBI also had internal memos that showed Barboza - who was the key witness against the four men at their trial - was framing the four men and protecting Flemmi, who was also an FBI informant at the time Deegan was killed.

Salvati was sentenced to life in prison as an accessory to murder. He was released from prison when his sentence was commuted in 1997, after serving a little more than 29 years. Limone served 33 years in prison before being freed in 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0114153

Justice Department lawyers have argued during the civil case that federal authorities had no duty to share information with state prosecutors and cannot be liable for the results of a separate state investigation.

Salvati's lawyers say FBI memos showed the FBI believed Flemmi had killed Deegan, as well as six other people, but agents continued to use him as an informant.

The memos were made public in 2001 after they were discovered by a Justice Department task force probing the FBI's relationship with gangsters and FBI informants James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi, Vincent Flemmi's brother.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Former Terrorism Suspect Can Sue County Over Treatment In Jail, U.S. Judge Rules (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

(AP) - DETROIT-A former suspect in a federal terrorism case who says he was mistreated while in jail can sue the county, a federal judge has ruled.

Moroccan immigrant Karim Koubriti, 28, was held for three years in the Wayne County jail and claims he was strip searched, held in isolation for 23 hours a day and not allowed to exercise.

U.S. District Judge Bernard Friedman last week rejected the county's request to dismiss Koubriti's lawsuit, the Detroit Free Press reported Sunday. No trial date has been set.

"The decision means he'll get his day in court and his say at trial," said Koubriti's lawyer, Ben Gonek of Detroit. He is seeking unspecified damages.

Friedman's order dropped one count - that being served pork at the jail violated Koubriti's Muslim faith and his constitutional rights. But he upheld three other counts, including Koubriti's claim that he was "repeatedly subjected to unlawful and unnecessary strip searches designed to humiliate and degrade him because of and in retaliation for his religious beliefs."

The Wayne County Sheriff's Department had no immediate comment.

Koubriti and three other Middle Eastern immigrants had been accused of forming a terror cell in the Detroit area. In 2003, Koubriti and Abdel-Ilah Elmardoudi were convicted of conspiracy to aid terrorists and document fraud. A third man was convicted of document fraud, and the fourth was acquitted of all charges.

A federal judge later dismissed the convictions at the request of the Department of Justice, which said federal prosecutors in Detroit withheld evidence beneficial to the defendants.

Koubriti is free on bail and staying in a halfway house. The government is seeking to retry him on charges of attempting to commit insurance fraud.

Brooklyn Man, 38, Dies After Jolt From Police Taser (NYT)

By Andy Newman

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

The day after a disturbed man died after being shocked with a Taser stun gun in Queens by a police sergeant, a city police official yesterday provided a fuller account of the moments before the man apparently went into cardiac arrest.

The man, Blondel Lassegue, 38, a former schoolteacher, struggled with the police on Sunday afternoon in a kitchen of a house near Kennedy International Airport. Family members at the house said late yesterday that they would issue a statement today about the circumstances of Mr. Lassegue's death.

The Nassau County medical examiner's office, which is investigating the death, said the cause had not been determined.

The sergeant who shot Mr. Lassegue appeared to have been following departmental guidelines, said Chief Michael Collins, a New York Police Department spokesman. The Taser is widely used by police departments to subdue people, although there have been questions about its safety. Amnesty International says more than 220 people have died after being shot by Tasers.

DOJ_NMG_0114154

Mr. Lassegue, a deeply religious man who lived in Flatbush, Brooklyn, had a history of mental illness and, according to family members, had recently stopped taking his medication, Chief Collins said. Four times in recent years, the police had been summoned to incidents involving Mr. Lassegue in Brooklyn, he added.

Shirley Donis, Mr. Lassegue's sister, described him as a scholarly man who spoke seven languages, including the Creole of his native Haiti, had a master's degree in psychology, and studied theology. Two weeks ago, she said, he went to Las Vegas to be ordained a Pentecostal minister. She said he was a kind, gentle person.

"He's a giver," she said. "He doesn't go out. He's always preaching. He always says you need to go to church."

On Sunday afternoon, the police said, Mr. Lassegue visited his aunt and uncle at 240-12 141st Avenue in Rosedale, Queens, on a tidy street lined with boxy houses and miniature lawns. He began behaving erratically, refused to leave and at one point grabbed a 1-year-old child, Chief Collins said.

The aunt called other relatives at Mr. Lassegue's home in Brooklyn, who called 911, Chief Collins said.

A caravan of police cars and ambulances drove up around 5 p.m., drawing the attention of neighbors. Sandy Ronquillo crossed the street to the Lassegue house and was met by Mr. Lassegue's uncle, Clausel Lassegue, who told her his nephew was "acting crazy."

Chief Collins offered the following account of the events inside the house:

Four officers approached Mr. Lassegue in the kitchen to try to calm him down. He eventually agreed to be placed in handcuffs and taken to a hospital, but after the police had cuffed his left hand, he lashed out with his right, punching a sergeant in the face repeatedly.

The officers wrestled Mr. Lassegue down. "They have his hands behind his back," Chief Collins said. "They're sitting on his legs as he's kicking in the air."

A second sergeant warned Mr. Lassegue that he would shoot him with the Taser if he continued to resist. When he did, the sergeant fired a Taser dart, which typically delivers a shock of 50,000 volts.

The officers were able to finish handcuffing Mr. Lassegue. Paramedics had arrived, and they "declared him O.K.," Chief Collins said. The paramedics left the room.

The police officers were preparing to carry Mr. Lassegue "from the building when he becomes unresponsive," Chief Collins said. The paramedics were called back, but were unable to revive Mr. Lassegue. He was taken to Franklin Hospital Medical Center, just over the Nassau County line in Valley Stream, where he was pronounced dead at 6:39 p.m.

The sergeant who was struck and the other three officers were treated for minor injuries. The 1-year-old child was unharmed. The names of the officers and sergeants were not released by the police.

The spokeswoman for the Nassau County medical examiner's office, Diane Markunas, said that an autopsy was performed yesterday but that a finding on the cause of death awaited the results of toxicological and other tests.

The Taser gun, which fires barbs attached to fine wires and is used by more than 10,000 police departments around the world, has been the subject of conflicting studies about its safety.

Officials at Taser International, which makes it, say that it has been tested on volunteers about 200,000 times, and that tests financed by the United States Justice Department found that the Taser did not change heart rhythms or damage hearts. But a University of Wisconsin study found last year that the guns' shocks applied directly to the hearts of healthy pigs could cause them to stop beating. Chief Collins said he did not know where the Taser dart struck Mr. Lassegue.

Killing Stirs Racial Concerns In North Woods Of Wisconsin (NYT)

By Barbara Miner

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

MILWAUKEE, Jan. 8 — Law enforcement officials said Monday that a Hmong hunter found dead Saturday in northern Wisconsin had been murdered after an "accidental meeting" between the victim and another small game hunter.

The killing has reignited racial tension in Wisconsin's northern woods, where two years ago a Hmong hunter killed six white hunters and injured two others in a confrontation that included racial epithets.

Details remain sketchy about the latest killing, although there have been news reports that the two men had a confrontation.

DOJ_NMG_0114155

"While there is much I would like to tell you, there is much I cannot tell you," Sheriff James Kanikula said at a news conference Monday in Marinette, Wis., The Associated Press reported.

The finding that the death of the Hmong hunter, Cha Vang, 30, had been intentional was based on an autopsy. The case has been turned over to Wisconsin's newly elected attorney general, J. B. Van Hollen.

The other hunter, James Nichols, 28, of Peshtigo, Wis., is being detained, but has not been charged in the killing. Mr. Nichols is being held on charges of violating parole and being a felon in possession of a firearm. A convicted burglar, he has been in custody since Saturday, when he showed up at a medical center with a gunshot wound.

Many members of the Hmong community here are urging caution.

"There are a lot of rumors, and there is a lot of talking, but I don't have all the information at this point," Yia Thao, president of the United Hmong Community Center in Green Bay, said in a telephone interview. "I believe in the law, and I hope that whoever caused the crime, I hope they will be put into justice."

The body of Mr. Vang, a father of five children age 3 to 10, was found partly concealed Saturday in the Peshtigo Harbor Wildlife Area. The hunting spot is an hour's drive north of Green Bay, where Mr. Vang lived, and about 250 miles north of Chicago.

He had been hunting small game with friends on Friday, and they reported him as missing when he did not show up at day's end. A search, which included tracking dogs, took place. The authorities did not find Mr. Vang's body until after questioning Mr. Nichols.

Hunting is deeply ingrained in both the Hmong and Wisconsin northern woods cultures. Distrust among the Hmong and other residents has been high since Chai Soua Vang of St. Paul killed six hunters and wounded two others in 2004 in north-central Wisconsin. The hunters had ordered Chai Soua Vang off private land. Mr. Vang is serving a life sentence.

About 40,000 Hmong live in Wisconsin, which has the third-highest Hmong population in the United States, after California and Minnesota. Roughly 6,000 live in the Green Bay area. The Hmong, who are from the mountain regions of Laos, were granted refugee status after the end of the Vietnam War.

Cha Vang was among the final wave of Hmong refugees from Thailand and emigrated to Wisconsin two years ago. He spoke little or no English and had recently been laid off from a manufacturing job, said Mr. Thao, of the Hmong community center.

After the killings two years ago, many Hmong felt nervous about hunting. "Everybody was worried," said Zongsae Vang, a community organizer with the Hmong American Friendship Association in Milwaukee, where most of the state's Hmong population lives.

Pang Vue Vang, Cha Vang's wife, does not speak English and she and the children are having difficulty coping with all that is happening, Mr. Thao said. "I see the wife crying all day, and the little one is asking for their dad," he said.

ANTITRUST:

GE Sets Private-Equity Limits (WSJ)

By Randall Smith And Kathryn Kranhold

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

In Auction of Plastics Unit, Restrictions on Team Bids Reflect Antitrust Concerns

General Electric Co. has asked for bids on its plastics business, valued at as much as $10 billion, in an auction that appears to reflect new concerns from the Justice Department about the lack of competition among possible private-equity buyers.

GE has told a handful of private-equity firms contacted about the possible plastics-unit sale that they face restrictions on their ability to team up with other private-equity bidders, according to people familiar with the sale effort. Although the exact nature of the restrictions isn't known, one of the people said the contacted firms aren't allowed to call other buyout funds about teaming up.

DOJ_NMG_0114156

The restrictions may effectively limit the formation of so-called clubs, the teams of two or more private-equity firms that pool their resources to pursue a single acquisition deal.

A spokesman for GE, which is based in Fairfield, Conn., declined to comment.

GE has been weighing the future of its plastics business, which has been plagued by higher raw-materials costs and keen competition. The business, where former GE Chief Executive Jack Welch made an early mark as boss and which also employed current CEO Jeffrey Immelt, has an estimated value of between $8 billion and $10 billion and annual revenue of about $7 billion. In the first nine months of 2006, its revenue rose 1% to $5 billion, but operating profit fell 13% to $560 million.

Acting on GE's behalf, Wall Street investment bank Goldman Sachs Group Inc. has conveyed the bidding restrictions on the plastics unit to four private-equity firms, the people familiar with the matter said. Goldman has also contacted two potential bidders in the plastics industry, they added. Goldman declined to comment.

The "club" issue has taken on greater significance since October, when the Justice Department launched an antitrust probe of private-equity funds. The probe followed a trend in the past few years toward club bids. While the ostensible goal of forming buyout clubs has been to spread the risk of larger investments among the members of the club, some takeover professionals have voiced concern that clubs may also limit the number of competing bidders and the value of potential bids.

Amid such concerns, restrictions on clubs may become more common among companies auctioning substantial business assets. Although similar restrictions have been tried in the past, they have often been dropped as auctions proceeded and no single bidder proved willing to put up a large enough sum, takeover experts said.

In some recent cases, teams of three to five private-equity funds have been involved in major buyouts, with the value of some of these deals topping $30 billion, including debt. The value of the GE plastics unit, however, may be small enough for the restrictions to stick.

Since Mr. Immelt became CEO in 2001, he has transformed GE by selling slow-growth and underperforming businesses including reinsurance, industrial diamonds and motors. Among them are GE Insurance Solutions, which Swiss Reinsurance Co. acquired last year for $7.8 billion in cash and securities, plus assumption of $1.7 billion in debt. GE also spun off its consumer-insurance group, renamed Genworth Financial Inc.

Large Acquisitions

Mr. Immelt has also expanded GE into health-care information technology, water treatment and security technologies. His biggest acquisitions include the British biosciences and medical-diagnostic firm, Amersham PLC, for about $9 billion, and Universal's entertainment assets for about $14 billion, which formed NBC Universal.

GE last month completed the sale of its silicon-and-quartz business for $3.4 billion to Apollo Management LP, a private-equity firm. The business had annual sales of roughly $2.5 billion. Since that sale, analysts have focused on a possible sale of all or part of the plastics unit.

GE has been shifting from commodity products such as plastics used in compact discs into higher-priced specialty materials used in autos, aviation and health care. For example, GE has developed lightweight materials including resins for car roofs, fenders and steering wheels.

Last month, Mr. Immelt said GE would "evaluate" the case for keeping plastics, but that he wasn't "necessarily" committed to wait for a turnaround. He noted that there was "infinite capital" to sell underperforming businesses to private-equity firms or strategic buyers.

Using Lots of Debt

Private-equity firms buy companies or divisions of companies using lots of debt on behalf of their investors, which include pension funds, endowments and wealthy families. They are called private-equity because the acquired companies are taken private.

Although some investment banks conducting auctions have sought to stimulate competition among rival private-equity bidders, in the past few years no agreed-to private-equity deal has been topped by a higher bid from a rival buyout firm.

In one auction that included restrictions on clubs, Goldman Sachs in March 2005 told potential private-equity bidders for luxury-goods retailer Neiman Marcus Group Inc. they could contact only a single additional buyout firm about forming a bidding "team."

DOJ_NMG_0114157

The result was that two buyout firms that have both specialized in retailing deals, Texas Pacific Group and Bain Capital LLC, weren't able to join forces on a Neiman bid. The idea was to keep the two firms viewed as able to mount the strongest bids in competition against each other.

Within a month, one of the private-equity teams gained permission to bring in a third member. The winning bid of $5.1 billion from Texas Pacific and Warburg Pincus LLC topped bids from two other private-equity teams, one of which included Bain.

Flush with cash from investors seeking higher returns fueled by a rising market and amplified by debt, the buyout firms have completed ever-larger corporate takeovers. Last year, one group completed a buyout valued at $33 billion, including debt, of hospital chain HCA Inc., based in Nashville, Tenn.

The HCA board also sought to stimulate competition in the form of a rival bid by barring three initial members of the private-equity bidding group from adding additional members. However, a rival bid didn't materialize.

Faced with the antitrust probe, the buyout firms have launched a Washington lobbying effort. Last month, 11 of the largest fund groups formed the Private Equity Council, to be led by a former lobbyist for the videogame industry.

-- Henny Sender contributed to this article.

Write to Randall Smith at randall.smith@wsj.com4 and Kathryn Kranhold at kathryn.kranhold@wsj.com5

GE Reportedly Shopping Plastics Business (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

Report: General Electric Seeks to Sell Its $10 Billion Plastics Business

FAIRFIELD, Conn. (AP) -- General Electric Co. is seeking bids on its $10 billion plastics business, which has been hit hard by inflation in raw materials, The Wall Street Journal reported late Monday.

In seeking bids, GE has told several private-equity buyout firms contacted about the possible sale that they could be restricted in joining other private-equity bidders, the newspaper reported on its Web site, citing unidentified sources.

Gary Sheffer, a spokesman for GE, would not comment.

The possible restrictions among bidders reflect concerns by the U.S. Department of Justice about lack of competition among possible private-equity buyers, the newspaper reported.

Last October, the Justice Department began an antitrust probe of private-equity funds, looking particularly at private-equity firms that team up and prompting fears among some sellers that the number of bidders and size of the bids would be limited.

GE chief executive Jeff Immelt, in a conference call with analysts last October, called GE's plastics segment "the business we really need to remain focused on."

He said higher-than-expected commodities prices pushed down margins.

The plastics unit has current estimated revenues of $7 billion. Its value is estimated at between $8 billion and $10 billion. In the first nine months of 2006, its revenue rose 1 percent, to $5 billion, but operating profit fell 13 percent, to $560 million.

GE has been shifting from commodity products such as plastic used in compact discs into higher-priced specialty materials used in autos, aviation and health care. GE has developed lightweight materials including resins for car roofs, fenders and steering wheels.

GE Seeks $10 Billion For Plastics Unit, People Say (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Rachel Layne And Dana Cimilluca

Bloomberg, January 9, 2007

Jan. 8 (Bloomberg) -- General Electric Co., the world's second-biggest company by market value, is seeking bids for its plastics unit and may be offered as much as $10 billion, people with direct knowledge of the auction said.

The bids may come from private equity firms, said the people, who asked not to be identified because the talks are private. GE spokesman Russell Wilkerson declined to comment.

A sale would free Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Immelt of one of the drags on GE's recent earnings. He said at a December investor meeting that the Fairfield, Connecticut-based company's plastics unit is ``in a difficult spot'' and that he's not necessarily committed to waiting for its fortunes to improve.

DOJ_NMG_0114158

``It's nice to see them get away from the low-margin businesses like this," said Mike McGarr, an analyst at Becker Capital Management in Portland, Oregon, which owns about 800,000 GE shares. ``A lot of the hard work at GE is starting to pay off a bit and we are pleased with what Immelt has done steering toward services and infrastructure."

GE has been weighing the sale after the high cost of benzene, the main oil-based material used in much of its plastic, cut earnings last year.

Immelt made almost $70 billion in acquisitions since becoming CEO in 2001 to enter faster-growing areas including healthcare, and he sold assets such as insurance that are volatile or capital intensive and hurt profit.

Shares of GE slipped 1 cent to $37.55 in New York Stock Exchange trading at 4:01 p.m. The stock has gained 5.9 percent in the past 12 months.

Early Talks

The negotiations are in the early stages, one person said. Goldman Sachs Group Inc., which has been hired to look for buyers, is restricting the ability of private equity firms to form groups in the auction, two of the people said.

Such restrictions aren't unheard of, though in this case it comes as the Justice Department investigates possible anticompetitive behavior on the part of buyout firms, which often team up to buy multibillion-dollar assets.

A sale could generate a hefty tax bill, since GE has owned the unit for a long time and likely carries it on the books at less than half its current value, one of the people said.

GE Plastics probably had an operating profit of about $738 million last year on sales of $6.7 billion, Citigroup analysts Jeffrey Sprague and P.J. Juvekar said in a Dec. 13 note. A sale may slice 3 cents to 4 cents off profit in 2007, Sprague said. He includes that possibility in his estimate of $2.22 a share.

Immelt's Efforts

Immelt last month forecast as much as 13 percent growth in earnings this year. The plastics unit is one dark spot. In the quarter ended in September, benzene prices rose 31 percent and the business posted a 23 percent drop in profit. GE had expected earnings in the unit to be little-changed.

``The chronically disappointing performance of GE Plastics increases the odds that the business gets sold," Sprague and Juvekar wrote. BASF of Germany and Midland, Michigan-based Dow Chemical Co. are the most likely buyers, they said.

Saudi Basic Industries Corp., the world's largest chemicals maker by market value, said last month it may bid for the plastics unit if it was put up for sale.

The more likely buyer could be a private-equity firm, McGarr said. GE last year sold its advanced materials unit, a maker of adhesives and sealants, to private equity firm Apollo Management LP for $3.8 billion.

Today, the company said it would buy drilling-equipment maker Vetco Gray Inc. for $1.9 billion as dwindling oil and gas reserves prompt energy companies to boost investments in opening new oil fields.

The Wall Street Journal reported the auction earlier today.

GE Imposes Private Equity Conditions On Plastics Deal (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera Andjames Politi In New York

Financial Times, January 9, 2007

General Electric has put its underperforming plastics business up for sale but has told private equity groups not to team up to bid for the unit, valued at about $10bn, for fear of antitrust objections to the deal.

The move by the US industrial conglomerate is the first sign that an ongoing investigation by the US Department of Justice into potential collusion among buy-out funds is prompting companies to revise the way they deal with private equity groups.

These groups have been able to buy ever-larger companies by joining forces in "club deals" such as the $33bn takeover of hospital operator HCA by a consortium of Bain Capital, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Merrill Lynch.

However, people close to the situation said that GE had demanded bids from individual buy-out funds only for its plastics unit in an apparent move to foster competition in the auction.

Jeffrey Immelt, GE's chairman and chief executive, has repeatedly told investors the company was reviewing the future of the $7bn-a-year plastics business, which has been hit by the rising costs of raw materials and natural gas.

DOJ_NMG_0114159

"Am I committed to waiting for that to right itself? Not necessarily. But I will say that the business is in a difficult spot right now and a spot that almost nobody would have forecast . . . But look, we're going to evaluate stuff like that," he told investors last month

Mr Immelt has been a supporter of the growing influence of private equity on takeover markets, arguing that it makes it easier for large diversified companies like GE to reshape their portfolio by trading assets with buy-out groups.

GE has already found private equity groups to be attractive buyers for non-core businesses it is considering selling. In September, the group agreed to sell its advanced materials business, a supplier of sealants, adhesives, and ceramics materials, to Apollo Management in a deal worth $3.8bn.

A sale of the plastics business would be an emotional affair for Mr Immelt, who cut his managerial teeth in the unit, as did his famous predecessor Jack Welch.

However, he has been under pressure to sell the underperforming parts of GE's locomotive-to-washing machines portfolioto revive the company's share price.

GE and Goldman Sachs, its adviser on the sale, declined to comment.

Waste Services Buy Of Fla. Unit Gets OK (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

Justice Department OKs Waste Services $61M Acquisition of Allied Waste's Florida Operations

NEW YORK (AP) -- Waste Services Inc., a Canada-based solid waste management company, said Monday its previously announced acquisition of Allied Waste's South Florida operations has been cleared by the U.S. Department of Justice.

Under a deal signed in July, Waste Services agreed to pay $61 million in cash for Allied Waste's collection company, transfer station and recovery facility located in Miami-Dade County. In return, Waste Services agreed to sell its Arizona operations to Allied Waste for $53 million.

Shares of Waste Services Inc. dipped 3 cents to close at $9.90 on the Nasdaq. Shares of Allied Waste Industries Inc. rose 5 cents to $12.56 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Caremark Rejects Bid From Express Scripts (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

NASHVILLE, Jan. 8 -- Caremark Rx rejected a buyout offer by a rival pharmacy-benefits manager Monday and pledged to continue to pursue a bid from drugstore operator CVS.

Express Scripts responded by launching an effort to salvage its $26 billion stock-and-cash offer by reshaping the Caremark board of directors. The CVS deal, valued at $21 billion in stock, has passed antitrust scrutiny by the Federal Trade Commission and is expected to go to a shareholder vote and be completed by the end of March.

Express Scripts of Maryland Heights, Mo., contends that its proposal represents a 13 percent premium for shareholders over what Woonsocket, R.I.-based CVS is offering, but Caremark hasn't been swayed.

"The board has unanimously concluded that pursuing discussions with Express Scripts is not in the best financial or strategic interests of Caremark and its shareholders," Nashville-based Caremark said in a statement Monday.

Express Scripts said a few hours later that it had notified Caremark of its intentions to nominate four candidates to the Caremark board at the company's next shareholder meeting.

The only obstacle in the way of a shareholder vote on a deal between Caremark and CVS is a pending lawsuit filed in state court in Delaware, where Caremark is incorporated, by a Louisiana pension company with a block of Caremark stock. An injunction hearing is set for March 20 or earlier if a shareholder meeting to vote on the CVS deal is set, documents show.

The lawsuit seeks to block the CVS deal, claiming it is designed to benefit Caremark insiders at the expense of the shareholders. A similar lawsuit filed in federal court in Nashville was dismissed in favor of the Delaware suit.

Express Scripts Moves To Derail A Merger (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

EXPRESS SCRIPTS opened a proxy war in the pharmacy benefits industry yesterday, moving to derail the pending acquisition of its rival Caremark Rx by the drugstore chain CVS.

Express Scripts said it would nominate four directors to the 11-member board of Caremark. But Caremark said the vote would need to wait for its annual meeting, which is normally held in May but which the company said yesterday it had not yet scheduled.

The action came after the Caremark board voted unanimously on Sunday to reject a $26 billion hostile takeover offer by Express Scripts, even though the offer values Caremark at about 13 percent higher than the CVS deal. Caremark said in a statement yesterday that the Express Scripts offer, which was made on Dec. 18, would create "significant, if not insurmountable, antitrust risks."

Express Scripts yesterday dismissed the antitrust issue as "a red herring" that Caremark was wielding to distract stockholders.

Caremark is currently the second-largest player and Express Scripts is No. 3 in pharmacy benefits management — the business of acting as a middleman between drug companies and health plans that offer drug benefits to workers, retirees and Medicare enrollees. The current leader is Medco Health Solutions, but a combined Caremark-Express Scripts would be much larger.

The question of how much competition prevails in the pharmacy benefit business is likely to be at the center of the proxy war. Express Scripts asked the Federal Trade Commission last week to review its bid and analysts expect the commission to seek further information later this month.

A second request could start a lengthy process and potentially cast a pall of uncertainty over the Caremark-CVS deal, which has already received antitrust clearance from the F.T.C. Caremark has said it would ask its shareholders to approve the CVS offer at a special meeting before March 31.

Edwin M. Crawford, Caremark's chairman, said in the company statement yesterday that the "certainty" of having the antitrust clearance "and the opportunity to close our merger promptly translate in a strong financial benefit."

Since the Express Scripts bid three weeks ago, Caremark investors have indicated hopes that the CVS deal would be sweetened, one way or another, but this has not yet happened. "Some investors may be figuring that a higher bid is worth waiting for, even with the uncertainty of the antitrust issue," said Sheryl Skolnick, a health care analyst with CRT Capital in Stamford.

Shares of Caremark gained 29 cents, to $56.64 yesterday, which analysts noted, was well above the CVS cash and stock offer for Caremark, which was worth a total of $52.35 at yesterday's CVS price.

Shares of CVS rose 18 cents, to $31.35. Express Scripts dropped 8 cents, to $68.78.

In the hope of speeding the antitrust review, Express Scripts has already dispatched its lawyers to start arguing its case before the commission staff. "Most people think this will get through the F.T.C.; granted it will take some time," said Kemp Dolliver, a health care analyst with Cowen & Company.

The pharmacy benefit business is "probably less consolidated than it looked 18 months ago," Mr. Dolliver said. With the advent of Medicare Part D drug coverage last year, the largest health insurers — WellPoint, UnitedHealth Group and Aetna — have aggressively expanded their in-house pharmacy benefits units.

Employers and smaller health plans can choose from the insurers' drug management services along with those of the big pharmacy benefit managers: Medco, Caremark and Express Scripts.

Trying to reduce drug costs, the pharmacy benefit managers bargain with drug manufacturers for rebates and discounts on brand-name drugs, and they work to switch patients to lower-cost generic versions of expensive brands. With taxpayers footing much of the bill for elderly Medicare enrollees and low-income people in Medicaid programs, the benefit managers' effectiveness became an issue in some Congressional races last fall.

Express Scripts yesterday nominated to the Caremark board Stuart L. Bascomb, chief executive of Amerisight, a privately held laser eye surgery company and former Express Scripts executive; Duke K. Bristow, an economist at the University of California, Los Angeles; John J. Jones, a former executive of the Argosy Gaming Company, and Todd E. Warnock, a health care investor and former investment banker at Credit Suisse First Boston.

DOJ_NMG_0114161

In press releases yesterday, Express Scripts and Caremark each said that the merger it preferred could achieve $500 million in savings by cutting costs.

Caremark said that combining with CVS would create an integrated health care product that would include mail-order and retail drug sales and "personalized pharmaceutical and disease management services." A forced merger with Express Scripts would require debt that would diminish the financial strength of the combined company, Caremark contended.

Express Scripts stressed that Citigroup and Credit Suisse had committed to fully finance the transaction. But even if Caremark and CVS shareholders reject CVS-Caremark merger, some analysts say that investor approval of the Express Scripts offer would be far from certain.

"I would be very surprised if Express Scripts and Caremark ever get together," said Andrew L. Speller, an analyst with A.G. Edwards & Sons in St. Louis.

Express Scripts Seeks Caremark Seats After Rejection (Update16) (BLOOM)

By Lisa Rapaport

Bloomberg, January 9, 2007

Jan. 8 (Bloomberg) -- Express Scripts Inc. will nominate four directors to Caremark Rx Inc.'s board in an effort to push through the $26 billion hostile bid that was rejected by Caremark earlier in favor of a lower offer from CVS Corp.

Express Scripts is seeking the seats in light of the Caremark board's ``refusal to even discuss our superior proposal," the St. Louis-based company said in a statement today. Caremark rejected the Express Script bid by saying the deal ``would result in a highly leveraged and weakened business" and ``insurmountable antitrust risks."

Caremark, a manager of prescription benefits for employee health plans, accepted a $21 billion bid on Nov. 1 from CVS, the No. 2 U.S. drugstore chain. CVS and Express Scripts, which is about a third of Caremark's size, want Caremark to help them gain clout in negotiating discounts on medicine and to lure customers from rivals such as Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and Medco Health Solutions Inc.

``Express Scripts has opened up a whole new ballgame," said Matt Kaufler, a portfolio manager at Clover Capital Management in Rochester, New York, in a telephone interview today. ``They may need to sweeten the bid and CVS may also need to sweeten their bid."

Kaufler said Caremark doesn't have a ``poison pill," or shareholder rights provision, that would make it difficult for Express Scripts to advance a hostile takeover by purchasing large blocks of Caremark shares.

``Other than the breakup fee with CVS, buying up shares shouldn't be a problem," Kaufler said.

Board Nominations

Express Scripts said it will nominate to the Caremark Board Stuart Bascomb, chief executive officer and chairman of Amerisight Inc.; Duke Bristow, an economist who teaches corporate finance at the University of Southern California; John Jones, a director of Topps Co., and Todd E. Warnock, founding partner of RoundTable Health Care Partners.

``Since we made our offer for Caremark public, Caremark stockholders and the marketplace as a whole have demonstrated their strong support for our offer," the Express Scripts statement said. ``We clearly provide Caremark stockholders with superior value to the proposed acquisition of Caremark by CVS."

Caremark said in a Jan. 7 statement that the Express Scripts proposal ``would result in a highly leveraged and weakened business" and ``insurmountable anti-trust risks."

Financing

In a subsequent regulatory filing, Caremark said it rejected that offer because Express Scripts didn't ``disclose its financing." Caremark also said it couldn't ``envision any scenario where it would be willing to trigger the imposition of a $675 million break up fee" to CVS ``without having a competing party obligated to fund that payment."

Express Scripts said its acquisition would be partially financed through Citigroup and Credit Suisse. The company retained Skadden, Arps, Slate Meagher & Flom LLP as legal counsel.

Earlier in the day, Express Scripts said in a statement that Caremark was using ``antitrust as a red herring to distract stockholders from the real value differential at issue." Express Scripts, with a market value of $9.33 billion compared with Caremark's $24 billion, had threatened to file a proxy to take its offer directly to Caremark shareholders.

``The premium alone argues for a rejection of the current CVS bid," Matt Perry, an analyst with Wachovia Capital Markets LLC in New York, wrote in a Jan. 4 note to clients.

Shares

Caremark's shares rose 29 cents to $56.64 at 4:01 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, while shares of Woonsocket, Rhode Island-based CVS rose 18 cents to $31.35. Shares of Express Scripts fell 8 cents to $68.78 in Nasdaq stock market composite trading.

Caremark's stock has climbed 17 percent since Nov. 1, when Woonsocket, Rhode Island-based CVS offered $48.53 a share. The shares have traded closer to Express Scripts' Dec. 18 offer of $58.50 each. CVS shares have gained 7.3 percent since the Nov. 1 bid, while the stock of Express Script have dropped 1.5 percent since its offer.

Caremark's directors met Dec. 22 to discuss Express Scripts' proposal and spoke again by teleconference Dec. 27 before voting unanimously to reject the offer on Jan. 5, Caremark said today in a regulatory filing.

``We look forward to closing our transaction during the first quarter of 2007," CVS Chief Executive Officer Tom Ryan said today in a regulatory filing. In a later filing, Ryan called the Express Scripts nomination of four directors ``nothing more than a publicity stunt."

3Q Completion

Express Scripts said today at a meeting with investors in San Francisco that it expected its takeover of Caremark to be completed by the end of the third quarter of 2007.

``Express Scripts' latest actions illustrate its desperation to disrupt our merger with CVS due to fear of competition," Caremark CEO Mac Crawford said in a statement released today on Business Wire.

Employers hire Caremark and rivals to hold costs down by seeking out drug manufacturers and pharmacies with the best prices. Health insurance plans and employers are turning to such companies to help counter rising health-care costs. Spending on prescription drugs in the U.S. increased 5.4 percent to $251.8 billion in 2005.

CVS, which has 6,200 outlets in 43 states, wants to buy Caremark to gain size and power to negotiate prices with drugmakers and prevent foot traffic lost to mail-order medicines from hurting sales of razors, sodas and makeup.

The offer from Express Scripts would reduce the number of major competitors in the drug-benefits industry to two from three, CVS Chief Executive Officer Tom Ryan said in a statement last week. CVS is the fourth-biggest U.S. pharmacy-benefit manager through its PharmaCare unit.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

EU Calls For New Low-Carbon Power Era (AP)

By Aoife White, Ap Business Writer

AP, January 9, 2007

EU Calls for New Low-Carbon Power Revolution As It Seeks to Cut Oil Imports

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- The European Union will call for "a new industrial revolution" on Wednesday as it tries to rein in oil imports and slash the carbon emissions blamed for global warming.

In a draft paper seen by the Associated Press, the European Commission says the days of secure, cheap energy for Europe are over.

Surging world demand for limited stocks of oil and gas has sent prices higher. The EU executive said Europe has to look at alternatives: using more renewable energy such as wind power and biofuels.

It also suggests that current plans to cut back nuclear power -- which it calls "one of the cheapest sources of low carbon energy" -- will endanger the goal of curbing greenhouse gas emissions.

DOJ_NMG_0114163

Electricity generation will be "heavily dependent" on natural gas, it said, warning a number of countries reliant on one main supplier that they should diversify.

The EU said it is confident that relationships with oil and gas suppliers Norway, Russia and Algeria will strengthen but also that it needs to open up a range of sources, suppliers, transport routes and methods.

European concerns about the reliability of Russian supplies were underscored Monday when shipments of oil via a pipeline running through Belarus were disrupted by a trade dispute between the two former Soviet republics.

Germany and Poland said earlier Monday Russian supplies had been halted, and Russia accused Belarus of siphoning off oil destined for Europe since the weekend.

Russian state pipeline operator Transneft said Belarus, which is furious that Russia is demanding it pay new oil duties, had diverted 79,000 tons of oil so far.

In an effort to diversify supply, the EU plans to start negotiations with Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan, build on agreements with Azerbaijan and Kazakhstan and cement relations with Turkey, Egypt and other nations, including Libya "if possible," it said.

It will also explore bilateral pacts with the Gulf state of Qatar and energy exporting nations in the Caribbean and Latin America, it said.

The world also needs to make a global effort to cut energy use, it suggests, proposing an energy efficiency agreement for industrialized nations plus China, India and Brazil to be signed at the Beijing Olympics in July 2008.

Supply uncertainties mean the EU has to rely on power in its own backyard, boosting renewables and making clean coal technology a reality.

The EU executive suggests setting a new target -- no figure appears in the draft -- for renewable power by 2020, with a binding target for biofuels to replace oil in vehicles. It says that biofuels could take up 14 percent of that market by 2020.

"Major investment" in renewable energy is needed to create the economies of scale that would make it viable, it said, acknowledging that many EU nations will fail to make existing goals to draw 12 percent of all EU energy from renewables by 2010.

Vast amounts of money also need to be pumped into Europe's electricity network with some 900 billion euros ($1.17 trillion) needed just to provide more power generation alone in the next 25 years as demand grows.

The EU recognizes serious problems with the way the electricity and gas markets work, highlighting the control huge energy companies have over production and sales. These issues will be detailed in a parallel report from EU antitrust regulators on Wednesday.

It said these market problems are causing governments to cap power prices, leading to less investment in the sector that could cause future supply crunches. "This situation cannot continue," it warns, saying it believes a series of measures need to be taken to create a competitive market within three years.

Polluted Waters Stain D.C.'s Shining Vision (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

The Anacostia River, planned as the scenic centerpiece of massive redevelopment in the District, remains heavily polluted by sewage, trash and toxic chemicals, environmentalists say -- and it might be years before the river's health catches up with its new cachet.

In the city's plans, the Anacostia will soon be surrounded by a necklace of new stadiums, office buildings, condominiums and parks. A river that has come to symbolize neglect, both of its water and of the neighborhoods near its banks, will become a new hub of urban life.

But that bright vision is hard to square with the Anacostia of the present. Its channels are choked with mud and floating debris. Its catfish have tumors on their livers and lips. And, dozens of times a year, it actually stinks, from human waste dumped out by the District's sewer system.

Now, activists wonder whether a dirty river will start to hold this development back. Or maybe, they hope, all this building will speed the Anacostia's recovery by making activists out of people who are seeing its plight for the first time.

DOJ_NMG_0114164

"You really cannot build a world-class city on a wrecked river," said Thomas Arrasmith, a leader at the Anacostia Watershed Citizens Advisory Committee. "You cannot have a world-class city with a sewer running through it."

The Anacostia winds its entire course inside the Capital Beltway, beginning near Bladensburg and emptying into the Potomac River 8.4 miles downstream at the District's Hains Point. It is often out of sight, though, even to those who live near the river. People have been kept away by the U.S. National Arboretum, the Anacostia Freeway and other barriers -- and the historical perception that the river isn't worth visiting.

"One of the sad things about the Anacostia: It's been so dirty for so long that people shunned it," said Joseph Glover, a Southeast Washington resident who helps monitor the health of an Anacostia tributary, Pope Branch.

If the plans on city drawing boards are followed, however, it will not be that way for long.

The marquee project of the new waterfront development effort is the Washington Nationals baseball stadium, whose steel skeleton is rising near the Frederick Douglass Memorial Bridge. City officials hope to surround it with a new entertainment and residential district. They also plan to remake the area just to the east, adding office buildings and a three-block Washington Canal Park.

They want to turn the area around the old D.C. General Hospital into a neighborhood, extending Capitol Hill to the riverside. On the south side, a stretch of empty land called Poplar Point could be converted into a D.C. United soccer stadium or perhaps a park surrounded by a crescent of residential buildings.

"The whole purpose here is to think of the river as a great centerpiece of the city and not a dividing line," said Uwe Brandes, a vice president of the city-chartered Anacostia Waterfront Corp.

Most of the pollution the Anacostia suffers from is not the kind for which miscreants are tracked down and fined. Instead, most of it comes from obvious sources, such as lawns, sewage plants and storm drains -- within the law, or at least not the target of stringent enforcement.

Brandes said he worried that development will slow if the river doesn't get clean.

Douglas Jemal, whose Douglas Development Corp. plans to build near the new baseball stadium, said he believed that development and new public attention would lead to a cleaner river.

"I can't imagine it's not going to get taken care of," he said.

Today, though, the Anacostia is not ready for its close-up.Maryland

Across the street from a shopping center in Prince George's County, and a few feet into some thorny woods, James Connolly stopped at a 12-foot-deep gully. Its bottom was littered with plastic bags, chunks of brick, even campaign signs from the fall election.

Connolly, executive director of the Anacostia Watershed Society, pointed out what made the gully: a storm sewer pipe. Running downhill from the shopping center, he said, the rainwater in the pipe moves fast enough to carve earth.

The water flows to the Northwest Branch, a tributary of the Anacostia, carrying dirt and trash.

Environmentalists have nicknamed this gully and others like it "The Gorges of Prince George's," although there are similar problems in Montgomery County tributaries. These deep channels are a stark example of what they call a major problem in Maryland, home to more than 80 percent of the Anacostia's roughly 176-square-mile watershed: Suburbanization has supplanted trees and paved over dirt with concrete. Rainwater is funneled swiftly downstream, carrying with it dirt, trash and chemicals.

The dirt: One survey found that sediment levels in the river needed to be reduced 77 percent to meet water-quality standards. At Bladensburg, where in Colonial times the river was deep enough for oceangoing ships, so much sediment has built up that there is often exposed mud in the middle.

The trash: An estimated 20,000 tons come downstream every year. There are coffee cups, soft drink bottles -- an astounding number of basketballs, river aficionados say -- plus tree trunks and other more dangerous debris.

The University of Maryland men's crew team, which practices on the Anacostia, had six boats damaged this season by things in the water. "After a big rain, we've had to turn around," said Chris Mattingly, the team's president. "It's just a lot of shopping carts, big stuff that gets down there after a rain."

DOJ_NMG_0114165

And the chemicals: They wash off roads and parking lots and include oil and grease and exhaust byproducts called PAHs. The high concentration of PAHs, known to cause cancer, was cited when a survey found that more than half of the river's brown bullhead catfish had tumors. It was equal to the highest tumor levels ever seen in a U.S. river.

There have been efforts to fix that problem by using filters to capture trash and using plants and artificial wetlands to absorb stormwater upstream.

But in Montgomery and Prince George's, officials say the problem is much bigger than the solution. It will be very hard to retrofit entire neighborhoods, they say, because many of the changes would have to be made on private property.The District

In the District's section of the Anacostia, the problem is not water running too fast; it's the opposite. The Anacostia in the District is beyond languid. It can take more than 30 days for water to make the trip from Bladensburg to the Potomac.

That means the river doesn't flush out pollution quickly. It remembers insults. One of the biggest came from Washington Navy Yard, where runoff from ship maintenance and munitions-building washed down hazardous metals and other chemicals.

The Navy Yard is an Environmental Protection Agency Superfund cleanup site, though some of the most toxic soil and groundwater has been removed or cleaned. One current research project has put down layers of sand and absorbent materials a foot thick on the river bottom there, hoping to bury the remaining pollutants.

Another problem is the District's sewer system, designed more than a century ago to dump out raw sewage during moderate rainstorms. It still does. At last count, the system dumped 2.14 billion gallons of mixed rainwater and waste into the Anacostia. The river's count of fecal coliform bacteria has been found to be 21 times the EPA's limit.

Being on the river when waste is flowing in is "like being in a toilet," said Connolly, the watershed society's director.

When he said it, he was steering a boat to show the location of one sewage "outfall" -- within sniffing distance of the new Nationals ballpark.

"It's going to be stinky, especially after a rain," Connolly said. "You'll stand up in the seventh-inning stretch and get a big whiff of sewage."

The D.C. Water and Sewer Authority is working to solve this problem, with a plan to dig enormous tunnels under the city where water can be stored during a rainstorm, then treated to remove the sewage.

WASA Chief of Staff Johnnie Hemphill said 30 percent of the problem had been eliminated. But fixing the bulk, he said, will probably take close to 20 years and $2 billion.The Future

The Anacostia today provides stark contrasts of beauty and ugliness, sometimes on the same day.

Gabriel Horchler, a Library of Congress employee who often commutes from Cheverly in a rowing shell, said he sees beavers and deer on the river's wooded shorelines -- but he has had people spit at him and throw rocks from the Benning Road bridge. He has seen the bald eagles that have recently come back -- and dodged car bumpers and baby carriages in the current.

"Sometimes, it's depressingly dirty and noxious," Horchler said. "And sometimes, it's very beautiful."

New parks and high-dollar developments could sharpen the contrast between what the Anacostia is and what it should be. Environmentalists hope that will translate into a greater public demand for cleanup.

Already, though, there have been battles over pollution control at the stadium. Environmentalists say they're happy that the city plans to try to corral stormwater, but they had also hoped for a green roof of plants on the stadium.

Planners say that would take away from one of the ballpark's signature features: its sweeping silvery roof canopy.

"This is a great opportunity for the river, and it still can be, hopefully," said Brian Van Wye, an activist whose title is Anacostia riverkeeper. "But the stadium has so far been fundamentally disappointing."

Thinking about the future, city officials tick off encouraging stories from other cities, where waterside development led to environmental improvements: the Chicago River, Boston Harbor.

But skeptics in Washington can also think of a counterexample, less than 40 miles north. It's got a ballpark and shops near the water -- and, still, one of the worst pollution problems in the mid-Atlantic.

"I'd take that person up to the Inner Harbor" in Baltimore, said Ed Merrifield, who serves as the riverkeeper for the Potomac. "And have them jump in the water there."

Tribe Keeps Fighting For Treaty Rights (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0114166

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

Associated Press, January 9, 2007

LAS VEGAS (AP) -- The way Allen Moss sees it, vast stretches of the West and all of their wealth belong to the Indians.

And despite being turned back in lawsuit after lawsuit for decades, the Western Shoshone leader says he won't rest until the U.S. government honors a 19th-century treaty that, according to the tribe, entitles it to reclaim ancestral lands extending from California through Nevada and Utah to Idaho.

The lands include much of the Las Vegas area. The Shoshones say they are not interested in Sin City - too many people, too many problems. But they want the rugged desert hills that have yielded tens billions of dollars worth of gold over decades.

At issue is the 1863 Treaty of Ruby Valley, which the Shoshone say gave the tribe - not the federal government - royalties and final say over water, mineral and property rights for land covering 93,750 square miles, an area roughly the size of Maine.

Moss, a representative to the eight-member tribal council in Nevada, estimates the number of Shoshone at 5,000 to 8,000 - descendants of people who lived from the Snake River Valley in Idaho to the Salt Lake Valley in Utah, across most of eastern and central Nevada, and in Death Valley and the Mojave Desert in California.

The tribe has taken its case to fence lines, courts, international tribunals and the public.

It sued to block the nation's nuclear waste from being stored in Nevada. It succeeded in postponing government plans to explode a non-nuclear bomb that would send the first mushroom cloud in decades over the desert. And it went all the way to Switzerland to ask the United Nations to intervene in the land dispute.

The tribe keeps losing on most fronts, but also keeps appealing - and some cases its members have notched a place in Western lore.

Tribal elder Carrie Dann and her sister Mary became folk heroes for defying the government in a losing, quarter-century battle to graze cattle on federal land without authorization.

The Supreme Court ruled against the tribe in another case in 1979, saying the Treaty of Ruby Valley gave the U.S. trusteeship over the tribal lands. And in September, the Court of Claims in Washington accepted the government position that the treaty was "merely one of friendship and that it conveyed no treaty rights."

Lawyer Bob Hager, who has been handling Western Shoshone cases for free since 1983, maintains the tribe is losing on technicalities. He said the tribal claim finally got traction - and attention - with the U.N. Committee for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination last year in Geneva.

The panel said the U.S. government is trampling on Shoshone rights. It cited the privatization of Shoshone ancestral lands for mining and energy developers and federal efforts to open a nuclear waste dump at Yucca Mountain, 90 miles from Las Vegas.

Cynthia Magnuson, a U.S. Justice Department spokeswoman in Washington, said the government would not comment on the dispute because the case is still in court.

The government has offered tribal members money, arguing it is unrealistic to expect the U.S. to give back lands acquired through "gradual encroachment" and now dotted with cities, crisscrossed by interstate highways and railroads, and used for mining, ranching and recreation.

A law signed by President Bush in 2004 approved the distribution to tribal members of more than $145 million, including some $26 million that a federal Indian claims commission awarded in 1979.

Some Shoshones have said they would take the cash, but others balked. Moss, who loads preprinted newspaper advertisements for a living, said the money will not be touched because to take it would be to concede the government's position.

"Our land is not for sale," he said. The money continues to collect interest.

Moss is not sure his sons, now 25 and 21, will take up the decades-long fight.

"They can't believe how long the battle has taken," said Moss, 52. "They were taught in school this is a land of laws. I sit here saying, `This is how the laws have been manipulated and twisted.'"

"The whole thing boils down to, `How many times can you break the law or twist the law in your favor?' That's what the government has done."

DOJ_NMG_0114167

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Seven Programs To Watch In 2007 (GCN)

By Wilson P. Dizard III, Jason Miller, Mary Mosquera And Patience Wait

Government Computer News, January 8, 2007

SBINet

Impact in '07: The SBINet program, an ambitious effort to gain control of the borders via improved technology, combines a high political profile with daunting technology and program risks.

SBINet's success or failure in 2007 will stand as both a defining legacy of Homeland Security Department secretary Michael Chertoff, who has given it high priority, and a watershed for DHS' shaky program management capabilities.

Previous border technology programs, such as the Border Patrol's scuttled America's Shield program, have alerted Congress and oversight agencies to the high risk of failure in the border security arena.

As a result, SBINet faces skeptical oversight from the House Homeland Security Subcommittee on Management, Integration and Oversight, DHS inspector general Richard Skinner and the Government Accountability Office.

One major criticism of SBINet is that the program management office is understaffed. In response, program manager Greg Giddens pledged during a hearing of the House subcommittee to hire more than 200 additional program management office employees by mid-2007.

But Skinner testified at the same hearing that when Giddens completes that hiring, "The emerging organizational structure [will include] 65 percent of the 252 positions as contractors," a proportion he called "excessive."

SBINet will begin 2007 by launching a Common Operating Picture project this month, completing the system design in April and deploying it immediately along parts of the southwest border.

Another 2007 priority is the $20 million Project 28, to deploy unattended ground sensors, radars, cameras and towers in the Sasabe area of the southern border's Tucson, Ariz., sector.

DHS plans to integrate sensor data via a network that will shuttle information among computers in Border Patrol trucks, partner agencies and mobile command centers.

An additional $55 million SBINet project for 2007 aims to gain control over a military weapons testing zone in the Yuma, Ariz., sector, using IT as well as improved roads and fences.

Farmington Hills Pot Bust Is Oakland's Second In Four Days (DN)

Detroit News, January 8, 2007

FARMINGTON HILLS -- For the second time in four days Oakland County police say they have stopped a major marijuana dealing operation.

Over the weekend three county residents were arrested in the seizure of 70 pounds of marijuana, valued at nearly $500,000, bound from Arizona to West Bloomfield.

Charged were: Jerry Jadan, 39, and Fred Jadan, 38, both of West Bloomfield; and Randy A. Rabban, 39, of Farmington Hills. The arrests stemmed from an investigation begun by the Wichita, Kan., office of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), which discovered a scheme to bring the marijuana into Oakland County.

"We expect other charges and arrests, possibly in other states, to result from this," said Farmington Hills Police Chief William Dwyer, who credited the arrests and seizures to the South Oakland Narcotics Intelligence Consortium, the DEA, and the Oakland County Prosecutor's Office.

Jerry Jadan and Rabban were charged with conspiracy to deliver controlled substances, five to 45 kilograms of marijuana and delivery of 5-45 kilograms of marijuana. The charges are felonies punishable by seven years in prison and $500,000 fines. Both were arraigned and released after posting $100,000 bond each.

Fred Jadan was charged with possession of marijuana, a misdemeanor punishable by up to a year in jail and a $2,000 fine.

DOJ_NMG_0114168

Last Thursday, Richard N. Nash, 48, of Troy was charged in an alleged marijuana growing operation after members of the Oakland County Narcotics Enforcement Team raided his basement on Webb Street and found 96 plants, a sophisticated growing operation, guns, financial records and $80,000 in cash, according to police. Nash is similarly charged and held in the Oakland County Jail in lieu of $25,000 bond and a Jan. 17 preliminary examination.

Oakland County Drug Bust Nets $33,000, Marijuana (FREEP)

Detroit Free Press, January 8, 2007

Two Oakland County men face were arraigned in district court Sunday on felony drug charges after law enforcement agents raided homes in Farmington Hills and West Bloomfield, resulting in the seizure of 70 pounds of marijuana and more than $33,000 in cash.

Jerry Jadan, 39, of West Bloomfield, and Randy Rabban, 39, of Farmington Hills, were charged with conspiracy to deliver a controlled substance and manufacturing of 5 to 45 kilograms of marijuana. They were arraigned in 47th District Court in Farmington Hills and released on $100,000 bonds. Each charge is punishable by seven years in prison and fines of up to $500,000.

A third man, Fred Jadan, 38, also of West Bloomfield, was charged with possession of marijuana, a misdemeanor punishable by up to a year in jail and a $2,000 fine. He also posted bond and was released.

Farmington Hills Police Chief William Dwyer said Monday the seizure was the result of an investigation conducted by the South Oakland Narcotics Intelligence Consortium, which is made up of officers from Farmington Hills, Novi, West Bloomfield and the Oakland County Sheriff's Office.

"This is an outstanding example of cooperation across the full spectrum of law enforcement," Dwyer said Monday. SONIC officers also recovered several firearms.

"We are working with the DEA, and more arrests will be coming," Dwyer said. Police said information that lead to the arrest came from the DEA office in Wichita, Kan. "Here's a perfect example of drugs that came in out of state and were bound for communities in Oakland County," Dwyer added.

Owners Of Medical Marijuana Dispensary Arrested (KESQ)

KESQ-TV, January 8, 2007

The owners of a local medicinal marijuana dispensary are behind bars tonight after turning themselves in.

It is the latest chapter in CanaHelp's ongoing saga to stay open for business and stay legitimate.

This time, the owners of the medicinal marijuana dispensary, Stacy Hochanadel and his two partners, turned themselves in at the Indio Police Department jail.

Volunteers who continue to operate CannaHelp say the county issued an arrest warrant last week. The charges include possession and distribution of marijuana and maintaining and operating CannaHelp.

"They've not violated any laws," said one volunteer we spoke with. "They are standing up and trying to be forthcoming again, even though they're being persecuted by Riverside County Sheriff's."

Police and federal agents once raided CannaHelp on suspicion it sold marijuana for profit. And more recently, the city of Palm Desert issued an order to stop doing business.

This came after an undercover cop allegedly bought pot from the dispensary without the necessary medical credentials.

"That's a civil issue which is separate of whatever criminal investigation Riverside County Sheriff's is enacting at this time."

Still, supporters say CannaHelp's owners have done nothing wrong at least on the state level.

"I'm not sure why they're trying to take away all forms provided to qualified patients."

CannaHelp Owner And Managers Being Booked At Indio Jail (DS)

Desert Sun, January 8, 2007

The owner and two managers of the CannaHelp medical marijuana dispensary who have been charged with felonies turned themselves in this morning at the Indio Police Department Jail.

CannaHelp owner Stacy Hochanadel and managers James Campbell and John Bendar are being booked at the jail, according to jail representatives.

The three are facing three felony charges each related to marijuana possession, sales and transport, as well as "keeping a place to sell controlled substances."

Bail and court dates for the three have yet to be set.

The dispensary at 73-350 El Paseo remains open, said Ryan Michaels, a volunteer.

3 From Pot Store Facing Charges (PE)

Press-Enterprise, January 6, 2007

INDIO - The Riverside County district attorney's office has filed felony drug charges against the owner and two employees of an embattled Palm Desert medical marijuana dispensary.

Ingrid Wyatt, spokeswoman for the district attorney's office, said the case against Cannahelp shop owner Stacy Hochanadel and his employees, James Campbell and John Reynolds, could be precedent-setting because it is the first time in Riverside County that anyone associated with a storefront marijuana dispensary has been prosecuted.

Hochanadel, Campbell and Reynolds are charged with the same three felony drug counts: one of unlawful possession; one of sales, furnishing and transporting; and one of maintaining a place for the purpose of selling a controlled substance. If convicted, they face up to three years in state prison.

Wyatt said arrest warrants have been issued for all three and that Hochanadel has indicated that he plans to surrender to authorities Monday.

None of the defendants was available for comment Friday, and Hochanadel's San Diego-based attorney did not return a telephone call.

California's 10-year-old medical marijuana law allows patients with prescriptions from a doctor to grow and use marijuana, but not to sell it for profit. Federal law prohibits any cultivation, sale or use of marijuana.

"We're not targeting individuals who have a prescription and are in need of marijuana for medicinal purposes," Wyatt said. "We're targeting people who are using the guise of medicinal marijuana to actually sell marijuana. We believe there are people out there selling marijuana (illegally) for profitable purposes."

Wyatt said individuals with medical prescriptions may possess 8 ounces of dry marijuana or six mature plants or 12 small plants.

"If you have more than that, we believe it's a prosecutable case," she said.

Wyatt said authorized caregivers may dispense legally prescribed medicinal marijuana.

"It's not just anybody who can do this," she said. "You have to be a designated caregiver for the person who has the prescription. There is a process to this whole medicinal-marijuana thing."

The Palm Desert business stayed open even after the city revoked its license Dec. 18. In a letter to Cannahelp, City Attorney David Erwin said the business failed to comply with conditions of an agreement that came out of a hearing before the City Council on Feb. 23.

"Because of your failure to comply with the agreement of April 10, 2006, your license is hereby revoked and your operation must cease immediately," Erwin wrote.

City officials have said undercover authorities were able to purchase marijuana from Cannahelp without proper credentials.

Riverside County supervisors on Oct. 3 banned marijuana dispensaries in unincorporated areas and joined other counties that are challenging state medical-marijuana laws.

The board stopped short of an outright prohibition on marijuana-growing cooperatives but banned the distribution of marijuana to caregivers, qualified patients or patients with a state identification card even at marijuana-growing co-ops, which are legal under state law.

Then-District Attorney Grover Trask said he would not prosecute patients who use marijuana in accordance with state laws. His successor, Rod Pacheco, agreed that the district attorney's office has no authority to prosecute patients who are following state laws.

DOJ_NMG_0114170

Robbers Posed As DEA (AT)

Albuquerque Tribune, January 8, 2007

The two men who robbed a truck stop and exchanged gunfire with police before ultimately eluding a dragnet early Sunday may have been involved in two previous burglaries in the city, Albuquerque police say.

The common denominator in all three robberies: The suspects wore pieces of uniform identifying them as DEA agents.

Police say it's pretty clear the men are not real DEA agents. But how they got the uniforms and how they escaped from police moments after a gun battle near I-40 and and 6th Street Northeast on Sunday remains unclear.

"Given their willingness to use law enforcement clothing as a guise and the fact that they tried to kill police officers today, our interest in finding these two is as high as it can be," Albuquerque police Capt. Larry Sonntag said Sunday evening.

Sonntag said police have surveillance tape of Sunday's burglary and hope that will help in the hunt for the two men. Anyone with information is asked to call Crimestoppers at 843-STOP.

Sonntag said the surveillance tape shows two men - one wearing a black and yellow DEA jacket and one a DEA baseball cap - walking into the Love's truck stop off I-40 at 3 a.m. Sunday.

The men demanded money and also took car keys from an employee. Police arrived as the two men fled in the employee's car, and the men may have fired at police at the truck stop, Sonntag said.

Police followed the vehicle to a residential area west of 6th Street where the men opened fire on police, police fired back, and the men fled on foot.

Sonntag said a SWAT team was called in and set up a perimeter around the area. Canine units were also called in to aid in the search. Officers went door to door but found no sign of the suspects. Six hours later, the search was called off.

Sonntag said the men did not leave a vehicle at the truck stop, and the fact they apparently arrived there on foot added to the possibility that they were from, or had some connection to, the nearby neighborhood.

"But it's also possible they escaped before the perimeter was in place, and the neighborhood had nothing to do with it," he said.

The source of the DEA outfits may be less of a mystery. Sonntag said he believed a DEA agent had reported his car burglarized about a month ago.

"It's also possible to buy those type of uniforms on the Internet," he said.

Tape Shows Robbers Dressed As Feds (KRQE)

KRQE-TV, January 8, 2007

ALBUQUERQUE -- Police have their pictures, but the search for a pair of armed robbers continues.

Surveillance video recorded the of the robbery at the Loves truck stop on 6th Street NW at Interstate 40 on Sunday morning.

The suspects appeared to be dressed as Drug Enforcement Agents--one in a raid jacket, the other in a DEA cap--when they walked into the business and terrorized employees, according to Albuquerque police.

Officers said the men forced a security guard to the floor, then held another employee at gunpoint while they took money out of the register.

The men then led another employee to the parking lot and forced him to give up the keys to his car, police said.

The two suspects shot at police and are considered to be armed and dangerous.

Call Albuquerque police at 843-STOP (843-7867) if you have any information on the suspects.

Meth Smoke Taints Motels (DENP)

Denver Post, January 8, 2007

Montrose - The motel on a popular strip of Montrose inns was busy with Thanksgiving travelers when drug agents used a passkey to enter room 108.

Inside they found a woman lying on a bed. A glass pipe for smoking methamphetamine was next to her. Meth was found in her purse.

DOJ_NMG_0114171

Her boyfriend was arrested when he came back to the room where they had been living for weeks. He was found with more meth and a disassembled shotgun. The pair had allegedly sold meth to undercover agents from this base of operation in the weeks preceding the bust.

As in the majority of motel and hotel busts, a maid with a vacuum, disinfectant sprays and dust cloths cleaned the room in the normal way. And it was rented again within days.

While no official data are available, experience shows that meth dealers and users love to stay in hotels, said Tom Gorman, agent in charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration in Grand Junction.

"I can't think of an investigation we've done that doesn't connect to a hotel or motel," he said.

But motel owners and managers don't need to do anything out of the ordinary when meth is smoked in a room. They don't need to inform health authorities or have anyone evaluate the room for contamination. And they don't need to inform the next party renting the room that meth had been smoked there.

That is troublesome for researchers at National Jewish Hospital, who have found residues the day after the simulated smoking of meth in a motel room. The residue levels far exceeded safe levels set by the state for cleanups after meth labs are found.

"We know it sticks around up to 24 hours later and the levels don't go down much," said Mike VanDyke, an industrial hygienist at National Jewish. "We're guessing it is at least days, likely weeks and possibly months before it goes down."

National Jewish is waiting on federal funding to do further testing to determine that time frame and also to determine what kind of health hazard that residue might pose.

Many questions linger

Rob Derrera, an estimator with COCAT restoration contractors in Denver, said his workers have found higher levels of residue in rooms where meth has only been smoked than in rooms where it has been cooked. He said the unknown is how much smoking over what period of time it takes to push levels to the hazardous zone.

Until those answers come, the smoking of meth in hotel and motel rooms is under the radar of health regulations.

If a motel owner decides to do testing and cleanup, it could cost thousands of dollars for a single room. Tests for residues on furniture, walls, rugs and other surfaces cost upwards of $100 each. Cleanup might not be as extensive as the mandated cleanups for meth labs, but would still range from about $3,000 to $7,000 for the average 300- square-foot room, Derrera said.

He said cleanup could range from disposing of anything porous, such as carpet and drapes, and scrubbing the walls multiple times with special chemicals to entirely gutting a room - tearing out drywall and vanities and discarding all furnishings as his company sometimes has to with meth labs.

"Hotels and motels have a built-in disincentive to report. The testing and remediation is very expensive," Colorado Attorney General John Suthers said.

He said that a recently formed statewide meth task force might take up an educational effort to deal with the motel problem.

Focus still on meth labs

The danger posed by the residue left behind by meth smokers has fallen between the cracks as efforts to deal with the drug's dangers to the general public focus primarily on labs.

The noxious mix of chemicals - acetone, anhydrous ammonia, starter fluid, paint thinner and red phosphorous - that goes into making the stimulant drug creates a known health hazard. Inhalation or skin exposure to those chemicals can cause burns, breathing problems and neurological difficulties.

The airborne residue from smoked meth is not considered as dangerous because the residue does not contain all the chemicals from a "cook."

Colleen Brisnehan, an environmental protection specialist with the Colorado Department of Public Health and Environment, said the statutory definition of contamination is broad enough to include the smoking of meth even though the regulations only apply to manufacturing. She said local agencies would have authority to force a cleanup if the contamination levels were high enough - and if they were notified.

"But it would be difficult or impossible to do," she admitted, because smoking does not trigger any notification.

Derrera agreed.

DOJ_NMG_0114172

"Do I think there should be something in place to deal with this? Absolutely, positively yes," he said. "But how do you mandate it and who pays for it?"

Staff writer Nancy Lofholm can be reached at 970-256-1957 or at nlofholm@denverpost.com.

Tom Gorman, the father of DEA agent Tom Gorman and the director of the High Intensity Drug Task Force in Colorado, summed up the problem of meth in motels as "a mess."

Drug agents say lower-end motels seem to be the worst - drug dealers are also looking for bargains. But that doesn't mean only flophouses are of concern. Many midrange motels have been the sites of drug busts.

"The more expensive the motel, the better the chance that kind of activity has not occurred there," said Jack Haynes, supervisor of the Delta/Montrose Drug Task Force.

There is no easy way for the public to protect themselves. Test kits are sold online but are too complex or expensive for general use or don't give consistent results.

"From a personal level I'm very concerned," said Tim Hersee, commander of the North Metro Task Force that covers Adams and Broomfield counties.

Mike VanDyke, an industrial hygienist at National Jewish Hospital in Denver, said he is particularly concerned about children in rooms with the residue from meth smoking.

"That definitely concerns me because of their hand-to-mouth behavior," he said.

He said research shows that simple activity - including vacuuming or jumping on the bed - increases the levels of airborne meth residue.

Colorado Hotel & Lodging Association President Ilene Kamsler said her organization in the past has helped to educate hotel and motel owners about ways to avoid becoming havens for drug users and dealers but there is no such effort currently.

She said many of the association members are the higher end hotels that don't have a problem.

Federal Officials Pursuing More Gun-related Prosecutions (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

LOUISVILLE, Ky. - Police and prosecutors are using a different strategy in western Kentucky to convict suspects of gun-related crimes.

If suspects can't be prosecuted in state court, cases are being sent to federal court, where the sentences are harsher and plea bargains are fewer, prosecutors and defense attorneys say.

That's what happened when state police found ammunition in the van of William West, a convicted felon. Since police didn't find a gun, West couldn't be charged under state law - so the case was turned over to federal prosecutors, said assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Dyke, who oversees prosecutions in Louisville.

West, 51, of Eddyville, was charged with being a felon in possession of ammunition and is serving a 15-year sentence in prison, Dyke said.

The strategy has arisen from the federal Justice Department's "Safe Neighborhoods" program, which in Kentucky is known as "Project Backfire." Gun violators are targeted in both the state and federal court systems.

Gun-related cases in U.S. District Court in western Kentucky increased from 56 in 2004 to 79 in 2005, after U.S. Attorney Dave Huber announced an effort to increase Project Backfire federal prosecutions. By late last year, there had been 66 cases.

Jefferson County's state court handled 1,162 cases in 2005 by the county attorney's office as part of Project Backfire.

Huber said the federal prosecutions are designed to help local prosecutors and law enforcement agencies. They're "only being federalized," he said, because of inadequate funding at the state level "for state prosecutors and state prisons."

"If you don't want it to be federalized, support your prosecutors and state prisons," he said, adding that only a small number of cases are elevated to federal court. "We're not a panacea. We're just trying to help where we can."

Federal public defender Scott Wendelsdorf questioned whether the federal prosecutions were worth the trouble. Wendelsdorf said that federal prosecutions should be limited to crimes "uniquely federal in nature," such as interstate trafficking in child pornography or drugs - crimes local law enforcement isn't equipped to tackle.

But gun violators are taken to federal court solely to hand out stiff punishments, Wendelsdorf said.

DOJ_NMG_0114173

"I'm not sure that's a legitimate reason, but it's legal and they do it, and God knows, it's effective," Wendelsdorf said.

IMMIGRATION:

Illegal Immigrants' Rearrest Rate High (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, The Associated Press

AP, January 9, 2007

A Justice Department audit looks at how authorities who get funding are cooperating to stem "catch and release."

Washington - Illegal immigrants who were caught but released in the United States may have been rearrested as many as six times, Justice Department data released Monday indicate.

The findings by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine are based on a sampling of 100 illegal immigrants arrested by local and state authorities in 2004, the latest complete data available. They show that 73 of the 100 immigrants were arrested, collectively, 429 times - ranging from traffic tickets to weapons and drug charges.

Fine's office said its audit could not conclude precisely how many of the 262,105 illegal immigrants charged with criminal histories that year had been rearrested. "But if this data is indicative of the full population of 262,105 criminal histories, the rate at which released criminal aliens are rearrested is extremely high," the audit noted.

The audit was required by Congress in 2005. It looked at how local and state authorities who receive Justice Department funding to help catch and detain illegal immigrants are working with the Homeland Security Department.

It also examined the arrest rates of immigrants who were released before they could be turned over to Homeland Security's bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

In all, 752 cities, counties and states participating in the program received $287 million in 2005, the audit noted. Five states - California, New York, Texas, Florida and Arizona - received the bulk of the money, pulling in more than $184 million.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff four months ago declared an end to the "catch and release" practice that for years helped many illegal immigrants stay in the United States unhindered.

At the time, the department was holding 99 percent of non- Mexican illegal immigrants in its custody until they could be returned to their home nations. The policy generally does not apply to Mexicans, who are almost immediately returned to Mexico after being stopped by Border Patrol agents.

The audit also looked at whether local and state authorities fully cooperated with Homeland Security efforts to remove illegal immigrants, and tried to determine how many had been released because of jail space or funding shortages. In both cases, Fine's office said it was unable to draw definitive conclusions.

It also found that at least one area - San Francisco - was receiving funding even though local policy specifically limits the information it gives to Homeland Security about immigration enforcement. San Francisco, which won $1.1 million, defines itself as a "city and county of refuge" and does not allow federal agents to view immigration jail records without permission from local police.

Some Illegal Immigrants Arrested Repeatedly, Report Finds (MCT)

By Marisa Taylor, McClatchy Newspapers

McClatchy Newspapers, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON - Illegal immigrants are being released from prison only to be arrested on new charges despite government efforts to deport them and keep them out of the country.

The findings are part of an audit by Justice Department Inspector General Glenn Fine that suggest authorities are still struggling to deport illegal immigrants who commit crimes, even though most state and local authorities are notifying immigration authorities of the imminent release of prisoners.

Fine's office analyzed the cases of 100 immigrants who had served time in prison and found 73 of them were re-arrested for committing a crime after being released.

On average, each immigrant was re-arrested six times, ranging from traffic violations to assault.

DOJ_NMG_0114174

Fine's office couldn't determine how many illegal immigrants had been re-arrested overall because immigration authorities don't keep track. If the sample was any indication, "the rate at which released criminal aliens are re-arrested is extremely high," the report said.

Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials questioned whether the audit's small sample should reflect negatively on their agency's efforts to deport criminal immigrants. The audit did not determine whether ICE failed to deport the immigrants after being notified by prison officials.

But Heather Mac Donald, a fellow with the conservative Manhattan Institute, said ICE continues to have problems with deporting criminal immigrants because the agency doesn't always have enough detention space to hold immigrants once they're released from prisons.

"What this speaks to is the fact that we're not up to speed on immigration enforcement in general," she said.

Last year, Homeland Security's inspector general said immigration authorities expected that most of the 300,000 illegal and legal immigrants eligible to be deported would be released. Federal officials said they would need 34,000 additional beds at a cost of $1.1 billion to detain and remove all of them.

David Martin, a University of Virginia law professor and former top immigration official, said he was surprised that the re-arrest numbers in the most recent report were "so high."

U.S. immigration officials appeared to be making progress working with state and local officials who now notify them before a criminal immigrant is released, he said. That way, the immigrant is quickly deported.

Congress requested the audit because of questions about compliance with a federal program meant to reimburse cities and states for the costs of incarcerating illegal immigrants.

California, New York, Texas, and Florida receive the most funding. States and cities often are not completely reimbursed for what they spend on prisoners because the program doesn't get enough funding, the audit said.

U.S. Supreme Court Refuses To Hear Asylum Case Of Colombian Drug Informant Fearing For His Life (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The Supreme Court on Monday refused to consider the case of an informant against the Cali drug cartel who says he and his family will be murdered if the U.S. government returns them to Colombia.

Immigration officials have refused to grant asylum to Diego Castillo-Arias, who came to the United States with his wife and two young sons about a decade ago after telling police in Cali about the location of cartel bank accounts and property.

The Board of Immigration Appeals says that volunteer, noncriminal informants working against the drug cartel do not constitute a "particular social group," a requirement for asylum under the Immigration and Nationality Act.

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals deferred to the board's interpretation, saying it was doing so with "consternation" and expressing dismay that "informants who risk their lives have been ignored by our nation."

The appeals court said it regretted that Congress has not taken action on behalf of Castillo-Arias and others similarly situated.

Castillo-Arias' attorney, Michael Dean Ray of Miami, said Monday it is now up to the Department of Homeland Security to decide whether to send the family back to Colombia, adding that the department could use its discretion to defer removing them from the United States. The family is living in the state of Florida.

Hispanic Leaders Call For Reform On Immigration Within 100 Days (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, January 9, 2007

National Hispanic leaders are pressing House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) to make immigration reform a top priority within the first 100 days of the new Congress, citing the large numbers of Hispanics who turned out to vote for Democrats in November.

DOJ_NMG_0114175

Several of the largest Hispanic advocacy groups in the country, the League of United Latin American Citizens, the Southwest Voter Registration Education Project and the Hispanic Federation, plan to stage a massive grassroots campaign to pressure House lawmakers to move quickly on immigration. They will team with America Votes, one of the nation's largest liberal voter-mobilization groups, to push reform.

"As you prepare to lead the 110th Congress of the United States of America, we urge you to make immigration reform one of your top priorities during the first 100 days of the new Congress," the president of LULAC, Rosa Rosales, and the president of the Hispanic Federation, Lillian Rodriguez-Lopez, wrote in a letter delivered to Pelosi and Reid over the weekend.

LULAC describes itself as the country's largest and oldest Hispanic civil rights organization. The Hispanic Federation is a coalition of about 100 local groups, most based in the New York area.

Hispanic leaders expect the Senate to take up immigration this year, and Reid has included the issue among his top 10 legislative priorities. But the House is a different story, say advocates of reform.

Pelosi and other House Democrats have said little about what legislation they will take up after completing their 100-hour agenda, a collection of relatively uncontroversial bills over which Democrats have reached consensus.

Beyond the first 100 hours it's hard to speculate" about what Democrats will focus on, Pelosi spokesman Drew Hammill said. Hammill said Pelosi has discussed immigration reform with President Bush and that both have agreed it should be a "priority."

Hammill said immigration reform proposals would undergo the regular order of the legislative process, a series of subcommittee and committee hearings and markups, which would affect the timing.

Hispanic leaders are making two clear statements: Reform should include a path to legal residency for the 12 million illegal immigrants now working in the U.S., and a guest-worker program supported by President Bush, which would require foreign workers to return home after several years, is inadequate. They also oppose the building of a fence along the Mexican border intended to stem the flow of immigration.

"Immigrants have dedicated themselves to this country through hard work and determination and America has benefited accordingly," Rosales and Rodriguez-Lopez wrote. "[T]hey deserve an orderly pathway to legalize their status in the U.S. so they can emerge from society's shadows into the light of day."

Hispanic support for Democrats shot up in November compared to 2004. Sixty-nine percent of self-identified Latino voters cast ballots for Democratic candidates, according to national exit-poll data. Only 30 percent voted for Republican candidates. Republican pollsters have said that GOP candidates must receive 40 percent of Hispanic votes to win future elections. Strategists have come to see these voters as crucial because the Hispanic population is the fastest-growing major racial demographic in the country.

But in recent months House Democrats have shied away from the issue for fear of angering conservative-leaning white voters, whom Republican strategists hoped to court in 2006 by pushing strict and punitive immigration proposals.

House Democrats did not mention immigration in "A New Direction for America," the broad agenda document they made public shortly before the election. The omission drew angry responses from congressional leaders such as Reps. Jose Serrano (D-N.Y.), a senior member of the Appropriations Committee, and Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.), who heads the Congressional Hispanic Caucus's Immigration Task Force.

"I'm very sad and disappointed that comprehensive immigration reform is not a key and pivotal point for the Democrats," Gutierrez told The Hill in September.

Political strategists who have concentrated on Hispanic outreach say that Democrats have a golden opportunity to capitalize on the increased political attention of Hispanics because of last year's immigration debate, but that chance could soon pass.

"I think if Democrats want to take advantage of this great disenchantment of Latinos of Republicans, they're going to have to pass immigration reform this year," said Simon Rosenberg, president of the New Democrat Network, an advocacy group that spent $2 million before the election to promote Democratic candidates to Hispanics.

"When Democrats got elected in 2006, they got elected to solve immigration," he said. "I think Hispanics were about 8 percent of the national electorate and there was an enormous swing in the number of Hispanics who turned out."

DOJ_NMG_0114176

Immigration reform that creates a path to citizenship for illegal workers is seen as having strong support in the Senate. Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), two of the most influential lawmakers of their respective parties, teamed up to craft a popular bill last year. Lobbyists said they expect the Senate to take up and pass reform before the House, a reversal from the usual course of most bills that first pass the lower chamber.

Rosales said in an interview that LULAC's board of directors would meet Feb. 8 and 9 to discuss the upcoming lobbying campaign.

"What we'll decide there [at the meeting] is that comprehensive immigration reform is a top priority," she said. "I can assure you that our 115,000 members will reach out to their election officials."

Rosales said her organization would team with America Votes and the Southwest Voter Registration Education Project.

Guardsmen Retreat At Border Deemed Appropriate (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

National Guard soldiers who abandoned an observation post on the U.S.-Mexico border after spotting armed men approaching their position acted appropriately by retreating to a safer location, the U.S. Border Patrol said yesterday.

Border Patrol spokesman Mario Martinez at the agency's D.C. headquarters said that although the National Guard troops were armed and authorized to use force in self-defense, they determined they were not in imminent danger and retreated to call for help.

"The Border Patrol responded within minutes with air and ground units, but found no one in the area," Mr. Martinez said. "In this situation, the National Guard troops did exactly what was expected of them, exactly what they should have done.

"The Guard troops are not there to engage, interdict or arrest anyone but to man observation posts," he said.

The troops were members of an entry-identification team, assigned to monitor major illegal-alien and drug-smuggling corridors.

Mr. Martinez said that no shots were exchanged and that no one was injured in the incident, which occurred Wednesday shortly after 11 p.m. near Sasabe, Ariz., about 70 miles southwest of Tucson. He said agents who responded to the site found footprints leading back to Mexico.

The armed men had come within 100 yards of the observation post.

Mr. Martinez said the Border Patrol has not identified the four or five armed men involved in the incident but said the Guard troops spotted them with their night-vision equipment and confirmed they were carrying rifles.

Several Border Patrol field agents said the armed men could have been a scouting party for drug smugglers or might have been testing the National Guard's response to a cross-border intrusion.

In that same area in July 2005, two Border Patrol agents were shot and wounded by assailants in what law-enforcement authorities called a planned ambush by drug smugglers a mile north of the U.S.-Mexico border.

More than 50 rounds were fired at the agents after they spotted suspected drug smugglers in a canyon east of Nogales, Ariz., authorities said. Although most of the smugglers fled, one man used a hand-held radio to point out the agents' location to other shooters hidden nearby, they said.

The agents, who were tracking a previous marijuana load on foot, were shot in the leg with high-powered weapons. Authorities said the gunmen withdrew from the canyon using military-style cover and concealment tactics to escape back into Mexico.

Authorities later found 500 pounds of marijuana near the site.

About 6,000 National Guard troops deployed along the 1,951-mile U.S.-Mexico border are part of President Bush's $760 million Operation Jump Start. They have been deployed from California to Texas to upgrade border security and give the Border Patrol time to recruit, hire and train 6,000 new agents by the end of 2008.

The Guard troops are not empowered to get involved in law-enforcement duties. They cannot detain, arrest or interdict anyone or anything coming across the border -- only report them to the Border Patrol.

Illegals Become Repeat Criminals (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

Criminal aliens set free on the streets of America -- instead of being deported after serving their time -- are being rearrested as many as six more times by U.S. authorities, according to a government audit released yesterday.

But the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General said it did not know how many of 262,105 illegals in the audit, who had been charged with a crime and then released, had been rearrested.

Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said that the volume of available files "was too great to search manually and quantify the results" and that investigators instead selected a sample of 100 illegal aliens arrested in 2004 and reviewed their criminal histories for evidence of rearrests.

Mr. Fine noted that although the limited audit did not find any instances of "outright failure" to cooperate with Homeland Security in the removal of criminal aliens from the United States, a review of the 100 criminal histories "produced results that, if indicative of the full population of criminal aliens identified, suggest that the rate at which released criminal aliens are re-arrested is extremely high."

The 91-page audit, which was requested by Congress, said the limited sampling found that of the 100 selected aliens, 73 had an average of six arrests each after being released from custody. They were arrested, collectively, 429 times on 878 charges, ranging from traffic violations and trespassing to drug crimes, burglary, robbery, assault and weapons violations.

The audit found that local jurisdictions "prioritize enforcement of state and local laws, while sometimes permitting or encouraging law-enforcement officers" to work with Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE).

Last year, Congress required an annual audit as part of the Justice Department's State Criminal Alien Assistance Program (SCAAP), which provides federal funding to states and localities for the costs of incarcerating criminal aliens on state or local charges. The program is administered by the Justice Department in conjunction with ICE, which is part of Homeland Security.

During fiscal 2005, Justice distributed $287.1 million in SCAAP payments to 752 state, county and local jurisdictions -- nearly 70 percent of which went to 10 jurisdictions: the states of California, New York, Texas, Florida, Arizona, Illinois and Massachusetts; New York City; and two California counties, Los Angeles and Orange.

The report also said investigators identified an official "sanctuary" policy for two jurisdictions that received at least $1 million in SCAAP funding: Oregon, which received $3.4 million, and the city and county of San Francisco, which received $1.1 million and has designated itself a "city and county of refuge."

In addition, an executive order issued in New York City limits the enforcement of immigration law by local authorities, the report said.

The audit defined "sanctuary" as a jurisdiction that may have state laws, local ordinances or departmental policies limiting the role of local authorities in the enforcement of immigration laws.

The audit also examined the level of cooperation among federal, state and local authorities, but found "conflicting views between ICE and local jurisdictions as to what actions constitute full cooperation."

"Congress did not define 'fully cooperate,' nor did our review of immigration legislation disclose any specific steps that localities are required to take to help effect the removal of criminal aliens from the United States," the audit said.

The report also found that among 164 state and local agencies surveyed:

•30 jurisdictions do not generally ask those arrested about their immigration status.

•17 said they do not inform ICE when they have someone they suspect may be an illegal alien in custody. Some agencies said they do not inform ICE about possible illegals in custody because they don't think ICE will respond.

•18 jurisdictions do not alert ICE before releasing undocumented criminal aliens.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Fielding Picked For White House Counsel (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114178

President Bush has chosen Fred Fielding, formerly the top lawyer in the Reagan administration, to be his White House counsel.

The announcement will be made Tuesday, according to a Bush administration official who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the appointment had not been made.

Fielding will become Bush's counsel just as newly empowered Democrats in Congress plan deeper scrutiny of the administration. From the Iraq war to environmental policy and secret surveillance, the Democrats who now control both the House and Senate are armed with subpoena power and ready to summon panels of witnesses.

Fielding, a longtime Washington lawyer, will replace Harriet Miers, Bush's failed Supreme Court nominee and longtime adviser. She submitted her resignation Thursday after six years in the White House, and it will take effect Jan. 31.

Fielding served as President Reagan's counsel from 1981 to 1986, where one of his assistants was John Roberts, now the chief justice of the Supreme Court. Under President Nixon, Fielding served as deputy White House counsel from 1972 to 1974 and associate counsel from 1970 to 1972.

More recently, he served on the bipartisan panel that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks.

Fielding is a partner at the firm of Wiley, Rein and Fielding.

He is known as an expert in business litigation and government relations law, representing corporations in high profile regulatory investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Justice Department and others.

"As soon as I heard they were looking for someone with a great investigation background, Fred Fielding was the only one I thought of," said Sheila Tate, a public relations executive who worked in the Reagan administration.

Ron Kaufman, who served in the administrations of Reagan and Bush's father, said he was not surprised that Fielding would take the job.

"Guys like him can't say no to a president," Kaufman said.

Fielding's appointment was first reported Monday by Time magazine on its Web site.

Bush Picks Reagan White House Counsel Fielding To Succeed Miers (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

President Bush has selected Fred F. Fielding to be his White House counsel, recruiting a seasoned Washington veteran to represent the president with Democratic congressional investigators and reprise the job he held under Ronald Reagan, sources close to the process said yesterday.

The White House plans to announce the appointment today, just days after longtime Bush loyalist Harriet Miers was eased out as the president's top lawyer in preparation for the anticipated struggle with a new Democratic Congress eager to investigate the administration. A White House official confirmed the appointment but insisted on anonymity because it has not been announced.

Fielding, 67, brings the experience and political heft that White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten has been seeking to counter any aggressive moves to probe the most controversial decisions of the Bush presidency. Smooth and soft-spoken yet battle-hardened, Fielding is considered a Republican "wise man" who Bush aides believe will be able to negotiate compromise without surrendering on the most important priorities.

"It sends the perfect signal that we are serious about the president's position and the principles he has articulated but we're also going to be reasonable and work together to get some of these issues resolved," said Helgi C. Walker, a former Bush White House associate counsel who works with Fielding at his firm, Wiley Rein & Fielding. "He brings stature and gravitas, and he also brings a very healthy perspective, the ability to prioritize in crafting a settlement."

Fielding served as deputy to White House counsel John W. Dean III under President Richard M. Nixon and was the first to tell Dean about the Watergate break-in. Yet Fielding was one of the few to emerge untainted by Watergate. In fact, he was suspected, wrongly, of being "Deep Throat," the inside source who helped Washington Post reporters Bob Woodward and Carl Bernstein uncover the scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0114179

Fielding served as White House counsel for Reagan from 1981 to 1986, handling a spate of conflict-of-interest situations and telling Secretary of State Alexander M. Haig he was wrong to assert that he had command authority when the president was shot. Fielding was Bush's transition counsel after the 2000 election, vetting the backgrounds of new administration officials. And he served as a member of the commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"Fred will be a formidable person to deal with," said Democrat Richard Ben-Veniste, a Watergate prosecutor who served with Fielding on the Sept. 11 commission. "This change reflects the understanding by the president and his advisers in the administration that they will be in for a much more robust period of congressional oversight."

Ben-Veniste said Fielding sometimes played intermediary with the White House in conflicts over the release of information to the commission. "At times, Fred was somewhat dismayed by the positions taken by White House counsel and other agencies," Ben-Veniste said. "But by the same token, he was someone with whom the White House was in frequent contact."

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), the new chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said he does not know Fielding but understands that "he has a very distinguished record." Waxman, who plans to begin hearings on Feb. 6 into waste, fraud and abuse in Iraq contracting, said, "I hope he advises the president on ways to work with Congress."

The move to bring back a White House counsel from another era is reminiscent of President Bill Clinton's decision in the midst of the Whitewater investigation in 1994 to hire Lloyd N. Cutler as his chief lawyer, many years after Cutler served in the same position under President Jimmy Carter. Like Clinton, Bush is reaching out to a pillar of the Washington establishment in hopes of tamping down political troubles.

In Bush's case, he faces congressional demands for information on politically sensitive topics such as whether officials authorized the abuse of U.S.-held detainees, whether the administration turned a blind eye to profiteering by politically connected contractors in the Iraq war, how the White House responded to Hurricane Katrina and whether senior officials complied with the law in ordering heightened domestic surveillance. The White House counsel also monitors staff ethics issues and screens judicial nominations, including potential Supreme Court justices.

"Fred Fielding's been in the White House before and he understands how the place works, which is very important," said Leonard A. Leo, executive vice president of the Federalist Society, who informally advises the White House on legal matters. "He understands how the Hill works, which is important. And he has widespread respect from all points on the spectrum."

Bush Turns To Capital Insider (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — Turning to a man described as "the truly quintessential Washington, D.C., inside lawyer," President Bush has chosen Fred F. Fielding as his White House counsel, a White House official said Monday.

Bush will be the third president whom Fielding has served in the counsel's office. As deputy counsel, he defended Richard M. Nixon during the Watergate investigation; as the chief White House attorney from 1981 to 1986, he directed Ronald Reagan's responses to smaller scandals.

The official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because the appointment had not been formally announced, said that Fielding, 67, would replace Harriet E. Miers, who submitted her resignation Thursday.

Fielding, who served on the independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks, is a partner in a Washington law firm, Wiley Rein & Fielding.

His appointment, which could be announced as early as today, is part of a White House personnel overhaul that began in April with the arrival of Joshua B. Bolten as chief of staff. In a White House in which few senior aides, and even fewer midlevel staff members, served in high-level posts in previous administrations, Fielding's arrival would represent a rare reliance on a Washington insider.

The counsel's office is likely to be particularly busy in coming months.

The new Democratic majorities in the House and the Senate have pledged to conduct vigorous oversight of administration policies and investigations of its actions — with the possibility of issuing subpoenas.

DOJ_NMG_0114180

"It's going to be a contentious time. There will be repeated demands for executive-branch witnesses to testify on Capitol Hill" and a push for internal documents, said Douglas W. Kmiec, a professor at Pepperdine University School of Law, who worked with Fielding during the Reagan administration. "Some of it is likely to be quite testy on Iraq and contracts for the rebuilding of Iraq."

Fielding will bring to the White House a resume nearly unmatched among Republicans in Washington: a history of dealing with congressional investigations and constitutional issues at the heart of the separation of powers of the executive and legislative branches, experience working with Democrats, and a reputation for delivering bad news to presidents in a straightforward manner.

"He knows how to deliver tough news. He is not cowed by the office of the presidency," said Kenneth M. Duberstein, who served as one of Reagan's chiefs of staff. "He doesn't get cotton in his mouth when he walks into the Oval Office."

As Reagan's White House counsel for five years, Fielding oversaw the administration's response to legal issues that snared then-Labor Secretary Raymond Donovan and to scandal at the Environmental Protection Agency.

He also was involved in the search that led to the nomination of Sandra Day O'Connor as the first woman on the Supreme Court. Among his young aides was John G. Roberts Jr., now chief justice of the United States.

As deputy White House counsel during Nixon's second term, he worked at first with John W. Dean III, constructing the initial responses to the Watergate investigation. For a time, he was believed to have been Deep Throat, a key source for Washington Post reporters Bob Woodward and Carl Bernstein. (That mysterious figure was identified in May 2005 as W. Mark Felt of the FBI.)

Like many of his predecessors in the Oval Office, when Bush came to Washington he placed longtime associates, with whom he was comfortable, in particularly sensitive jobs.

And when problems arose, predecessors turned to Washington veterans.

The appointment recalls President Clinton's decision in 1994, during the initial investigations of the Whitewater land deal, to name Lloyd N. Cutler as special counsel. Cutler, a Democratic insider with decades of Washington experience, had served President Carter as White House counsel almost two decades earlier.

Bush's first two White House counsels — Alberto R. Gonzales, now attorney general, and Miers — were longtime loyalists who came with the president from Texas.

By selecting Fielding, said former Solicitor General Kenneth W. Starr, "the president has gone inside — he has chosen the truly quintessential Washington, D.C., inside lawyer."

"Fred has probably unparalleled experience. He's very well known for his great wisdom, common sense and very discerning judgment," said Starr, now dean of Pepperdine's law school, who as an independent counsel conducted the investigation that led to Clinton's impeachment in 1998.

The selection of Fielding was first reported Monday on Time magazine's website.

Reagan Lawyer Ready To Return To White House (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — President Bush has chosen Fred F. Fielding as the new chief White House lawyer, adding to his team a longtime Washington legal hand and veteran of the post.

Mr. Fielding forged his skills in politically charged episodes like Watergate and the air traffic controllers' strike in 1981.

White House officials said Mr. Bush would announce as early as Tuesday that Mr. Fielding would return as White House counsel, succeeding Harriet E. Miers, who announced her resignation last week. The officials insisted on anonymity to discuss an unannounced personnel decision.

Mr. Fielding's agreement to take the job surprised some of his closest friends. The friends said last week, when his name surfaced as a contender for the position, that they would be surprised if he would give up a successful corporate practice for another stint of what promises to be heavy partisan battle at age 67.

Mr. Fielding was deputy counsel to President Richard M. Nixon under John W. Dean III and was White House counsel for the first five years of Ronald Reagan's presidency.

DOJ_NMG_0114181

Since then, he has kept a hand in politics and government, helping screen job candidates for President Bush during and after his transition, and serving on the bipartisan Sept. 11 commission.

Several friends said they believed that he had been under heavy pressure to return as White House counsel by an administration girding for a raft of investigations by the new Democratic Congress.

The news of his selection was first reported on Monday afternoon on the Time magazine Web site.

Officials said Mr. Fielding was always a leading candidate of the White House chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten, who is said to have been seeking a possible change in the counsel's office from the moment he took over as chief of staff in April.

But several Republicans close to the White House said Mr. Bush swiftly dismissed that notion. Ms. Miers had been Mr. Bush's lawyer in Texas and followed him here. Mr. Bush nominated her to the Supreme Court in 2005, but she withdrew amid criticism of her qualifications.

Mr. Bolten pushed again for a new White House counsel after the Democrats won control of both chambers of Congress in November and he concluded that the president would need a more seasoned Washington creature in the months ahead, Republicans close to the administration said.

He found one in Mr. Fielding, known as such an expert player of the inside game of Washington politics that he had even been suspected as Deep Throat, the confidential source of information who led to the disclosures of the Watergate scandal.

Mr. Fielding was not Deep Throat, but he is likely to bring a more sophisticated sense of the interplay among Congress, the news media and the White House than Ms. Miers.

The selection of such a battle-hardened hand as Mr. Fielding for the counsel post underscores the degree to which the White House is girding for potentially intense battles with Democrats. He would help prepare for the possibility that the new Congress may use hearings and, possibly, subpoenas to challenge Mr. Bush's broad assertions of executive power.

Representative Henry A. Waxman, the California Democrat who is chairman of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, sounded a somewhat combative note.

"I'm hopeful that he will understand that the best way to represent his client is to cooperate when the Congress asks for information," Mr. Waxman said in a telephone interview.

Mr. Fielding has a nuanced record on executive privilege and partisan confrontation. Associates say he is as likely to head for the negotiating table as to the wrestling mat.

Lee H. Hamilton, the Democratic vice chairman of the Sept. 11 commission, said Mr. Fielding had a major role in securing information and testimony from the White House that it was initially loathe to share.

"He understood the problems for the White House and he understood the demands of the commission," Mr. Hamilton said. "He played a key role in working it out for us in an amicable way, and it didn't come easily."

In the counsel's position, Mr. Fielding will lead a White House legal team that includes David S. Addington, the powerful chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney. Both officials have advocated a tough line in protecting executive power against perceived intrusions by Congress.

A Republican close to the White House said Mr. Fielding had maintained close ties to Mr. Cheney, whom he has known for decades, and had occasionally been an informal adviser to him.

J. Michael Luttig, a former federal judge who worked with Mr. Fielding in the Reagan administration and remains close to him, said:

"He has a firm, clear view of executive prerogative, but he also understands as well as anyone in Washington the constitutional need for compromise. He is not someone that takes an absolutist position and then drives the presidency and the branches together off the brink. He has judgment."

Mr. Luttig said Mr. Fielding had wrestled somewhat with the decision to become White House counsel, but ultimately, "He did this out of a sense of obligation and patriotism, and that was the sole reason."

Republicans close to the White House said Mr. Fielding had assurances of having a wide berth that he apparently received last week in a meeting with Mr. Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0114182

Kenneth M. Duberstein, a chief of staff for Mr. Reagan, said because Mr. Fielding had been an aide to two presidents he would not be cowed by the Oval Office or so charmed by the president that he would shy from giving potentially unwelcome advice.

"Fred has an independence of judgment and independence of stature," Mr. Duberstein said. "He knows how to deliver tough news."

All the same, Mr. Fielding is clearly being brought in to draw legal lines in the sand.

"He brings enormous credibility to both sides, but he's the president's counsel," said Wayne Berman, a Republican lobbyist who is friendly with Mr. Fielding and whose wife is the White House social secretary, Lea Berman. "He's not there to represent the views of the Congress."

Fielding Subpoenas (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

For a President said to be irrelevant, George W. Bush has certainly managed to hire a big name to be his next chief White House counsel. In recruiting Fred Fielding, Chief of Staff Josh Bolten has donned some necessary armor for the subpoena assault that is sure to come from Democrats in Congress.

Mr. Fielding replaces Harriet Miers, a Texan and personal friend of the President. Ms. Miers was an ill-fated nominee for the Supreme Court, but she served Mr. Bush well both on judicial selection and preserving Presidential powers. Both of those areas are likely to get fiercer as Democrats look to bloody the White House in the run-up to 2008.

It's hard to imagine a more experienced choice than Mr. Fielding on the subject of executive power. As deputy White House counsel from 1972 to 1974, he witnessed the modern low tide of Presidential authority as Richard Nixon was besieged by Watergate. And as Ronald Reagan's counsel from 1981 to 1986, he had to cope with a Democratic House that unleashed special prosecutors on the executive branch.

The "independent counsel" law has happily expired, but this Congress will be looking to assert itself in particular on war powers. Mr. Fielding understands the importance of fighting off such poaching -- for the sake of Mr. Bush and the Office of the Presidency. This ought to mean recommending that Mr. Bush veto any weakening of last year's law on military tribunals, as well as resisting any further delegation of executive power to the judiciary for approving warrantless wiretaps of al Qaeda.

The question of responding to the avalanche of subpoenas will be more politically delicate. Congress has every right to conduct oversight of the executive branch, and the White House will be obliged to supply numerous documents. However, the principle of executive privilege is vital to Presidential decision-making, and preserving the privacy of that deliberative process will be one of Mr. Fielding's primary tasks.

Another duty will be offering Mr. Bush advice on judicial selection. The conventional Beltway wisdom is that Senate Democrats will block all but liberal nominees to the appellate courts, and that might be right. But the judges issue proved to be a good one for Republicans in both the 2002 and 2004 campaigns, and the White House shouldn't shrink from appointing capable members of the Federalist Society simply because they might not be confirmed.

This is an issue that deserves to be framed for 2008 -- all the more so if Mr. Bush gets another Supreme Court nomination. Democrats may want to block any Bush nominee, but they won't find it politically painless to do so if the President selects nominees as capable and conservative as Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito.

Amid all the Washington talk of "bipartisanship," the reality of our current political division means inevitable conflict. It's good to see Mr. Bush recruiting some experienced generals for the battles ahead.

Bush Issues Democrats Challenge On Earmarks (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

Twice in the last week, President Bush has challenged Democrats to cut pork-barrel spending projects in half this year -- but the administration won't say how much earmark spending happens now, nor what the 50 percent target cut would mean.

DOJ_NMG_0114183

As Republicans adjust to being the minority party on Capitol Hill, both Mr. Bush and his fellow party members in Congress are flexing their newfound freedom to take shots from the sidelines without the responsibility of having to back it up by passing the bills or meeting the goals.

For Mr. Bush, that meant making the bold challenge Wednesday in the White House Rose Garden "to cut the number and cost of earmarks next year by at least half," but not backing it up with any specifics.

A spokesman for the Office of Management and Budget said to stay tuned for the details.

"We're looking right now at the peak levels that we've seen occur over the last three years, and what you'll see in the coming future, particularly the budget itself, is a more clear understanding of what is meant by that phrase," said Sean Kevelighan, press secretary at the OMB, which handles the White House's fiscal affairs.

But Democrats found the timing of Mr. Bush's goal to be curious.

"It is interesting that the administration stayed quiet as the number of earmarks exploded under a Republican Congress and set this target now that Democrats are in control," said House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, who also supports cutting the number of earmarks.

Meanwhile, congressional Republicans are finding freedom in being in the minority.

At their session-opening press conference, House Republican leaders were asked what alternatives they would offer to the new Democratic leadership's package of reforms.

"I think we have to see the base of what we're dealing with, what hand are we dealt," said Rep. Adam H. Putnam of Florida, chairman of the House Republican Conference.

It's a strategy that political observer Charlie Cook called the "just throw rocks" approach in last week's issue of National Journal.

Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat and the new chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, bristled at the president's challenge, saying Mr. Bush is just as guilty of spending money to gain politically.

"If we are going to talk about earmarks, then let's talk about the guy who does the most earmarking. That's the guy in the big white house at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue," Mr. Obey said.

Mr. Obey said last year the president provided fire-grant money to 30,278 projects, but 62 percent of those grants were in congressional districts represented by Republicans.

"Every single one of those fire grants is the functional equivalent of an earmark," Mr. Obey said.

Both sides agree that earmarks are in the eye of the beholder, and there are a host of guesses as to how much earmarked spending there is in the budget.

Citizens Against Government Waste, which publishes the annual "Pig Book" looking at pork-barrel spending, put the figure at $29 billion in 2006; Republicans on the House Appropriations Committee said it was $17 billion; and Bloomberg News service, citing the Congressional Research Service, put the 2006 figure at $71.77 billion, covering 15,832 special projects.

Mr. Obey supports more transparency in earmarks, but cautioned against thinking it will affect the budget deficit. Cutting earmarks doesn't save any money because earmarks themselves don't increase the size of a spending bill; rather, they direct money to a specific project.

Mr. Hoyer said Mr. Bush has a chance to prove he is serious with next month's budget proposal.

"I hope that the president is truly looking to work together to reduce earmarks. An important first step would be for him to put forward an honest and credible budget."

Reid's 'earmark' Gets Veto Of Home County (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 9, 2007

From securing money for a modern national park visitors' center to landing an alternative-energy grant for a local school, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has come through over the years for rural and cash-poor White Pine County.

But a White Pine lands bill that Reid attached to the 109th Congress's final legislation lost the official endorsement of the very county it affects, leaving disappointed Nevadans in its wake.

DOJ_NMG_0114184

White Pine officials wanted funding added to the bill for a study of the Southern Nevada Water Authority's (SNWA) plan for a 285-mile pipeline snaking through their region, sending groundwater south to glittering Las Vegas. County commissioners said Reid and Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) told them the addition would sink the bill, but the commission was willing to take the risk.

Both senators and several local groups praise the bill for designating more than a half-million acres of newly protected wilderness. But some in White Pine and elsewhere in the West contend that the requested water study fell victim to Reid's support for a pipeline sought by Clark County, home of Las Vegas, where the majority leader's son Rory is board chairman.

"Reid's always told us in private … that we should sell some of our water," said John Chachas, a Democratic White Pine commissioner. "He says, 'You're bankrupt, sell your water, let Clark County build their $2 billion pipeline into northern Nevada and everybody will be happy.' Well, we're at opposite ends of the rainbow."

Reid laid the foundation for wilderness preservation coupled with private development in Nevada with a 1998 bill that authorized the sale of thousands of acres of public land in Clark County. The Nevada delegation ensured that proceeds from the sales would stay within the state, including 10 percent headed to the SNWA, where Rory Reid is vice chairman of the board.

White Pine also will gain access to those land-sale proceeds, one of several changes the county requested in the final version of last month's land bill, Reid spokesman Jon Summers said in an e-mail.

During a town hall in August, Summers said, "the senators emphasized that the bill was a land bill — not a water bill — and that they did not intend to give preference to either side of the water debate by putting in water provisions."

Two Southern California water provisions that were high priorities for the SNWA were included in the final version of the White Pine bill: a canal-lining project and a new reservoir, paid for by the state of Nevada, that would provide billions of gallons of water each year for Clark County.

Both Summers and White Pine's chief commissioner, Brent Eldridge, said the California projects could alleviate the immediate need for the water pipeline. Eldridge missed the board's vote to pull support from the lands bill but defended the lawmakers' refusal to add funding for the water study.

"We understand that they're Nevada's senators, not White Pine County's senators," Eldridge said, adding the county "seriously eroded our credibility with the senators" by pushing for a study that "could appear to be an affront" to the SNWA.

Reid helped pass two more Nevada land sales bills in 2002 and 2004, each combining new wilderness designations with public land sales. He took GOP heat after media reports revealed benefits in the 2004 bill for Harvey Whittemore, a friend of the senator whose planned Clark County development would tap the water pipeline.

Still, White Pine was the first county to raise questions about a congressional lands bill written to help replenish its coffers. The initial draft of the bill included almost $1 billion of water-related projects for Clark County — a red flag for some.

"I'm going to be fighting this project hard. But these political games, the fact that Reid has this power as majority leader, it bothers me quite a bit," said Gary Perea, a Democratic commissioner who voted to resist the bill without the water study.

Perea acknowledged that Whittemore and Rory Reid stand to gain from the water pipeline. But he attributed Reid's last-minute move on the White Pine bill primarily to the delegation's reliance on thirsty Las Vegas for political clout.

Reid, Ensign and Gov.-elect Jim Gibbons (R-Nev.), a former House member, all lent muscle to the White Pine bill. Reid requested its addition to the year-end tax and trade omnibus, however, according to a Congressional Record statement by former Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) and media reports.

"I just don't trust [Reid]. Not with water," said Chachas, sufficiently scarred by the water fight that last month he stepped down from the commission. "He's too close to the water authority and their efforts down there."

Summers and Ensign chief of staff John Lopez stressed that the proposed pipeline is under state jurisdiction, with its fate to be determined sometime this year in a ruling by the state engineer. Ensign believed "the inclusion of the water study would unwisely move the focus of this bill away from economic development and natural resources protection," Lopez said in an e-mail.

The SNWA focused its lobbying effort not on the White Pine issues but on the new reservoir and canal-lining projects, water authority spokesman Scott Huntley said.

"That was our interest in the bill, not any of this other matter — though we did oppose the study," Huntley said. The SNWA believes another water study, required by a settlement of federal protests to the pipeline, would address the county's concerns.

DOJ_NMG_0114185

The SNWA lobbying team includes Kai Anderson, a former Reid aide now with the Rhoads Group, and Marcus Faust, a Mormon lobbyist who has worked for the church. Huntley referred questions about Rory Reid's role in the process to Sen. Reid's office, where Summers said, "To our knowledge, Commissioner [Rory] Reid had no involvement" with SNWA's action on the bill.

Environmental groups are split on the White Pine bill. The Nevada Wilderness Project and the Eastern Nevada Landscape Coalition lent support, but the Sierra Club, Environmental Defense and the Seattle-based Western Lands Project (WLP) have expressed concern.

"With one hand, he's essentially giving them land for development, and with the other hand, he's [taking] away their water," WLP director Janine Blaeloch said of Reid.

The WLP has filed suit against Whittemore and the federal agency that manages public lands, the Bureau of Land Management (BLM), in a bid to halt progress on his development.

Then-Rep. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.), who led the House Resources Committee until losing his reelection bid, appeared blindsided by the White Pine bill's presence in last month's year-end omnibus.

Pombo said he was unaware who inserted the White Pine provisions but labeled them a "probable earmark" in a letter to then-Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) "Their ill-advised inclusion undermines valuable natural resources, cheats taxpayers out of their investment in our public lands and benefits special interest groups on a completely unprecedented scale," Pombo wrote on Dec. 8.

"It quacks like an earmark, it walks like an earmark," said Steve Ellis, vice president of programs at Taxpayers for Common Sense. "You could say this is one last hurrah for the old way of doing things, but it certainly runs counter to what the Democrats in both chambers are trying to enact for the 110th Congress."

RaLeene Makley, who will join the county commission next year, said lingering hard feelings could lead the county to take a savvier approach with its congressmen, perhaps even hiring a lobbyist.

"I believe that White Pine was thinking something different was happening than what really was," Makley said.

House Votes To Tighten Rules On Tariff Breaks (WP)

By Joe Stephens

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

The House voted last week to shine a spotlight into the murky world of import-tariff suspensions, a little-known form of special-interest legislation that has cost taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars in lost revenue.

The House overwhelmingly approved a bill that, for the first time, officially equates tariff suspensions with a better-known variety of legislative pork, the congressional earmark. The new rules require public disclosure of each measure's sponsor, purpose and cost whenever lawmakers slip one into legislation.

The rules also require that congressional sponsors identify each person or corporation "reasonably anticipated to benefit" from the breaks on import taxes.

The rules direct sponsoring lawmakers to certify that they and their spouses have no financial stake in the tax breaks, and they ban the practice of trading provisions for members' votes.

In one of the first official acts of the new Democratic majority, the House approved the rule changes 280 to 152. Some analysts predicted the changes would encourage increased scrutiny of a practice that, a Washington Post study found, often benefits large foreign-based corporations.

The Senate is expected to take up similar legislation this week.

In recent months, the number of congressionally approved tariff suspensions has soared. It rose from 440 at the end of 2004 to more than 800 in the just-concluded 109th Congress, including provisions covering such products as shoes, camcorders and boiled oysters.

Lawmakers rolled 520 of the suspensions into just one must-pass bill that was approved in December, in the final hours of the last Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0114186

Such suspensions often apply to one product imported by one company, according to The Post's analysis in September. The provisions rarely, if ever, identify the company that initiated the legislation. Some provisions do not identify the product, either, referring instead to strings of numbers keyed to massive volumes of tariff tables.

Individual tariff suspensions are supposed to cost the Treasury no more than $500,000 a year in lost revenue. But in recent years the authors of a number of the provisions managed to file multiple measures aimed at a single product.

Supporters of the suspensions say they create jobs and lower consumer prices by reducing costs for U.S. manufacturers. The proponents say that proposed suspensions are reviewed by the Commerce Department, customs officials and the U.S. International Trade Commission. Congressional committees also seek industry comment on the proposed suspensions and recently began posting any objections on their Web sites. Lawmakers say they generally drop a measure if a domestic producer objects.

Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.), who is expected to chair the House Ways and Means subcommittee on trade, hailed the changes as "a useful step forward."

"The more transparency the better," Levin said. "It will be easier for people to verify the basic rules are being followed; outside groups will be able to more readily check."

Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.) said the changes will help root out what he described as "old-fashioned pork."

"This should be one more lesson to my party: We were fired with cause. We got lazy, we got too cozy with K Street, and this is an example where flipping the majority cleans out the closet. I very reluctantly give kudos to the majority."

The House bill applies only to tariff suspensions that benefit 10 or fewer companies. Ryan Alexander, president of Taxpayers for Common Sense, hailed the legislation as a "good start" but said it should apply to suspensions that benefit as many as 100 companies.

"Ten doesn't really pass the smell test," Alexander said.

White House To Unveil Medicare Overhaul (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington

Financial Times, January 9, 2007

The White House budget to be unveiled on February 5 will include plans to expand means-testing in Medicare, the government-sponsored health insurance programme for the elderly, the Financial Times has learned.

The greater use of means-testing, which would require richer Americans to make a bigger contribution, will be accompanied by other steps to increase efficiency and bear down on Medicare costs.

The proposed Medicare changes form part of the White House plan to meet President George W. Bush's goal of eliminating the federal government deficit by 2012 while making his tax cuts permanent.

A senior administration official said the Medicare reforms set out in the budget would be "significant" though they would not add up to "unrealistic full-blown reform" of the programme.

He likened them to changes negotiated in 1997 as part of a bipartisan effort to balance the budget in five years.

The White House will also revise down its estimate of the underlying growth rate of Medicare costs, based on the lower than anticipated cost of the Medicare prescription drug benefit and new actuarial forecasts.

The administration expects that a combination of the policy reforms and slower growth in underlying costs will free up tens of billions of dollars annually by 2012 to help meet the zero deficit goal.

The official acknowledged that the administration had failed to win Congressional support for changes to Medicare in the recent past. However, he said the political context – with both parties now at least talking about balancing the budget by 2012 – has changed.

"I am not saying it is easy," he said. "But it is easier."

Stuart Butler, a policy expert at the Heritage Foundation, said "greater means-testing is the only way to contain the huge tsunami of Medicare spending that is scheduled for the next several decades."

DOJ_NMG_0114187

The White House budget will also impose tight ceilings on growth in discretionary spending on non-security related programmes. However, in an effort to show that its budget plan is politically credible, the White House will not demand a nominal freeze in spending in these areas, as it did in last year's budget.

"We will show some flexibility," the official said.

This will involve budgeting for growth in total non-defence discretionary spending, though this will almost certainly be set below the expected rate of inflation.

Some defence costs included in supplemental budgets for the Iraq war will be brought into the administration's budget. But there will be no amount set aside for unforeseen military costs in 2012 and beyond.

Bush, Lawmakers Meet On Education Bill (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, January 9, 2007

President Bush pushed for renewal of the No Child Left Behind education law Monday in a meeting with congressional leaders but was noncommittal on their request for more money to help schools meet the law's requirements.

"In our discussions today, we've all agreed to work together to address some of the major concerns that some people have on this piece of legislation, without weakening the essence of the bill," Bush said following the White House meeting with Democratic and Republican lawmakers.

The law seeks to ensure all children can read and do math at grade level by 2014, which has placed many new demands on schools. They have had to step up testing, boost teacher quality and pay more attention to the achievements of minority children.

Schools that get federal aid but do not make enough progress must provide tutoring, offer public school choice to students or initiate other reforms such as overhauling their staffs.

First Lady Laura Bush, a former teacher and school librarian, and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings attended the meeting Monday, a day the Bush administration chose to mark the fifth anniversary of the law.

Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., and Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass. — who chair committees overseeing education — said they urged the president to propose funding increases for the law. Bush made no commitments, according to a congressional aide who was briefed on the discussions and spoke on the condition of anonymity because the meeting was private.

Democrats, who won control of Congress in November, say the administration and Republican lawmakers have underfunded the law by about $50 billion, compared to what was originally called for. Republicans say it is common practice for legislation to be funded at less than the full level.

While partisan sniping over the law has been common in recent years, the lawmakers attending Monday's meeting struck a bipartisan note and pledged to work together to get the law renewed for five more years. The united front is part of a strategy to fend off critics who want to see the law scrapped or drastically changed.

"This issue now has its detractors and those that are opposed to it. That's true in the Democratic party and the Republican party," Kennedy said.

Spellings listed a few areas of concern that came up during Monday's meeting. They included how to test special education and limited-English speaking students, a desire to give schools credit for progress even when they fall short of annual targets and ways to get students access to high-quality free tutoring.

Spellings also indicated she was willing to consider providing financial incentives to states that want to align their standards with more rigorous ones in place elsewhere.

The administration, and Republicans generally, have consistently resisted anything that resembles national standards dictating what students across the country should know and learn.

"I think anytime there's a carrot approach, as opposed to a stick for continuing to raise the bar, I think that will be well received," Spelling said.

The No Child Left Behind law has pushed some states to weaken their standards to avoid consequences that arise when schools miss annual targets.

DOJ_NMG_0114188

Kennedy and Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., have introduced legislation addressing the issue. The National Education Association, the largest teachers' union, has endorsed Dodd's bill calling for voluntary national standards.

Republicans Seek Flexible School Funds (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

Key Republicans yesterday said President Bush's education reform law, which is up for renewal this year, should be changed to give states more control over funding and results, arguing that the federal government remains far too involved in local classrooms.

Exactly five years after signing the No Child Left Behind Act, Mr. Bush met with a separate group of lawmakers, including Senate education panel chairman Edward M. Kennedy, to ask them to renew the law, one of Mr. Bush's signature domestic accomplishments.

But across town, Republican Sens. Jim DeMint of South Carolina and John Cornyn of Texas teamed up with the conservative Heritage Foundation to offer a proposal that would let states opt out of many of the federal education funding formulas and instead use the money to best fit their own classroom needs.

"You can't have quality development with a top-down approach," Mr. DeMint said. "It's time to change the way we're thinking about this because it's not working."

Mr. Cornyn agreed that the best option at this point is "moving decision-making power out of Washington and closer to parents and teachers."

Their idea -- which they'll fight to include in the law's renewal -- would keep high standards in place but let states choose to enter a five-year performance agreement with the federal government in exchange for less regulation and more flexibility in how they would use federal dollars and would track their progress. A similar idea was included in Mr. Bush's original NCLB proposal but was watered down by the time the bill became law, according to Heritage.

Mr. Bush and administration officials yesterday praised the bipartisan law, which requires states to test third- to eighth-graders annually and once in grades 10 to 12, with the goal of ensuring that all students can read and do math at grade level by 2014. States had to set paths to meet that goal and track the progress of their schools. Consistently failing schools must offer students public-school choice and tutoring services.

New standards were also set for teachers' ability.

"I think it's made an enormous difference," the president said, after meeting with Mr. Kennedy, House education panel chairman George Miller of California, and the panels' top Republicans, Sen. Michael B. Enzi of Wyoming and Rep. Howard P. "Buck" McKeon of California.

Mr. Bush said he was "confident" that the group can work together to address some of the major concerns about the law without weakening it.

"We have learned some things over the last five years, but we know we're on the right track," said Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, who also attended, along with first lady Laura Bush.

The four lawmakers all expressed hope that they could reauthorize the act, with some changes, and Mr. Enzi said there could be "quick progress."

Democrats said they asked Mr. Bush to increase funding for the bill, insisting that states need more help to meet requirements. Federal education funding has jumped about $7 billion in the past five years under the law, but Democrats have long complained that it's still about $40 billion short of levels set out in the original law.

"It's an issue of priority -- of budgetary priority," Mr. Kennedy said yesterday.

"It will make the reauthorization process far more difficult if it's not there," Mr. Miller said.

Helping limited-English-speaking students and ensuring that more students in failing schools access the tutoring and school-choice options are among other issues being discussed, Mrs. Spellings said.

DOJ_NMG_0114189

Conservatives likely will resist a further spike in education funding. But many conservatives on Capitol Hill are also "spooked" at the prospect of Mr. Bush cutting a deal with Democrats to expand the NCLB fully into high school, a House Republican aide said.

"If they do it the way they did the first one, then we're looking at a massive new entitlement," the aide said.

Mr. Bush included a proposal in his budget last year that expanded the annual testing to high school.

The White House praised the NCLB law yesterday, noting that all states now have accountability and testing plans in place, the number of highly qualified teachers has increased and 9-year-olds are scoring better than ever on reading and math.

Still, there has been relatively low participation in the tutoring and school-choice options offered under the law for students in consistently failing schools.

Mr. DeMint said schools are "squawking" that the law is too onerous. He said schools are focused so intently on meeting its requirements that they're not trying creative solutions for education.

"This will require results ... but it won't be so focused on process," Mr. Cornyn said of their proposal.

White House spokesman Chad Colby said the administration would wait to see details of the DeMint-Cornyn proposal.

"We're all for allowing states and districts to have flexibility as long as they adhere to the core principles of NCLB though. We can't get away from those core principles or reduce accountability in any way," he added.

Democrats Push For Changes To No Child Left Behind Law (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — Democratic Congressional leaders on Monday called President Bush's signature education law too punitive in its sanctions on public schools and pledged to increase educational spending, signaling the stance they will take this year in negotiations over the law's renewal.

The comments came as Mr. Bush discussed renewal of the law, No Child Left Behind, at a White House meeting with legislators of both parties on the law's fifth anniversary. The measure prods schools to improve students' yearly achievement with the threat of sanctions and requires them to bring all students to grade level in reading and math by 2014.

In remarks after the meeting, Mr. Bush predicted a strong bipartisan effort to address "major concerns" about No Child Left Behind "without weakening the essence of the bill."

He added, "We showed in the past that we can work together to get positive results, and I'm confident we can do so again."

While the tenets of the law enjoy strong bipartisan support, No Child Left Behind has also become a partisan battleground, with Democrats accusing Republicans of underfinancing it by $56 billion. Groups across the political spectrum are looking for changes and refinements, including removal of sanctions and imposition of a single national standard for academic performance.

The Democrats, now in the majority, began to stake out their own positions. The Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, who did not attend the president's meeting, said that "accountability measures have proven far too punitive, and states have been given little flexibility in implementing the law's requirements."

Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, who took over as chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, said after the meeting with the president, "We've learned a lot from the past five years, and we know changes are needed to help improve and strengthen the law."

His aides said Mr. Kennedy was proposing incentives for states to work together toward common academic standards that would help them and meet the demands of college, work and military service. Currently, states vary wildly in what they consider sufficient progress under the law.

Mr. Kennedy has also suggested expanding social programs for low-income children and putting outreach workers in every impoverished school, as a way of raising achievement. He is also proposing a new federal role in school construction and renovation.

Under existing rules, students have the right to transfer from subpar schools to ones with higher test scores, even if overcrowding would result. The Democratic proposal is intended to reduce crowding.

DOJ_NMG_0114190

Representative George Miller, Democrat of California, the new chairman of the House Committee on Education and Labor who also attended the White House meeting, urged the president and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to make sharp increases in spending on the impoverished schools singled out by No Child Left Behind.

"The No Child Left Behind Act has brought important changes to our public education system, for example, by shining a spotlight on the persistent achievement gap that exists among different groups of students in our country," Mr. Miller said. "But if we are going to fulfill our original commitment to children and parents, then the law, its implementation and its funding must be improved."

Mr. Bush did not indicate whether he would seek additional financing. But Ms. Spellings indicated that the administration would be amenable to changes in a number of areas the Democrats were suggesting, including the incentives to make state standards more rigorous and uniform. She also said that areas of common concern included how to test special education students and those with limited English.

Senate Torn Over Ethics Panel Measure (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, January 9, 2007

Presidential candidates from both parties are urging the Senate to set up an independent office to probe ethical questions involving fellow senators. That could be a tough sell.

There is some "institutional resistance," said Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., a potential candidate who has long championed the notion of an independent office of public integrity that would take over some of the self-policing duties of the Senate ethics committee.

"A lot of members are concerned about the use of an independent commission as a political club to beat them over the head," Obama said at a news conference Monday as debate on ethics legislation opened.

A possible rival in 2008, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., is also pressing to amend the ethics bill, the first legislation Democrats are taking up in their new majority role, to include the office of public integrity.

The ethics legislation, based on a bill that stalled in the last Congress, would ban gifts and travel paid for by lobbyists, slow the movement of former senators to lobbying jobs, require lobbyists to provide more information on their activities and oblige senators to be more open about their special projects, or earmarks. The Senate is expected to spend up to two weeks on the legislation.

The House passed a rules package last week with tough bans on receiving gifts and travel from lobbyists and their employers and banning the use of corporate jets.

Obama and McCain argue that, after the lobbying and ethics scandals that contributed to the Republican defeat in the 2006 midterm elections, the Senate must create an independent office to ensure voters it is serious about enforcing its own ethics rules.

But Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., a member of the six-senator ethics panel, said the nonpartisan group has done its job, and the new office would simply add another step to the ethics process. He added that the office of public integrity was "in danger of becoming a backboard for political tennis balls" with each side filing partisan charges against the other.

"Our ethics process in the Senate works very well," said Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., another ethics committee member. "We have not broken down like the House has."

The House ethics committee, torn by partisan wrangling, was dormant for about 16 months until May of last year. It did carry out an extensive investigation of disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., last fall.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., in an interview with Nevada reporters Monday, said that as a former ethics committee member he believed an outside body should be considered only after extensive hearings. "I think it would be a gross error in judgment for the Senate just to leap in and do something without holding any hearings," he said.

Last year, led by ethics committee members, the Senate rejected a proposal for an office of public integrity by an 11-5 vote in the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee and then by 67-30 on the Senate floor.

DOJ_NMG_0114191

Asked how that result might change this year, Obama pointed to eight Democratic freshmen that also attended the news conference. "We've got a whole bunch of freshmen and I also think the election changed the dynamics," he said.

The independent office proposal that Obama and Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., will likely offer as an amendment is identical to the idea being put forward by McCain, Sen. Joseph Lieberman, I-Conn., and Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, in separate ethics legislation.

It would create an independent congressional agency that would audit financial disclosure and lobbying reports and investigate alleged ethics violations. It could refer cases of possible violations to federal and state authorities. It would report to the House and Senate ethics committees, which would retain the authority to determine violations and penalties against members.

Feingold said they also would push for changes to move the Senate closer to the House, which last week effectively barred lawmakers from traveling by corporate jets. "It is one of these things that really sticks in the craw" of voters, he said. "It also has a corrupting influence."

Reid said his office was working on various measures to expand the gift and travel ban to include companies that hire lobbyists, stop lawmakers from sneaking provisions into legislation at the last minute and strengthening the definition of what constitutes an earmark.

"This is just a start," he said of the bill he and Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., introduced on the Senate floor. "We're going to improve this bill."

Senate Takes Up Ethics Bill Promoted By Democrats (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

The Senate yesterday began debate on the Democrats' ethics-reform package, with one of their chief spokesmen on the issue accusing lawmakers of being loath to support a ban on free private-jet flights for reasons of personal privilege.

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois noted at a press conference held yesterday to announce the package -- which Democrats hope to pass Friday -- that such flights, usually funded by lobbyists or their corporate sponsors, let lawmakers avoid security lines.

"Why do you think there is resistance?" he said. "Well, because corporate jets are nice. They are convenient. They are waiting for you. You don't have to take your shoes off."

Mr. Obama, who has all but announced his run for president in 2008, said he voluntarily gave up flying corporate-class last year and now pays for chartered flights out of his hefty campaign account.

Critics of the proposals -- which also include prohibitions on accepting gifts, meals or junkets funded by lobbyists -- say monied special interests still could buy influence with campaign contributions. Mr. Obama promised to tackle campaign-finance reform later this year.

Democrats say the sight of senators and congressmen whizzing around in Learjets nettles a public that must endure the long lines and security checks of commercial air travel.

"When they find out that members of Congress can use a corporate jet and have that kind of convenience that the average person can't have, it is one of those things that really stick in the craw," said Sen. Russ Feingold, Wisconsin Democrat and co-sponsor of the ethics bill with Mr. Obama, adding that the free flights have a "corrupting influence."

"When a lobbyist is in that plane with you, he or she has all kinds of time to lobby you, bend your ear," Mr. Feingold said. "It is something the average citizen does not have. So to me, [a ban] is both substantive and symbolic, and it is a very important point."

The Senate ethics bill closely mirrors legislation that began to move through the House last week. Both include measures to stop earmarks, the local spending provisions widely derided as pork that lawmakers bury in complicated bills, and to break up close ties between lobbyists and members of Congress.

Voter outrage over corruption in Washington, including the scandal involving disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, is widely credited as a factor in the Democrats' gains in the midterm elections. The issue became the first taken up by the new Democrat-controlled Congress.

"The American people demanded change, and the Democrats are ready to deliver," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said at the press conference. "In the end, the Senate will pass the most sweeping reforms since Watergate."

DOJ_NMG_0114192

Public backing for a crackdown makes supporters of the reforms confident that lawmakers will vote for the new rules, even if they have to give up flying free or at reduced rates on corporate jets.

Mr. Obama acknowledged that some lawmakers depend on private jets for legitimate congressional business. But he said they can find ways to pay for it themselves.

"In fairness, for folks who are traveling a lot or live in remote areas or have to travel to areas of the state that are difficult to get to or have irregular commercial flight schedules, there may be legitimate reasons for them to be concerned," he said. "I just pay for it out of my campaign funds."

Senate Democrats Begin Work On Ethics Law Changes (BLM)

By Jonathan D. Salant

Bloomberg, January 9, 2007

Jan. 8 (Bloomberg) -- Democrats who now control the U.S. Senate will spend the next two weeks on overhauling ethics and lobbying laws, after the House voted to amend its own rules.

ADVERTISEMENT

The proposed Senate measure would bar lawmakers from accepting free gifts and meals from lobbyists. Lobbyists would have to file disclosure reports online four times a year, instead of filing paper reports twice a year. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said he'll support amendments to strengthen the measure, which is similar to a plan passed by the Senate last year that was criticized by advocacy groups as too weak.

``No issue facing this body is more fundamentally important," Reid said on the Senate floor today. ``When we make leaders accountable to the people, not to special interests, there's no limit to what we can accomplish."

House Democrats approved more extensive restrictions last week as their first order of business since taking power. Democrats won control of both houses in November's election for the first time in 12 years, with 42 percent of voters in a CNN exit poll saying the ethics issue was ``extremely important."

Republican Senator John Cornyn of Texas, a member of the Senate Ethics Committee, said the two parties should work together on a final measure.

``Ethics and lobbying reform are issues that deserve and demand a bipartisan solution as Congress works to strengthen the American people's faith and trust in their government," Cornyn said.

Corporate Jets

The Senate proposal is co-sponsored by Reid and Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, a Republican from Kentucky. Reid said the Senate plans to spend the next two weeks debating the legislation and amendments before voting.

The House rules approved last week will ban lawmakers from flying on corporate jets and accepting gifts and meals from lobbyists. They also can't accept overnight trips from lobbyists and their organizations. Nonprofit foundations affiliated with lobbying groups can continue to pay for trips approved in advance by the House ethics committee.

The new House rules also require that the sponsors of pet spending projects, known as earmarks, be identified publicly.

The House new rules will take effect with no further action, while the proposed Senate legislation would need House approval and SEARCH

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> President George W. Bush's signature. The House can continue to require members to follow its rules if legislation enacted by Congress is weaker.

Proposed Amendments

Democratic Senators Russell Feingold of Wisconsin and Barack Obama of Illinois are proposing amendments to the Senate legislation that would duplicate the House rules on travel, except that it would let senators fly on corporate jets as long as they pay the charter rate. Their proposal also would double to two years the waiting period before former lawmakers can become lobbyists.

Feingold and Obama would require Senate campaigns to file electronically with the SEARCH

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> Federal Election Commission, as do House campaigns, political parties and political action committees. Until now, Senate campaigns have filed their reports on paper.

``We may finally have a bill that is an appropriate response to the clear message we got from the American people," Feingold said at a news conference with Reid, Obama and eight of the nine Democratic Senate freshmen.

The Feingold-Obama proposal also would include an independent ethics office to enforce the new law and investigate complaints.

`Outside Mechanism'

``Some sort of outside mechanism is the key," said former FEC Chairman Trevor Potter, who now heads the Washington-based Campaign Finance Institute, an advocacy group. ``What we've learned is without some outside prod, the system won't work."

Potter and others who support stronger ethics laws have said the Senate is not as motivated to act on the issue as the House. House Democrats have said they won eight Republican-held seats in November because of ethics issues, more than half of the 15 they needed to win control of the chamber.

``It's a much tougher sell on the Senate side," said Gary Kalman, a lobbyist with the Washington-based U.S. Public Interest Research Group. ``The biggest disappointment is they are starting with the bill that passed the Senate last year. It passed at a very different time, a very different understanding of where the public was on the topic of corruption."

Freshman Democrats Back Senate Ethics Bill (CQ)

By Martin Kady II

Congressional Quarterly, January 9, 2007

Freshmen in the Senate are generally supposed to be seen and not heard.

But when it comes to the ethics and lobbying bill (S 1) on the Senate floor, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid seems willing to shine the spotlight on the new Democratic senators who gave the party its majority.

Reid stood on a dais Monday with eight of the nine new Democrats in the Senate to tout the ethics and lobbying bill meant to be a reaction to scandals of the past two years that focused popular anger against Republicans.

The news conference had a decidedly populist feel, as Sen. Bernie Sanders, an independent from Vermont who describes himself as a socialist, derided “lobbyists who represent the wealthy.” Freshman Democrat Amy Klobuchar of Minnesota, talked about how she drove to Washington in her family Saturn and brought her “Minnesota moral compass” to the Senate. And new Sen. Sherrod Brown, D-Ohio, complained that in the past, the “drug industry wrote the Medicare drug law.” Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo., tried to sum up the moment: “The fact that we are here [on the stage] speaks volumes” about the importance of lobbying and ethics.

Reid said the intent of bringing the freshmen to the stage was to showcase their support for “the most sweeping reforms since Watergate.”

The Senate meanwhile formally took up the ethics and lobbying bill, and there is widespread agreement for a crackdown on lobbyist-funded travel, gifts and meals.

Sens. Barack Obama, D-Ill., and Russ Feingold, D-Wis., are leading a charge to create an independent Office of Public Integrity with the authority to investigate ethics violations. Obama and Feingold will likely team up with Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., Joseph I. Lieberman, D-Conn., and Susan Collins, R-Maine, but they don’t necessarily have the support of the incoming freshmen Democrats.

Sen. Bob Casey, D-Pa., who beat Republican Rick Santorum on Nov. 7, said in a brief interview that he believes the Office of Public Integrity should be studied further by the Rules Committee in hearings. And freshman Sen. Jon Tester, D-Mont., who beat Republican Conrad Burns in the general election, said he thinks the Senate should police itself.

“I would rather see the enforcement done by an existing body,” Tester said. “But there needs to be teeth in enforcement.”

Without the support of these freshmen senators, the Office of Public Integrity is likely to be rejected. The idea failed on a 67-30 roll call last year, and at least 10 new senators would have to approve the idea for the amendment to have a chance.

“There is some institutional resistance,”Obama said. “But it’s very important that whatever we do, the laws will be enforced.”

Push For Lobby Database Fades (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

DOJ_NMG_0114194

Roll Call, January 9, 2007

Lobbyists bracing for tough new disclosure requirements from the Democrats' ethics reform drive can breathe a little easier.

Democratic leaders appear to be backing away from a provision included in ethics proposals last year that would require lobbyists to detail their contacts with Members of Congress.

The plan was met with stiff resistance from labor and nonprofit groups, which argue that the requirement would be onerous, impossible to apply consistently and could chill contact on politically sensitive topics.

Democrats, who last year pushed the measure as key to shedding light on lobbyists' role in the lawmaking process, are now suggesting the disclosure standard is too problematic.

"That is a provision that raised a lot of concerns with a lot of people," said Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.). "We haven't gotten through all of them. We're going to take another look at it."

House Democratic aides said that while the measure still could find its way into a reform bill the chamber is expected to take up later this month, it isn't topping anybody's priority list.

The new posture, in part, reflects the challenge for Democrats seeking to make good on last year's promises, made when they were out of power and trying to rally voters with an anti-corruption message.

The then-minority party grabbed for the high ground in the debate over ethics rules by proposing bold reform measures. Now that they are in power, Democrats are trying to pursue the strongest reforms possible while ensuring the overhaul doesn't cause unintended consequences or spur a filibuster in the Senate.

As Senators take up the bill this week, public interest groups are preparing for fights over grass-roots lobbying disclosure and reimbursement rates for lawmakers taking rides on corporate jets.

The House Democrats' package last year — offered as an alternative to a Republican version derided as pitiful by outside watchdog groups — would have required lobbyists to file quarterly reports listing every lawmaker they contacted over that period. The information would be available to the public in a searchable online database.

Feingold went a step further. His proposal narrowed the definition of a contact only to "oral communications," to exclude widely circulated letters and blast faxes that would have swamped lobbyists' reports. The Senator would have required lobbyists to report not only every lawmaker and executive branch official they contacted, but also the date that contact occurred.

Feingold left the provision out of a bill he introduced Monday with Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) as a high-water mark for the debate. Neither is it likely to appear in a substitute bill Senate Democratic leaders are negotiating with Republicans to strengthen the base measure, tagged S.1. "There was a recognition that too much specificity would be unhelpful and not workable," a Senate Democratic aide said of the proposal.

Ellen Miller, executive director of the Sunlight Foundation, a watchdog group that advocates for greater transparency, called the current reporting requirements "ridiculous."

"The legislation has to provide a requirement that lobbyists provide detailed reporting — what issues they are talking about and who they are meeting with," she said. "If somebody is a paid lobbyist, and their business is to contact Members of Congress and senior staff to talk about legislation, they know who they're talking to and what about."

Gary Kalman, of U.S. PIRG, pointed to the controversy surrounding Vice President Cheney's closed-door meetings in 2001 to formulate White House energy policy. "That's a prime example of how disclosure would have helped the public understand how policy is being made," he said.

But while most reform groups agree an ideal bill would include the disclosure requirement, they are training their fire elsewhere, on travel, earmark and enforcement measures.

Democracy 21, for example, left the reporting requirement off a checklist of reforms, including those addressing lobbyist disclosure, the group released last week as its agenda for the weeks ahead. "It's not among the things we're focused on," President Fred Wertheimer said.

Despite the lack of interest on Capitol Hill, the specter of the new rule has generated plenty of buzz on K Street, where lobbyists of all stripes have tried to throw cold water on the idea by arguing it would provide too much information — or not enough — to be meaningful.

DOJ_NMG_0114195

"While we haven't really spent a lot of time looking at this provision, it seems to us it would be reporting for reporting's sake," said Bill Miller, a top lobbyist for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Another lobbyist, who requested anonymity, suggested a better rule would require lawmakers to disclose their fundraising pitches to lobbyists.

"For me to go talk to a Member or staff about an issue — is that corrupting? I don't think so," he said. "The corruption comes from the fundraising, and that all emanates from the Members to the lobbyists, not the other way around."

A common complaint focused on the difficulty of defining a reportable contact, since lobbyists do so much of their work in unscheduled hallway conversations, or after hours, at fundraisers and restaurants. Lobbying law expert Tom Susman said in addition to potentially spawning hundreds of thousands of new reports, the requirement could generate untold opportunities for mischief while yielding little usable information.

Senators are expected to spend the next week and a half, at least, on the ethics rewrite, taking up the bill that the chamber passed last spring and debating amendments.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) held a press conference Monday with Obama and Feingold — the party's point-people on the ethics rewrite — and a group of freshman Democrats to renew his commitment to strengthening that package. "We're going to improve this bill," he said. "At the end of the day, the Senate is going to pass the most substantive reforms since Watergate."

Reid, Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and a bipartisan group of other leaders on the issue are expected to offer a substitute amendment as soon as today.

Bundles Of Influence (WP)

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

THE MOST pernicious aspect of the relationship between lawmakers and lobbyists doesn't involve skybox tickets or golf junkets. It centers on the role that lobbyists play in providing lawmakers with the campaign cash they need to survive. Lobbyists write their own checks, which must be disclosed. But lobbyists are even more valuable to politicians in their role as bundlers, tapping their clients and other networks to deliver campaign cash far in excess of what they are permitted to contribute personally. The master of the bundling game was President Bush, with his $200,000-and-up Rangers and his $100,000-and-up Pioneers.

Yet while you can be assured that lawmakers and their campaigns know who their big bundlers are, and that the bundlers keep careful track of how much they help bring in, the people aren't let in on the news. That information ought to be made public, especially regarding those who make their livings seeking to influence Congress.

A provision that would require such disclosure is part of a strong package of ethics and lobbying reforms introduced yesterday by Sens. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.). It would require lobbyists to disclose not only their contributions but also the donations they collect or arrange, along with checks going to presidential libraries, inaugural committees and lawmakers' charities. No single change would add more to public understanding of how money really operates in Washington.

Unfortunately, this change is not expected to be part of the reform package to be introduced today by the new Senate leadership, though its bill promises to be a significant improvement over the measure passed by the Senate last year. But Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) has promised to permit an open amendment process. "I'm here to show that the Democratic caucus's commitment to giving America a government as good and honest as the people it serves really does exist," Mr. Reid said at a news conference yesterday. We look forward to the vote on the bundling amendment, with the new leader providing strong support.

Senators Vow Ethics Reform, But Will Deeds Match Words? (USAT)

USA Today, January 9, 2007

Senate Democrats held a press conference Monday to declare themselves champions of ethics reform, just days after House members of both parties actually did something about ethics reform in that chamber.

DOJ_NMG_0114196

As the ethics debate unfolds this week in the Senate, never was the old adage — watch what we do, not what we say — more apt.

The Democrats, who now lead the Senate, are talking a good game but, then again, so did Republicans last January when they ran the Senate and muffed an opportunity to clean up Capitol Hill's sleazy ways.

Last year's failed attempt — which skirted the real problems and preserved senators' favorite perks — is the starting point for this year's try. Senate reformers say they've heard the anti-corruption message from voters and will make the reform package stronger. We'll see.

Here are three ways to judge whether senators are serious about changing:

Corporate jets.

For years, lawmakers have avoided the annoyances of commercial air travel by flying on elite corporate jets at cut-rate prices. Company lobbyists, who fly along, get priceless access. Last week, the House banned this egregious practice for its members.

Senators can't bring themselves to go that far. Democratic senators Russell Feingold of Wisconsin and Barack Obama of Illinois are pushing a measure that would allow the trips but at least require members to pay the full charter rates. But, as of Monday, it wasn't part of a bipartisan bill touted by Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. Reid has been a leading user of this perk, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, which compiles data on money in politics.

Earmarks. The senators' proclaimed reforms do little to rein in earmarks — the "spending with a Zip code" provisions stuck in bills to direct your tax dollars to politically favored recipients. There were almost 14,000 of them last year, according to a count by Citizens Against Government Waste.

The Senate bill requires senators who sponsor these often-secret expenditures to attach their names to them. That's hardly going to deter noted Senate pork-barrelers such as Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., and Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, who take great pride in their earmarks. A Stevens earmark was responsible for the infamous "bridge to nowhere." If senators were serious, they'd change rules that make earmarks virtually impossible to challenge and reduce.

Enforcement. Reforms will be only as good as the enforcement behind them. Neither the House nor Senate has embraced adding an independent panel to hold members to any new, stricter rules. The Senate rejected a similar idea last year. Monday, when Obama championed the independent panel, senators from both parties squealed in disapproval.

Many lawmakers much prefer the moribund ethics committees of their peers that self-police the House and Senate now. Last year, those panels sat by meekly while Congress wallowed in scandals.

After watching voters bounce ethically challenged incumbents in November and give Democrats the majority, the House made a start last week on its cleanup. And some of the Senate proposals — requiring more public disclosure, banning lobbyist-provided gifts and slowing the revolving door between Capitol Hill and lobbying firms — sound promising.

But promises can be fleeting. Just last month, House leaders promised five-day work weeks. This week, the second of the new Congress, House members took Monday off so some of them could attend the college football championship game.

How serious is Capitol Hill about reform?

Watch what they do, not what they say.

Campaign Photo Shows Bush With Abramoff (AP)

AP, January 9, 2007

A liberal watchdog group published on its Web site Monday a picture of President Bush and imprisoned lobbyist Jack Abramoff, the kind of photo the White House has refused to release.

The picture was taken at a campaign fundraiser in December 2003, according to the Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. It was taken by a private photo contractor who posted it on a Web site, but then was removed before it made it into distribution, said Melanie Sloan, CREW's director.

A previous photo of Bush and the disgraced lobbyist surfaced last year but Abramoff was in the background, slightly blurry.

"This is the one they didn't want you to see," Sloan said.

DOJ_NMG_0114197

Kim Eisler, Washingtonian magazine writer and a friend of Abramoff's, confirmed the photo's authenticity for The Associated Press. He said he had seen the picture at Abramoff's house.

In response to the photo being posted, a Bush spokeswoman, Emily Lawrimore, said: "The White House has previously acknowledged that they've met."

Abramoff helped raise more than $100,000 for Bush's 2004 re-election campaign. He is serving nearly six years in prison for a fraudulent Florida casino deal and is cooperating with the FBI in a bribery investigation involving members of Congress and the Bush administration.

Jersey Judge Up For Circuit Court Post (NSL)

By Robert Cohen, Star-ledger Washington Bureau

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), January 9, 2007

Hillman is expected to be Bush's nominee

WASHINGTON -- President Bush is expected to nominate Noel Hillman, a longtime prosecutor and a newly appointed federal judge in New Jersey, to an opening on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Reliable political sources said Hillman is currently undergoing a background investigation needed before he can be formally nominated to fill the federal appeals court seat vacated a year ago by U.S. Supreme Court Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

"It's pretty close. It's what the White House wants to do," said one knowledgeable source who asked not to be identified.

Hillman, 50, a former assistant U.S. attorney in New Jersey and most recently the lead Justice Department prosecutor in the Jack Abramoff Capitol Hill lobbying scandal, was just confirmed in June to the U.S. District Court in New Jersey.

He had the support then of New Jersey Democratic Sens. Robert Menendez and Frank Lautenberg, and will need their backing again to win a promotion to the prestigious appeals court.

"Sen. Menendez supported Noel Hillman's confirmation to the federal bench last year, but it would be presumptuous to comment on any future nomination until the president makes the choice," said Matt Miller, a spokesman for the senator.

Alex Formuzis, a spokesman for Lautenberg, declined comment on the possible Hillman nomination.

After Hillman was nominated for the federal trial court a year ago, Lautenberg said he was "well qualified" and described him and several other judicial nominees from the state as individuals who "understand the concerns and values of ordinary New Jerseyans."

Hillman, who sits in Camden, declined to comment.

Those familiar with the selection process said the White House decided against picking someone who was clearly ideologically conservative, settling on Hillman because of his qualifications, his integrity and the political calculation that he could easily win confirmation in a Senate now controlled by the Democrats.

Lautenberg and Menendez each could use the Senate rules to block consideration of a New Jersey judicial nominee they opposed.

Hillman also had the backing of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, his former boss at the U.S. Attorney's Office in New Jersey and a former federal appeals court judge.

Prior to going on the bench last year, Hillman was chief of the Justice Department's Office of Public Integrity in Washington.

In that role, he headed the Abramoff corruption probe and was involved in the prosecution of former Clinton administration National Security Adviser Sandy Berger, who was charged with stealing classified documents from the National Archives.

Hillman also played a role in the still-pending corruption investigation of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), and a number of other high-profile cases.

Before coming to the nation's capital in 2001, Hillman worked for nine years in the U.S. Attorney's Office in Newark. He served there under Chertoff and later became deputy chief of the office's criminal division.

While in New Jersey, he helped direct the campaign finance investigation involving former New Jersey Sen. Robert Torricelli (D-N.J.). That probe led to several prosecutions, including the conviction of David Chang, a wealthy New Jersey commodities broker who made illegal contributions to Torricelli.

Tenet Memoir Under Scrutiny (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

The CIA has submitted portions of a book manuscript by George J. Tenet to the White House for review amid speculation the former CIA director's memoirs will be critical of President Bush.

The book, "At the Center of the Storm," is still being analyzed by the CIA's Publications Review Board. It was during that process that portions of the manuscript were sent to the White House's National Security Council (NSC).

CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield said in response to questions from The Washington Times yesterday that the book portions were sent to the White House for "classification review purposes." He said the book was not submitted because of any negative comments about Mr. Bush, as an intelligence source told The Times. The spokesman declined to comment on the book's contents.

He said the sole criterion for review is whether a book contains classified information, which cannot be published legally by former CIA employees. In this role, the White House would have the power to delete information, or perhaps scenes, it views as classified.

The White House is getting an early peek at one of the most anticipated publishing events of the year because of the former spymaster's close involvement in virtually all of Mr. Bush's war decisions. Mr. Tenet was President Clinton's CIA director, and won reappointment from Mr. Bush.

Mr. Tenet formed a close professional relationship with Mr. Bush, including personally delivering the President's Daily Brief, a highly classified presentation on world events. He sat at the war Cabinet table as the president made decisions on invading Afghanistan and Iraq.

It was the Iraq invasion, coupled with the agency's earlier failure to stop the September 11 attacks, that earned the CIA years of criticism on Capitol Hill. The intelligence community's 2002 National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction (WMD) turned out to be largely wrong. Saddam Hussein no longer possessed stockpiles of usable chemical weapons and had not restarted his nuclear weapons program, as the NIE said.

As the invasion neared, Mr. Tenet told Mr. Bush it was a "slam dunk" that Saddam still possessed WMD, as reported by author Bob Woodward.

New York publishers have enjoyed brisk sales of books that bash Mr. Bush's handling of Iraq and the broader war on terrorism.

Amazon.com has packaged "At the Center of the Storm" with books highly critical of Mr. Bush, such as "Hubris: The Inside Story of Spin, Scandal, and the Selling of the Iraq War" by Michael Isikoff and David Corn.

Amazon.com markets books together that have similar subject matter, tone and perspective. It lists a publication date of Feb. 6, a date that cannot be met because the administration is still reviewing the book.

Mr. Mansfield said other former CIA directors have seen their books submitted to the White House to review subjects with which it is more familiar. The standard is always to check for classified information, he said.

He said Mr. Tenet, who resigned in 2004, first submitted a portion of his book in October and then more pages in November and December. He said Mr. Tenet "hasn't completely finished the book yet."

"Written submissions by former CIA employees are also referred to classification review specialists at other government agencies that may have equities with regard to classification issues," Mr. Mansfield said. "For example, that agency may be in a better position to know if a certain factor or piece of information is classified. Portions of Mr. Tenet's manuscript were referred to the classified review specialists at the NSC and that's in line with what we would do with other CIA employees."

Mr. Bush bestowed the Presidential Medal of Freedom on Mr. Tenet at a December 2004 White House ceremony. The president also honored two other key players in the Iraq war retired Gen. Tommy Franks and former Iraq administrator L. Paul Bremer. Mr. Bush hailed Mr. Tenet as "one of the first to recognize and address the threat to America from radical networks."

An Instant Raise For Federal Judges (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114199

The Senate passed legislation awarding federal judges their annual cost-of-living pay raise immediately rather than keeping their pay frozen along with that of lawmakers. Members of Congress voted last month to deny themselves their annual cost-of-living raise, though only through Feb. 15; Democrats had pledged during the midterm election campaign to freeze Congress's pay until the minimum wage is raised from $5.15 per hour. That move also had the effect of freezing the pay of federal judges, who had been scheduled to receive a 1.7 percent raise on Jan. 1.

Senate Restores Pay Raise For Judges (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, January 9, 2007

The Senate passed legislation awarding federal judges their annual cost-of-living pay raise immediately rather than keeping their pay frozen along with that of lawmakers.

U.S. lawmakers last month voted to deny themselves their annual cost-of-living pay raise — though only through Feb. 15 — keeping a promise made by Democrats in the campaign to freeze Congress' pay until raising the $5.15 per hour minimum wage.

That move also had the effect of freezing the pay of federal judges, slated to receive a 1.7 percent hike on Jan. 1. The Senate bill, which passed Monday by unanimous voice vote, lifts the COLA freeze for judges.

For Chief Justice John Roberts, who currently makes $212,100 per year, the bill would make up for about $400 in lost pay — the total of his scheduled raise between Jan. 1 and Feb. 15. He's slated to start receiving the rest of his approximately $3,600 pay hike on Feb. 16. The associate justices currently make $203,000 per year, while district judges make $165,200, the same amount as members of Congress.

The controversy is separate from Roberts' crusade for higher pay for federal judges, who are rapidly falling behind contemporaries such as law school deans and senior professors.

A spokeswoman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said that chamber would act on the measure shortly.

Poll: Americans Want Democrats, Not Bush, At Helm (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democrats have taken control of Congress this month amid a wave of good feeling from the public.

A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Friday-Sunday shows that Americans by nearly 2-to-1 want congressional Democrats, not President Bush, to have more influence over the direction the nation takes during the next year.

POLL RESULTS: Opinions on new Congress

Democratic congressional leaders get their highest rating since Bush took office in 2001; 59% of those surveyed say their policies would move the country in the right direction. Republican congressional leaders get their lowest rating: 35% endorse their approach.

"Looks like a honeymoon," says Gary Jacobson, a political scientist at the University of California at San Diego. "People can project all their hopes on to this new majority … but I wouldn't expect that kind of favorable image to keep up forever."

When Republicans took over Congress in January 1995, he notes, the early glow had faded by fall, when congressional Republicans had a budget showdown with then-President Clinton.

Half or more of those polled identify four issues as "extremely important" for the White House and Congress to deal with in 2007: Iraq, terrorism, government corruption and health care.

That's a shift from recent years. At the beginning of 2005 and 2006, terrorism and Iraq essentially were tied as the issues of highest importance to the most Americans. The war in Iraq has grown in importance each year and now has clearly moved into the top spot.

The focus on problems caused by Hurricane Katrina has ebbed. Last year 35% said Katrina issues were "extremely important;" now 28% feel that way.

And concern about corruption — not even on most lists two years ago — has risen to 52%.

The telephone survey of 1,004 adults nationwide has a margin of error of +/-3 percentage points.

DOJ_NMG_0114200

At least for the moment, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California can bask in a 2-to-1 favorable rating: 44% say they have a favorable impression of her, 22% an unfavorable one. When the GOP took over 12 years ago, incoming speaker Newt Gingrich was considerably more controversial. His favorable rating in December 1994 was 27%, his unfavorable 35%.

Americans express confidence that Congress will raise the minimum wage and that the economy will improve this year. They're pessimistic that political stability around the world will improve or violence in Iraq ease.

And will Bush and congressional Democrats be able to work more closely together? On that, Americans are split down the middle: 50%-50%.

Donnelly, Freshman Democrats Tell Pelosi To Stick To The Center (BLOOM)

By William Roberts

Bloomberg, January 9, 2007

Jan. 9 (Bloomberg) -- Representative Joe Donnelly, a freshman Democrat from Indiana, has a blunt message for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi: Stick to a ``middle-of-the-road agenda" or their party's control of Congress may last just two years.

If Pelosi ``goes too far one way or another, we're not coming back," Donnelly says. He sees his party's victory in the November elections as less an endorsement of its agenda than a rejection of Republican rule: ``People just got real tired of this bunch, and they fired them."

Donnelly's view reflects those of many of the 30 House Democrats elected in districts previously held by Republicans. Their fragile hold on their seats means they'll be pushing their new speaker, who represents heavily Democratic San Francisco, to limit confrontations with President George W. Bush and the Republicans over taxes, the war in Iraq, stem-cell research and abortion.

``Pelosi needs to show she can govern," says James Thurber, a professor at American University in Washington who specializes on Congress and the presidency. To pass her agenda, Pelosi must build coalitions with lawmakers, ``especially those from moderate districts" such as Donnelly's, he says.

Democrats hold 233 seats in the House, while Republicans have 202. In the Senate, Democrats hold only 51 of the 100 seats -- and one Democrat, Tim Johnson of South Dakota, remains hospitalized after brain surgery.

Medicare and Minimum Wage

Donnelly, 51, says he likes most of the legislation Pelosi is trying to push through in the first 100 hours of Democratic control of the House, including an increase in the minimum wage and a plan to allow Medicare to negotiate the cost of drugs with pharmaceutical companies, both scheduled for votes this week.

It may be more difficult for him to support other parts of the party's agenda. Donnelly, a practicing Catholic, opposes abortion and is also against federal funding stem-cell research that uses human embryos, which most Democrats back.

He also may clash with the Democratic leadership over how to handle the war in Iraq. While he describes the war as a ``disaster," he says he doesn't support the fixed timetable for withdrawal proposed by Pennsylvania Democrat John Murtha that Pelosi, 66, has endorsed. Instead, like Bush, he opposes any withdrawal until Iraq is ``stabilized."

``My goal is to help the president," he said in an interview. ``I am not going to rip him to shreds. If he does a better job, then our soldiers can be more successful, Iraq can be stabilized and our troops can come home."

First Test

A first test may come this week when Bush announces a change in strategy in Iraq, which may include a plan to send more troops. Last week, Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said in a letter to Bush that they oppose a troop increase.

Donnelly, a lawyer, represents an industrial district that backed Bush in the 2000 and 2004 presidential elections. He lost his first bid for Congress in 2004; in November, he defeated his opponent, two-term incumbent Chris Chocola, with 54 percent of the vote -- an upset Donnelly says was largely due to the national wave of voter dissatisfaction with Republican mismanagement of Congress and Bush's policies.

Next year's elections may be more difficult for Donnelly and other Democrats who won in Republican-leaning districts, says Michael Genovese, chairman of the Institute for Leadership Studies at Loyola Marymount University in Los Angeles. An attractive

DOJ_NMG_0114201

Republican presidential candidate in 2008 might draw back some of the Republican voters who switched in 2006, he says: ``That's what the Democrats fear and the Republicans hope."

Preparing for 2008

Democratic leaders have already taken steps to help lawmakers from these districts prepare for 2008. Almost immediately after the Nov. 7 elections -- and before the freshmen lawmakers had even arrived in Washington -- the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee established a re- election program for new members. The program includes coaching on fund-raising and constituent outreach, says the DCCC's chairman, Representative Chris Van Hollen of Maryland.

``We fully recognize that in districts where Republican presidential candidates have won majorities in the past, the Republicans will try to target our members," Van Hollen says.

Tom Gallagher, a senior managing director at the International Strategy & Investment Group Inc. in Washington, says 60 House Democrats represent districts carried by Bush in 2004, while only eight Republicans represent districts carried by Massachusetts Senator John Kerry, the Democratic presidential nominee.

High-Profile Committees

To increase their re-election chances, some freshmen have been given seats on high-profile committees, positions that increase a lawmaker's appeal to donors.

Donnelly, for example, will serve on the Financial Services Committee, which regulates commercial banks, insurance companies and securities and investment firms. In the 2006 election cycle, committee members received an average of about $180,000 in campaign contributions from the financial-services industry, according to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics, a Washington-based group that tracks campaign giving.

Watching Pelosi take the Speaker's gavel on Thursday was a jubilant moment for Donnelly. Sitting with his fellow freshmen congressmen in the chamber, Donnelly noticed actor Richard Gere and singer Carole King sitting together in the gallery and waved to his son Joe Jr., also in the gallery, to point them out.

Donnelly cast his first vote on Jan. 4 to elect Pelosi as House speaker. He then supported rules changes to ban gifts from lobbyists and identify lawmakers who originate requests for pet spending projects, known as ``earmarks."

With the House in session only two days, Donnelly has a 100 percent record of voting with his party. Still, the lawmaker says, he is determined to try to find common ground with Republicans.

Last week, he signed up with the ``Blue Dog" Democrats, a group of 44 self-described conservative lawmakers who support balanced budgets and less business regulation and are open to accommodation with moderate Republicans.

``I want to represent Democrats and Republicans," he says. ``I am going to hit the ball down the middle."

Industry Measures Up Dems, Picks Its Battles (HILL)

By Jessica Holzer

The Hill, January 9, 2007

Major business groups have revamped their legislative wish lists, resurrecting some longstanding but moribund items and backing off of others, in the hopes of scoring some victories in a Democratic-controlled Congress.

At this time last year, boosting domestic energy supply was a top priority for both the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers (NAM). Though they haven't abandoned that goal, the industry groups are now trumpeting their support for expanded research into alternative fuels and clean-energy technologies, a popular cause among Democrats.

Meanwhile, they've shifted the modernization of the transportation system, long a concern of the business community, to center stage. Last week, the Chamber announced the launch of a new initiative to promote investment in the nation's highways, rail network, ports and waterways.

It is characterizing that initiative, as well as a plan to pour money into energy infrastructure, as government-backed jobs programs in a clear effort to appeal to Democrats.

"With the right kind of rebuilding program, not just in transportation but in energy and power as well, we could employ a massive number of Americans for a long, long time," said Thomas J. Donohue, the president of the Chamber, at a press briefing on Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0114202

A deal on immigration that includes a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for law-abiding aliens is perhaps the most feasible business goal, thanks to the informal agreement of Democrats, several labor unions and the White House on the issue.

On the defensive side, the business lobby seems intent on picking its battles, to judge by its capitulation on minimum-wage legislation, which is expected to pass the House this week.

Meanwhile, Donohue vowed to fend off any attempt by Congress to change the law to make it easier for workers to form unions. Most Democrats and some labor-friendly Republicans back the legislation, but industry groups are vowing to defeat it.

"They're going to have a major fight on their hands," Donohue said.

A week after the election, America's Health Insurance Plans (AHIP) announced a proposal to expand access to health insurance coverage to every American — an idea that is touted by most Democrats. For years, AHIP has engaged in many policy battles with Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.), the new Ways and Means health subcommittee chairman.

AHIP, whose PAC has significantly favored Republicans in recent elections, says it is planning to work with all members of Congress on its new proposal.

Where they are stymied in Congress, business interests are likely to turn to the executive branch to accomplish their goals. While hopes still run high among corporate lobbyists for legislation that follows on the heels of last year's bill that opened up acreage in the Gulf of Mexico for oil and gas drilling, they see the Minerals Management Service (MMS) as another route to achieve that goal.

"They could as well begin to open up other portions of the Gulf and follow up what Congress enacted last year," said Bruce Josten, the executive vice president of the Chamber, which has filed a comment to the MMS on its plans to expand oil and gas exploration on federal lands.

The Chamber already spends 60 percent of its efforts on the regulatory agencies, estimates William Kovacs, who heads up lobbying on environmental, energy and other issues at the association. "The real work is done by the regulatory agencies," he says, noting that some 192,000 regulations are overseen by the executive branch.

Several business lobbyists denied they would change tack to navigate a more hostile environment in Washington, insisting their agenda does not shift with the political winds.

"The good news for us is that we don't have to change the game plan. We don't lick our finger and stick it up in the air and see what our policy will be," said Charles Drevna, a lobbyist at the National Petrochemical & Refiners Association.

Many are pinning their hopes on the Democratic leadership working across the aisle to achieve legislative accomplishments.

"Those that govern most successfully govern from the center," said Jay Timmons, NAM's senior vice president for government relations.

"Of course, we would have the backstop of the legislative branch," he added.

Military Seeks Oil Savings (WSJ)

By Masood Farivar

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

Rising Demand, Supply Risks Spur Conservation Move

Recent energy-market disruptions have added urgency to the U.S. military's efforts to curb its use of oil and other fuels. But the effort faces considerable obstacles, including the difficulty in figuring out how much it spends on energy to begin with.

In the year ended Sept. 30, the Defense Department spent, by its estimate, $13 billion on fuel amounting to 134 million barrels of oil for the year, up from 107 million barrels of oil in 2000. The wars in Afghanistan and Iraq led to a surge in fuel use in that period, according to the Defense Energy Support Center, a government agency that buys fuel from private-sector companies and supplies it to the armed forces.

The most recent figure is more than the entire nation of Sweden consumed in 2005. (Still, it adds up to less than 2% of daily U.S. consumption.)

DOJ_NMG_0114203

As energy prices have surged and volatility has increased in important oil-producing regions, the military is redoubling efforts to rein in consumption through conservation, increased fuel-efficiency measures and greater use of alternative energy. The effort picked up in earnest following the 2005 Atlantic Ocean hurricanes, which devastated the Gulf Coast, lifted prices to records and highlighted the vulnerability of supplies.

"Katrina was a wake-up call," says Michael Aimone, assistant deputy chief of staff of the Air Force who oversees the force's energy-conservation efforts.

The Pentagon is planning to spend more than $2 billion in the next five years on energy initiatives, which could help spur development of energy sources for use in other sectors. "The contribution [the military's efforts] will make will be in leadership rather than actual conservation," said Rep. Roscoe Bartlett, a Maryland Republican, who last year formed a bipartisan panel called the Defense Energy Working Group to study the issue.

James Woolsey, a former Central Intelligence Agency director who heads the policy panel of one of two Pentagon energy task forces, said the drive to curb energy use is being fueled less by high prices than an increasing awareness about the "vulnerability and insecurity of supplies" world-wide.

The effect of the Pentagon's interest in conservation and alternative energy can be seen from military bases and hangers to the battlefields of Iraq and Afghanistan. In late July, Marine Corps Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, commander of U.S. forces in Iraq's insurgent al-Anbar province, asked for a shipment of mobile solar panels and wind turbines to supplement gas-guzzling generators at bases under his command.

Cutting "the military's dependence on fuel for power generation could reduce the number of road-bound convoys" and U.S. casualties resulting from insurgent attacks on U.S. supply convoys, Gen. Zilmer wrote in a memo. The Army's Rapid Equipping Force, the unit responsible for processing such requests, has contracted SkyBuilt Power of Arlington, Va., to build four hybrid power stations for delivery this spring.

So far, the impact of the military's efforts has been modest. In the past 20 years, it has cut energy use at facilities 28%. Still, oil accounts for roughly 75% of total energy use. The military's focus has been on saving power -- also a laudable goal, critics say, but not an answer to dependence on oil.

Also, it isn't clear how much energy the military consumes and how much it pays. The 134 million-barrel figure for fuel use is the government's official estimate, as is the dollar amount. Some inside and outside the military think actual consumption is higher partly because the figure doesn't include a lot of unpaid oil and oil contracted to U.S. bases.

"I've looked at all the information that is publicly available and I haven't seen any single number," said Sohbet Karbuz, a former official at the International Energy Agency, the industrialized world's energy watchdog, and an expert on military energy use. "We don't know where much of the oil comes from and how much it exactly costs. If you don't know the number how do you calculate fuel efficiency?"

According to Mr. Karbuz, the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq have increased military fuel use by as much as 56,000 barrels a day. In addition, the military's improved ability to deploy troops to battlefields comes at the cost of increased fuel use: today, more than half of the fuel consumed in combat theaters is used not by front-line soldiers but by supply convoys of the type that worried Gen. Zilmer. Mr. Karbuz estimates the military uses fuel at twice the rate it did in the first Persian Gulf War and four times the rate it did in the Second World War.

The Air Force, which accounts for 53% of military fuel use, has stepped up use of biodiesel fuel -- where vegetable oils are substituted for petroleum -- at bases in the U.S. In December it conducted a test flight of its B-52 strategic bomber using a blend of synthetic fuel and jet fuel on all eight engines and is planning further test flights this year. At a cost of $23 per gallon compared with $2 to $3 per gallon for jet fuel, however, that option isn't considered viable. The B-52 uses 48,000 gallons of fuel in a single mission.

The Air Force also has adopted measures from commercial airliners to save fuel on its three most fuel-guzzling aircraft. It better plans the amount of fuel onboard to reduce weight, gets overflight clearance from foreign governments to avoid circuitous routes, and more efficiently schedules midair refueling missions.

DOJ_NMG_0114204

Mr. Aimone of the Air Force says that the service wants to promote a "culture of conservation" and hopes to build on its success on the facilities side to improve fuel efficiency in operations. He says the Air Force's goal is to reduce fuel use by 10% over the next five years, though "it is too soon to tell" the impact of current efforts.

Other services are exploring similar long-term projects designed to reduce the military's dependence on oil. The Army is studying designs to replace the Humvee with 30% to 40% lighter, more fuel-efficient models. The Navy is studying alternate propulsion systems as well as proposals for an all-nuclear Navy.

Today, almost 9% of the electricity used by military facilities comes from renewable energy sources, and the Pentagon plans to raise that to 25% by 2025. The Air Force has installed modern lighting and replaced Second World War-era buildings with better-insulated structures. Four Air Force bases rely entirely on renewable energy for power, while several others use a combination of solar, wind and land gas production for power.

Similar efforts have been under way at other services, with the Navy installing wind turbines at several overseas bases, including four at Guantanamo Bay in 2005 to supply as much as 25% of the base's electricity needs and cut diesel use by more than 600,000 gallons a year. The Army is developing similar systems for bases in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Critics say these efforts aren't enough. The military has long taken access to fuel for granted, but in a world of dwindling and endangered supplies, "I don't think politically it is possible for the military to stay ahead of the line," said Byron King, a former Navy pilot and geologist who writes frequently on the subject.

Write to Masood Farivar at masood.farivar@dowjones.com1

White House Honors Cultural Institutions (AP)

By Natasha T. Metzler

AP, January 9, 2007

The White House honored six cultural institutions Monday for their creativity and public service in what first lady Laura Bush described as one of her favorite events.

Mrs. Bush and Anne-Imelda Radice, director of the federal Institute of Museum and Library Services, recognized innovative outreach programs at three public libraries, a museum, a zoo and an aquarium.

"At every library and museum across our country we feel at home, thanks to the librarians and the curators who are eager to serve their communities," Mrs. Bush said, later adding "your reach is so much farther than you'll ever, ever know."

Radice thanked the first lady for her commitment to libraries and museums and said her work is "more than symbolic, or merely ceremonial."

"Whether it's a train conductor hauling art masterpieces across the United States, the zookeeper introducing children to a red-foot tortoise, or that friendly librarian asking, 'may I help you?' the people behind each of today's winning institutions have made their organizations indispensable to the communities they serve," the first lady said.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

Ford postmark

Hats off to Rep. Mark Udall, Colorado Democrat, for beating to the punch congressmen from Michigan, Virginiaand California -- all states where Gerald R. Ford lived during his illustrious career -- by introducing legislation to name the post office in Vail after the 38th president.

"I believe this legislation is appropriate as another means of honoring the legacy of President Ford, in large part because of his special connection to Colorado and the Vail Valley," Mr. Udall says.

Mr. Ford and his family first visited Vail in 1968 to ski and celebrate Christmas. They later bought a home there, dubbed the "Western White House" after he became president.

Utmost sacrifice

We'd written recently about the confusion surrounding two congressmen now serving on Capitol Hill named "Mike Rogers." Both are Republicans to boot.

DOJ_NMG_0114205

Rep. Mike D. Rogers represents Alabama, whereas Rep. Mike Rogers hails from Michigan.

Now we learn that the latter Mr. Rogers was absent from the formal swearing-in ceremony in the House last week. What could have been more important?

"I was unavoidably detained," he later explained to the speaker, "while paying my respects to a fallen soldier from my district at his funeral in Arlington National Cemetery."

Mr. Rogers took his oath upon his return to the U.S. Capitol.

Safe 'bunt'

They own the majority in the 110th Congress, but already Democrats and their leader, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, have gone on the defensive with an unprecedented threat to block any proposal by President Bush to send additional U.S. troops to Iraq.

Not that Republican Rep. Jack Kingston of Georgia was impressed with their agenda.

"The Democrats were getting a lot of good credit for what I would say is kind of a 'golden oldies' agenda, bringing out no original ideas: minimum wage, stem cells and student loans," he opined during recent floor debate.

"And I understand those are safe things. But it is kind of like starting out the World Series by bunting instead of trying to get on base with real serious hits. The reason why I submit that criticism is there is nothing in your agenda about immigration reform, Social Security reform, Medicare reform, the heavy-lifting ideas of entitlement."

... Quidditch, by golly

For several years, Inside the Beltway has observed the mysterious bike-riding habits of President Bush.

Members of the White House press corps, who regularly accompany the president deep into the woods of suburban Maryland or else onto the dusty terrain of his Texas ranch, seldom if ever actually see Mr. Bush atop a bicycle.

The big question is why? Could something secretive or covert be taking place that doesn't involve two wheels?

For instance, did Mr. Bush in 2004 really fall off of a bicycle and cut his chin, upper lip, nose, both knees and right hand (when his Democratic opponent, Sen. John Kerry, inquired: "Did the training wheels fall off?"), or did something more unusual cause his injuries?

Was the president actually "enjoying" a bike ride so much during a major terrorist scare in Washington that the Secret Service, or so we were told, didn't bother to tell him that his own wife, Laura, and Vice President Dick Cheney had been rushed into a secure bunker?

And how about the Sunday morning not long ago when Mr. Bush's church attire was unusually "bulky"? Immediately after the sermon, the president in the space of seconds had shed his suit of clothes and appeared in a brightly colored outfit that the White House insisted was "bike-riding gear."

'I've never seen a man who hasn't been drinking get out of a suit faster," noted Julie Mason of the Houston Chronicle.

Now, we learn of yet another bizarre twist involving a presidential biking trek this past weekend. Mr. Bush had been participating in an "extended" intelligence briefing in the Oval Office with his national security team, when suddenly a half-dozen young men and women showed up dressed in the same colorful gear worn by Mr. Bush.

The entire group, including the president, immediately climbed into several heavily protected vehicles and sped off. But wait, there's more, discovered in the official White House pool report:

"Four of them carried rakes and brooms along with their riding gear; why they had the rakes and brooms with them was unclear."

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

Your Questions Answered About Gilbert Arenas's 25th Birthday Party

So Gilbert Arenas celebrated his 25th birthday with approximately 7,500 of his closest friends at Love nightclub. Why?

DOJ_NMG_0114206

Good question. The offbeat Wizards star has never been a big partyer. Yet in this season of his breakout success on the court, Arenas has expressed some hunger to emerge as a crossover superstar whose name extends beyond D.C. and the NBA. On his blog he describes his plan for "The Takeover": "This is the time where, you know, me as a person is gonna get bigger."

How did Gil make his entrance?

Around 12:30 a.m., he drove his Lamborghini convertible into the concert tent and right up to the stage.

Who was there?

In addition to host Diddy and performers Busta Rhymes, Lil Wayne, The Game and T.I. (who tried his hand at bartending in the VIP lounge), guests included rappers Doug E. Fresh and Fabolous (who Saturday dropped by Legal Seafoods with a bodyguard and six pals), Redskins Jason Campbell and Clinton Portis, the Eagles' Donovan McNabb, the Caps' Alexander Ovechkin, starlet Megan Good, go-go star/actor Big G, and scads of Wizards (Etan Thomas, Antawn Jamison, Jarvis Hayes and Caron Butler sporting a black beanie).

We saw the pics of the Arenas Express card in Jamie Foxx's name. Was he there?

No.

Who most rocked the house?

Experts agree that T.I. tore the place up. Though the crowd also went nuts for Lil Wayne's "The Block Is Hot."

How much did the reserved tables cost?

Most were about $4,000, though tables near T.I. fetched as much as $16K.

OMG!!! Were those painted naked ladies really naked? We're told they may have been wearing some kind of body stocking. But they sure looked naked.

How late did Gilbert stay?

Until the end, which was sometime after 4 a.m. If you didn't get much face time with the birthday boy, it's probably because he was hanging out in the fourth-floor VIP lounge.A Chance to Be in Good Standing With the Mayor

Okay, maybe new D.C. Mayor Adrian Fenty deserved a standing ovation -- but not for four hours!

Inaugural balls are notoriously bad parties, and Saturday's bash for Fenty was plagued by rookie mistakes that took the fest out of the festivities. The line snaked around the block as party guests (more than 15,000 tickets were distributed for the free celebration) spent an hour or more waiting to get through the security checkpoints. Once inside the Washington Convention Center, they discovered that all the tables and chairs had been snapped up five minutes after the party started at 7 p.m. "Black tie optional" meant that all those strappy high heels had no place to rest, leaving plenty of folks plenty sore. (And let's not even talk about the cash bar.)

"We had approximately 1,500 chairs," said Fenty spokeswoman Mafara Hobson. "The thought process behind that was more chairs would mean less room for people. The whole point is that this was an event for the whole city." The ballroom, she said, was designed with exhibits and cocktail tables to "encourage mingling."

But the largest mayoral ball in D.C. history ended up being another crowded, not-that-much-fun, over-hyped letdown. If we've told you once, we've told you a thousand times: If you insist on going to an inaugural ball, wear sneakers.

HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

? Jenna and Barbara Bush on the town! After months on the road, the first daughters made a rare joint appearance in D.C. this weekend: Barbara at Smith Point Friday night with several pals from New York, and both twins at Town Hall on Saturday night with a well-heeled entourage -- crushed-velvet sport coats for the men, trendy leggings, silk dresses and platform heels for the women. Both daughters spent the Christmas holidays with the first family; alas, Barbara is headed back to New York and her job at the Cooper-Hewitt museum; Jenna is returning to her UNICEF gig in Central America.

? Michael Hayden at the International Spy Museum Saturday afternoon. The CIA director, dressed in navy corduroy pants and a light blue long-sleeved polo shirt, toured the museum with a dozen family members and friends.

? Cedric the Entertainer at the Chi Cha Lounge Friday night. The comedian and three friends arrived in a white stretch, and he turned over both his ID and hat (club policy) to the doorman who didn't recognize him. Trust us -- he's over 21!LOVE, ETC.

? Dating: Jason Campbell and Mercedes Lindsay. The Redskins quarterback and the newly crowned Miss District of Columbia USA 2007 were one of the cutest couples at the mayor's inaugural bash. That's one completed pass in the off-season.

DOJ_NMG_0114207

* * *

"Shiloh seemed so privileged from the moment she was born. I have less inclination to feel for her. . . . I have to make sure I don't ignore her needs, just because I think the others are more vulnerable."

PIN Money (WSJ)

By Robert C. Pozen

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

Democrats have consistently refused to discuss any Social Security reform requiring a carve-out account: where workers can invest a portion of the 12.4% of their payroll taxes. Recently, Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson has shown a readiness to explore bipartisan approaches to Social Security reform without any prerequisites. A bipartisan plan for reform can be built on a modified version of progressive indexing, without carve-out accounts in Social Security but with enhancements of existing retirement accounts.

Progressive indexing (PIN) preserves the current schedule of Social Security benefits for the lowest 30% of wage earners, as well as for already retired-workers and those who will retire before 2012. By contrast, PIN slows the growth of initial Social Security benefits for the top wage earners to the annual increase in consumer prices (price indexing), as opposed to the annual increase in wages (wage indexing). For all those workers in between, PIN provides for lower benefits than the current schedule, but benefits that grow faster than increases in consumer prices through a blend of price and wage indexing. In total, PIN reduces the present value of the 75-year deficit of Social Security by 70%, close to $4 trillion to approximately $1.2 trillion.

A progressive approach to Social Security is justified because federal taxes forgone from 401(k)s and IRAs exceed $50 billion per year -- which primarily benefit high and middle earners. Yet PIN should be modified to deal with four major criticisms. First, because Social Security benefits are growing faster for lower-wage workers than middle- and higher-wage workers, the benefits for all workers would become roughly the same at some date in the next century. This criticism can easily be rebutted by stopping PIN after 75 years, when there will still be substantial benefit differences between wage groups.

Second, while wages have historically grown over 1% faster per year than prices, critics have pointed out this relationship could possibly reverse at some point over the next 75 years. In this unlikely event, the initial Social Security benefits for high earners would grow faster than those of low earners under PIN as originally designed. To avoid this anomaly, initial Social Security benefits should be indexed to wage growth for all workers if, during the 30 years prior to their retirement, prices rose faster than wages.

Third, the original form of PIN did not address the complex issues involved with Social Security benefits for the disabled. Additional savings to hold harmless the disabled could be generated by combining PIN with longevity indexing after 2027. Under longevity indexing, the benefit schedule at normal retirement age (NRA) would be adjusted to keep constant (relative to the average wage level) the estimated lifetime benefits from Social Security in response to increasing life expectancy -- without changing the NRA itself. For example, if life expectancy rises to 88 from 87 between 2027 and 2039, the benefit schedule for Social Security under longevity indexing would be the same (in wage-indexed dollars) for a worker retiring at age 68 in 2039, as for someone retiring at age 67 in 2027 (with the same average career earning). This combination would generate enough savings not only to preserve current Social Security benefits for the disabled, but also to improve the benefit schedule for median wage workers under PIN -- thus, dealing with the fourth major criticism of PIN.

Since a combination of PIN and longevity indexing would not include a carve-out account, this would present a political challenge to Republicans. One response could be an expansion of other types of private accounts for retirement. Most workers earning more than $120,000 per year do not meet the eligibility requirements for the Roth Individual Retirement Account (IRA) -- which allows investment earnings from after-tax contributions to be excluded permanently from federal income taxes. If all income limits were taken off the Roth IRA, higher wage workers would be eligible for its tax advantages. This would promote retirement savings by these higher earners, whose Social Security benefits would be growing at the slowest rate under PIN.

Congress could also expand the existing savers credit for retirement plan contributions by low-income households. That nonrefundable credit is limited to joint filers with adjusted gross annual income of $50,000 or less. However, the credit is poorly designed because most families below that income level do not pay income taxes. Congress could make the credit partially refundable to help those low-wage workers whose Social Security benefits will grow a little slower under PIN -- between $35,000 and $50,000 in annual earnings.

DOJ_NMG_0114208

Some Democrats would support the combination of PIN and longevity indexing because it substantially improves the solvency and fairness of Social Security without raising taxes. Nevertheless, other Democrats may object to this combination because it relies too heavily on benefit changes rather than revenue increases. Although President Bush has rejected any increase in the 12.4% rate for the Social Security tax, he has reserved judgment on increasing the maximum wages (not income) subject to Social Security taxes. In 2012, when most Social Security reforms start to be implemented, this maximum would be approximately $113,000 per year. For these reasons, some commentators have proposed raising the maximum wage base subject to the Social Security tax to $150,000 or $170,000 per year. However, this would be an unfair and huge tax increase for those with annual earnings in the $170,000 range. They would be subject to an additional 12.4% tax on all or almost all of the earnings; by contrast, those earning $2 million or more annually would be subject to the 12.4% tax on a tenth or less of their earnings.

A better approach would be a 2% surcharge, 1% from the employee and 1% from the employer, on all earnings above the maximum wage base (like the Medicare tax). In 2012, for example, that would mean 12.4% on the first $113,000 in earnings and 2% on all earnings above that amount. Such a 2% surcharge would close approximately 18% of the current long-term deficit of Social Security if no incremental benefits were associated with the surtax. The revenues from the surcharge could be applied to improve the benefit schedule for median-wage workers under PIN. However, a 2% surcharge on high-wage workers without any incremental benefits would violate the fundamental principle of Social Security as a social insurance program. In the long run, this could undermine political support among high earners for the program -- a major concern among Democrats. One alternative would be to provide a modest stream of benefits for every $1,000 in surcharge paid by the employee. But even a modest stream will result in a very large and unseemly annual benefit from Social Security for multimillionaires.

A better alternative would be to devote the 1% from the employer to restore the solvency of Social Security and to allow all of the 1% from the employee to be contributed to a Roth IRA (or half of the 1% over $1 million per year). This alternative would link the surcharge to additional retirement benefits and permit a further improvement in PIN's benefit schedule for median workers. It would also make the surcharge more palatable to Republicans.

In short, there are a number of workable plans to reform Social Security with enhanced retirement accounts if both political parties are willing to compromise.

Common Sense On The Census (NYT)

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

Last November, the director of the Census Bureau, C. Louis Kincannon, and the deputy director, Hermann Habermann, abruptly decided to quit, acknowledging tensions with their bosses in the Bush administration but giving no other details. Both men are statisticians who had served in their positions since 2002 and, before that, had decades of experience as civil servants.

The leadership problems — on top of severe budget cuts — threaten to throw the preparations for the 2010 census into disarray. At stake is the accuracy of the next count and, with it, the legitimacy of important decisions that are rooted in the census, including the drawing of electoral districts and the allocation of government resources.

Various steps must be taken now to ensure an accurate count, starting with an investigation by the committees that oversee the bureau — Oversight and Government Reform in the House, and Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs in the Senate — into why the men quit. This will clear up a distracting mystery and is necessary to ensure that the new directors do not confront the same obstacles.

Equally important, the appropriations committees in the House and Senate must quickly act to restore the roughly $50 million cut by the previous Congress from President Bush's 2007 budget request for the bureau. Otherwise, the agency may have to forgo using hand-held computers for the next census, relying instead on paper and pencil, which is less accurate and would probably be more expensive in the long run because of its inefficiency.

DOJ_NMG_0114209

An alternative and equally unacceptable way to cut costs would be to delay the economic census, which is currently conducted every five years and which serves as the benchmark for dozens of other government surveys, including reports on inflation, construction activity and retail sales.

Carlos Gutierrez, the secretary of commerce, should be pounding the tables in Congress to get this money; failure to do so would suggest that the administration is trying to undermine the census. For his part, Mr. Bush must swiftly nominate a new director — a nonpartisan, professional statistician with solid management experience.

Mr. Kincannon has graciously agreed to remain until his replacement is confirmed, but moving forward requires a new director. For the deputy director position, administration officials must resist any temptation to make a political appointment and should choose instead a top-notch statistician from the bureau's career ranks.

OTHER NEWS:

Health-care Spending Rose At Twice The Rate Of Inflation In '05 (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, January 9, 2007

Spending on health care rose at twice the rate of general inflation in 2005, with consumers facing increased deductibles and co-pays finding themselves spending more of their own money, government researchers said in a report out Tuesday.

Spending went up 6.9%, with the total amount spent by individuals, insurers and the government on health care hitting almost $2 trillion, or $6,697 per person. That's the slowest rate since 1999, when spending rose 6.2%.

Hospital spending continued to be a main factor in spending growth, growing at nearly 8%, with increases in both in-hospital care and out-patient services.

A slower rate of growth in spending was attributed to a drop in spending on prescription drugs, mainly from a growing use of lower-cost generics and the safety-related withdrawal from the market of some expensive pain relievers such as Vioxx, government economists say in their annual report, published Tuesday in the journal Health Affairs.

"This might be an encouraging sign for the individuals, businesses and governments that finance health care; however, it is unclear whether this … is temporary or indicative of a long-term trend," says the report by the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, Office of the Actuary.

Economist Paul Ginsburg of the Center for Studying Health System Change, who did not work on the report, says the growing economy could lead to higher spending in the coming years.

"We have a strong growth in jobs and sharp pay increases," says Ginsburg. "These are the conditions that will lead to a cyclically higher rate of spending, say in '08 or '09."

Health insurance premium rates went up by 6.6% in 2005, continuing a moderating trend seen in the past couple of years and well below the double-digit increases seen in the late 1990s and early 2000s.

Employers continued to shift some of those costs to workers by adding deductibles, co-payments or eliminating coverage for specific treatments or certain drugs.

Those moves helped push so-called out of pocket spending up, by 5.8%, an increase over the 5% reported in 2004. At the same time, increases in overall premiums outpaced that growth, the report says, meaning out of pocket costs for workers as a share of total spending fell.

The report also found:

• Spending on prescription drugs increased 5.8%, to $200.7 billion, well down from the peak increase of 18.2% noted in 1999. Reasons included slower growth in spending by state Medicaid programs, which had instituted cost-control programs, and increased use of generic drugs and the withdrawal of Vioxx and Bextra over safety concerns.

• Overall drug prices rose by 3.5%, about the same rate as in 2004, although brand-name drugs prices rose 6%.

•Hospital spending continued as the largest piece of the health spending pie, accounting for 31% of all money spent on medical care. Spending on hospital rose nearly 8%,

DOJ_NMG_0114210

Healthcare Spending Eases Off (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON — Government figures released today show that Americans may be getting a respite from the torrid pace of increases in healthcare spending, but experts cautioned that it was too soon for a national sigh of relief.

The data show that in 2005, spending on healthcare grew 6.9%. That was the smallest rate of increase since 1999, and marked the third straight year in which the pace had moderated. In 2004, for example, spending grew by 7.2%. Because of the time required to collect and analyze data, the 2005 numbers are the latest to be released.

Although the rate of increase declined, healthcare spending in 2005 still grew faster than wages, inflation and the economy as a whole. And with employers continuing to shift more of the cost of job-based medical insurance to workers, the pressure on individuals and families remained high.

"It would be a disaster if people thought these [spending] numbers mean the crisis is over," said Henry Simmons, president of the National Coalition on Health Care, which advocates for covering the uninsured. "Even if costs are only going up at 6.9%, that is still two or three times the rate of growth in take-home pay. It is still unsustainable."

Said economist Joseph Minarik, "I suspect that what we're seeing is something like we observed in the early 1990s, that as costs go up some resistance is being thrown in their path. But the resistance is not a fundamental change, and the fundamentals in the system will continue to push costs higher."

Minarik is a senior vice president of the Committee for Economic Development, a group of chief executives that tries to influence public policy on major issues.

Nationwide, health spending reached nearly $2 trillion, accounting for 16% of all economic activity and averaging $6,697 for every man, woman and child, according to the figures released by the Department of Health and Human Services and published in the journal Health Affairs.

A slowdown in spending on prescription drugs was the main reason for the improvement in 2005, the government report found. Analysts credited a continuing shift to generic medications, as well as aggressive cost-control efforts by state Medicaid programs. The report did not factor in the new Medicare prescription benefit, not yet in effect in 2005.

Government experts also found another glimmer of hope in an arcane but important statistic that measures the amount of spending on the sickest people. Traditionally 5% of patients — the most frail — have accounted for more than half of all spending in any given year.

But in 2003, the share of spending on these very ill patients dipped to 49%, suggesting that doctors are reducing costly hospitalizations through better management of chronic diseases such as diabetes.

"It's nice that overall health costs have slowed down a little," said Richard Foster, Medicare's chief number cruncher. "It's nice that the economy is doing well. It's a happy occurrence. [But] it's not something we can expect to happen all the time."

The release of the numbers, an annual snapshot of the healthcare system, coincides with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's call for broad healthcare reforms in California. He is the second GOP governor to engage in a major effort to cover the uninsured and rein in costs. Last year, then-Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney pushed a plan through in his state that requires all residents to get coverage.

Nationally, the number of uninsured stands at about 47 million, as government programs have failed to keep up with the continued erosion of employer-sponsored coverage. The share of employees covered on the job fell from 81% in 2001 to 77% in 2005.

The federal cost report also came on the heels of a study that found the United States spends far more on healthcare than some of its closest economic competitors in the global marketplace. The U.S. spent more than 2 1/2 times as much as Japan per person, and a little less than twice as much as Germany. Both those countries cover all residents. The analysis, for the Kaiser Family Foundation, used data from 2003, but experts said the pattern has not changed.

"The Europeans are worried that with their current rate of growth, they are going to be spending 12% of their gross domestic product on healthcare, but for us 12% would be a miracle," said researcher Gary Claxton, author of the Kaiser study.

DOJ_NMG_0114211

Higher healthcare costs translate into higher prices for some U.S. goods and services, making them less competitive both at home and abroad.

Health Care Spending Up 6.9 Pct. In '05 (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Health care spending grew in 2005 at the slowest pace in six years thanks in part to a greater reliance on generic drugs.

Health spending went up 6.9 percent in 2005, approaching $2 trillion. That represents about $1 out of every $6 spent in the U.S., compared with about $1 out of every $10 in the early 1980s.

Private and public payers for health care, such as insurers, states and the federal government, have said such a spending pattern cannot be sustained without harming the economy. Some of the tools they've put in place to slow health care spending appear to have had an impact.

The slower growth in 2005 is good news for consumers and taxpayers, but economists aren't confident that the trend will last.

Richard Foster, the chief actuary for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said there is a growing demand for expensive lifesaving equipment and procedures.

"We don't see much that is going to change that for a long time to come," Foster said.

The data on health care spending was compiled by the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. The complete study was published in the journal Health Affairs.

Officials said prescription drugs played the most important factor in slowing health-care spending in 2005. The growth in spending on medicine was lower than overall spending on health care for the first time since the early '90s.

In the past five years, insurers have sought to slow drug spending by giving customers an incentive to buy generics or low-cost brand name drugs. For example, they require customers to pay only a nominal fee for certain medicines, say $3. However, for medicines they'd rather the customer not take, they'll require the customer to pick up a much larger share of the drug's costs, say 20 percent. The use of such tiering has become standard practice by insurers.

States also took steps to rein in costs. They pooled together to negotiate lower prices for the medicine they provide the poor and elderly in Medicaid. They also encouraged the use of generics. As a result, drug spending by states went from an 11.6 percent increase in 2004 to just 2.8 percent in 2005.

The slower growth in drug spending in 2005 had nothing to do with the new Medicare benefit, which did not go into effect until 2006. However, the slower growth in drug spending should help lower the cost of the program, which was implemented using the higher projections for the coming decade.

Meanwhile, the growth in spending on hospital care was comparable in 2005 to previous years -- about 7.9 percent. The growth rate is greatly influenced by labor costs. During the past five years, the pay and benefits provided hospital workers increased 8.2 percent annually, which is about the same as the increase in overall hospital spending.

"This continued increase in labor costs was driven in part by a sustained shortage of hospital workers," said government economists who wrote about the spending patterns in a health journal article released Tuesday.

Among other health care providers, spending on nursing home care went up 6 percent. Spending on care provided at physician offices and clinics went up 7 percent.

Officials also noted that spending on health care is concentrated. About 2 percent of U.S. consumers account for about a third of expenditures.

The economists said that health-care spending often increases at a much faster rate than the overall economy during recessions and in the years immediately following. The trend in 2005 was consistent with past post-recession periods.

Growth In U.S. Health-Care Spending Slows Again (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang

Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114212

WASHINGTON -- Growth in U.S. health-care spending slowed in 2005 for the third consecutive year, reflecting a sharp slowdown in the rise of prescription-drug spending, the federal government reported.

The study, considered the most comprehensive tally of the nation's annual health spending, found that the U.S. spent $1.988 trillion, or $6,697 per person, on health care in 2005, the latest year for which data are available. That was a rise of 6.9%, down from 7.2% in 2004 and the lowest growth rate since 1999.

It isn't clear whether the deceleration in health-care spending is temporary or part of a longer-term trend, said economist Aaron Catlin, who wrote the report with colleagues at the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. The study is being published today in the journal Health Affairs.

The authors note that health-care spending will be dictated by factors such as the aging of the population, the development of new technology and utilization patterns by patients and doctors.

The rise in health-care spending was barely faster than the growth in the overall economy. As a result, health-care spending edged up to 16% of the gross domestic product from 15.9% the year before. Federal and state governments footed 40% -- or $736.3 billion -- of the bill for health services and supplies. This public-sector spending rose 7.8% in 2005, compared with growth of 7% for businesses and 6.2% for households.

"Health-care costs continued to grow faster than the underlying rate of inflation, faster than the rest of the economy and faster than the growth in average wages," said Jack Ebeler, a health-care consultant in Washington. While some critics say that government spending on Medicare and Medicaid is driving up health costs, the trend, he said, "is a health-care cost issue generally for the nation, not just a public-spending issue."

Still, the slowdown in prescription-drug spending has been notable; it increased 5.8% in 2005, down from 8.6% in 2004 and a peak of 18.2% in 1999, the report said. The drop was partly caused by a sharp deceleration in drug expenditures by Medicaid, the state-federal program for the poor. Drug spending by Medicaid rose 2.8% in 2005, compared with average annual increases of 15.4% for the program from 1994 to 2004. To restrain costs, states have worked together to get higher rebates on certain drugs and steered recipients to use those drugs. Medicaid also pushed for the use of less expensive generic drugs.

Meanwhile, the study noted, private insurers also promoted generics by setting up tiered benefit plans, which require higher co-payments for brand-name drugs. In addition, companies were slower in introducing new drugs, which tend to be more expensive. Also, the withdrawal of the big-selling painkiller Vioxx also damped spending, the report said. The study added that strong growth in mail-order drugs -- often in larger, cheaper supplies -- also helped slow increases in drug spending. Drug makers increased prices for brand-name prescription medicines an average of 6% in 2005, the authors said.

The study doesn't include data on the effect of the Medicare drug benefit, which was implemented in January 2006. Since then, Medicare -- not Medicaid -- has started paying for the drug costs of low-income enrollees who are eligible for both programs. The government will likely release new data on the issue next month. A Health Affairs study published last year predicted that the new drug benefit would produce "a dramatic shift in spending across payers" but have "little net effect on aggregate spending growth."

While the growth for prescription-drug spending slowed, spending for other sectors, such as hospital and physician and clinical services grew at rates similar to those of 2004, the authors said. Hospitals accounted for 31% of all dollars spent on health care.

Despite the slowdown in health-care spending, the study said, the percentage of personal income going for health care is rising. Out-of-pocket spending for health care grew to $249.4 billion in 2005, compared with $235.8 billion in 2004. One in five out-of-pocket dollars went to pay for prescription drugs.

Personal spending on prescription drugs also contributed to another trend: from 1996 to 2003, health-care costs became more evenly distributed throughout the population, according to a separate study published in Health Affairs. The study, by economists at the federal Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality said outlays by the top 5% of spenders dropped to 49% of all health-care spending in 2003 from 56% in 1996. Almost all the top 1% of spenders were patients who ran up big hospital bills after some type of catastrophic illness or injury. But in recent years, with more people buying prescription drugs, the health-care spending has become more evenly spread throughout the population.

DOJ_NMG_0114213

"It's becoming less concentrated so care is shifting from very catastrophic to more preventive and maintenance treatment," said the lead author, Samuel Zuvekas.

Sweeping State Health Plan Governor's Proposal: Coverage For All Californians -- Everyone To Share Cost (SFC)

By Tom Chorneau, Chronicle Sacramento Bureau

San Francisco Chronicle, January 9, 2007

(01-09) 04:00 PST Sacramento -- Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger proposed Monday extending medical insurance to all Californians, including illegal immigrants, with a far-reaching plan that would transform the health care market by spreading the $12 billion cost of universal coverage among employers, individuals, insurers, government and health care providers.

The proposal, which the governor called a model for bringing universal coverage to the nation, would deliver both pain and reward to the many powerful interests in the health care industry, giving the plan an uncertain future before the Legislature.

But Schwarzenegger said the problem of covering the state's million uninsured must be undertaken.

"We have more than 6.5 million people without insurance, nearly one-fifth of our population -- so the rest of us pay their bills," the governor said during a news conference in Sacramento through a satellite television link from his office in Los Angeles.

Schwarzenegger said his solution is to make sure everyone in the state has health insurance.

To get there, Schwarzenegger would require all Californians to have insurance and to take more responsibility for staying healthy.

He would require employers with more than 10 workers to provide insurance or pay into a fund that would purchase policies. He would require insurance carriers to accept all applicants regardless of their health, and he would limit insurers' profits.

Schwarzenegger's plan also would redirect billions of dollars now spent subsidizing the care of the uninsured at hospitals to a pool for purchasing policies for those without insurance.

And he would impose a tax on doctors and hospitals under the theory that once all Californians have insurance, medical businesses no longer would be burdened by the cost of the uninsured, and the higher rates that providers now charge insured patients could be used to help buy more insurance.

By getting all parts of the economy and the industry sharing in the solution, Schwarzenegger said, he believes the price of care will fall, benefiting all.

"In each case where it appears to be we're taking something from someone -- if you do the math, everyone is left with a better deal here," he said.

But some skeptics pointed out that the plan's symmetry might also leave Schwarzenegger few proponents willing to fight alongside him.

"He's counting on a groundswell of public opinion," said Larry Gerston, a political scientist at San Jose State, noting a recent Field Poll that showed nearly 80 percent of California voters support expanding health care programs to cover the uninsured.

"My question is, what is the intensity of that belief?" he said. "How many people go to sleep at night thinking about this problem? I think the intensity is uneven and really only among those who are already not in the system."

Although complaints about the governor's plan were largely muted Monday, there were hints of the rhetoric that could be used in the coming political fight.

A "coverage dividend" was how Kim Belshe, the governor's Cabinet secretary for health care issues, described a 2 percent tax on doctors and a 4 percent tax on hospitals.

Dr. Anmol Singh Mahal, president of the California Medical Association, called it a tax.

"A tax on physicians is really a tax on those who are sick, because it is the sick who go see their doctors," he said.

Allan Zaremberg, president of the California Chamber of Commerce -- a group that is already on record opposing a mandate on employers to provide insurance -- said he is worried that business profits will not keep pace with health care costs.

DOJ_NMG_0114214

Labor unions and consumer groups are opposed to Schwarzenegger's mandate on individuals to have insurance because there is nothing in the plan to make sure policies will be affordable.

Hospitals are concerned about losing subsidies for uncompensated care in a time when so many already are losing money.

"Part of the problem is that health care is one of the few places in our society where we haven't made the commitment to include everybody," said Anthony Wright, director of Health Access, a Sacramento consumer group.

"We don't have a fire system where the fire trucks don't go to certain houses on the block," said Wright. "We have a public education system where we say we're going to include all children. Yet the United States has never made the commitment to include everybody in health care, which creates further disfunction."

Assembly Speaker Fabian Núñez, D-Los Angeles, said one certainty is that whatever changes are made to the state's health care system, not everyone will be completely happy with the results.

"But I think the key here is to really do what's most effective," he said. "Do what is going to have the most positive impact on a progressive health care system for California and not do what is politically convenient because it's helpful to this or that group. As long as we do that, I think we'll end up in the right place."

Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata, D-Oakland, went even further, saying there is something in Schwarzenegger's plan "for everyone to hate." Perata said that is usually an indicator of being on the right track.

The governor's plan also contemplates extending coverage to undocumented immigrants -- something that has been criticized by Republican lawmakers whom Schwarzenegger might need to support any spending legislation.

"There is no debate about whether to provide medical care for people who are in California illegally," Schwarzenegger said. "I know this is controversial, but federal law requires us to treat anyone who shows up at an emergency room in need of care."

In addition to getting employers to provide private insurance, the governor also would expand the existing Medi-Cal and Healthy Families programs. The state will subsidize the estimated 1.2 million low-income people who do not currently qualify for coverage under Medi-Cal.

The governor's plan would also provide insurance for all children whose families earn less than $60,000 per year, regardless of their residency status.

Like other parties affected by Schwarzenegger's proposal, hospitals complimented the governor for his proposal but insisted it contain enough money for their emergency rooms.

"Even when coverage is broadly expanded, the reality is that many individuals will inevitably fall through the cracks," said Duane Dauner, California Hospital Association president. "The health care safety net must be funded in such a manner that persons served by safety-net hospitals continue to have access to the care they need."

Among the harsher critics of the governor's plan was the California Nurses Association, a political enemy of Schwarzenegger since he relaxed higher nurse-to-patient staffing requirements in hospitals, something the nurses had sought for more than decade.

"Little more than a fresh coat of paint on a collapsing house" and a "huge gift to the insurance industry" was the description of the plan by Deborah Burger, the president of the nurses association. "There are no limits on skyrocketing health premiums, no requirements on what will be included in the required plans."

Small businesses are especially wary of the mandates on employers.

"I don't see anything about the cost containment," said Jot Condie, president of the California Restaurant Association, which helped defeat a ballot measure to require that employers provide insurance to their employees. "Our position is, fix the system first, then maybe you don't have to require employers to contribute 4 percent of payroll."

Page

Schwarzenegger Proposes Universal Health Coverage (WP)

By Sonya Geis And Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114215

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 8 -- Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) on Monday proposed a system of universal health insurance for Californians that would make the nation's most populous state the third to guarantee medical coverage for all its residents.

"Prices for health care and insurance are rising twice as fast as inflation, twice as fast as wages. That is a terrible drain on everyone, and it is a drain on our economy," Schwarzenegger said. "My solution is that everyone in California must have insurance. If you can't afford it, the state will help you buy it, but you must be insured."

Much of the opposition to Schwarzenegger's program, which requires legislative approval, is expected to come from his fellow Republicans, who object that the plan will be costly for small businesses. But the governor said California cannot afford not to do it. Nearly one in five California residents does not have health insurance -- a total of 6.5 million people, many of whom seek expensive care in emergency rooms.

Nationwide, the ranks of the uninsured are growing. Census figures show that a record 46.6 million Americans, including 8.3 million children, had no health insurance in 2005, up from 45.3 million in 2004. Among those who did have coverage, fewer were receiving it through their jobs as employers scaled back their health plans.

Analysts say the California proposal is illustrative of the resurgence of interest among politicians at all levels in expanding health coverage to the uninsured and that it provides fresh evidence that, with Congress stalled on enacting comprehensive health-care reform, the states are beginning to take matters into their own hands.

In the past year, Massachusetts and Vermont have passed laws requiring all their residents to obtain health insurance, with help from the state if necessary. Other states considering expanding coverage to reduce the number of uninsured include Washington, Montana, Rhode Island, Wisconsin and Illinois.

"Health care for the uninsured is back on the agenda," said Diane Rowland, executive vice president of the Kaiser Family Foundation, a nonprofit, nonpartisan organization that researches health-care issues. "The governors are trying to lead the way, but it's also going to take national action to try to address this problem."

Schwarzenegger's plan would require everyone living in California -- even illegal immigrants -- to have health insurance, at an estimated cost of $12 billion. Individuals who refuse to carry insurance could face reductions in their state income tax refunds or the garnishment of their wages. All businesses with 10 or more employees would have to offer coverage or pay a fee of 4 percent of their payroll into a fund to help the uninsured buy health insurance.

Schwarzenegger also recommended expanding the state's existing program for children's health insurance to families that earn less than three times the poverty level, or about $60,000 for a family of four.

The governor also wants to force insurers to offer coverage to people with existing medical conditions. Currently many insurers will not cover older people, those with major illnesses or even people with relatively minor complaints such as asthma or varicose veins.

Schwarzenegger also would require insurance providers to use 85 percent of their premium proceeds on patient care.

The state would increase reimbursements to doctors and hospitals by a total of $4 billion. Money for the program would come from new taxes on doctors (2 percent of their revenue) and hospitals (4 percent), federal funds, and county funds that now pay for emergency care for the uninsured.

In addition to objections from small business, Schwarzenegger is sure to face opposition to taxes on doctors and hospitals, additional regulation of insurance providers and the extension of coverage to illegal immigrants.

"Imposing a new jobs tax on employers of any size and expanding costly government mandates is the wrong approach, one which will devastate our economy," the Assembly's Republican leader, Mike Villines, said in a statement Monday.

But Schwarzenegger said that while the plan will cost money, it will pump funds back into the health system because of the expanded coverage. "Everyone ends up with a better deal," he said.

Calif. Gov Calls For Universal Coverage (AP)

By Laura Kurtzman

AP, January 9, 2007

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Monday proposed to extend health coverage to nearly all of California's 6.5 million uninsured people, promising to spread the cost among businesses, individuals, hospitals, doctors, insurers and government.

DOJ_NMG_0114216

The plan contains elements that are likely to provoke opposition from a wide range of powerful interests, including doctors, hospitals and insurers, as well as employers and unions. But it also contains incentives for each of them.

All children, regardless of their immigration status, would be covered through an expansion of the state and federal Healthy Families program.

"I don't think it is a question or a debate if they ought to be covered. ... The federal courts have made that decision — that no one can be turned away," Schwarzenegger said. "The question really isn't to treat them or not to treat them. The question really is how can you treat them in the most cost-effective way."

Under Schwarzenegger's plan, all Californians would be required to have insurance, although the poorest would be subsidized. Businesses with 10 or more employees would have to offer insurance to their workers or pay 4 percent of their payroll into a state fund. Smaller businesses would be exempt.

Also, insurers would no longer be allowed to deny coverage to people because of their medical problems.

Business groups and Republican legislators are likely to object to the extra costs imposed on businesses.

The state would subsidize the estimated 1.2 million poor people who do not currently qualify for state health coverage. They would be able to buy insurance through a state-run pool and would have to make a small contribution toward their premiums.

Schwarzenegger is betting that his plan will save $10 billion a year by cutting health care costs. He says the savings would offset the new fees he is asking doctors and hospitals to pay — 4 percent of revenue for hospitals and 2 percent for doctors.

The state also would increase what it pays doctors and hospitals through Medi-Cal, the state insurance plan for the poor.

The governor was supposed to give his address in person to a panel of health care officials. Instead, he spoke via video link since he is still recuperating from broken leg suffered in a skiing accident.

Gov. Seeks Sweeping Health System Reforms (LAT)

By Jordan Rau

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

SACRAMENTO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger today proposed upending just about every portion of the healthcare industry in one of the country's most elaborate efforts at holding down medical costs and expanding insurance to those who don't have it.

Schwarzenegger's plan, which he publicly unveiled at noon, would require employers with 10 workers or more to buy insurance for their workers or pay a fee of 4% of their payroll into a program to help provide coverage for the uninsured.

Schwarzenegger would tax doctors 2% of their gross revenue and place a 4% tax on hospitals. He campaigned for reelection on an anti-tax platform, but his administration argues that so many more people would have insurance that medical providers would make more money.

The governor also wants to ban insurers from refusing to offer coverage to some individuals because of their prior medical conditions. Insurers would also have to spend at least 85% of their premium revenues on patient care, a move that would limit the amount companies spend on administrative costs and profits.

In an effort to cover all Californian children, including ones in the state illegally, Schwarzenegger's plan would expand the state's Healthy Families program, providing insurance to children whose parents make less than three times the poverty level. That works out to about $60,000 for a family of four.

And Schwarzenegger said his plan would require every Californian to have health insurance.

"If you can't afford it, the state will help you buy it," he said, "but you must be insured."

Schwarzenegger called the delivery and payment of healthcare in California "disastrous," noting that nearly 1 in 5 residents is uninsured.

"The problem with that is, of course, that the rest of the people who have insurance pay for them," said the governor. "Those that are fortunate enough to have coverage — we are paying a hidden tax."

Schwarzenegger spoke by satellite from Los Angeles. Doctors treating his broken leg have ordered him not to fly more than once a week. The governor will fly to Sacramento on Tuesday to deliver his annual State of the State address.

DOJ_NMG_0114217

All of these ideas are sure to engender opposition from the healthcare industry and their allies in the Legislature, which must approve any plan before it becomes law.

Anticipating a hostile reaction to his plan from many quarters, Schwarzenegger said that although it appears that some people lose and others win under this proposal, in fact the whole system would benefit.

"Everyone has been left here with a better deal," he said.

But Republican lawmakers and business groups have long argued against additional requirements on employers.

Two hours before Schwarzenegger unveiled his plan, Assembly Republican Leader Mike Villines (R-Clovis) joined with a trio of small business owners in a Thai restaurant a few blocks from the Capitol to announce that his caucus will resist any plan that places a mandate on employers. He called such mandates a "job tax," and stood at a podium alongside a large poster with those words circled and crossed through in red.

"If we put any form of mandate on a business, we are seeing a jobs tax," he said. "This isn't a philosophical discussion. This is a jobs discussion. This is the difference between employees having a job and a jobs tax that says no to that."

The governor's plan matches some elements of proposals put forth last month by the Legislature's top two Democrats. All plans build on an existing system, in which 71% of California employers offer workers health insurance.

All plans also include a "pay or play" element by which employers who don't offer health benefits must pay a fee to a state agency that would then negotiate with private insurers for worker coverage.

Last month, Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata (D-Oakland) proposed taxing workers and employers to cover an estimated 4.2 million of 6 million uninsured Californians, with a requirement that all employers — even those with a single employee — offer health insurance or pay the state a percentage of payroll. Perata would also require workers to prove when they pay taxes that they have health insurance.

The plan of Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez (D-Los Angeles) would not force workers to show they have health insurance. He would exempt businesses with less than two workers, those with a payroll less than $100,000 and firms less than three years old.

This afternoon, Nunez called Schwarzenegger's plan "pretty much in sync with the proposal I laid out in December." He also called it "a good start."

Schwarzenegger agrees with Assembly Democrats, Nunez said, on many areas, including giving all California children health insurance, requiring insurers to accept all people regardless of their health status and requiring employers to either offer health benefits or help pay the cost of extending it to their workers.

"When it's all said and done, employers in California will pay a portion of their payroll deductions toward the cost of insuring their employees," said Nunez. "That will happen."

The speaker said the governor's plan could pass the Legislature on a simple-majority vote, which would not require any Republican support.

Republican lawmakers, who are a minority in the Assembly and Senate, have a seat at the table, Nunez said. But they are out of touch with mainstream Californians, he said, when they insist that children in the country illegally get no state-assisted health insurance. And they are wrong, Nunez said, in characterizing the governor's plan as a new tax.

"I don't think . . . that the governor and the Democratic Legislature ought to roll over or steamroll the Republicans in this process," said Nunez. "But I think we need to have an honest discussion about what's a real mandate and what's not a real mandate.

"The mandate is a hidden tax of $1,200 that each of us has to pay because there are employers out there who would rather increase that rate of profit and put it in their pocket than to pay a portion of the healthcare costs of their employees," Nunez said. "That's a tax."

Schwarzenegger Proposes Health Plan (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114218

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger outlined a plan Monday to provide health insurance to all Californians by requiring health insurers to offer coverage and individuals to carry it — with the state's doctors, hospitals, insurers, taxpayers and employers all helping pay for it.

His proposal is significant not only for its scope, but also because what happens in the nation's most-populous state often has ripple effects across the country. California, for example, helped lead the way on automobile-smog controls and smoking bans in public places.

"We want to make health care more affordable and accessible and equitable for everyone," said Schwarzenegger.

If his plan wins approval — and heated debate is expected — California would be the second state to require health insurance. Massachusetts lawmakers approved a plan last year.

SMALL BUSINESS BLOG: Do you support Schwarzenegger's health plan? Take this quick quiz — and see how other readers responded, too

"This is bigger than Massachusetts," said Jay Gellert, CEO of insurer Health Net. Gellert was among a panel representing business, labor, consumers, doctors and counties who were asked for their opinions on the proposal at a press conference.

They generally praised the governor for raising the issue, while questioning some of the details. Anthony Wright from consumer group Health Access said he feared the plan doesn't have a cap on how much consumers would have to pay for insurance, while the California Medical Association said doctors will not like a proposed revenue tax. Safeway CEO Steve Burd said a proposed 4% payroll tax for businesses that don't offer insurance may not be high enough.

While the plan aims to reduce the state's 6.5 million uninsured — currently about 20% of the non-elderly population — the governor also emphasized its benefits to the insured.

The insured could see premium discounts for living healthy lifestyles, the governor said. Further savings may come if everyone is insured, because premiums are now estimated to include 10% to 17% in "hidden taxes" — money used to pay medical providers to make up for the uninsured and low payments for those on state programs.

Under the proposal:

• Individuals would have to buy insurance, with government subsidies for people earning up to 250% of the federal poverty level, about $24,500 for an individual and $50,000 for a family of four.

• State programs for children would expand to include families earning up to 300% of poverty, about $60,000 for a family of four.

• Employers with 10 or more workers would have to offer coverage or pay a tax equal to 4% of payroll. Under 10 are exempt.

• Insurers could not turn away prospective policyholders because they've got health problems.

• Insurers and hospitals would have to devote 85% of revenue to direct patient care.

• Hospitals would pay a 4% tax on revenue and doctors a 2% tax to help provide coverage subsidies.

• The state would boost by $4 billion the amount it pays to medical providers through the Medicaid program.

Schwarzenegger Embarks On Fight For Health Plan (WSJ)

By Jim Carlton

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger proposed a sweeping plan to mandate universal health care in the nation's most-populous state, putting forth measures that would require employers to pay into the health-care system as well as tax hospitals and doctors to help offset medical coverage's spiraling costs.

The move makes Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, the latest governor to try to tackle a problem -- covering the uninsured -- that the federal government has been unable to solve. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who is seen as a Republican contender for the presidency, struck a bipartisan deal with his state's legislature last year mandating universal health care in the Bay State. Mandates for some employers to pay more of their share if they don't already have been passed in Vermont and Maryland, as well as New York City and San Francisco. Maryland's law was thrown out by a federal judge last year after a legal challenge.

DOJ_NMG_0114219

California, with 36 million residents, could influence other states to follow suit. But Mr. Schwarzenegger also faces potentially one of the fiercest battles of his political career, because his plan calls for some level of sacrifice from many of the parties affected.

The governor anticipated criticism in his remarks yesterday to a Sacramento gathering of his staff and business executives, saying the long-term rewards of having lower medical costs would make the pain worthwhile. "It appears we are taking something away from everyone here," Mr. Schwarzenegger said by video link as he recuperated from a broken leg injury he suffered while skiing over the holiday break in Sun Valley, Idaho. "But when you look at the math, they actually benefit. Everyone is left with a better deal, even though everyone has to chip in."

The governor said his plan to charge a "dividend" of 2% on doctors' revenue and 4% on hospitals' would be more than offset by what his office estimates would be $10 billion to $15 billion in new money coming into the medical system from so many people being insured, as well as a proposed increase in the state's Medi-Cal plan.

California now has about 6.5 million people who are uninsured or underinsured, a higher level than any other state. According to the Census Bureau, 15.9% of Americans lacked health insurance in 2005; in California, it was 19.4%.

The Schwarzenegger plan drew some skepticism. "There may be some unintended consequences," said Joel Fox, president of the Small Business Action Committee in Sacramento, in a panel discussion organized by the governor's administration after the speech. "For example, will some businesses opt out of covering employees and go into the pool [of state-insured workers], thus overwhelming the pool? Will some companies cherry-pick their employees so that they hire those more easily covered, instead of guys like me that are older?"

Allan Zaremberg, president of the California Chamber of Commerce, questioned whether the plan would really make health care more affordable for those who already are insured. Mr. Zaremberg said the taxes on doctor and hospital revenues could be passed onto consumers and the companies that already provide insurance in higher premiums.

Others praised the plan. Officials of Blue Cross of California called it "bold and visionary," singling out the provision to provide medical coverage to all uninsured children in the state, even those of illegal immigrants. "Taking each part separately, there's something for everyone to hate, but taken as a whole, there's a lot to like," said Bruce Bodaken, chairman, president and Chief Executive of Blue Cross of California.

Some other business leaders, including the chief executive of California-based grocery titan Safeway Inc., are also backing the plan. One reason: They already pay to fund medical plans for their employees, and resent the competitors who don't. On balance, the governor likely will have a tougher time persuading members of his own party to back the measure than the Democratic lawmakers who control the California Legislature. Indeed, Mr. Schwarzenegger's plan isn't hugely different from versions recently proffered by state Senate President Don Perata and Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez. Mr. Nuñez said in an interview that he just had a few issues with the governor's plan -- most important, that it would shift money from one program for the poor into this health-care program. "On its face, this is a good start," Mr. Nuñez said.

California's Governor Seeks Universal Care (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 8 — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Monday proposed extending health care coverage to all of California's 36 million residents as part of a sweeping package of changes to the state's huge, troubled health care system.

A total of 6.5 million people, one-fifth of the state's population, do not have health insurance, far more than in any other state. At least one million of the uninsured are illegal immigrants, state officials say.

Under Mr. Schwarzenegger's plan, which requires the approval of the Legislature, California would become the fourth and by far the largest state to attempt near universal health coverage for its citizens. The other three states are Maine, Massachusetts and Vermont.

The governor outlined his proposal to an audience of health care experts and reporters via satellite from Los Angeles. He made it clear that a variety of mechanisms would be used to provide all Californians with insurance and that the responsibility of providing it would fall on the government, employers, health care providers and the uninsured themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0114220

The plan, which Mr. Schwarzenegger estimated would cost $12 billion, calls for many employers that do not offer health insurance to contribute to a fund that would help pay for coverage of the working uninsured. It would also require doctors to pay 2 percent and hospitals 4 percent of their revenues to help cover higher reimbursements for those who treat patients enrolled in Medi-Cal, the state's Medicaid program.

"Everyone in California must have health insurance," Mr. Schwarzenegger said.

As he made his proposal, the federal government announced that health care spending in 2005 showed the slowest growth in six years. [Page A13.]

Mr. Schwarzenegger's plan includes elements that quickly provoked opposition from many powerful interests, including doctors and the governor's Republican colleagues in the Legislature.

But the speaker of the State Assembly, Fabian Núñez, a Democrat, said in a statement, "I'm glad the governor is on board with coverage for all kids."

Over the last two years, state legislatures have grown increasingly concerned with how to provide health insurance to citizens as the number of employers offering coverage has fallen and the number of workers entering fields where health insurance is not an option has grown.

Because of its great size, California is likely to set the stage for a national conversation about health care this year.

"This is a very significant proposal," said Karen Davis, president of the Commonwealth Fund, a nonprofit foundation. "It is not just children he is talking about. It is really dealing with the whole problem of the uninsured, with concrete positions to raise revenues to pay for that coverage, and the philosophy of shared responsibility. I think this shows health care is going to be a major issue in the 2008 presidential election."

In many ways, Mr. Schwarzenegger's proposal mirrors the plan in Massachusetts, the most comprehensive of its sort, which is projected to cover about 515,000 of the state's 550,000 uninsured. The law enacted there transformed a $1 billion pool that had long paid for health care for uninsured patients into a mechanism to help subsidize insurance for those who could not afford it.

In many states, spending on Medicaid, the federal government's health program for the poor, has surpassed that for education in recent years. In New York, Gov. Eliot Spitzer has vowed to insure all the state's children and enroll all eligible adults in Medicaid. And New Jersey is among a handful of states considering some form of universal coverage.

Under Mr. Schwarzenegger's proposal, Medi-Cal would be extended to adults who earn as much as 100 percent above the federal poverty line and to children, regardless of their immigration status, living in homes where the family income is as much as 300 percent above that line, about $60,000 a year for a family of four. Medi-Cal is currently limited to adults with children, and children with documented residency are covered if their family's income is up to 250 percent above of the poverty line.

Adult illegal immigrants would continue to be barred from Medicaid benefits but would still be entitled to health services from their counties and the state's hospital system.

Employers would have new responsibilities as well. Businesses with 10 or more workers that choose not to offer coverage would be required to pay 4 percent of their total Social Security wages to a state fund that would be created to subsidize the purchase of coverage by the working uninsured. The cost of such coverage would be measured on a sliding scale depending on what an employee earned, and employees would be able to pay for it using pretax dollars.

This component seems intended to give employers an incentive to offer health insurance, and to level the playing field between employers that do not offer insurance — and are therefore essentially paying lower wages — and those that do.

"If you look at where the uninsured lie," said Laura Tobler, a health policy analyst for the National Conference of State Legislatures, "most of them are working, and most work for small businesses."

On the provider side, the governor's plan contains privileges and responsibilities. Doctors and hospitals, which have long complained about Medi-Cal's low reimbursement rates, would benefit from a $4 billion increase in annual reimbursement. But the state would tax doctors 2 percent of their total revenues, and hospitals 4 percent, to help pay for the greater reimbursement.

The proposal would prohibit insurance companies from denying coverage to people because of their age or health status. They would also be required to put 85 percent of their profits directly into health care services.

DOJ_NMG_0114221

Aides to the governor said financing for the program would come from roughly $5 billion in federal money the state believes it will be owed through restructuring of its health care programs, and through a redirection of state money that now goes toward what is basically charity care, among other measures.

The chief executive of Blue Shield of California, Bruce G. Bodaken, described what might happen once the Legislature began to debate the governor's proposal.

"Taking each part separately, there's something for everyone to hate," Mr. Bodaken said. "But taken as a whole, there's a lot to like."

The governor's plan signals a growing trend among state legislatures. "What we are seeing this year," said Enrique Martinez-Vidal, acting director of the State Coverage Initiatives, a program that assists states looking to expand health care programs, "is that instead of just trying to take on reform in an incremental way, there are some states trying to do this in a comprehensive way, by trying to get buy-ins from all the different players."

But it is likely to set Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, on a collision course with many state lawmakers from his party, who are the minority in the Legislature.

"Some of the areas he put out there we are probably not going to support," said State Senator Dick Ackerman, the minority leader. Among his concerns, Mr. Ackerman said, were the coverage of illegal immigrants, which he said his members would not support, and a tax on doctors or providers.

"We don't think taxing folks is something that is popular in California," he said in a telephone interview from Sacramento. "But this isn't going to be an up-or-down vote on one bill. It will be a debate. And we welcome it."

Gov. Offers Bold Prescription (LAT)

By Jordan Rau

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

SACRAMENTO — Calling for massive changes throughout a healthcare system he called "broken," Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Monday proposed a $12-billion plan that would require all Californians to obtain medical insurance while helping the poorest to afford it.

The plan, which both critics and supporters called the most audacious in the country, would dramatically reshuffle the financial underpinnings of an already fragile industry. The governor said his plan would control spiraling health costs while ensuring coverage for the quarter of a million children and 5.6 million adults who lack insurance.

"Everyone in California must have health insurance," Schwarzenegger said via teleconference from Los Angeles, where he is recuperating from a broken leg. "If you can't afford it, the state will help you buy it, but you must be insured."

Only Massachusetts has required all residents to carry insurance, but California's larger population of uninsured and poor makes Schwarzenegger's goals much more challenging. To pay for the plan, Schwarzenegger proposed placing new fees and obligations on doctors, hospitals, employers and insurers — all powerful lobbies in Sacramento.

Schwarzenegger was widely praised for tackling such a huge issue so comprehensively. But many leading consumer advocates, academics and business leaders said they feared that the governor's proposal was inadequately financed and would shift more responsibility for healthcare to families while unintentionally encouraging businesses to drop or downgrade the coverage they now offer.

Employers with 10 or more workers would have to offer plans that cost them at least 4% of their payroll. Those who refuse would be required to pay an equivalent amount into the state's insurance fund for people with no other option. That mandate, while greeted skeptically by businesses, was criticized as too lax by advocates who said that a majority of companies that now provide insurance already contribute much more money.

"It's the equivalent of setting the minimum wage at $3 an hour," said Anthony Wright, executive director of Health Access California, a consumer advocacy group.

Those earning more than 2 1/2 times the federal poverty level — a total of $41,500 a year for a family of three — would not receive a subsidy but would still have to buy insurance if their employer did not offer it. The cheapest plan would require families to pay $2,000 a year in premiums, and as much as $10,000 in out-of-pocket medical costs.

DOJ_NMG_0114222

"By setting this as a minimum, the tendency will be to undermine and reduce the current level offered by some employers, who will use this to justify reducing their benefits much more," said E. Richard Brown, director of the UCLA Center for Health Policy Research, who nonetheless called the proposal "very impressive" in its reach.

Steven A. Burd, chairman of the Safeway grocery chain, who was invited by the administration to comment on the proposal, also lauded the effort but said it did not ask enough of employers. Their required contribution, he said, "is frankly too low and should be higher."

The plan was welcomed by the Democrats who control the Legislature, which must approve any proposal. Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles) called it "good work" and "a good start."

But he said that he could not agree to requiring everyone, whether working or not, to obtain health insurance "until and unless we solve the problem of the costs of the premiums."

Schwarzenegger's fellow Republicans showed little enthusiasm for the plan, saying that the governor's strategy of funding it through mandated employer contributions and assessing a portion of earnings of doctors, hospitals and health plans violated the anti-tax cornerstone of his reelection campaign.

*

Republican opposition

"If we put any form of mandate on a business, we are seeing a jobs tax," said Assembly Republican leader Michael Villines of Clovis, echoing the argument that Schwarzenegger himself made in 2004 when he successfully campaigned against Proposition 72. That Democratic plan would have required employers to provide health insurance or pay into a state fund.

The administration insisted that its plan did not include taxes, instead labeling the levies "coverage dividends." The debate is more than semantic: A measure with taxes needs two-thirds support in the Legislature, giving the GOP veto power. Otherwise, it needs only a simple majority that could be obtained solely with Democratic votes.

Another part of the plan provoking Republican resistance would provide healthcare for impoverished children who are in the United States illegally. Senate Republican leader Dick Ackerman of Irvine called such a provision a "nonstarter."

The governor said emergency rooms are required by federal law to treat anyone who shows up, regardless of status. "So the decision for my team was, do we treat them in emergency rooms at the highest cost available or do we do it right and do it efficiently?" he said.

The plan, which has been anticipated for weeks as the governor's biggest initiative of the year, gave virtual coronaries to leaders of California's hospitals, doctors' groups and insurers — the most politically influential players in a $169-billion industry that spends $22 million annually on lobbying in Sacramento.

The guiding philosophy of Schwarzenegger's plan was that fixing California's healthcare system was a responsibility to be shared, and the complex plan gave each sector some benefits that are offset by new burdens.

He proposed a $4-billion annual increase in Medi-Cal reimbursements, which are among the lowest in the nation. That would help hospitals and doctors who treat many poor people, and encourage more providers to participate in the program.

But doctors also would have to pay 2% of their gross earnings back to the state to help expand coverage. The physicians' lobby said many doctors would simply pass that cost on to patients and insurers through higher bills.

If all Californians were indeed covered under his plan, hospitals would be able to bill insurance for the costs of the uninsured they must absorb now. But hospitals also would have to pay 4% of their earnings back to the state, and would lose $2 billion they now get from the government for uncompensated care.

"I did get a little bit of pain in the side when I heard that part," said Jim Lott, executive director of the Hospital Assn. of Southern California.

And hospitals may still have to deal with uninsured patients. The homeless, unemployed and illegal immigrants might not obtain insurance even if fully subsidized, and the administration plans to enforce the mandate through the state's income tax boards.

Insurers would receive a huge business boon, since the mandate for coverage would provide them with a captive audience, but without having their rates regulated as those of auto and home insurers are. The governor would require insurers to offer coverage to all people regardless of their health, and would limit to 15% the amount of premiums insurers could spend on administration and keep as profits.

DOJ_NMG_0114223

Much of Schwarzenegger's plan was designed to allow the state to qualify for $5.5 billion in additional federal money. But many questioned whether, even with that boost, the contributions from employers would be enough to allow workers to buy anything more than bare-bones catastrophic coverage.

Premiums rising

Healthcare premiums have been rising at the rate of 8.2% annually, nearly twice the rate of wage growth. Yet employers would pay only 4% of their payroll amounts, something that disturbs both labor and business leaders.

"How will the inevitable shortfall in funding be addressed?" asked Allan Zaremburg, president of the California Chamber of Commerce. "Will the tax have to be doubled in 10 years?"

The proposal was devised by a team of policy experts who were hired last year specifically for that task. They spent months interviewing representatives of all segments of the healthcare industry across the nation. But the final decisions were delayed until Sunday night because of Schwarzenegger's injury, which occurred in a skiing accident Dec. 23.

All of the plan's details can be altered and its questions can be resolved in negotiations with lawmakers, and Schwarzenegger said he looked forward to forging a bipartisan agreement as he had last year with a massive public works building project.

But because so many parts of Schwarzenegger's plan hinge on one another, deleting the areas of greatest disagreement could unravel the entire plan.

"Health insurance reform is as delicate as an egg," said Jamie Court, president of the Foundation of Taxpayer and Consumer Rights, a Santa-Monica based watchdog group. "One little crack and the egg is lost."

Among other provisions, the governor's proposed health overhaul would:

• Require every Californian to have health insurance.

• Require employers with 10 or more workers to offer health benefits or pay 4% of the payroll to a coverage program.

• Extend government insurance for poor children to more families.

• Ban insurers from denying coverage because of medical conditions, occupation or age.

Source: Governor's office

**

Breaking down costs

U.S. healthcare spending reached almost $2 trillion in 2005, an average of $6,697 per person--and far more than any other industrialized country's spending. Where the money comes from, and what it goes toward:

Where it comes from*

Private insurance: 35%

Medicare: 17%

Medicaid: 16%

Other public programs: 13%

Private out-of-pocket: 13%

Other private programs: 17%

--

Where it goes

Hospital: 30%

Doctors/Clinical: 21%

Prescription drugs: 10%

Administrative costs: 7%

Nursing homes: 6%

Other spending : 25%

DOJ_NMG_0114224

*Medicaid includes State Children's Health Insurance Program; other public programs include worker's comp and military healthcare; other private programs include charity.

Includes dental care, home health, over-the-counter medicines, research and more.

Note: Totals may not add to 100% because of rounding.

A Flawed Cure (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 9, 2007

THE DEVIL, AS THEY SAY, is in the details, and that cliche was repeatedly thrown back and forth across Sacramento on Monday as lawmakers, business groups, doctors and consumer advocates studied Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's sweeping proposal to change the way healthcare is bought and sold in California.

But it may be a little early for this cliche. Schwarzenegger's plan is ambitious in scope and laudable in its goals, especially in its coverage for all children, including children of illegal immigrants. But the plan has a substantial chunk of devil before you even reach the details.

The problem is this: It makes no sense to legally and permanently make Californians' access to healthcare dependent on their employers. Companies hire workers and pay them for their time, talent, muscle and brains. Employers must meet certain standards to do business in the state — complying with workplace safety laws, paying the minimum wage, providing workers' compensation insurance, etc. But they should not become the primary mechanism for the state to deliver vital services to citizens.

This is more true here than elsewhere because so many Californians who need insurance have only marginal or temporary relationships with employers. Companies, meanwhile, face plenty of challenges just staying in business and keeping up with the dynamics of the modern marketplace without being saddled with a new health insurance tax.

And make no mistake, it is a tax. Employers currently have the option of offering health insurance to entice workers, but they are not required to do so. Under Schwarzenegger's proposal, every business with 10 or more employees that does not offer workers health insurance would have to pay 4% of its payroll into a state fund. And like most employer taxes, workers ultimately will pay it — in the form of lower wages or lost jobs.

The governor is loath to call it a tax because, like everyone else in Sacramento, he does not want to be seen as the kind of politician who proposes tax increases. He rode into office in part on his promise to slash the vehicle license fee, or car tax, and he did. He devoted much of his first term and reelection campaign to protecting California's tax-cutting heritage. But fancy wordplay doesn't change the fact.

The plan requires money — about $12 billion — and although some of it would come from the federal government, some from counties and presumably some from cuts in other state programs, some must come from new revenue.

Schwarzenegger has promised a new era for California, and his determination to fix the state's broken healthcare system is a welcome sign of his commitment. He should also make candor a part of the agenda. An employer tax should be out of the equation. So who should be taxed instead? Shouldn't we all? And how would it be imposed? All these questions are likely to get a full hearing in Sacramento in the next few months.

The governor certainly knows that the final version of the plan will deviate from the proposal he unveiled Monday. As for how much devil will be left in the details, only time, and plenty of intense horse trading, will tell.

Life At America's Bottom Wage (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, January 9, 2007

MUSKOGEE, OKLA.

It's the kind of December evening when the Hosier family might want to stay home.

At work all day, John Hosier has been resting on the living-room couch. Tina, his wife, has had her hands full taking care of their two young children. Yet, here they are, rolling 18-month-old Rose in a stroller with 5-year-old Donald tagging along, on a half-mile walk to the Salvation Army Church in Muskogee, Okla.

It's not just a place of worship and fellowship. The Salvation Army's affiliated store offers discounted goods and employs Mr. Hosier full time. The $6-an-hour job is the family's sole paycheck, which amounts to barely $200 a week. Even with government aid, such as food stamps, the family is on poverty's doorstep. "If it wasn't for the Salvation Army, I don't know where I'd be," Hosier says.

DOJ_NMG_0114225

Wednesday, Congress formally begins considering helping families like the Hosiers by raising the nation's minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, up from the $5.15 rate that has held steady since 1997.

By one estimate, the expected hike would directly affect the paychecks of 6.6 million low-wage workers like John Hosier. Another 8 million workers have wages that, while a bit too high to be forced upward by the law, stand to gain from an upward ripple effect when the wage floor is adjusted.

A glimpse into the lives of people who live at bottom-rung pay rates illustrates why, to supporters of the change, the minimum wage is long overdue for a raise. But it also reveals that such a boost isn't a one-step solution for the challenges that face America's poorest workers.

In fact, many families are poor today even though they earn far above $7.25 an hour.

"Until you're making $10 or $12 an hour, if you're [a single-income household] with dependents, you're going to have a really tough time making ends meet without public assistance," says David Blatt, a poverty expert at the Community Action Project of Tulsa County, about 40 miles from Muskogee in the state's northeastern section. Oklahoma family's needs: $33,000

Oklahoma doesn't have high living costs, compared with some other states. But to cover the basic needs of a family of four here typically requires an income of more than $33,000, according to an online budget calculator created by the liberal Economic Policy Institute in Washington.

At $5.15 an hour, it would take three full-time jobs for a family to earn that much.

Many minimum-wage workers, it's true, don't have children. Often they are young people on their first job.

But the Hosier family is not unusual. Of the workers who stand to reap higher pay if Congress raises the wage floor, the vast majority are adults, most work full-time, and about 1 in 4 have dependent children, according to the Economic Policy Institute.

Moreover, they are often the sole breadwinner in the household. Of families with children, nearly half of those who would be affected by a minimum-wage hike get all their earned income from one low-wage worker.

The issue is important politically. Democrats, now in control of Congress, have made raising the minimum wage a top priority in their 100-hour legislative push for change. It would also have its most significant economic effect - positive and negative - in the South and Great Plains where states generally haven't set their own higher minimum wage.

Few states will see a greater impact than Oklahoma. As of last year, the Sooner State led the nation in the share of hourly workers (4 percent) who earn no more than $5.15 per hour.

That means many families such as the Hosiers will see a boost in pay if the law changes. But it means that negative ripple effects will also be magnified, as businesses confront a big jump in labor costs. Many employers will have to raise prices, and some are likely to hire fewer people as a result.

In the end, the law may exert only a modest influence on the arc of Oklahoma's economy, experts say. (The income gains and job setbacks would be greater if the hike, say, doubled the wage instead of boosting it by the proposed 40 percent.)

Yet the proposed raise would have a big effect on the households that would be directly affected.

The legislation calls for the wage floor to rise in three steps, reaching $7.25 after two years.

A pay jump from $6 to $7.25 an hour would put 21 percent more money in each paycheck for Hosier. "That would help a lot," he says. A 'soldier' in Salvation Army

A sturdy, soft-spoken man born in Arkansas, Hosier has spent about 15 years in this unassuming city of 39,000. He's worked as a mechanic on lawnmowers and other small motors. And for six years, he's been a "soldier" - a worker - at the Salvation Army. He rides a big truck, loading and unloading furniture, toys, boxes of clothing, and other items that county residents donate for sale in the store.

It's work that he believes in, but he also works there because the people - including the manager known as "Major" - believe in him.

"It's the people in Salvation Army who help you out," John says.

And he has needed help. His life story, as he recounts it, includes physical abuse from his father as a boy, various forms of drug abuse ("I did it all") and a prison term. And he struggles now with illiteracy.

DOJ_NMG_0114226

As he sought a new life, he credits God and Tina with helping him forward. The church here has also been a haven of support.

The gathering on this night is not for formal worship but for a mix of activities. Mrs. Hosier settles in for some games of Bingo. As John heads to a vending machine and treats the family to drinks, a friend hands Tina a little gift. It's a typical-looking mug, but it makes her smile when it turns out to be a music box, too.

Meanwhile, Donald has joined some older children throwing a football in the parking lot. Other youngsters are dressed as angels, rehearsing a play to be performed on Sunday.

The Salvation Army is the core of this family's world. They don't have a car, but live within walking distance of both the church and the store where John works.

The store is a source not only of a paycheck, but also of used goods available at deep discounts.

The family also gets substantial government aid, for everything from clothing to food and healthcare. But paying their bills is a stretch, the Hosiers say.

Rent is $400 a month for their modest, yellow-sided home. They've lived there just a few months, so they're still figuring out how much to budget for utilities. And medical costs add up each month.

Donald takes medicines to cope with hyperactivity, and Hosier lists a range of ailments of his own, from asthma to an ulcer.

The state's Medicaid program covers many of these health costs, but the medications all require small monthly copayments that add up, John says.

"It's hard on a small income," he says. "You've got to get out and hustle and bustle to make a living."

When they need to go on an errand, the Hosiers rely on a Volunteers of America van, or ride with friends and relatives. Life without a car

Mrs. Hosier says they'd like to get a car of their own, but that remains a far-off goal.

Their discretionary spending, for now, is on smaller items: some music CDs and for Donald on his birthday a toy truck and Spiderman underwear.

They like life in this quiet city that has long been a gateway for east-west and north-south commerce. Riverboats, railroads, and semitrailer trucks have successively rolled through this town. The historic brick downtown has given way to Wal-Mart on the edge of town as the new trading post for commerce.

The city was also the end point of the Trail of Tears, by which the Cherokee and Creek nations were forcibly resettled in the 1830s and '40s. In 1969, country legend Merle Haggard immortalized it a different way when he sang "I'm proud to be an Okie from Muskogee."

Oklahoma, like the rest of the states, got its first taste of a federally mandated minimum wage in 1938, during Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal. It was 25 cents at the time - worth about $3.57 in today's dollars - and was adjusted upward, at infrequent intervals, in an effort to keep pace with rising costs of living.

The current level of $5.15 was reached in 1997, and Congress has never waited so long to raise it.

As a result, the purchasing power of a minimum-wage paycheck is now at its lowest point in half a century. Also earning the minimum: teenagers

The people who earn minimum, or close to it, are as different as John Hosier and Megan Sistanich.

She also lives in Muskogee but is still in high school. She's earning $5.15 an hour at a downtown cafe called Breadworks. She aims to go to a nearby college and become a pharmacist, which almost certainly would mean much better pay in a few years.

Serving behind the counter here, taking orders for sandwiches and baked goods, is her first job. She's using the money for a cellphone and a coming band trip to Texas.

Drawing on government data on the American workforce, labor economists highlight several patterns in the low-wage workforce:

• Most workers don't work the minimum wage for very long. Of workers who are 10 years into their careers, only about 13 percent have spent half or more of their career earning within $1.50 of the minimum wage, according to a 2001 study.

DOJ_NMG_0114227

• Minimum-wage workers are concentrated in low-skill service-sector occupations, including food service, retail, and motel housekeeping. Among Labor Department occupations, "leisure/ hospitality" leads the pack with 14.3 percent of workers earning $5.15 or less per hour. (Workers in some occupations such as food service can earn less than $5.15 if they earn enough tips to equal the minimum.) By contrast, just 0.4 percent of manufacturing workers earn minimum wage.

• Of the 6.6 million workers who would be directly affected by the proposed minimum-wage hike to $7.25 an hour, 61 percent are female, 29 percent are age 16 to 19, 21 percent are Hispanic, 16 percent are black, and 9 percent are single parents, according to the Economic Policy Institute.

Those numbers are all higher than the share of those groups in the total workforce. By contrast, 16 percent of those affected will be married parents - many fewer than the 29 percent of all workers who are in that group.

• Many low-wage workers also face a high level of job insecurity. People with low skills are more likely to be unemployed, according to government data. And many low-wage workers have only part-time jobs. Of those directly affected by the proposed wage hike, 21 percent work fewer than 20 hours per week, whereas just 5 percent of the overall workforce is in that category. In addition to low skills, barriers to employment can include substance abuse or mental illness and other disabilities. Low wages only a part of the problem

"There are two problems the poor have. One is low wages.... The other is not enough work hours, consistently, over time," says Timothy Bartik, an economist at the Upjohn Institute for Employment Research in Kalamazoo, Mich.

Here in Oklahoma, Hosier is grateful for full-time work. He figures that, for now, none of the other jobs available to him would be better paying.

And he likes working for an organization that's in the business of helping others, just as he has been helped by those around him.

"If I had a dollar in my pocket and someone asked me for 50 cents, I would give them that dollar," he adds. "The would make me feel good."

Fed's No. 2 Chills Hopes For A Rate Cut (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

Despite a recent decline in the nation's underlying inflation, it is "too early to relax our concerns" about price pressures, a top Federal Reserve official said, suggesting interest-rate cuts aren't yet on the table.

Fed Vice Chairman Donald Kohn also warned that long-term interest rates could jump if the Fed fails to cut short-term rates as much as the market expects or if there were a reversal in other factors holding down long-term rates.

A recent drop in core inflation, which excludes food and energy is "encouragingly consistent" with the Fed's forecast for a gradual decline in inflation, Mr. Kohn said in a speech to the Atlanta Rotary Club yesterday.

But he cautioned against "extrapolating trends from a couple of months of data," and said some of the recent slowdown in inflation may reflect "one-time influences," in particular the indirect effects of the big drop in energy costs. Moreover, companies may be holding the line on prices to keep inventories from rising, and "that restraint on pricing will dissipate" once inventories are in line with sales.

The remarks by Mr. Kohn, the Fed's most influential policy maker after Chairman Ben Bernanke, suggest little has changed in the central bank's outlook since it last met in December. At that meeting, it kept its short-term interest-rate target at 5.25%, said its principal concern remained inflation, and its main choice in coming months would be whether to raise rates or leave them unchanged.

Since that meeting, manufacturing activity and business investment have softened and inflation was reported to be low for the second month in a row. That has left investors wondering whether the Fed, at its next meeting Jan. 30-31, will release a "neutral" policy statement -- one that implies a rate increase is as likely as a rate cut. The Fed isn't expected to change rates at the meeting.

Mr. Kohn didn't address the prospect for any change in the Fed's stance. Still, his remarks suggest he continues to see higher inflation as a greater risk to the economy than weaker growth. The softening in manufacturing and capital spending "is not the leading edge of general economic weakness, but instead an adjustment to a sustained pace of expansion that, necessarily, is less rapid than that from mid-2003 to mid-2006," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0114228

He did, however, strike a note of caution on the housing market. "Tentative signs have begun to emerge that the housing market may be stabilizing," he said, and "housing starts may be not very far from their trough." But he added: "The risks around this outlook still are largely to the downside."

Housing prices are still high relative to their fundamental determinants, such as interest rates and residential rents, he said. The uncertainty is magnified by the fact housing isn't weakening for the usual reason: high interest rates. Rather, he said, the sector is weakening because sales and construction had risen so much, and it wasn't clear why.

Mr. Kohn also noted that long-term rates are "relatively low," which is supporting housing. He said long-term rates could rise if short-term rates "fail to follow the downward path currently built into market expectations," or if "term premiums" rise. The term premium is the additional interest rate a lender charges for a long-term loan, compared with a short-term one, that can't be explained by expectations of Fed policy.

Fed officials believe a lower term premium, while difficult to measure, is the main reason long-term rates are so low -- perhaps because of the market's increased faith in low, stable inflation. That is why they don't think the "inverted yield curve" -- or long-term rates that are lower than short-term ones -- foreshadows recession, as it has in the past. Indeed, low term premiums are one reason the Fed has decided not to lower short-term rates.

But because the reasons for the low term premium are unclear, there remains the chance of a sharp reversal. That could weaken the U.S. economy and encourage the Fed to lower short-term rates.

Meanwhile, a report released by the Fed yesterday showed that U.S. consumer credit grew more strongly than expected in November, as shoppers put their credit cards to heavy use.

Consumer credit, which excludes mortgage debt, rose at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of about $12.4 billion, or 6.2%, in November to $2.390 trillion. Analysts had predicted a $3 billion increase. Revolving credit, which mainly reflects credit-card financing, jumped 11.9% in November to $872.6 billion. Nonrevolving credit, mostly auto loans, rose 3% to $1.517 trillion.

Drop In Oil Price And Some More Mergers Lift Shares (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

Wall Street overcame early losses to close higher yesterday as a drop in oil prices and a fresh round of acquisition activity helped raise investors' confidence in the economy.

Gap, the clothing retailer, surged on a report that it was considering strategic alternatives for its business, which could include a sale. Some $6 billion worth of deals were announced, indicating that activity in mergers and acquisitions was off to a strong start in 2007 after reaching record levels last year.

Low energy prices also helped stocks reverse course from their earlier losses. Oil prices continued last week's decline, as a mild winter in the Eastern United States eased pressure on heating oil supplies. A barrel of light crude fell 22 cents, to $56.09, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Investors turned their attention toward fourth-quarter earnings reports, which start today when Alcoa posts results. Several profit warnings from companies including the airline company UAL, the electronics maker Molex and the telecommunications firm Tellabs prevented indexes from gaining broader momentum.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 25.48, or 0.21 percent, to 12,423.49. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was up 3.13, or 0.22 percent, at 1,412.84, and the Nasdaq composite index added 3.95, or 0.16 percent, to 2,438.20.

Gap rose $1.37, or 7.3 percent, to $20.26, after CNBC reported the retailer had hired Goldman Sachs to plot its future.

General Electric agreed to acquire Vetco Gray, a supplier of equipment for oil and gas fields, for about $1.9 billion. Shares of G.E. fell 1 cent, to $37.55, in regular trading, but rose 5 cents after the close.

The pharmacy benefit manager Caremark Rx rose 29 cents, to $56.64. Late Sunday, it rejected a $26 billion bid from a rival, Express Scripts, preferring a $22.2 billion offer from the drugstore chain CVS. Express Scripts was off 8 cents at $68.78, while CVS rose 18 cents, to $31.35.

DOJ_NMG_0114229

A profit warning from Molex sent shares down $1.52, or 4.9 percent, to $29.28. Tellabs, which makes telecommunications equipment, reduced its fourth-quarter guidance and its shares fell 47 cents, or 4.4 percent, to $10.25.

UAL, the parent of United Airlines, picked up 25 cents, to $46.80, despite saying it expected to post a loss during the fourth quarter because of December snowstorms in the Midwest. After trading hours, UAL dropped 9 cents, to $46.71.

Shares of St. Jude Medical, a maker of implantable defibrillators, climbed $1.95, or 5.57 percent, to close at $36.95 after it announced that fourth-quarter sales would come in at the upper end of its forecast. Analysts said St. Jude's announcement suggested that the market for the devices could be coming back.

St. Jude and two rivals, Boston Scientific and Medtronic, have struggled with falling sales since 2005 because of highly publicized safety problems. Medtronic's chief executive, Art Collins, said yesterday that his company planned to expand its presence in the implantable defibrillators market. Its shares rose 34 cents, to $53.70. Boston Scientific reported a 13 percent gain in defibrillator sales in the fourth quarter compared with the previous period. Its shares rose 71 cents, to $17.81.

Wal-Mart Stores dipped 39 cents, to $47, after it was downgraded by Goldman Sachs.

Bond prices were flat, and the yield on the 10-year Treasury note remained at 4.65 percent.

Following are the results of yesterday's auctions for three- and six-month Treasury bills:

Dow Industrials Gain 25.48 While Oil's Early Rally Fades (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

The stock market tiptoed higher, helped by a drop in oil prices, a speech by a central banker and upbeat comments from analysts on International Business Machines.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average inched up 25.48 points, or 0.21%, to 12423.49, off 0.3% on the year. Among the blue-chip indicator's components, the biggest gainer was IBM, which rose 1.5% after UBS analysts upgraded the technology bellwether to a buy rating from neutral.

The broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 0.22%, or 3.13 points, to 1412.84, off 0.4% on the year.

The Nasdaq Composite Index inched up 3.95 points, or 0.16%, to 2438.20, up 0.9% on the year. The tech-stock-led indicator's gains have been a rare bright spot for investors in this year's early going, which has otherwise been lackluster.

"I think we're seeing a little bit of payback for an extremely strong fourth quarter," said Philip Schlakman, a managing director at J.P. Morgan Private Bank, referring to modest early-2007 losses in the S&P and Dow, which enjoyed a run of record closes late last year.

An early rally in crude oil yesterday spooked stock investors, as crude contracts for February delivery jumped $1.41 to their intraday high on supply concerns and forecasts for colder weather in the Northeast.

As the session wore on, however, the gains evaporated, reflecting the strong bearish sentiment that has gripped the energy markets since last week.

February crude-oil contracts finished down 22 cents, or 0.39%, at $56.09 a barrel, down 8.1% after just four trading sessions this year on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Stock investors generally like to see energy prices fall because lower fuel prices leave more money in consumers' pocketbooks, which helps the profits of most companies.

Investors also received good news yesterday on interest rates, another key area of concern. In a speech to the Atlanta Rotary Club, Federal Reserve Vice Chairman Donald Kohn said that inflation appears to be easing in the economy -- a signal to some investors that the way may be clear for the central bank to begin cutting its key interest-rate target soon.

Looking ahead, aluminum giant Alcoa, a Dow component, is due to announce its earnings after today's market close, kicking off the fourth-quarter corporate-earnings season.

Outside the U.S., stocks eased in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, declined 0.04%, or 0.09 point, to 239.53.

In major U.S. market action:

DOJ_NMG_0114230

Stocks rose.1 Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.75 billion shares, as 1,952 stocks advanced and 1,349 fell.

Bond prices fell.2 The 10-year note fell 3/32 point, or 93.75 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.658%.

The dollar was mixed.3 Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 118.75 yen, compared with 118.68. The euro rose to $1.3022, compared with $1.3003.

Reapportionment: Good News For GOP? (RC)

By Louis Jacobson

Roll Call, January 9, 2007

When Election Data Services late last month released projections of which states are poised to gain and lose Congressional seats based on the 2010 Census, Republicans cheered.

The numbers showed that GOP-leaning states in the Sun Belt continue to outpace the more Democratic Northeast and Midwest in population growth. But projecting whether the Republicans truly will gain ground after the post-2010 reapportionment requires a more micro-level look at the states in question.

According to the EDS, the states that are set to gain at least one seat after 2010 — if current demographic trends hold — are Arizona, Florida, Georgia, Nevada, Texas and Utah. Each voted for President Bush in 2000 and 2004, and the GOP controls both the Legislature and the governorship in Florida, Georgia, Texas and Utah. The GOP also controls one chamber plus the governorship in Nevada.

Here is a rundown of what may be in store in the states that could gain seats after 2010:

Arizona. On Nov. 7, the Arizona delegation shifted from 6-2 Republican to a 4-4 tie. Both new Democratic House Members — Reps. Gabrielle Giffords and Harry Mitchell — likely will get serious GOP challenges in 2008, and given the state's historical red tinge, Republicans will look to gain ground if new seats materialize after 2010. The problem for the GOP is that an independent redistricting commission, not the Republican-controlled Legislature, is charged with drawing the lines.

Currently, Republican and independent registration levels are healthy, said one GOP lobbyist in the state. But the growth of the Hispanic population — and the evolution of Latinos' political leanings — remains a wild card.

Florida. There's little question that the Florida GOP has worked hard to maximize Republican seats. But some demographic realities may make it harder for Republicans to do so in the future.

There are at least three factors that could play a role, said University of South Florida political scientist Susan MacManus. One is the growing number of independents, who account for almost one in four voters and whose voting patterns fluctuate tremendously, she said. Another factor — which already emerged in the 2006 midterms, she said — is population shifts from expensive areas of the state to more affordable jurisdictions.

And the third issue will have to do with how Florida Hispanics divide their vote. "Generational cracks are evident in the once solidly Republican Cuban population, and the non-Cuban population now outnumbers the state's Cuban electorate," MacManus said.

Georgia. While few states have been moving as steadily in the Republicans' direction, partisanship may be less of a consideration during the next round of redistricting.

After an aggressive pro-Democratic map was enacted after the 2000 Census and a more pro-Republican map enacted by a newly installed GOP Legislature prior to the 2004 elections, Gov. Sonny Perdue (R) convened a task force to study how redistricting should be done in the future. Late last year the panel recommended the formation of an independent commission that would present maps to the Legislature for an up-or-down vote. It remains to be seen whether this idea will be enacted.

No matter what happens, Democratic Reps. John Barrow and Jim Marshall, who won very narrow victories in 2006, remain vulnerable for the foreseeable future.

Nevada. If the Legislature remains under divided control, as it currently is, the consensus is that Nevada probably will end up with its current allotment of one safe GOP seat, one safe Democratic seat, one competitive seat that Rep. Jon Porter (R) consistently has held, plus one newly created seat that will be competitive between the parties.

DOJ_NMG_0114231

Even beyond the question of who controls the Legislature after 2010, it will be difficult for the GOP to craft a new safe GOP seat "because rock-ribbed GOP voters mostly live in rural Nevada," said Las Vegas-based political columnist Jon Ralston. "That's not growing and is now only 15 percent of the vote."

Given that reality, carving out another safe GOP seat would require not just creative line-drawing but also a dilution of the GOP strength in either the Porter seat or the district held by freshman Rep. Dean Heller (R). While the latter district is fairly solid for the GOP, it was competitive when it came open in 2006.

"The question really will come down to whether the state Legislature has the courage to make two districts out of rural Nevada, meaning that both would have some of Clark County, too," said one Republican in the state, referring to the heavily urbanized county that includes Las Vegas. "The debate will have more to do with whether rural Nevada will be better represented with a single Member or by having two Members looking out for its interests — but also for Las Vegas."

Texas. The re-redistricting pushed by then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R) prior to the 2004 elections may have made the Lone Star State Congressional delegation more reflective of Texas' GOP leanings, but it also may have maxed out potential GOP gains.

While Republicans may be able to flip a seat in 2008 by ousting DeLay's Democratic successor, Rep. Nick Lampson, the longer-term demographic trends point in the Democrats' direction. They are "little Anglo growth, pretty good increases in the black and Asian populations, and explosive Hispanic growth," said University of Houston political scientist Richard Murray.

Even if the Texas GOP operates with total control of the redistricting process, as is the case now, Hispanic-dominated areas in the Dallas-Fort Worth and Houston areas could benefit.

"A very big variable, of course, is who controls the presidency, and with it the Voting Rights Division of the Department of Justice," Murray said. "A Democratic DOJ would put great pressure on the Texas Legislature to recognize the additional 3 million Hispanics the census will count — they will go from 6.6 [million] to 9.5 million, Anglos from 10.5 [million] to 11.1 million — with additional urban-based seats."

In a special runoff last month, Republican Rep. Henry Bonilla lost his House seat to now-Rep. Ciro Rodriguez (D) following a Supreme Court ruling that required redrawing of districts to conform with the Voting Rights Act.

Utah. Unlike the other states on this list, Utah already has drawn a map with an additional district, as a preparatory step for proposed legislation that would add one Utah Congressional seat in tandem with one for the District of Columbia. The plan did not win passage in the 109th Congress, but it is given decent odds in the 110th.

The map approved by the Legislature appears to strengthen Democratic Rep. Jim Matheson, a frequent GOP target, by taking away most of the rural portions of his 2nd district. (Earlier proposals to try to create four winnable districts for the GOP fell by the wayside after pressure from GOP Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr., among others.)

"It's nearly certain that a new fourth seat will be safe Republican," said Utah-based GOP consultant LaVarr Webb. "If Democratic Rep. Jim Matheson is given a district that leans Democratic, then mathematically, the three remaining districts will be Republican. It would be possible to create four Republican-leaning districts, but since Matheson has shown he can win among Republicans, the prevailing sentiment in the Legislature seems to be to concentrate the strong Democratic areas — mostly around Salt Lake City and Park City — in his district, which leaves three strong Republican districts."

In the meantime, Iowa, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Missouri, New York, Ohio and Pennsylvania risk losing seats after the next Census, according to the EDS. The potential partisan consequences in these states remain a bit muddy, but Democrats will have to worry about potentially losing seats in hurricane-ravaged Louisiana as well as in Massachusetts, where a one-seat reduction almost certainly would result in a Democratic setback since the state delegation is now entirely Democratic.

On the other hand, if the Democrats can keep their winning streak going in New York, they may be able to erase the decades-old GOP hold on the state Senate. With unified Democratic control, they likely would be able to squeeze out a GOP Congressional seat.

Setting aside the Congressional consequences of population growth and reapportionment, Republicans can feel safe look forward to one new favorable development after 2010. Gaining a seat each in Georgia, Texas and Utah essentially would give the Republicans three more assured electoral votes for president. Arizona, Florida and Nevada would offer electoral votes that are more competitive, even though these states lean Republican at the presidential level.

DOJ_NMG_0114232

In Fla., GOP Hopes For Two Pick-ups Where It Just Suffered Two Losses (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, January 9, 2007

Sid Dinerstein, chairman of the Republican Party of Palm Beach County, left for a Caribbean cruise Monday following a midterm election season that saw Republican losses in both of the area's congressional districts, one amid a national scandal.

"That's why we're going on the cruise," Dinerstein said. "We've had a hell of a year."

With Rep. Clay Shaw Jr. and state Sen. Joe Negron, who ran a late race for disgraced Rep. Mark Foley's seat, defeated, Dinerstein said he immediately turned his attention to reclaiming the seats in 2008.

Those districts, now represented by Democratic Reps. Ron Klein and Tim Mahoney, have already begun to draw serious interest from local Republicans looking at 2008.

Both races were close last year, with Klein defeating Shaw 51 percent to 47 percent, and Negron, despite having to run on the ballot as Mark Foley, narrowly losing with 48 percent to Mahoney's 50 percent.

In Mahoney's 16th district, Dinerstein said Negron is considering another run, and state Rep. Gayle Harrell, who stepped aside for Negron after Foley resigned with little time on the clock, said she is eyeing the seat as well.

"I am certainly looking at that possibility," Harrell said. "I'm looking at the whole situation, whether it's a primary or certainly the general."

For his part, Mahoney said he will fight hard for reelection. His early positioning and leadership on ethics reform — a fitting topic given the Foley scandal — could serve as a cornerstone issue for his reelection campaign, Mahoney said.

"My concern is much greater than the page scandal," Mahoney said, pointing to a comment piece he wrote about the need for congressional ethics reform months before the Foley scandal broke.

"The things I'm doing today are things I promised to voters more than 15 months ago, and that's only in the first two days," Mahoney said. "I think we're off to a very, very good start here."

As for Klein's seat, Dinerstein confirmed that Shaw would not try to retake the seat he held for 26 years, citing health issues and a desire to spend more time with his family. Dinerstein did say he has spoken with four potential candidates who "claim to be seriously interested."

Though he wouldn't disclose the names of those who might run, Dinerstein said he would meet with the four when he returned from his cruise and try to cut that number to two viable candidates.

Klein said he has already spoken with the new Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee chairman, Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), about the need to start raising money and the importance of opening constituent offices quickly.

"We're hitting the ground running," Klein said. "I don't think anyone is taking it for granted. I'm certainly not."

Klein and Mahoney are two of five freshmen appointed to the House Financial Services Committee, seats that allow them to focus time and energy on the issue of rising homeowner insurance costs. In the hurricane-prone area of South Florida, such representation is crucial, Klein said.

As for the anger aimed at Republican incumbents, especially in these two Florida districts, Dinerstein said in many ways it was deserved.

"The voters down here were angry at us Republicans before the Foley thing," he said, adding that the party had virtually conceded their strongest issues of fiscal responsibility and ethics.

"All of the sudden, Republicans in Washington have found fiscal religion," he said.

Those issues aside, Dinerstein said the tsunami that was the Foley scandal remained in the district long after the national attention had moved to former Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). That said, Dinerstein believes that much of the local fury directed at the party has subsided, and that now is the time for the GOP to get back to its core issues of fiscal responsibility, ethics and strong foreign policy.

And while attempting to retake the two Florida seats they lost in 2006, Dinerstein said Palm Beach County Republicans' first priority is to deliver the notorious electoral area to a Republican presidential candidate in 2008.

The early polling leader and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani is Dinerstein's odds-on favorite to do well in South Florida.

DOJ_NMG_0114233

"The people that I bump into love Rudy Giuliani," he said. "He's king down here."

Giuliani, who stumped in the area twice for Shaw in 2006 and twice for President Bush in 2004, "owns South Florida on our side of the aisle and gets huge crossovers" from Democrats and independents for his desire to cut taxes and for "standing up to bad guys."

Dinerstein said some Republicans' concerns about Giuliani's social leanings are similar to those he saw with new Gov. Charlie Crist (R), which, in the end, fell by the wayside to a pragmatic GOP looking to retain the governor's mansion.

And while South Florida may be Giuliani territory, Dinerstein said he has heard that much of the rest of the state is excited about former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, whom the chairman is trying to lure to South Florida early this year for either a rally or a small meeting with area donors.

But Dinerstein said that like Giuliani, Romney's social leanings are of concern to many Republicans.

"Here's a guy who in the past minute and a half has gone from being a social centrist … to Jerry Falwell," Dinerstein said, adding that such perceived repositioning caused significant damage to Crist's primary challenger, Tom Gallagher.

Dinerstein said plans for an October 2007 straw poll — one way to determine the early leader for the state's crucial votes — are again in the works.

New Districts Cause Headaches For Ga. Reps. (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton

Roll Call, January 9, 2007

Aside from redoing the stationery, changing those office signs and reaching out to new constituents, there is one very important thing the four Georgia Representatives who switched district numbers for the 110th Congress have to deal with: misdirected e-mail.

In 2005 the Georgia Legislature decided to redo the state's Congressional districts. By the time the process was completed, four Members saw their district numbers flip — Republican Rep. Lynn Westmoreland exchanged the 8th district for Rep. Jim Marshall's (D) 3rd, while Rep. Nathan Deal (R), the former 10th district Representative, began to serve residents of Georgia's 9th, switching numbers with Rep. Charlie Norwood (R).

Mix those changes with new district lines, and it's a recipe for confusion.

"Our people are having to figure out who their Member is, for one thing," said Brian Robinson, Westmoreland's press secretary. "And we're having to reprogram the computer system to let it know who our constituents are."

The e-mail confusion mainly comes into play when constituents type their ZIP code into the "Write Your Representative" feature on the House Web site. While the computer can find the district, it is not aware of the number change.

"A lot of our mail is getting e-mailed to Jim Marshall's office, and a lot of Marshall's constituent e-mail is being sent to us," Robinson said. "We're having to work that out with the computer people."

And don't forget that the Georgia Members still have to deal with the other logistics that came with a new Congress in which leaders are promising to work five days a week.

"It is kind of challenging," said Doug Moore, communications director for Marshall. "We spent two terms being the 3rd district. Now they switch us to the 8th, so we have to get all-new everything. New letterhead, new business cards for everybody, even down to changing the voice mail that everybody has."

On the e-mail front, both Moore and Robinson said information technology staffers are working to correct the problem as quickly as possible, although overcoming the glitches isn't an easy task.

"I do feel for them, because it does seem like a gratuitous job," Moore said.

And until that work is done, the two offices plan to work together to deliver constituent e-mail, despite their party differences.

"Their hands are tied, too, because we have their constituent mail," Robinson joked. "We both have hostages to negotiate over."

While Marshall and Westmoreland are forced to exchange constituent e-mails, things are going a bit smoother for Deal and Norwood — but there's still work to be done.

DOJ_NMG_0114234

Chris Riley, Deal's chief of staff, said the most difficult part of the transition came during the elections, because while Deal represented the 10th district, he was running for the 9th.

After Deal was re-elected in November, IT staffers were able to do much of the groundwork for the transition, Riley said.

"We haven't had that many hiccups," he added. "We may have a few, but those haven't been brought to my attention yet. ... That's not to say you can't go to our Web page and find a problem."

(In fact, as of Monday night, Deal's Web site still him listed at the 10th district Representative.)

For veteran Norwood staffers, the change to representing the 10th district might be a bit of a headache but isn't unheard of. Norwood has gone through three district-number changes and four redistricting efforts since becoming a Congressman in 1995.

When Norwood first entered Congress, he actually represented Georgia's 10th district, which is geographically different from the 10th district of today.

"At this time, Charlie's represented probably a third of Georgia," said John Stone, Norwood's communications director.

With that experience, staffers knew ahead of time they would need to make the transition a priority. Last year, Norwood's office reached out to constituents through e-mails and news releases, letting those Georgians in counties affected by redistricting know whom their new Representative would be.

Marshall did the same thing, Moore said, paying particular attention to counties the Congressman wouldn't be representing once 2007 arrived.

"We have a lot of territory and counties we lost, so they still call us," Moore said. "A lot of time, they have a relationship with us."

After the 109th Congress adjourned, technology staffers began to go through Norwood's Web site, page by page, to make sure everything that needed to be changed to the 10th district was fixed, Stone said.

"We have to get everything changed over. We're doing it first on the Web, then stationery," Stone said. "There's still some cleanup work."

Of course, the district number confusion isn't just limited to office logistics. Many publications — including Roll Call — mixed up the district numbers in various election results articles and features, Robinson said.

"Every single major media outlet did that," Moore added. "I had to call and correct them repeatedly."

For his part, Riley predicted Morrison and Westmoreland would have their constituent e-mail reaching them soon.

"Mr. Westmoreland has the smartest IT guy on the Hill," Riley said. "So if Brian Tyson can't figure it out, it's hopeless for the rest of us."

Sununu Has Big Target On His Back (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, January 9, 2007

New Hampshire was good to Democrats last year, handing them both House seats in the midterm elections. Now the resurgent party thinks a Senate seat can be wrested from GOP control as well.

Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) recently called first-term Sen. John Sununu (N.H.) one of the three most vulnerable Republican Senators up for re-election in 2008. His claim echoes what Granite State Democrats believe.

"I think Sununu will have problems in 2008 that go beyond [President] George Bush and goes to John Sununu, his voting record, and who he is," said Kathy Sullivan, chairwoman of the state Democratic Party.

On election night, when New Hampshire voters tossed out Republican Reps. Charles Bass and Jeb Bradley, Democratic activists immediately turned their attention to Sununu, saying "he's next," Sullivan related.

At least one potential Democratic challenger, Portsmouth Mayor Steve Marchand, is seriously readying for a bid.

Marchand, who turns 33 on Wednesday, said he's looking at the feasibility of a Senate run and determining if he can raise the considerable amount of money it will take to unseat Sununu.

"I have people in position to work on a campaign," he said. "I am interviewing folks and will continue to so that if and when we decide to do it, we're in a position to begin with a running start."

DOJ_NMG_0114235

Marchand, who was first elected mayor of the 23,000-population seacoast town in 2005, said he will decide sometime in February.

Having worked on his own campaign and those of others, Marchand said he has "a good appreciation" for how challenging a Senate campaign will be. He has reached out to national and state Democrats and is looking at the financial picture.

While he has not spoken to Schumer yet, Marchand said doing so is a "high priority."

Other potential candidates include state Sen. David Gottesman (D) and Gary Hirshberg, president of Stonyfield Farm, the Londonderry, N.H.-based yogurt company.

Former Gov. Jeanne Shaheen (D), who narrowly lost to Sununu in 2002, has been touted as another top potential contender. But while she and her husband, David, remain active in Granite State politics, the former governor is the president of the Institute of Politics at the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University and is not likely to try again, knowledgeable Democrats privately concede.

"Jeanne is really enjoying her work with students and faculty at the Institute of Politics, and has no other plans at this time," said Esten Perez, communications director for the institute.

Hirshberg, who did not return calls for this story, is a regular contributor to Democratic candidates and parties.

During the 2004 and 2006 cycles, he and his wife, Meg, gave $36,450 to candidates and parties, including $10,000 to the Democratic National Committee.

Gottesman just said: "At this time, I can only say that I have not ruled out any options that I have for elected office, but am focused on my job as a New Hampshire state Senator."

Democrats have just taken control of the New Hampshire Legislature for the first time in decades.

"After what happened in 2006, I don't think we'll have trouble finding someone to run," Sullivan said.

Sununu, who had more than $560,000 in his campaign account as of Sept. 30, did not address Democrats' enthusiasm about unseating him, nor was he ready to discuss the upcoming campaign in detail. Sununu spent $3.5 million on his first Senate race, and Shaheen spent $5.8 million that year.

Year-end campaign finance reports are not due until Jan. 31.

"As they have always been, our campaign in 2008 will be an aggressive town to town, person to person effort — strong on grassroots organization and focused on the issues that matter most to New Hampshire citizens," Sununu said in a statement.

Officials for the New Hampshire Republican Party declined to comment, as did the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

Meanwhile, Marchand already seems to have his sound bites and campaign themes ready.

He describes himself as fiscally conservative, moderate on social issues and progressive on environmental issues — a mix he says meshes very well with New Hampshire voters, who tend to be more libertarian than conservative or liberal.

"Sen. Sununu in general has become more conservative on many key issues over time, while New Hampshire continues to moderate in a lot of important ways," Marchand said.

As for his relative youth, Marchand, who previously worked for The Concord Coalition and the AARP, said he has enough experience to make up for it.

"I'll be 34 in 2008 and I'll have been a mayor," Marchand said. "That should trump being the son of a former governor."

Sununu's father, John Sununu, was a Republican governor of New Hampshire and chief of staff to former President George H.W. Bush.

"Sununu first ran for federal office in 1996 when he was 32 and never held elected office," Marchand pointed out.

At 42, Sununu currently is the youngest member of the Senate.

Sullivan said she thinks the 2006 elections may have represented a "fundamental change" in New Hampshire voting patterns.

Even so, New Hampshire soon will be caught up in the whirlwind of the presidential primary, which could take focus off the Senate race.

Sullivan said she does not think that will happen.

DOJ_NMG_0114236

"We were able to unseat a first-term governor in 2004 during a very hotly contested presidential contest," she said.

Marchand said he thinks the presidential focus actually may bring more attention to the Senate race.

"I'd argue it's a unique opportunity to gain exposure," he said. "This is going to be a closely contested Senate for the foreseeable future and every seat is going to matter."

Party leaders, and presidential hopefuls, understand that and will not let the Senate race fall by the wayside, he said.

"I've had conversations with many [presidential hopefuls] personally, and certainly their staffs, and they understand how critical the race is," Marchand said. "The New Hampshire [presidential] primary can never be a hindrance."

Johnson's Re-election Plans On Hold (RC)

By David M. Drucker, Roll Call Staff

Roll Call, January 9, 2007

Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.), experiencing a slow but encouraging recovery from a Dec. 13 collapse, has put his re-election plans on hold, plunging a key Senate battleground into uncertainty.

A spokeswoman said Monday that the Senator's health will dictate whether a 2008 bid, which had been on track until illness struck, can eventually resume.

Johnson had long ago started raising money, and he was beginning to assemble a campaign staff and mull over when to announce his bid for a third term when he was hospitalized for a brain hemorrhage. Those re-election plans are now in limbo as his health and ability to wage what could be a very demanding Senate race are assessed.

"Things are on hold to prioritize the most important thing, and that's got to be his health," Johnson spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said. "It's just a matter of how long the recovery process is going to be. We're still in a holding [pattern] on that one."

Johnson, who turned 60 two weeks ago, had nearly $651,000 in cash on hand as of Sept. 30.

Despite Johnson's good standing at home and the fact that he held off now-Sen. John Thune (R) in a tough re-election bid back in 2002, the Democrat likely faced a battle in 2008 because of his state's strong Republican tilt and the fact that GOP candidates often have an advantage in South Dakota when they run in presidential cycles.

Thune, after losing to Johnson by 524 votes in the off year of 2002, beat then-Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle (D) by 2 points in 2004 while President Bush was defeating Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) by 22 points.

Johnson's ability to run a race that could be every bit as rigorous as his 2002 victory, when he and Thune spent a combined $12.1 million in a campaign for 334,438 total votes, could be determined not just by his overall health — which doctors say is improving — but by how long his recovery takes.

Patrick Davis, a Denver-based Republican consultant and native South Dakotan who served as political director of the National Republican Senatorial Committee in 2004, speculated that Johnson would ultimately choose not to run for re-election. He said the rigors required to wage a successful South Dakota Senate race — particularly in a presidential cycle — would be significant considering his current health problems.

"I don't think Tim runs again," Davis said.

The latest battery of tests conducted on Johnson last week indicated no traces of the condition that caused his illness. The Senator was diagnosed with a congenital blood vessel disorder known as arteriovenous malformation after being admitted to the hospital in December.

Johnson's aides said this week that Johnson was still breathing with the aide of a tube, though to a lesser extent than in recent weeks, as he is now able to breathe on his own most of the time.

For fear of appearing impolitic and insensitive, both Democrats and Republicans have been reluctant to comment on how Johnson affects South Dakota's status as a target on the 2008 Senate map, let alone the political plans of prospective candidates.

But it's clear that should Johnson choose not to run for re-election, a race that was sure to be hotly contested could get even hotter.

DOJ_NMG_0114237

Rep. Stephanie Herseth, currently seen as the candidate Democrats are most likely to turn to should Johnson retire, has declined to go anywhere near the issue. Her spokesman would say only that Herseth looks forward to Johnson making a full recovery.

"It's too soon for any kind of speculation like that," Herseth spokesman Russ Levsen said, when asked if his boss would consider running for Senate if Johnson doesn't.

Steve Hildebrand, a Democratic consultant based in South Dakota and former Daschle adviser, argued that it's far too soon to discuss what happens if Johnson retires. He said Johnson's approval ratings were solid prior to his illness and that it wasn't necessarily a given that he was going to face a tough challenge from a formidable Republican.

The state has rallied around the Senator since his collapse, with churchgoers praying for his return to good health every Sunday, Hildebrand said.

With approval ratings that Hildebrand said are higher than Thune's and above what Daschle's were in 2004, Hildebrand believes only popular Gov. Mike Rounds (R) could pose a serious challenge to the Democratic incumbent. But Hildebrand described Rounds as risk-averse — a sentiment echoed by Davis — and therefore doesn't expect him to run.

"Any of us who firmly believe Tim will make a full recovery are not considering any 'what-if' scenarios," Hildebrand said. "All of us have hope and faith that Tim will be back in full health and running for re-election."

Republicans have five candidates who are considered by GOP sources to be serious contenders regardless of what Johnson does, beginning with Rounds.

Davis predicted Rounds would run only if Johnson retires. Davis said Rounds would be all but unbeatable if the seat opens up — including against Herseth, who he speculated would not run against the governor, as the 36-year-old Congresswoman's House seat appears to be hers for as long as she wants it.

Absent a Rounds candidacy, which would clear the GOP primary field, Republicans could be in trouble, Davis said. He believes South Dakotans as a whole are more likely to support a "middle-of-the-road" GOP candidate in 2008 than one positioned on the far right of the party, but he said such a candidate is exactly what the GOP will probably nominate if the governor doesn't run.

"I do think [Rounds] runs if it's an open seat. But I don't think he runs against Johnson — healthy or not," Davis said. "Johnson is a street fighter; he's a great, great politician."

Rounds, who was working Monday on his State of the State address, declined through a spokeswoman to comment on whether he is considering a run for Senate in 2008.

In addition to Rounds, the potential Republican field includes former Lt. Gov. Steve Kirby, who probably could afford to self-finance a Senate race if he chose to; current Lt. Gov. Dennis Daugaard; state Sen. Dave Knudson; and Public Utilities Commission Chairman Dusty Johnson.

Romney Makes It Official And Asks For '08 Cash In A Big Way (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

BOSTON, Jan. 8 — Presidential campaign fund-raising operations are usually run well out of public sight, reflecting their status as essential, if slightly unseemly, requirements for running for the White House.

That is what made what happened here early Monday morning striking. Over 400 people, including corporate executives, governors, wealthy Republican donors and party operatives, gathered around telephones and computer screens stretched out over a huge convention center room for a day of public fund-raising on behalf of Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor who created a presidential exploratory committee last week. Television camera crews and reporters circled the room as Mr. Romney's aides provided a running tally of how much had been raised.

For Mr. Romney, this high-tech fund-raiser, with new fund-raising software rolled out to mark the occasion, amounted to a public declaration for the White House, as he marched out with his family for his first major event since leaving the Statehouse.

DOJ_NMG_0114238

And as Mr. Romney announced at day's end that he had drawn a $6.5 million one-day haul in cash and commitments, it was also a striking example of just how important fund-raising has become as a test for presidential viability, this year more than most, with the race dominated by high-profile candidates, most of whom are unlikely to participate in the public financing system.

"This has never been done before," Mr. Romney said, standing in the middle of an elaborate set, a wireless microphone planted on his body. "This is the most advanced technology ever employed as a fund-raising effort."

Politically, the display of fund-raising and organizational prowess was intended to put Mr. Romney back on the map after a tough month in which his conservative credentials have come under attack because of questions about his evolving positions on abortion and gay rights. If the immediate audience for this fund-raising event were his own supporters and the press, it was aimed just as much at other prospective Republican candidates. Those include Senator John McCain of Arizona and Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former New York mayor, but also some lesser-known candidates on the right, like Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas and Mike Huckabee, the former governor of Arizona, who have been emboldened at the sight of Mr. Romney struggling.

"It's going to send a strong message to McCain as well as to Giuliani, but also to all those other guys who might be thinking of getting in," said Thomas R. Tellefsen, who was recruited from the upper ranks of President Bush's fund-raisers to spend a day sitting in front of a computer screen.

Spencer Zwick, a longtime Romney associate who is now his national finance director, said: "We do know in political fund-raising, money talks, but early money screams. That's what we're trying to do."

No expense was spared for "The National Call Day" in the gleaming new Boston Convention and Exhibition Center. Callers were delivered boxed lunches at their seats. Huge video screens displayed a biographical film of Mr. Romney, who dutifully emphasized his opposition to abortion rights and same-sex marriage. The software, based on programs used by telemarketing sales forces, was designed exclusively for Mr. Romney and called ComMITT.

"People are waiting to see Ed McMahon flash up the latest number on the tote board," said Tom Rath, a veteran New Hampshire Republican leader who is a senior adviser to Mr. Romney.

The Romney campaign, indulging in a rather old trick from the political book, started off the day with a low-ball prediction that they would gather $1 million in pledges and commitments. With a group this large, and this well connected, a take like that would have been disappointing, so the final result gave Mr. Romney a chance to come out and announce he was "blown away" by the outcome.

Mr. Romney's supporters came armed with lists of friends and, in the case of politicians, their own contributors. A lot of internal planning had gone into the day, so the recipients of calls asking for donations of $2,100, the legal limit, were not surprised. And Mr. Romney was certainly not taking any chances. When it came time for him to make a fund-raising call, piped over the loudspeaker and in front of a crush of cameras, he chose to call his older sister, Lynn Keenan, at her home outside Detroit.

Still the image of, say, the governor of Missouri, Matt Blunt, sitting at one table, and the head of a major corporation dialing for dollars was certainly unusual.

"I've never done anything like this before," said Meg Whitman, the chief executive of eBay, in a break from her callers. "I start out by saying: 'You won't believe where I am! I'm at the Boston Convention Center with four or five hundred other people dialing for contributions for Mitt Romney.' "

The figure put out by Mr. Romney includes pledges as well as checks, Mr. Romney's aides said they were confident that most of that money would also come in. It also was the result of going after what Mr. Tellefsen called "low-hanging fruit."

Mr. Romney laughed when asked if he thought the campaign would be able to keep up this pace, though he characterized it as an affirmation of the potential appeal of a candidate who remains relatively little-known outside Republican circles.

"I don't think $6.5 million a day is likely to be sustained," he said, adding, "This is not a big flash and disappearance."

Mr. Romney's advisers have said they would like to raise around $100 million before the primaries. With the presidential primary contests coming fast and early next year, there is a premium on candidates' raising money as quickly as possible so they can leave the telephones and be free to do public events in early primary states.

Romney, High-profile Friends Call For Election Cash (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0114239

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

BOSTON -- Mitt Romney figured he needed something to wow the politicos for the first event of his young presidential campaign, so he put together yesterday's first-ever telemarketing fundraiser featuring governors and high-powered CEOs gathered together to dial for dollars -- more than $6.5 million raised in one day.

"I'm overwhelmed by the support, I'm heartened by the friendships and I'm optimistic about the future," Mr. Romney, a Republican, said as he announced the total to reporters yesterday evening, adding that it was a major statement about the ability to compete for "a guy who is not terribly well-known -- me."

It was an impressive entry for the former governor of Massachusetts into the so-called "invisible primary," the period before the actual 2008 primaries and caucuses, when candidates flaunt their fundraising prowess, show off their organizational skills and even try a few gimmicks to prove they can compete and to scare other potential candidates from entering the field.

"I think it's going to be a very strong message today to everybody -- I think it's going to be a strong message to [Sen. John] McCain as well as to [former New York Mayor Rudolph W.] Giuliani, and I think it's going to be a strong message to those that are considering or haven't really yet laid the groundwork," said Thomas Tellefsen, one of the co-chairmen of Mr. Romney's national finance team, naming the top Republican candidates in current primary polling.

Mr. Romney ended his term as governor of Massachusetts last week, the day after he announced formation of a committee to explore a run for president. An announcement on an official presidential committee is expected some time this winter.

In addition to yesterday's event to prove his fundraising credentials, Mr. Romney has also used this first official week to try to quell concerns among social conservatives about past remarks.

"Now, I wasn't always a Ronald Reagan conservative. Neither was Ronald Reagan, by the way. And perhaps some in this room have had the opportunity to listen, learn and benefit from life's experience -- and to grow in wisdom, as I have," he told a gathering of conservatives and major Republican donors in Sea Island, Ga.

"My life experience convinced me that Ronald Reagan was right. I'm a conservative that gets the job done. And you don't just have to take my word for it, you can just look at my record," he said.

While that weekend appearance was about honing a message, yesterday's event was all about proving fundraising and organizational skills.

The campaign rented out the grand ballroom at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center and had nearly 400 stations set up with telephones and laptops computers for the high-powered callers to take credit-card information down on the spot.

After a legal briefing by the campaign's lawyer, an introductory inspirational video about Mr. Romney and some opening remarks from the candidate and his wife, the calls began. The callers -- among them Meg Whitman, the president and CEO of EBay, and Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt, a Republican -- called their own lists of friends and colleagues to ask them to contribute. The campaign said the volunteers made about 15,000 outbound calls.

"In political fundraising, money talks, but early money screams," said Spencer Zwick, the campaign's finance director.

Mr. Tellefsen, who was one of the elite fundraisers for President Bush in 2004, attended Harvard Business School with both Mr. Bush and Mr. Romney and said Mr. Romney "was much smarter than both of us."

"The president and governor and I were all in the business school, but he also was in the law school and he graduated in the top part of his class in both of those things," Mr. Tellefsen said.

Romney Kicks Off Fundraising Campaign (AP)

By Glen Johnson

AP, January 9, 2007

White House hopeful Mitt Romney and 400 of his backers raised more than $6.5 million on Monday in a glitzy fundraising blitz that will force all Republican rivals to take notice.

"They've come together and blown us away today, and humbled us at the same time," said the former Massachusetts governor as he clutched the hand of his wife, Ann.

DOJ_NMG_0114240

The figure dwarfed the $2 million that Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., raised and the $1 million collected by former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani. Like Romney, the two have created committees exploring bids for the GOP's presidential nomination.

While Romney said he was not trying to send a message to anyone but his supporters, one of his national fundraising co-chairman disagreed.

"I think it's going to be a very strong message today — to everybody," said Tom Tellefsen, a classmate of Romney's at Harvard Business School and a top fundraiser for President Bush. "I think it's going to be a strong message to McCain as well as Giuliani, and I think it's going to be a strong message to those that are considering or haven't really yet laid the groundwork that maybe they should have."

The event at the Boston Convention & Exhibition Center featured a four-screen projection TV system hung from the center of a ceiling, displaying pictures that included Romney in the Oval Office and at the presidential lectern.

Besides the "National Call Day" event, Romney also sought over the weekend to shore up his support among evangelicals who have been dismayed to learn that he ran as a moderate for the U.S. Senate in 1994, as well as for Massachusetts governor in 2002.

He now is staunchly opposed to gay marriage, and says he supports a state-by-state approach to abortion rights.

"Now, I wasn't always a Ronald Reagan conservative. Neither was Ronald Reagan, by the way. And perhaps some in this room have had the opportunity to listen, learn, and benefit from life's experience — and to grow in wisdom, as I have," Romney said at a conservative gathering in Sea Island, Ga.

"My life experience convinced me that Ronald Reagan was right. I'm a conservative that gets the job done. And you don't just have to take my word for it, you can just look at my record," he added.

While Romney's presidential committee is still labeled "exploratory," he and his staff have made it clear they are in the race to win.

In e-mails sent last week, two of Romney's sons estimated he would need to raise $100 million to be among the "serious contenders" for the nomination. The stated goal on Monday was $1 million.

___

NEW YORK (AP) — Civil rights activist Al Sharpton said Monday he is seriously considering a run for president.

"I don't hear any reason not to," Sharpton, 52, said in an interview during an urban affairs conference sponsored by another civil rights leader, the Rev. Jesse Jackson.

"If we're talking about the urban agenda, can you tell me anybody else in the field who's representing that right now?" Sharpton asked. "We clearly have a reason to run, and whether we do it or not we'll see over the next couple of months."

Sharpton mounted a long-shot bid for the White House in 2004, in which his wit and fiery denunciation of President Bush often enlivened Democratic primary debates. He dropped out of the race after losing several state primaries and endorsed the eventual nominee, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry.

Despite widespread interest in the likely candidacy of another influential black Democrat, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, Sharpton said he's heard little substantive discussion of issues that might influence his decision about running.

"Right now we're hearing a lot of media razzle dazzle," Sharpton said. "I'm not hearing a lot of meat, or a lot of content. I think when the meat hits the fire, we'll find out if it's just fat or if there's some real meat there."

Sharpton said the candidate who impressed him most so far was former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, who has made poverty the central issue of his campaign. Sharpton ran for the Senate from New York in 1988, 1992 and 1994, and ran for New York City mayor in 1997.

___

ORANGEBURG, S.C. (AP) — Democrats will hold the first debate of the 2008 campaign on April 26, 2007 in South Carolina.

The hour and a half debate will be held at South Carolina State University, a historically black college, and will be televised by MSNBC, state party officials said Monday.

South Carolina was selected as an early voting state in a move intended to add racial and geographic diversity to the early voting.

DOJ_NMG_0114241

The university has a storied history in the civil rights movement. On Feb. 8, 1968, three people were killed and 27 injured after the South Carolina Highway Patrol fired on protesters demonstrating against segregation, an event known as the Orangeburg Massacre.

South Carolina's GOP plans its first debate May 15 at the University of South Carolina's Koger Center in Columbia.

___

Associated Press Writers Beth Fouhy in New York and Jim Davenport in South Carolina contributed to this report.

Romney Raises $6.5 Million In One-Day Blitz (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, January 9, 2007

Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney raised $6.5 million for his presidential exploratory committee yesterday, sending a powerful message to his potential opponents about the seriousness of his bid for the Republican nomination.

Romney gathered about 400 of his largest financial backers for an all-day call-a-thon at the Boston convention center. The group included politicians such as Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt, former Massachusetts governor William F. Weld and former lieutenant governor Kerry Healey, as well as deep-pocketed fundraisers such as Utah billionaire Jon Huntsman Sr., eBay chief executive Meg Whitman and Tennessee moneyman Ted Welch.

The politicos and fundraisers hit up friends and colleagues, and many of them wrote their own checks to contribute to the day's total. Less than four hours into the effort, Romney had surpassed his goal of raising $1 million; 90 minutes later, he announced that more than $2.5 million had been collected and urged callers to "keep on dialing for dollars." The day's total included actual contributions and what a Romney spokesman called "signed pledges."

Romney has said he hopes to raise $100 million in 2007 to support his presidential aspirations. An internal campaign document for former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, which a rival campaign leaked to the media last week, set the same goal. By comparison, then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush collected $69 million in 1999 for his campaign.

That gap speaks to the increasingly high fundraising bar that a candidate must clear to be taken seriously in the 2008 sweepstakes. With such high-powered fundraisers as Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) likely to run, Federal Election Commission Chairman Michael Toner estimated recently that the 2008 race could cost as much as $1 billion.

Alex Vogel, a Republican lobbyist not affiliated with any of the potential candidates, described Romney's one-day haul as an attempt at "shock and awe," adding that the former governor is seeking to quickly dispose of questions about whether he can raise the money to be competitive with McCain and Giuliani in the primaries.

In some ways, Romney's dynamic day of cash collection is not terribly surprising because of the variety of connections he has built. He has ties to the business world, having been a top executive at the Boston-based consulting firm Bain & Co. After four years as governor and two years as chairman of the Republican Governors Association, Romney boasts deep roots in the GOP giving community. And his stewardship of the Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City in 2002 gave him access to a group of nonpolitical donors.

While the Romney campaign touted its huge one-day total, the planning for the event had been going on for some time.

Participants gathered for dinner Sunday night and after breakfast yesterday before they began their calls. Each person was supplied a laptop computer and given access to new sales-based software, known as ComMitt, developed for Romney's presidential exploratory committee.

"In a presidential campaign, it's one thing to talk about your organizational strength but it's another to showcase it," said Romney spokesman Kevin Madden.

Mitt Rakes In Dough, Proves His Political Viability (SLT)

By Thomas Burr

Salt Lake Tribune, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114242

BOSTON - Sending a clear signal he wants to be in the top tier of presidential candidates, and using showmanship skills honed in heading the 2002 Salt Lake Winter Olympics, Republican Mitt Romney amassed more than $7 million Monday in political pledges.

In a room flanked by flags from all 50 states, Mitt and Ann Romney brought the crowd to its feet and then, on their first day of fundraising, pulled in almost as much as then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush did during the first three weeks of his presidential campaign exploration in 1999.

Romney was out to show that he can raise money like a frontrunner, and he did. But the former Massachusetts governor also wanted to show he has support from across Former Massachusetts Gov., Mitt Romney, R-Mass. (Josh Reynolds/The Associated Press) the nation and is organized to mount a convincing campaign should he choose to run for the White House.

"I'm overwhelmed by the support," Romney, a 59-year-old venture capitalist-turned-politician told reporters. "I'm heartened by the friendships and I'm optimistic about the future."

Romney's camp initially told reporters they hoped to collect $1 million at the event, a figure they reached by 11 a.m. MST.

Craig Holman is the campaign finance lobbyist for the government watchdog group Public Citizen and a critic of the bundling model pioneered by Bush and, it appears, perfected by Romney. Holman called Romney's one-day collection "tremendous" and "disheartening," noting it does not bode well for the future of public financing.

Advertisement

Still, Holman had to admire Romney's achievement.

"That puts him overnight on the steps of credible candidates," Holman said. "If he can raise that kind of money in one day, he's in the game."

That was the goal.

Some 400 Romney supporters - from the chief executive of eBay to Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt to enthusiastic bloggers - called friends and associates begging for donations in what Romney's staffers said was a novel approach in politics. The money raised was in donations by check or credit card or a signed pledge.

Supporters huddled around 40 horseshoe-shaped tables with IBM laptops and black phones at the Boston Convention Center dialing people from their Roladexes. A four-sided JumboTron carried images of Romney as he glad-handed the room and joined in to make the pitch on calls.

"Money talks but early money screams," Romney's national finance director, Spencer Zwick, said.

If Romney fully commits to the race, he needs momentum as he faces better-known opponents for the GOP nomination, mainly Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani. Political observers predict potential 2008 candidates need to raise $25 million to $30 million in the first three months, and up to $100 million this year alone.

It's unclear whether Romney's committee can sustain that kind of pace. Rich Hanley, director of graduate programs in the school of communication at Quinnipiac University, likened Monday's yield to that of a movie on opening weekend. "But it's ultimately not the opening weekend that matters. It's what happens after that."

Romney countered that he doesn't plan on making Monday's effort the standard, but that, "The opening box office is kind of important for a movie and the opening box office for a campaign is kind of important as well."

Earlier that morning, Romney emerged to the Goo Goo Dolls' "Give a Little Bit," and rallied his troops to call everyone they knew to help boost his vision for a "new American dream."

Some 15 Utahns, including Lt. Gov. Gary Herbert, entrepreneur James Sorenson Jr. and the state's lobbyist, Bill Simmons, were among the callers, and many of the supporters had worked with Romney during the Olympics. Richard and Linda Eyre, who write inspirational books, were there, as were executives from Utah companies Xango and Nuskin.

"It's not a hard sale in Utah because people know Mitt Romney," Herbert said during a break from his calls to friends back home. But his boss, Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr., is supporting McCain.

Monday's dialing-for-dollars campaign wasn't just a Boston event.

Supporters around the country spent the day phoning potential donors from their homes and offices, Romney's longtime friend and Utah developer Kem Gardner said between fundraising calls. Gardner, who stayed in Salt Lake City to close a business deal, knows of at least 50 people in Utah who were working the phones. By 1:30 p.m., Gardner had raised $52,000, he said.

"It's coming in great from all over the country," Gardner said.

And that's key.

Romney, a member of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, must prove his support base extends beyond Utah and the Mormon community. Polls indicate he needs to raise his profile.

In a Jan. 1-3 CBS nationwide survey of 1,000 adults, 85 percent of respondents were either undecided or didn't know enough about Romney to even have an opinion. Of those who did have an opinion, twice as many respondents viewed him unfavorably (10 percent) as favorably (5 percent).

Romney's first call Monday, placed on speakerphone for everyone to hear, met with success. He phoned his older sister, Lynn Romney Keenan, in Bloomfield Hills, Mich., and could hardly get a word in as Keenan praised her brother for his success.

"This is an exciting day, isn't it?" she asked.

Romney didn't even finish his request for $2,100, the federal limit, before Keenan interrupted: "Of course."

Romney has a history of creative fundraising. To plug holes in the 2002 Olympics budget, he assembled a team of 20 "Utah ambassadors" to hit up philanthropists for donations.

He also came up with the controversial idea to sell prime Olympic tickets and hotel rooms for several times their face value, in one case through an online auction in which the first set of 20 tickets sold for nine times their original price.

After the telethon, just about everyone there planned to meet at a hotel to watch the Florida Gators, coached by former University of Utah football coach Urban Meyer, face off against Ohio State for the BCS national championship.

Romney Event Nets More Than $6.5m (BOS)

By Scott Helman

The Boston Globe, January 9, 2007

Former governor Mitt Romney put on an unusual public fund-raising display for his presidential campaign yesterday, raising more than $6.5 million in an effort observers say was designed to intimidate rivals looking to challenge him for the conservative vote.

But one of those likely opponents, Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, chose to highlight Romney's past moderate positions on abortion rights and gay rights, announcing that seven conservative Massachusetts activists will back him over Romney.

Romney's highly choreographed event, held at the Boston Convention & Exhibition Center, drew 400 of his biggest supporters, who spent all day soliciting money from friends and contacts around the country.

"They blew me away with their success," Romney told reporters at an evening news conference. "And we will be able to continue to build slowly but surely a highly successful financial effort and campaign. This is not, if you will, a big flash and disappearance."

Tom Tellefsen, a private investor from California and one of Romney's national finance cochairmen, said the daylong blitz would "send a very strong message" to others in the race, both to top-tier rivals such as Senator John McCain of Arizona and former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani, and to "those that are considering or haven't really yet laid the groundwork that maybe they should have."

But if that was the message, the Brownback campaign didn't get it. Spokesman Rob Wasinger said in an e-mail that Brownback's conservative record was "an asset that money just cannot buy" and released a list of activists who he said "are tired of all the compromise and double-speak and are eager to support a true conservative."

The list included Dwight Duncan of Cambridge, a professor at Southern New England School of Law; Anne Fox of Needham, a past chairwoman of Massachusetts Citizens for Life; and R.T. Neary of Medfield, a past president of Massachusetts Citizens for Life.

DOJ_NMG_0114244

Neary explained his decision yesterday by saying that Brownback, who is expected to formally announce his candidacy Jan. 20 in Topeka, has "established credentials" on life issues. "Our governor, Mitt Romney, is a latecomer, if he is even a prolifer," Neary said.

In 1994 and 2002, Romney expressed support for abortion rights, but says he has since shifted to a "firmly prolife" position. The resurfacing of his remarks has stirred political trouble for Romney in recent weeks.

James Gilmore, a former Virginia governor and former chairman of the Republican National Committee, said at a GOP event last week that he intends to run as the race's true conservative, according to the Hotline, the political newsletter; Gilmore is expected to file papers today setting up a presidential exploratory committee. Governor Mike Huckabee of Arkansas is also eyeing a run as a conservative for the 2008 nomination.

But while Brownback, Gilmore, and Huckabee may challenge Romney for the conservative vote, none has built nearly the base of donors and activists in key primary states that Romney has. Observers say that if Romney can continue doing what he did yesterday, tapping into that infrastructure to raise millions of dollars, he could position himself as the one viable presidential candidate most palatable to conservative voters.

"That could be one of Romney's real advantages over the other candidates who are trying to market themselves to social conservatives," said Dante Scala, a political science professor at Saint Anselm College in Goffstown, N.H.

James A. Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University, said, "That's why he's doing this and getting out front and trying to marginalize some of those second-tier candidates."

Romney denied yesterday that he was trying to signal anything to his opponents.

"No message to rivals today," Romney said. "This is a message to Ann and me, to our family, and to our friends that what we stand for and what we're going to fight for has been heard, that our friends are behind us, that they're supporting us in remarkable ways. And that gives us the energy and the enthusiasm and the motivation to go forward with our message."

Romney's campaign said before yesterday's event that it hoped to raise $1 million, but it's clear it expected more. His supporters commanded a 38,000-square-foot room on the third floor of the convention center, which was filled with tables with phones and laptops.

At the lead table was William F. Weld, former Massachusetts governor, who alternated between making phone calls and checking his BlackBerry, and Kerry Healey, former lieutenant governor, and her husband, Sean. "We're going to do our best to make sure that Mitt has the best send-off possible," Kerry Healey said yesterday morning.

After entering the hall to the Supertramp anthem "Give a Little Bit" (as covered by the Goo Goo Dolls), Romney spoke about why he was running and proceeded to a phone to make his first fund-raising call to his oldest sister, Lynn, who lives outside Detroit.

"How are you?" Romney asked her.

"Good, how are you, Mitt?" she said. "This is an exciting day, isn't it?" She pledged $2,100, the maximum allowable contribution.

Romney's army of volunteers used an Internet-based database built by his campaign that it's calling ComMitt, which allows fund-raisers to log donations and access information about Romney's positions on various issues. The idea, according to Romney finance director Spencer Zwick, was for his supporters to use their own contacts -- Christmas card lists, for example -- and not to be handed a list of names to cold-call.

"While you see every one person here at the phone, what's behind them . . . [are] legions of other people and other supporters that they've worked with," said Romney campaign spokesman Kevin Madden.

One of Romney's top advisers, Tom Rath, an influential Republican National Committee member from New Hampshire, told reporters yesterday that any serious presidential candidate must raise $60 million to $75 million this year.

Much of that has to be done in the next six to eight months, he said, before candidates are too busy doing events in primary states to headline many fund-raisers. "Early money is really the mother's milk to these things," Rath said.

Four of Romney's sons were also on hand for the fund-raising kickoff, including his oldest, Tagg, 36.

"I don't know that you can ever be totally prepared because you can't really know what's going to happen," he said. "But everyone understands that there will be personal sacrifices, that you give certain things up. And that's what's required right now."

DOJ_NMG_0114245

Decisions On The Horizon (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

Don't look for presidential announcements from Senators Barack Obama and Hillary Rodham Clinton anytime soon, but stay tuned.

At least that is the word from their associates. Mr. Obama, Democrat of Illinois, is not likely to say whether he intends to seek the party's presidential nomination until after President Bush's State of the Union address on Jan. 23. As he walked out of the Capitol on a recent afternoon, Mr. Obama only smiled when asked about his timing. Then, he rushed to change the subject.

Initially, Mr. Obama said he intended to announce his decision after returning from a holiday vacation in Hawaii, where he was visiting his grandmother and other relatives. Now, several people close to the senator say, he needs a little more time to make up his mind.

Still, Mr. Obama has been busy telephoning crucial Democrats in Iowa, New Hampshire and other states. There is, of course, only one reason for him to be making such inquiries.

Last week on Capitol Hill, Mr. Obama bumped into Ethel Kennedy, who has been a big admirer. When asked about him, she said, "He can't run soon enough."

Mrs. Clinton, meanwhile, plans to announce her decision in the next several weeks, her advisers say. According to several Democrats who have spoken to her, as well as advisers, Mrs. Clinton has given every indication that she is running, short of saying so, and no signals that she is not.

She is making phone calls to Democratic officials, labor leaders and supporters in early nominating states. And she continues to talk to possible consultants and donors, yet she has not made any travel plans to kick off a campaign.

Obama's Folly Of Youth Shouldn't Hinder Rise (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, January 9, 2007

I knew it would come to this.

The widespread adulation that Barack Obama received with the release last year of his second book, The Audacity of Hope, pushed the junior U.S. senator from Illinois to begin making soundings about a run for the presidency in 2008.

And the initial response was downright giddy.

During visits to Iowa and New Hampshire — early testing grounds for presidential hopefuls — women swooned over Obama, and men rushed to be photographed with the man NBC News' Meredith Vieira called a political "rock star." Seasoned journalists gushingly spoke of Obama as a new force in U.S. politics who has chased everyone except New York Sen. Hillary Clinton from the field of viable contenders for the Democratic Party's 2008 presidential nomination.

But Obama's meteoric rise felt the pull of a political black hole last week when The Washington Post reported that in an earlier book, he had admitted to using illegal drugs while in high school and college.

"Junkie. Pothead. That's where I'd been headed: the final, fatal role of the young would-be black man. Except the highs hadn't been about that, me trying to prove what a down brother I was. … I got high for just the opposite effect, something that could push questions of who I was out of my mind, something that could flatten out the landscape of my heart, blur the edges of my memory," Obama wrote about the reasons for his youthful experimentation with marijuana and cocaine.

Far from being a prelude to his flirtation with presidential politics, this admission came before Obama entered political life. It was a catharsis — the kind of revelation about a troubled time that can produce emotional freedom and moral rejuvenation.

But in the world of politics, such honesty often runs afoul of the holier-than-thou crowd. I suspect, it's why Bill Clinton, when confronted on the issue, admitted having smoked marijuana but tried to mitigate this offense by saying he never inhaled. And I think it explains why George W. Bush deflected questions about his suspected drug use by quipping: "When I was young and irresponsible, I was young and irresponsible."

DOJ_NMG_0114246

Like many other young people of his generation, Obama experimented with illegal drugs. That's nothing to be proud of — and what he wrote in his first book, Dreams from My Father, doesn't come across that way. But it is a window into the thinking of a young man who, like his country, struggles with the issue of race and identity.

"Everybody was welcome into the club of disaffection," Obama wrote of that period in his life. "And if the high didn't solve whatever it was that was getting you down, it could at least help you laugh at the world's ongoing folly and see through all the hypocrisy and bullshit and cheap moralism."

Fortunately for Obama, he escaped that reckless period with no apparent, lasting damage. And fortunately for the rest of us, many Americans are willing to excuse such bad behavior by public officials when it happened in the distant past — and the person in question has moved on to a better life.

I don't know if Obama is of presidential timber. I don't know if he possesses the deep intellect, courage and character that this nation so badly needs in its chief executive. I don't know if he is as studious as he is bright; or if he is as feeling as he is outspoken about the problems of this nation's old and poor.

But what I do know is this: Given the candor and honesty with which he revealed his youthful drug use, and the fact that he did so long before mounting the national political stage, Barack Obama deserves to be judged on his public service, not some old demons.

He deserves to be given a chance to show us the kind of man he has become — and the kind of president he could be.

Roberta Wohlstetter, Codebreaker (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

When Roberta Wohlstetter set out, in the early 1960s, to explain why the U.S. had been surprised by the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, she confronted a puzzle that to some seemed like a conspiracy.

Unlike classic military surprises, the U.S. had received ample intelligence that the Japanese were prepared to attack the Hawaiian base. That nothing was done to remove American ships to safety was proof, for Clare Booth Luce among others, that Franklin Roosevelt had "lied us into war because he didn't have the courage to lead us into it." But Wohlstetter, who died Saturday at age 94, knew better, and she spelled it all out in "Pearl Harbor: Warning and Decision," perhaps the most important book ever written on military intelligence.

Yes, the U.S. had intelligence that Pearl Harbor was a potential Japanese target. But other intelligence suggested Siberia could be a target, or the Panama Canal, or the Philippines. Previous indications of an impending attack had served, like so many false alarms, to lower America's guard. And American planners had trouble believing the Japanese would launch a war against the United States that they couldn't possibly hope to win.

From this, Wohlstetter drew the essential conclusion that the U.S. failed to anticipate the attack on Pearl Harbor because, amid mountains of incomplete and often conflicting data -- what she called "noise" -- intelligence analysts couldn't distinguish the information that really mattered. This tended to lead, as the future Nobelist Thomas Schelling wrote in his preface to Wohlstetter's book, to "a routine obsession with a few dangers that may be familiar rather than likely."

The lessons are timeless, and foretold the findings of the 9/11 Commission. Contrary to the views of many so-called realists, nations do not always act from rational calculations of their self-interests: They can be reckless gamblers, something that should give pause to those who see nothing to worry about in the prospect of an Iranian nuclear weapon. And contrary to the instincts of many CIA "professionals," the best intelligence analysis requires judgment and imagination, not simply the widest possible data set.

Wohlstetter was also remarkable not simply as a woman working in what was then a "man's field," but also as the wife and intellectual partner of the late Albert Wohlstetter, the legendary nuclear-strategy theorist. Both Albert and Roberta were great friends of this page, as well as great patriots.

Europe, US Squeeze Iran On Nuclear Plans (FT)

By Daniel DombeyAnd Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, January 9, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0114247

Western Europe and the US are seeking to ratchet up pressure on Iran over its controversial nuclear programme in the wake of a United Nations Security Council resolution last month that declared almost all of Tehran's nuclear activities illegal.

Some European Union diplomats have indicated a growing readiness to impose additional bilateral sanctions on Iran above and beyond those mandated by the UN – a course of action long championed by the US.

One source of such measures is an "à la carte" list of possible EU sanctions on Iran drawn up by Javier Solana, EU foreign policy chief, almost a year ago. This includes a possible crackdown on export credits for companies doing business with Iran and the declaration of a formal arms embargo on Iran.

At the same time, the new UN regime – which took months to negotiate in New York – appears to have surprised parts of Iran's leadership, with differences emerging on how best to respond. After a period in which Iran saw its regional influence increase at relatively little cost, Tehran now faces greater isolation.

"We know that they won't meet their obligations to the UN during the 60-day deadline set by the resolution," said an EU envoy, referring to the resolution backed by the Security Council on December 23. "After that, a big issue is going to be what the EU and others can do beyond what the UN called for."

Many of the specific steps called for by the UN resolution are focused on preventing Tehran from acquiring "dual-use" goods that could be used in its nuclear and missile programmes. The resolution does not impose broad-based economic sanctions, but prohibits UN member states from financing Iran's nuclear activities.

However, it goes much further than the UN's earlier actions in outlawing a wide range of Iran's nuclear activities, including research and development and a heavy water reactor for which Tehran had requested UN funding only a few months earlier. The previous resolution – which carried a deadline of August 31 last year – had merely demanded that Iran suspend uranium enrichment, a process that can generate both nuclear fuel and weapons grade material.

A regime insider told the FT last week there was no chance Iran would accept the resolution within the 60-day deadline, and would go ahead with plans to extend the number of centrifuges – devices for enriching uranium – in the research plant at Natanz.

But pragmatists in Tehran have become bolder in pronouncements, because of their concern at the scope of the UN resolution and because of the reverse suffered by President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad in elections last month. The mood has shifted but not yet policy," the insider said. "There may well be changes in the leadership's approach, but not immediately."

In December, Kazem Vaziri-Hamaneh, oil minister, admitted Tehran was having trouble financing oil projects in a rare acknowledgment of the economic cost of its nuclear dispute.

However, Germany, which currently holds the EU presidency, has reservations about further sanctions. "Responsible policy would be to look at how to bring this back to a political process rather than studying what else you can do in the way of sanctions," said a European diplomat.

Iran's Fars news agency on Monday ran a long interview with Hossein Mousavian, a former nuclear negotiator close to former president Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, in which he described the UN Security Council as the "highest international legislative authority" and criticised the government of Mr Ahmadi-Nejad for attacking the council's resolution as "illegal".

But on Monday, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, reiterated that nuclear energy was "a source of pride for the Iranian nation and Islamic world" and that Iran would not give up its "right".

Iranian Leader Vows To Resist U.N. Sanctions (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

TEHRAN, Jan. 8 — Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, said Monday that Iran would not back down from developing its nuclear program, despite sanctions imposed by the United Nations Security Council last month.

Ayatollah Khamenei, 67, has the final word on state matters, including nuclear policies.

He was making his first public appearance since rumors spread on several Web sites on Thursday that he had died.

"The Iranian people will definitely not give up their right and the authorities have no right to give up this great achievement," Ayatollah Khamenei said, addressing a crowd in Qum, 82 miles south of Tehran.

DOJ_NMG_0114248

The Security Council passed a resolution on Dec. 23 with sanctions intended to curb Iran's uranium enrichment program, which Iran says is for peaceful purposes but the United States and some European nations contend is for the purpose of creating nuclear weapons. The measure bars the trade of goods or technology related to Iran's nuclear program. Enriched uranium can be used for making nuclear fuel but also for making nuclear weapons.

The resolution also gave Iran a two-month deadline to halt the program or face tougher sanctions.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has also brushed off the resolution and vowed that Iran will not suspend the nuclear program.

In his remarks, Ayatollah Khamenei also warned neighboring Arab countries not to join an alliance with the United States and Britain against Iran.

"The nuclear program is a native achievement and is a source of pride for Iran and the Islamic world," Ayatollah Khamenei said.

"If some Arab and Islamic governments think that by joining an alliance with Britain and the United States and imposing sanctions on Iran they can earn the satisfaction of the Zionist regime, they should know that they are making a political blunder," he said.

Israeli Defense Minister Proposes New Peace Plan (AFP)

AFP, January 9, 2007

Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz has proposed a fresh plan for peace in the Middle East that includes talks on the future borders of a Palestinian state within six months, army radio said.

"We need a new roadmap which will combine the Saudi initiative with the larger principles of the (current) roadmap," Peretz was quoted as telling a meeting of Labour MPs on Monday.

Peretz's three-stage plan calls for the creation of a new economic and security policy vis-a-vis the Palestinians, negotiations on a future Palestinian state to begin within six months and negotiations on the details of a final accord to take place over 18 months.

The long-stalled "roadmap" to peace agreed by the Middle East quartet of the United States, European Union, Russia and the United Nations also calls for a three-stage solution.

The Saudi initiative, which stipulated a normalization of ties after Israel vacates its post-1967 conquests, was endorsed by the Arab League at its 2002 summit in Beirut but was rejected by Israel.

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni last month announced she was spearheading a new peace initiative that "offers a complete solution to the problem of the Palestinian people and the Palestinian refugees," though she offered few details.

Fatah Frees Kidnapped Hamas Official (AP)

By Ali Daraghmeh

AP, January 9, 2007

Fatah gunmen on Monday released a top Hamas official after holding him hostage for two days and displaying him in an al-Qaida like video, but factional tensions remained high as pro-Fatah militants torched stores owned by Hamas sympathizers.

The firebombings marked the first time that militants have targeted civilians in the West Bank, widening the political violence in the Palestinian areas.

Until this week, most of the violence centered on the Gaza Strip, where more than 30 people have been killed in clashes between forces loyal to the rival groups. Now Fatah militants in the West Bank have begun retaliating for Hamas attacks in Gaza.

At a news conference in Gaza after sundown Monday, Hamas official Fawzi Barhoum said Fatah was trying to violently oust the Hamas-led Palestinian government. "We will not allow those seeking a coup to drag our people into the flames of a civil war, and will never let them drag our people into a family war," Barhoum said.

Another Hamas official, Ismail Radwan, called on Palestinians to use their weapons against Israel, not each other.

On Monday evening, former Finance Minister Salam Fayyad, a political independent who served in the Fatah-led Cabinet, said gunmen fired on his office earlier in the day. Police investigating the shooting said one of Fayyad's bodyguards accidentally discharged his weapon.

DOJ_NMG_0114249

The kidnapping of Mahdi al-Hanbali, a top Hamas official in the West Bank's commercial center of Nablus, was the strongest sign yet that fighting could soon reach the West Bank.

Al-Hanbali, unshaven and his shoes covered in mud, was hoisted on the shoulders of his supporters inside the city council after his release. He said he was not hurt in captivity, but he appeared nervous during a news conference, twitching his lips and fidgeting.

"They treated me well. They didn't ask me for anything special," he told reporters. He thanked Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, and other officials for working for his release.

His captors released a video on Sunday showing him surrounded by masked gunmen. In the video, resembling tactics used by Iraqi insurgents, the captors threatened widespread attacks against Hamas targets.

Fatah militants, in return, threatened more attacks against Hamas.

"Any attack on a Fatah member or a Fatah institution will have a response in the West Bank, and a violent one too," Nasr al-Kharaz, a Fatah militant, told the Associated Press. Hamas' stronghold is in Gaza, while Fatah is stronger in the West Bank.

Fatah and Hamas have been in a vicious power struggle since the Islamic group defeated Fatah in parliamentary elections last year. Hamas controls the legislature and most government functions, while Fatah holds the powerful presidency.

Abbas, a moderate, favors peace talks with Israel, while Hamas rejects the Jewish state's right to exist, despite an international boycott against its government. Abbas has urged Hamas to join Fatah in a more moderate unity government, but months of negotiations collapsed in late November, sparking the latest round of factional violence.

In the West Bank town of Ramallah on Monday, Fatah militants set fire to six stores belonging to Hamas supporters, security officials said. A large clothing store and a money changing shop were destroyed, the officials said.

In the town of el-Bireh, outside Ramallah, militants fired shots at the house of the Hamas-allied mayor, the officials said, speaking on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak to the media. No one was hurt.

Don't Play With Maps (NYT)

By Dennis Ross

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

Washington

I BECAME embroiled in a controversy with former President Jimmy Carter over the use of two maps in his recent book, “Palestine Peace Not Apartheid.” While some criticized what appeared to be the misappropriation of maps I had commissioned for my book, “The Missing Peace,” my concern was always different.

I was concerned less with where the maps had originally come from — Mr. Carter has said that he used an atlas that was published after my book appeared — and more with how they were labeled. To my mind, Mr. Carter’s presentation badly misrepresents the Middle East proposals advanced by President Bill Clinton in 2000, and in so doing undermines, in a small but important way, efforts to bring peace to the region.

In his book, Mr. Carter juxtaposes two maps labeled the “Palestinian Interpretation of Clinton’s Proposal 2000” and “Israeli Interpretation of Clinton’s Proposal 2000.”

The problem is that the “Palestinian interpretation” is actually taken from an Israeli map presented during the Camp David summit meeting in July 2000, while the “Israeli interpretation” is an approximation of what President Clinton subsequently proposed in December of that year. Without knowing this, the reader is left to conclude that the Clinton proposals must have been so ambiguous and unfair that Yasir Arafat, the Palestinian leader, was justified in rejecting them. But that is simply untrue.

In actuality, President Clinton offered two different proposals at two different times. In July, he offered a partial proposal on territory and control of Jerusalem. Five months later, at the request of Ehud Barak, the Israeli prime minister, and Mr. Arafat, Mr. Clinton presented a comprehensive proposal on borders, Jerusalem, Palestinian refugees and security. The December proposals became known as the Clinton ideas or parameters.

Put simply, the Clinton parameters would have produced an independent Palestinian state with 100 percent of Gaza, roughly 97 percent of the West Bank and an elevated train or highway to connect them. Jerusalem’s status would have been guided by the principle that what is currently Jewish will be Israeli and what is currently Arab will be Palestinian, meaning that

DOJ_NMG_0114250

Jewish Jerusalem — East and West — would be united, while Arab East Jerusalem would become the capital of the Palestinian state.

The Palestinian state would have been "nonmilitarized," with internal security forces but no army and an international military presence led by the United States to prevent terrorist infiltration and smuggling. Palestinian refugees would have had the right of return to their state, but not to Israel, and a fund of $30 billion would have been created to compensate those refugees who chose not to exercise their right of return to the Palestinian state.

When I decided to write the story of what had happened in the negotiations, I commissioned maps to illustrate what the proposals would have meant for a prospective Palestinian state. If the Clinton proposals in December 2000 had been Israeli or Palestinian ideas and I was interpreting them, others could certainly question my interpretation. But they were American ideas, created at the request of the Palestinians and the Israelis, and I was the principal author of them. I know what they were and so do the parties.

It is certainly legitimate to debate whether President Clinton's proposal could have settled the conflict. It is not legitimate, however, to rewrite history and misrepresent what the Clinton ideas were.

Indeed, since the talks fell apart, there has emerged a mythology that seeks to defend Mr. Arafat's rejection of the Clinton ideas by suggesting they weren't real or they were too vague or that Palestinians would have received far less than what had been advertised. Mr. Arafat himself tried to defend his rejection of the Clinton proposals by later saying he was not offered even 90 percent of the West Bank or any of East Jerusalem. But that was myth, not reality.

Why is it important to set the record straight? Nothing has done more to perpetuate the conflict between Arabs and Israelis than the mythologies on each side. The mythologies about who is responsible for the conflict (and about its core issues) have taken on a life of their own. They shape perception. They allow each side to blame the other while avoiding the need to face up to its own mistakes. So long as myths are perpetuated, no one will have to face reality.

And yet peace can never be built on these myths. Instead it can come only once the two sides accept and adjust to reality. Perpetuating a myth about what was offered to justify the Arafat rejection serves neither Palestinian interests nor the cause of peace.

I would go a step further. If, as I believe, the Clinton ideas embody the basic trade-offs that will be required in any peace deal, it is essential to understand them for what they were and not to misrepresent them. This is especially true now that the Bush administration, for the first time, seems to be contemplating a serious effort to deal with the core issues of the conflict.

Of course, one might ask if trying to address the core issues is appropriate at a moment when Palestinians are locked in an internal stalemate and the Israeli public lacks confidence in its government. Can politically weak leaders make compromises on the issues that go to the heart of the conflict? Can the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, compromise on the right of return and tell his public that refugees will not go back to Israel? Can Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, tell his public that demography and practicality mean that the Arab neighborhoods of East Jerusalem will have Palestinian and not Israeli sovereignty?

The basic trade-offs require meeting Israeli needs on security and refugees on the one hand and Palestinian needs on territory and a capital in Arab East Jerusalem on the other. But producing such trade-offs won't simply come from calling for them. Instead, an environment must be created in which each side believes the other can act on peace and is willing to condition its public for the difficult compromises that will be necessary.

So long as mythologies can't be cast aside, and so long as the trade-offs on the core issues can't be embraced by Israelis or Palestinians, peace will remain forever on the horizon. If history tells us anything, it is that for peace-making to work, it must proceed on the basis of fact, not fiction.

Condi Gets Israel's R-E-S-P-E-C-T (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

Last Friday, a senior delegation of U.S. defense officials was briefed in Jerusalem by members of the Knesset's Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee on Israel's threat perceptions in the wake of last summer's failed war with Hezbollah. The Israelis warned that the Syrian army is at its highest state of readiness since 1982, when the two sides clashed over Lebanon. They also warned that Egypt is actively funneling arms to Hamas in Gaza. The claim astonished the Americans. Why, they asked, had they never been told of it through formal Israeli channels?

DOJ_NMG_0114251

Ties between Israel and the U.S. are famously friendly, and as in many friendships the demands of comity often get in the way of those of frankness -- as in Israel's official reluctance to expose its peace with Egypt as a sham. That's a lesson Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice might keep in mind as she plans her forthcoming Mideast tour, beginning later this week in Jerusalem and Ramallah and moving on to Amman, Cairo, Riyadh and Kuwait, and perhaps Beirut or Baghdad.

The trip is yet another effort to rally Sunni Arabs on behalf of the government of Iraq, first of all by showing the U.S. intends to make a major push toward an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement. Perhaps that will impress the secretary's Arab hosts. But it doesn't impress the Israelis, who unofficially bill Ms. Rice's visit as tihzuk, or "maintenance," an attitude nicely captured by a popular Israeli comedy skit in which an actress playing Ms. Rice belts out Aretha Franklin's "Respect" while a stand-in for Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni sings back-up vocals.

Respect of the "Yes, Minister" kind is what Ms. Rice can mainly expect on her visit to Jerusalem. Sure, optical diplomacy -- the diplomacy of being seen to try -- has its political uses, especially when it comes to papering over differences or waiting on events.

But circumstances always impose limits on what diplomacy can achieve, and in the case of the Israeli-Palestinian peace process the limits are sharp. In Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, Ms. Rice confronts a leader who, as the Israeli political analyst Anshel Pfeffer puts it, has "all the practical authority of the Chicago chief of police circa 1925." Never mind the internecine killing sprees, now approaching outright civil war, between Hamas and Mr. Abbas's ostensible partisans in Fatah. The real problem is that Mr. Abbas no longer controls Fatah, where effective authority has devolved to local chieftains and power-brokers like the suave Gaza security chief Mohammed Dahlan.

On the Israeli side, the government of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is probably the weakest in the country's history. In a recent poll, Israelis disapproved of Mr. Olmert's job performance by a three-to-one margin; 60% doubt his personal integrity because of questions surrounding a shady real-estate deal. The rest of his government is also marinating in scandal; it does not have the political capital to spare on bold diplomatic moves.

The larger problem for Israel is strategic. Until Ariel Sharon suffered a stroke a year ago last week, and for a few months thereafter, Israelis were broadly prepared to make significant unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank, not because they thought the Palestinians were prepared to make peace but because they believed that Israel was more secure putting its enemies on the opposite side of its borders.

But Israel's manifest vulnerability last summer in the face of Hezbollah's rocket attacks -- coupled with its failure to defeat the threat -- raises reasonable questions about that assumption. If Israel faces a missile threat along its border with Gaza as well as one on its border with Lebanon, should it then allow a third front to be created along its much longer border with the West Bank? Nor were Israeli insecurities assuaged when Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak declared, after last Thursday's summit meeting with Mr. Olmert, that he would do nothing to stop money transfers to Hamas coming through the Sinai, and that he might well consider building a nuclear arsenal of his own if Israel and Iran were to be seen getting into an arms race.

The upshot is that even if America's predicaments in Iraq really could be eased by the appearance of progress on the Israeli-Palestinian front, such progress is exceedingly unlikely to happen. Yes, the administration can try to bolster Mr. Abbas by supplying funds through which he can extend his patronage, and perhaps enhance his authority and prestige, at the expense of Hamas. But tens of millions of dollars have already gone down that hole without plugging the drain. As for Israel, the U.S. might help Mr. Olmert by demanding of Mr. Mubarak that he cut off the flow of funds to Hamas and take more aggressive steps to prevent the flow of arms. Frankly, the best the U.S. can hope for is the collapse of Mr. Olmert's crippled and feckless government, something that may take another year.

In the meantime, Ms. Rice surely has better things to do than to chase after this fool's gold of international diplomacy. Contrary to the views of much of her bureaucracy, the U.S. cannot, as former National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft advised in a recent op-ed, merely butt Israeli and Arab heads together and arrive, through an act of American leadership, at a negotiated compromise that has already eluded American diplomats going back to the Eisenhower administration.

DOJ_NMG_0114252

When Ms. Rice arrives in Jerusalem, she will no doubt mouth the pieties that have now defined American policy in the Middle East for a generation -- an Israeli and a Palestinian state living side by side in peace and security -- along with some of the Bush administration's coinage: democracy, respect for human rights, an absolute cessation to terrorism. These are the right pieties, and the Israelis will surely mouth them as well.

But perhaps her case, and Israel's, would be better served by a bit of mutual frankness. As with the Palestinians, Israel's problems today are largely of its own making, and no amount of U.S. diplomacy is going to save the respective sides from themselves. On the other hand, nothing Israel can give by way of concessions to the Palestinians is going to make much of a difference in terms of America's credibility in Baghdad, Beirut, Cairo, Kabul or anywhere else on the proverbial Arab street. Maybe once that is mutually understood, r-e-s-p-e-c-t will actually spell respect for Ms. Rice.

A Green Line In The Sand (NYT)

By David Newman

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

Beersheba, Israel

NEARLY 40 years after it was removed from official maps, atlases and school books, the Green Line has made a significant comeback. Israel's education minister, Yuli Tamir, has ordered the Green Line border, which separates Israel from the West Bank, to be reintroduced in all texts and maps used in the Israeli school system. From now on, Israeli children will know exactly where the Green Line is and what it signifies — a political border that, at some point, will almost certainly become the line separating neighboring Israeli and Palestinian sovereign territories.

It was shortly after the Six-Day War of 1967 that the Green Line was removed from atlases produced by the Israeli government. The border, hastily drawn at the Rhodes armistice talks after Israel's war of Independence in 1948, had always been regarded as nothing more than an artificial line of separation eventually to be reworked. For most Israeli leaders in 1967, the occupation of the West Bank was a sign that the future territorial order would be vastly different from the one they had lived with for the previous 19 years.

According to Abba Eban — Israeli ambassador to the United States and the United Nations in the 1950s and foreign minister at the time of the Six-Day War — his attempts to negotiate with the Arab states to transform the border into a permanent recognized international boundary had been rejected in the early 1950s by Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion, who had argued that the more elastic and less permanent the boundary, the easier it would be to change in the future — as indeed seemed to be the case in the aftermath of the 1967 war.

The Green Line's removal from maps was meant to signify that it existed no longer, but in reality it never disappeared. It remained the administrative boundary separating Israel from the occupied territories, with one law for the Jewish and Arab citizens of Israel, and quite another one for the stateless Palestinian residents of the West Bank. Even Israeli settlers who moved to the occupied territories and continued to enjoy Israeli citizenship were ultimately subject to the military authorities — just to show the world that Israel had not formally annexed these territories or, as the Israeli government preferred to put it, had extended civilian law to these areas over which they did not enjoy sovereign rights.

But in the past decade, for most Israelis, the Green Line has once again become the line separating the relatively safe roads of Israel from the danger of the West Bank. Few Israelis, other than the settlers, venture beyond it, even when doing so would make their route shorter. It is along the Green Line that the unilateral West Bank separation barrier has been constructed in large sections.

Where the barrier has deviated from the Green Line, in practice annexing some parts of the West Bank to Israel, the International Court of Justice has ruled it illegal. Many Palestinians are caught in a state of territorial limbo: they live east of the Green Line inside the West Bank, but west of the separation barrier, in effect spatial hostages to this exercise in redrawing the border.

At last year's Herzliya Conference, an annual gathering arranged by the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya and attended by the prime minister and leading political figures, a group of Israeli geographers, planners and cartographers proposed that the Green Line serve as the foundation for any future territorial agreement, based on the principles of the road map and a two-state solution to this never-ending conflict. They identified certain areas along the line where, given the variations that have occurred during almost 40 years of occupation, territorial exchanges could be made between the two sides — as opposed to returning to a line that even 60 years ago was not ideal and that today is out of touch with the region's demographic realities.

DOJ_NMG_0114253

The international legal status of the Green Line is not clear. On the one hand, it is no more than an armistice line — it is not a recognized boundary, unlike the borders separating Israel from both Egypt and Jordan, which were drawn up and ratified as part of peace agreements. Yet the Oslo accords make mention of the West Bank as constituting the future Palestinian state. This region has a clearly defined boundary — the Green Line — and many international jurists argue that this is sufficient to recognize it as the formal line of political separation. The jurists' time in court is yet to come, but the groundwork has already been prepared by international boundary experts on both sides.

If some Israelis were unclear about the long-term significance of the Green Line, the education minister's decision to return the border to the geography and history textbooks will have left no one in doubt.

There may never be peace in this troubled region. But if there is to be a return to the negotiation table, the issue of boundary demarcation will be of paramount importance in determining the territorial configuration of the respective sovereignty to be practiced by each of the two states. On the ground, there are many reasons for drawing a completely new line, but it will always be easier for the politicians to return to what was once — however briefly — there. The Green Line is the default boundary, and it has finally been recognized anew by the Israeli government.

Bush: Important To Complete Doha Talks (AP)

By Foster Klug

AP, January 9, 2007

President Bush and European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso agreed Monday that the United States and Europe must resolve deep differences over farm subsidies that are stalling global free trade talks.

"We both recognize that the best way to help impoverished nations is to complete this Doha Round," Bush said, referring to the world trade talks, "and to encourage the spread of wealth and opportunity through open and reasonable and fair trade." Bush spoke after he and Barroso met at the White House.

Barroso said the two leaders instructed their negotiators "to come up with a solution as soon as possible."

"There is now the defining moment. We are really at defining moment," he said. "It will be a very important signal for the world community if we show that it is possible to have a global approach to trade and development."

The two talked in the Oval Office for nearly an hour, and then continued meeting over lunch.

The World Trade Organization talks collapsed in July, in a disagreement over how much the European Union, the United States and other wealthy countries should reduce the farm subsidies and tariffs that poorer nations in Africa, Asia and Latin America say prevent them from selling their agricultural goods abroad.

Before leaving for Washington, Barroso said "the U.S. holds the key to making a deal possible in 2007."

The United States was criticized for refusing to cut the government handouts it pays American farmers. But Washington partly blamed the standstill on the European Union for refusing to make deeper cuts in tariffs on agricultural imports.

Supporters of a trade deal are eager to find a resolution to the impasse. The Democrat-controlled Congress will consider this year whether to extend Bush's authority to negotiate trade deals that can be submitted to Congress for simple yes-or-no votes without amendments.

The loss of the that "fast-track" authority, set to expire in July, would make it much harder for any treaty to gain congressional approval, without which any global trade deal would be meaningless.

Barroso also met with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Barroso, who had been expected to push Bush to sign on to international efforts to combat global warming, issued a gentle nudge in public.

"When you think about climate change, it's not just about the environment. Of course, the environment is crucially important, but it is also about global security. It's also about economic development and sustainability," Barroso said. "And so we are hoping to deepen our dialogue on climate change, on technologies, on curbing emissions, on progress in terms of energy efficiency, energy security."

DOJ_NMG_0114254

Bush did not mention global warming specifically, but nodded while Barroso spoke.

The president spoke only about "the importance of energy independence and at the same time being wise stewards of the environment. " As he usually does, he said new technologies are the key to making that happen.

The two also talked about the Israeli-Palestinian dispute, Iran, Syria and Iraq.

Bush and Barroso planned to spend some of the lunch discussing the situation in Sudan's wartorn Darfur region.

"It is outrageous that people are being treated the way they are," Bush said.

Added Barroso, who said he visited Darfur recently: "We cannot accept that tragedy going on without a firm, united response of the international community."

Bush, Barroso Discuss Trade, Darfur (AFP)

AFP, January 9, 2007

European Commission President Jose Manuel Barroso said he and President George W. Bush agreed stalled Doha trade talks had hit a "moment of truth" and urged action to end the Darfur "tragedy." Bush welcomed Barroso to the White House for talks which also ranged through climate change, a controversial US visa waiver program, European Union enlargement and the crisis in Iraq.

The US president said he and Barroso had discussed efforts to revive the so-called Doha Round of World Trade Organization talks, now hung up by a dispute over agricultural subsidies.

"We talked about the importance for Europe and the United States to resolve any differences we have when it comes to the Doha round for trade, so that we can promote international trade," said the US president.

"We believe we can achieve more if we look at it in a comprehensive manner," Barroso said during a joint public appearance in the Oval Office.

"We are really at defining moment, and we had a very good exchange, and we gave instructions to all negotiators to come with a solution as soon as possible," said Barroso.

Later, at a press conference, Barroso told reporters the Doha round talks had reached a critical point for the world's largest economic partners, which trade more than one billion dollars a day in goods.

"President Bush and I agreed that we now face a moment of truth if we want to make progress on the Doha trade negotiations," Barroso said, as EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson met US Trade Representative Susan Schwab.

"We risk losing all the substantial economic benefits that are on the table, it is too important to fail, we cannot fail."

Mandelson told Monday's edition of London's Times newspaper that the trade talks were on a "knife edge" and would only succeed with Bush's support.

The two leaders said they had discussed the situation in the Darfur region in Sudan, where fighting has claimed at least 200,000 lives and displaced 2.5 million people, according to the United Nations, though some sources say the toll is much higher.

"I've been in Darfur recently. I can tell you that it's really a tragedy, what's going on, and we cannot accept that tragedy going on without the united response of the international community," said Barroso.

"I know that Jose is as committed as I am to helping solve what I've called a genocide. It is outrageous that people are being treated the way they are, and I'm confident Europe and the United States can work with other friends and allies around the world to help solve that difficult problem," said Bush.

The two leaders also said they had discussed the Israel-Palestinian situation, Iran, Iraq, Syria and efforts to combat climate change.

And Barroso also bemoaned the situation where US citizens can travel to all EU countries without a visa, while the citizens of 10 EU states cannot benefit from the US visa waiver program.

Some Progress In Global Trade Effort (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

DOJ_NMG_0114255

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — Trade envoys from the United States and Europe said on Monday that they had made progress in resolving differences to break an impasse on global trade negotiations, but they declined to say specifically where the differences had narrowed.

"We are clearly making progress," the United States trade representative, Susan C. Schwab, said after a day of talks with Peter Mandelson, the European Union's commissioner for trade. "Perhaps there's some showing of momentum here."

Mr. Mandelson, who has tangled sometimes bitterly with Ms. Schwab in the last year, said he had come to Washington "looking for new impetus, and I believe we've found it."

He said his new confidence was inspired not only by his talks with President Bush but also by those with the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, and the new Senate majority leader, Harry Reid. The Democratic leaders and many members of Congress were recently elected on promises to be more skeptical of trade deals.

The comments of Ms. Schwab and Mr. Mandelson came after a session between Mr. Bush and José Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission. Both pledged in general terms to try again to complete a world trade accord in coming weeks.

Mr. Barroso, speaking at the White House, said he and the president had instructed trade envoys "to come up with a solution" on issues that have divided the United States and Europe for years. The principal issue has been over lowering barriers to trade of agriculture products.

"There is now the defining moment," Mr. Barroso said. "Of course, it is important to engage also others, because this is a real global agreement that we are trying to build."

Mr. Bush said that both the United States and Europe recognized "that the best way to help impoverished nations" would be to complete the current round of talks, known as the Doha round, after the city in Qatar where the talks started.

The trade talks were suspended last summer by the director general of the World Trade Organization, Pascal Lamy, when it became apparent that Europe and the United States could not reach agreement on lowering tariffs and subsidies on farm goods.

The final offer of the United States then was to limit farm subsidies to $22.5 billion a year, less than half what the United States is entitled to impose under current agreements. But because the actual amount of subsidies for 2005 was $19.7 billion, Europeans claimed that the United States was trying to increase subsidies, not lower them.

The Bush administration has called on Europe to lower its tariffs on farm products by more than 50 percent of their current level. A coalition of rich and poor nations has called on Europe to lower tariffs by 36 percent.

Mr. Lamy has said that a final trade agreement can occur only if the United States and Europe increase what they are willing to do, and decrease what they are demanding from the other side. But on both sides, farmers make up powerful political blocs, even though they account for less than 5 percent of the population and of the economy.

By itself, a European and American agreement on farm subsidies would not produce a breakthrough. A global deal on trade would require participation by India and some other poor countries that are resisting demands that they lower their barriers on farm goods and on manufactured goods and services.

With millions of its citizens depending on subsistence farming, India is resisting lower tariffs for farm goods. Kamal Nath, the top Indian trade envoy, has said that the Doha trade talks should recognize the plight of poor farmers and not ask them to sacrifice in order to get rich countries to open their markets.

Negotiators are operating under a timetable that top officials say may be impossible to meet. Bush's legislative authority to negotiate a trade deal, and to get an up-or-down vote on it, expires June 30. Many experts say it will be impossible to meet that deadline for wrapping up a trade deal.

Mr. Lamy has said that if the broad outlines of a trade accord can be negotiated by March, then he hopes the Bush administration may ask Congress to extend Mr. Bush's trade negotiating authority by another six months so that the deal can be completed.

DOJ_NMG_0114256

But Democrats and Republicans in Congress said they doubted that Congress would be willing to extend trade negotiating authority past June 30. More likely, they say, Congress will let the deadline slip and allow a new Congress and president in 2009 to negotiate over trade authority.

European officials say that Europe has signaled a willingness to lower tariffs on specific products that the United States hopes to export, particularly poultry, beef and pork.

But Europe has other sorts of trade barriers that American farmers and ranchers say are blocking exports to Europe, like rules barring certain kinds of cleaning processes for chicken used by American producers. Also barred are the levels of hormone for beef used by Americans.

It was not clear whether any of these barriers were on the table in the talks this week.

Canada Seeks Talks Over Subsidies

OTTAWA, Jan. 8 — Canada has asked the World Trade Organization to start talks between it and the United States about American farm subsidies in general and its support of corn growers in particular.

"Canada is concerned that these U.S. subsidies continue to cause economic harm to our corn farmers," the Canadian agriculture minister, Chuck Strahl, said in a statement.

"That's why we took the action we did, in order to provide the best possible support for our producers by pushing for a level playing field so that they can compete." Jennifer Chiu, a spokeswoman for David Emerson, the international trade minister, said that Canada did not have specific demands at this point. The Canadian government, however, noted in its statement that if the United States does not reduce its farm subsidies, Canada will ask the W.T.O. to begin a formal dispute settlement hearing on the issue.

U.S. Sub And Japanese Vessel Collide (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 8 — An American nuclear-powered attack submarine has collided with a Japanese commercial vessel in the Arabian Sea. Initial reports from the area said there were no injuries and only slight damage, a Pentagon spokesman said Monday night.

The collision, south of the Strait of Hormuz, was first reported by the Kyodo news agency in Japan, which said the Foreign Ministry in Tokyo had been officially notified of the accident by American officials.

A Pentagon spokesman identified the submarine as the U.S.S. Newport News. The Japanese vessel was thought to be a tanker. American military officials in Washington were seeking a fuller accounting.

The U.S.S. Newport News is a nuclear-powered, fast-attack submarine in the Los Angeles class of vessels, and was commissioned in 1989, according to Pentagon records.

The Japanese oil company Showa Shell Sekiyu K. K. said the ship involved is the tanker Mogamigawa, operated by Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd., The Associated Press reported, citing a report from the Kyodo news agency. It was traveling from the Persian Gulf to Singapore and was carrying a crew of eight Japanese and 16 Filipinos.

In February 2001, a United States Navy submarine rammed into a Japanese fishing vessel in waters off Hawaii, killing nine people. The American captain's delay in apologizing for the crash set off protests by the victims' families.

Chavez To Nationalize 'Strategic' Sectors (WT/AP)

By Ian James, Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 9, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela -- President Hugo Chavez announced plans yesterday to nationalize Venezuela's electrical and telecommunications companies, pledging to create a socialist state in a bold move with echoes of Fidel Castro's Cuban revolution.

"We're moving toward a socialist republic of Venezuela, and that requires a deep reform of our national constitution," Mr. Chavez said in a televised address after swearing in his new Cabinet. "We are in an existential moment of Venezuelan life. We're heading toward socialism, and nothing and no one can prevent it."

DOJ_NMG_0114257

Mr. Chavez, who will be sworn in tomorrow to a third term that runs through 2013, also said he wanted a constitutional amendment to eliminate the autonomy of the Central Bank and would soon ask the National Assembly, solidly controlled by his allies, to give him greater powers to legislate by presidential decree.

The nationalization appeared likely to affect Electricidad de Caracas, owned by Arlington-based AES Corp., and C.A. Nacional Telefonos de Venezuela, known as CANTV, the country's largest publicly traded company.

"All of that which was privatized, let it be nationalized," Mr. Chavez said, referring to "all of those sectors in an area so important and strategic for all of us as is electricity."

"The nation should recover its ownership of strategic sectors," he said.

Before Mr. Chavez was re-elected by a wide margin last month, he promised to take a more radical turn toward socialism.

Mr. Chavez said lucrative oil projects in the Orinoco River basin involving foreign oil companies should be under national ownership. He didn't spell out whether that meant a complete nationalization, but said any vestiges of private control over the energy sector should be undone.

"I'm referring to how international companies have control and power over all those processes of improving the heavy crudes of the Orinoco belt -- no -- that should become the property of the nation," Mr. Chavez said.

In the oil sector, it didn't appear Mr. Chavez was ruling out all private investment. Since last year, his government has sought to form state-controlled "mixed companies" with British Petroleum PLC, Exxon Mobil Corp., Chevron Corp., ConocoPhillips Co., Total SA and Statoil ASA to upgrade heavy crude in the Orinoco. Such joint ventures already have been formed in other parts of the country.

Mr. Chavez threatened in August to nationalize CANTV, a Caracas-based former state firm that was privatized in 1991, unless it adjusted its pension payments to current minimum-wage levels, which have been repeatedly increased by his government.

After Mr. Chavez's announcement yesterday, American Depositary Receipts (ADRs) of CANTV immediately plunged 14.2 percent on the New York Stock Exchange to $16.84 before the exchange halted trading. An NYSE spokesman said it was not known when trading might resume for CANTV, the only Venezuelan company listed on the Big Board.

Investors with sizable holdings in CANTV's ADRs include some well-known names on Wall Street, such as Deutsche Bank Securities Inc., UBS Securities LLC and Morgan Stanley & Co. But the biggest shareholder, according to Thomson Financial, appears to be Brandes Investment Partners LP, an investment advisory company in California. Also holding a noteworthy stake is Julius Baer Investment Management LLC, a Swiss investment manager.

Mr. Chavez's nationalization announcement came in his first speech of the year, a fiery address in which he used a vulgar word roughly meaning "idiot" to refer to Organization of American States Secretary-General Jose Miguel Insulza.

Mr. Chavez lashed out at Mr. Insulza for questioning his government's decision not to renew the license of an opposition-aligned TV station.

"Dr. Insulza is quite an idiot, a true idiot," Mr. Chavez said. "The insipid Dr. Insulza should resign from the Secretariat of the Organization of American States for daring to play that role."

Cuba nationalized major industries shortly after Mr. Castro came to power in 1959, and Bolivia's Evo Morales moved to nationalize key sectors after taking office last year. The two countries are Mr. Chavez's closest allies in Latin America, where many leftists have come to power in recent years.

Tomorrow, hours after Mr. Chavez is sworn in for another term, former revolutionary Daniel Ortega returns to the presidency in Nicaragua.

In Managua, Venezuelan Ambassador Miguel Gomez indicated yesterday that the two countries planned to work closely together, and said Nicaragua could become Venezuela's top aid recipient -- getting even more help than Cuba and Bolivia, which benefit heavily from Venezuela's petro-diplomacy.

The United States remains the top buyer of Venezuelan oil, which provides Mr. Chavez billions of dollars for social programs aimed at helping the poor in countries around the region.

DOJ_NMG_0114258

Mr. Gomez said Mr. Chavez and Mr. Ortega planned to sign an agreement on Thursday providing Nicaragua with resources -- he described them as loans -- for infrastructure, health, education, agricultural development and the construction of 200,000 houses, as well as energy and debt forgiveness.

Chávez To Nationalise Telecoms, Power (FT)

By Andy Webb-Vidal

Financial Times, January 9, 2007

Hugo Chávez, Venezuela's left-wing president, Monday night fulfilled his radical pledges with sweeping nationalisation plans for the country's main telecommunications company and the biggest private power group.

He also said existing "strategic association" projects that process heavy crude oil in the Orinoco belt – which account for about a quarter of output from the world's fifth-biggest oil exporter – should become state property.

Mr Chavez, who has been in power for eight years, has often clashed with domestic business interests but now appears to be significantly raising the political stakes by targeting big international companies.

The surprise announcement, only hours before Mr Chávez was due to be sworn in for his third term as president on Wednesday, sent shock waves through Venezuela's business community and foreign investors.

The news provoked selling of Venezuela's debt, with the benchmark 2027 Global bond fell in price and its yield rose 10 basis points above Treasuries in JPMorgan's emerging markets bond index late on Monday.

The moves, if carried out, would most immediately affect Compañía Anónima Teléfonos de Venezuela and its principal shareholder, a wholly owned subsidiary of US-based Verizon Communications, although this stake has already been earmarked for a possible sale. Spain's Telefónica holds a 6.9 per cent stake.

Trading in Cantv's American depositary receipts in New York was halted after the stock dropped by 14 per cent.

"All of those sectors that are in an area as important and strategic for all of us, such as electricity, should be nationalised," Mr Chávez said in a televised speech made shortly after he swore in his new cabinet.

"The nation needs to recover its property of strategic sectors," he added. "Nacional Teléfonos de Venezuela – nationalise it."

Mr Chávez also said he wanted a constitutional amendment to eliminate the autonomy of the central bank. "We're moving toward a socialist republic of Venezuela, and that requires a deep reform of our national constitution," Mr Chávez said.

It was not clear on Monday night whether the government would offer compensation for the expropriation of the assets or stakes in Cantv or Electricidad de Caracas which are held by foreign investors.

Cantv said Monday night that it had received no official communication from the government regarding its nationalisation announcement.

EdC, the power group that supplies energy to the capital, Caracas, has always been a privately held company, although a majority stake in the utility was bought by Arlington, Virginia-based AES for $1.6bn in 2000, following a hostile takeover.

The magnitude of the impact on oil companies such as ChevronTexaco, Total and Statoil, which have invested some $17bn in the Orinoco over the past decade, was not immediately clear, as the government has already embarked on negotiations to secure a majority stake in the projects.

"If there was any doubt about Chávez's economic orientation, he's made it very clear on the eve of his inauguration, and it's that the state must assume full and direct control of key sectors of the economy," said Orlando Ochoa, an independent financial consultant based in Caracas.

Venezuelan debt in JPMorgan's emerging markets bond index was around seven basis points wider on Monday night, while credit insurance on Venezuela's risk of a default widened to 149 from 139 basis points in the credit derivatives market.

Tighter government control over Cantv is also likely to have repercussions for Venezuela's hitherto tolerated black market in foreign exchange, which uses Cantv ADRs as a mechanism to allow investors to buy dollars.

In Caracas, the dollar was on Monday night quoted at 3,600 Bolívars, brokers said, up about 10 per cent from the close of last week, and leaving it at a premium of 67 per cent over the official exchange rate of 2,150 Bolívars to the dollar.

Venezuela's Chavez: Nationalize Electricity, Phones (USAT)

By David J. Lynch, Usa Today

USA Today, January 9, 2007

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said Monday he would nationalize the country's electricity industry and its largest telecommunications provider, which could have an impact on major U.S. investors in his oil-rich country.

In a televised address, Chavez, who will be sworn in Wednesday to a second six-year term, also said he would ask the legislature, controlled by his allies, to let him rewrite Venezuela's economy through presidential decree.

"All of that which was privatized, let it be nationalized," Chavez said. "The nation should recover its ownership of strategic sectors."

In the crosshairs: Electricidad de Caracas, owned by Arlington, Va.-based AES, and C.A. Nacional Telefonos de Venezuela (CANTV) the country's largest publicly traded company. AES and Verizon Communications, which owns 28.5% of CANTV, declined comment.

CANTV's American depositary receipts plunged 14.2% on the New York Stock Exchange to $16.84 before trading was halted. An NYSE spokesman said it was unknown when trading might resume for CANTV, the only Venezuelan company listed on the Big Board.

In his speech, Chavez also alluded to potential changes in the oil-producing nation's relationship with foreign oil companies, such as ExxonMobil and ChevronTexaco, which are involved in Venezuela's Orinoco River basin. "I'm referring to how international companies have control and power over all those processes of improving the heavy crudes of the Orinoco belt — no — that should become the property of the nation," he said.

Despite the president's often-fierce rhetoric, foreign companies have thrived amid Venezuela's oil-fueled boom. From carmaker Audi to the producer of Heinz ketchup and the major oil companies, all have enjoyed fat profits.

U.S.-based analysts cautioned that Chavez often makes sweeping public statements that are followed with more limited action. "The foreign investors that are there are doing very well. … The country is flush with oil money," says Christopher Sabatini, senior policy director of the Council of the Americas.

Chavez critics, however, warned that he is intent on recreating Cuban-style socialism. "Chavez idolizes Fidel," says Antonio Szabo, a former Venezuelan oil official. "Before all is said and done, he is going to nationalize everything."

Chávez Moves To Nationalize Two Industries (NYT)

By Simon Romero

New York Times, January 9, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Jan. 8 — President Hugo Chávez signaled a vigorous new effort to assert greater control over Venezuela's economy on Monday by announcing plans to nationalize companies in the telecommunications and electricity industries.

Mr. Chávez, who will be sworn in Wednesday to another six-year term, announced his plans at the swearing-in of his new cabinet to a cheering crowd of supporters, sending a chilling message to foreign investors.

American corporations, including Verizon Communications, have large stakes in Venezuela's largest telecommunications company, CANTV, and its biggest publicly traded electricity company, Electricidad de Caracas.

"Let it be nationalized," Mr. Chávez said of CANTV. "All that was privatized, let it be nationalized."

Financial markets appeared to be caught off-guard by Mr. Chávez's announcement, as speculators reacted with a sell-off of assets that would be affected by the decision. Shares in CANTV plunged 14 percent in New York trading. Venezuela's currency, the bolívar, fell as much as 20 percent in black market trading here on Monday, traders said.

The announcement was the latest in a series of bold steps Mr. Chávez has taken since his re-election in December to consolidate his power and move Venezuela toward what he calls a socialist revolution. Mr. Chávez said he would also seek a "revolutionary enabling law" from Congress that would allow him to approve bills by decree, as well as a measure stripping the central bank of its autonomy.

"While this is a break with the past, it is consistent with Chávez's drive to concentrate ever greater power in his hands and the hands of his government," said Robert Bottome, editor and publisher of Veneconomía, a business newsletter.

DOJ_NMG_0114260

Last month, Mr. Chávez announced plans to meld the broad coalition of parties that support him into a single socialist party, raising concerns that he was following in the footsteps of Fidel Castro.

On Monday, in addition to the telecommunications and electricity nationalizations, Mr. Chávez also appeared to signal that he wanted control over four multibillion-dollar oil projects in the Orinoco River basin, which he said should become "state property."

It was not clear what Mr. Chávez meant, however, since Venezuela's government already has stakes in those ventures together with some of the world's largest private oil companies, including Exxon Mobil, Chevron, BP and ConocoPhillips.

Venezuela, which has the largest conventional oil reserves outside the Middle East, has already increased its control over numerous oil production ventures in the past year. The largest consumer of Venezuelan oil, of course, remains the United States, despite efforts by Mr. Chávez to export larger quantities of oil to China and other Asian markets.

Details were vague as to how any of the nationalization plans would play out. For instance, Mr. Chávez omitted from his remarks whether Venezuela would compensate foreign investors for their holdings or expropriate them outright. He has already clashed with investors over small-scale takeovers of farms and even a tomato-processing plant owned by H. J. Heinz, but his government has negotiated settlements with owners in those cases.

The nationalizations would, at least for Venezuela, reverse a trend that got under way in Latin America in the 1990s, when governments throughout the region sold many of their assets, particularly state telephone companies, to private investors. Those deals, together with the auction of licenses to provide wireless phone services, led to a sharp increase in the usage of such services among poorer Venezuelans.

They would also be a significant shift of Mr. Chávez's economic policies since he became president in 1999. Though Mr. Chávez steadily adopted more strident rhetoric, he let most of Venezuela's private companies operate unfettered as long they did not actively engage in politics.

But with his re-election in December, Mr. Chávez seems determined to use the momentum — and margin — of his victory to solidify his power and deepen his socialist policies in ways that are increasingly unnerving his opponents.

Supporters of Mr. Chávez already control every institution in the federal government, including Congress and the Supreme Court, so it was unclear what hindrances Mr. Chávez was attempting to overcome by seeking expanded powers.

Mr. Chávez is also going forward with a plan to effectively take RCTV, a television station that persistently criticizes his government, off the air in May by not renewing its broadcast license. The move has drawn fierce criticism both here and abroad, with critics claiming it will restrict freedom of expression.

On Monday, Mr. Chávez described one of the most prominent critics of the decision, José Miguel Insulza, the general secretary of the Organization of American States, in a vulgar term that loosely translates as "idiot." Mr. Chávez also called on Mr. Insulza to resign.

Flush with more than $50 billion in revenue from oil exports, Mr. Chávez is also retooling Venezuela's economy to focus on what his economic theorists describe as "endogenous development" that prioritizes the domestic production of agricultural goods and industrial products from worker-owned cooperatives.

Venezuela has undergone a nationalization push before, when the populist government of Carlos Andrés Pérez took control of companies in various sectors, including the oil industry, in the 1970s. The economy, however, suffered from poor growth and inefficient services after oil prices crashed in the 1980s, leading subsequent administrations to privatize state companies and open the oil industry to foreign investment.

American companies reacted cautiously to Mr. Chávez's comments on Monday. "Verizon has of course been carefully monitoring the news reports on President Chávez's comments today," said Eric Rabe, a spokesman for Verizon, which has had a large stake in CANTV since the early 1990s. "We are not aware of the details of the government's plan and therefore cannot comment at this time."

While Mr. Chávez referred specifically to the telephone company CANTV, his nationalization plans for the electricity sector remained unclear. The AES Corporation of Arlington, Va., controls Electricidad de Caracas, but did not acquire the company through a privatization auction. Robin Pence, a spokeswoman for AES, declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0114261

CMS Energy of Jackson, Mich., controls an electricity utility that provides power to Margarita Island that it bought from the Venezuelan government in the 1990s. Jeffrey Holyfield, a spokesman for CMS, said the company had a “good relationship” with Mr. Chávez’s government but was awaiting more details about its plan before it could comment.

Chavez Sets Plans For Nationalization (WP)

By Juan Forero

Washington Post, January 9, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia, Jan. 8 -- Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez on Monday announced plans to nationalize the country's electrical and telecommunications companies, take control of the once-independent Central Bank and seek special constitutional powers permitting him to pass economic laws by decree.

"We're heading toward socialism, and nothing and no one can prevent it," Chavez, who won a third term in a landslide election in December, said in a speech in Caracas, the Venezuelan capital.

The announcements were made as the president swore in a 27-member cabinet that includes ministers who analysts say will likely be more closely allied with the president's far-reaching goals.

Those appointments, combined with the new economic measures, are sure to escalate tension with the Bush administration, which regards the Venezuelan leader as a threat to democratic institutions. Chavez's administration, in turn, has accused the United States of meddling in its affairs.

"The people of the world, little by little, are increasingly expressing that idea: no more imperialism," Jorge Rodr?guez, the new vice president and a former electoral board official, said at the ceremony Monday. "We are obligated and committed because the people have given us a clear message once and again, and that message is, we must rise up to construct a socialist country and move the Bolivarian revolution forward."

In the ceremony, marked with revolutionary fervor at the Teresa Carre?o theater, the government also announced two new ministries, for telecommunications and indigenous peoples. Since Ch?vez's presidency began in 1999, the number of ministries has risen from 13 and the number of public sector workers has doubled to nearly 2 million.

Political analysts said they were not surprised by the measures and the tone of Chavez's speech, because he had previously pledged to take what he describes as his "revolution" into overdrive.

Last week, Chavez decided to not renew the broadcast license of RCTV, a Caracas television station long critical of his administration. That move prompted swift condemnation from press freedom groups.

"In effect, we're living a process of radicalization," said Luis Vicente Le?n, who directs the Datanalisis polling firm. "He had announced that there would be a new stage in the production of the revolution, and here it is."

In his bid to accelerate economic reforms, Chavez said he would seek to have the National Assembly give him special powers that would permit him to approve economic laws by decree. The plan would have little or no opposition in the 167-member body, which has not had an opposition politician in its ranks since the president's foes boycotted elections in 2005.

"I move forward with my request for a revolutionary enabling law," he said. "We already have the document prepared. We are making the final revisions, and we solicit special powers."

The president also spoke about the need for Venezuela's most important oil fields, those in the Orinoco belt in the northeast, to be brought under state control. The projects in that region, which the government says contains more oil than any other patch in the world, were developed in the late 1990s by foreign multinational firms such as Exxon Mobil, BP, Chevron and Total of France.

The government has already increased taxes and royalties, but the companies continue to mine and refine. Chavez provided little detail about his plans in his speech, but he railed against the privatizations that preceded his administration -- including those in the country's huge oil sector, which exports most of its crude to the United States.

If Chavez moves forward with nationalization -- which could mean anything from outright expropriation to higher taxes or more state intervention -- it would likely affect CANTV, the dominant provider of fixed-line telephone service in Venezuela and the country's largest publicly traded company, as well as the utility Electricidad de Caracas.

DOJ_NMG_0114262

Arlington, Va.-based AES Corp. has an 86 percent equity in Electricidad de Caracas, the largest private utility in Venezuela. The Venezuela operation -- five power plants serving more than 1 million customers -- is a major investment for AES. In 2005, the firm had revenue of $613 million from its Venezuela business. In filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, it listed the value of its plants and equipment in Venezuela at $1.85 billion.

Chavez also said Monday that the government would soon exert more control over the Central Bank, one of the few Venezuelan institutions that has shown itself to be independent of the Chavez administration. Two of the seven directors of the bank's board, including Domingo Maza Zavala, who often criticized government economic policy, are on their way out.

"The Central Bank must not be autonomous," Chavez said. "That is a neoliberal idea."

Last week, the government replaced one of Chavez's most loyal aides, Jos? Vicente Rangel, the vice president. In an ambitious cabinet shake-up, Chavez also replaced the heads of such key ministries as interior, justice, finance and education. He appointed his brother, Adan, to run education.

"He's gotten rid of a couple of people who have their own separate identity, particularly Rangel, who has contacts in Venezuelan society and internationally," said Mark L. Schneider, a senior vice president of the International Crisis Group in Washington, a policy group that regularly compiles reports on Venezuela's political situation. "Rangel is not a yes man, I suspect, and my guess is that he may not be in tune with the way Chavez likes to run things."

Chávez Moves New Socialism To Faster Track (WSJ)

By David Luhnow And José De Córdoba And Raúl Gallegos

The Wall Street Journal, January 9, 2007

Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez took a big step toward what he calls "21st-century socialism" by vowing to nationalize the country's biggest telecommunications and electricity companies, both controlled by U.S. firms. He also said he would throw out the country's commercial code and strip the central bank of all remaining traces of its autonomy.

The moves by Mr. Chávez, a populist who won a landslide re-election last month, are the latest in a flurry of actions to tighten his grip on power and use his country's oil riches to create a model of development different from the market-oriented economics that have dominated Latin America and much of the developing world for the past two decades.

Some Venezuelans fear that Mr. Chávez, a close ally and disciple of Cuba's ailing dictator, Fidel Castro, is reshaping Venezuela along Cuban lines, with the state controlling economic and political power. The Venezuelan leader has denied the comparison in the past, but critics said his latest moves belie the denial.

"Let's call a spade a spade. This is communism," said Eric Ekvall, a political analyst in Caracas. "He's clearly saying the state should own the means of production."

Mr. Chávez, whom the ailing Cuban leader sees as the successor to his revolutionary mantle in Latin America, used a speech yesterday to his new cabinet members to flaunt his ties to Mr. Castro. He ended his speech using the Cuban's signature sign-off: "Fatherland or death, we will triumph!" Mr. Chávez's longtime ally, former Vice President José Vicente Rangel, chimed in at the ceremony with another signature Castro phrase: "Always towards victory, Comandante!"

Years after the collapse of Soviet communism and the embrace of free-markets by countries around the world, Mr. Chávez is taking this Andean nation of 26 million in the other direction, greatly expanding the role of government in the economy. In the past few years, he has claimed a greater share of the country's giant oil industry for the state. But he has stopped shy of going directly after other major private industry, until now.

Although he revealed no details, Mr. Chávez said he would nationalize the country's largest publicly traded private company, Compania Nacional de Teléfonos de Venezuela, known as CANTV. The company, privatized in 1991, is controlled by the U.S. telecom giant Verizon Communications Inc. He also vowed to nationalize Electricidad de Caracas, controlled by Arlington, Va.-based AES Corp.

The choice of two U.S.-controlled companies will surely not be missed elsewhere in Latin America, where Mr. Chávez has struggled to convince nations to follow his lead and not Washington's.

Since Mr. Chávez took office in 1999, he has engaged in vigorous verbal combat with Bush administration officials, going as far as to compare Mr. Bush to the devil in an appearance last year at the United Nations. But despite all the rhetorical flourishes, the two countries are bound at the hip. Venezuela remains the U.S.'s fourth largest oil supplier and the U.S. is by far Venezuela's most important trading partner. Neither seems ready to cut that economic tie.

DOJ_NMG_0114263

Washington has tried of late to avoid being drawn into the fray. Yesterday, there was no official reaction by U.S. government officials to Mr. Chávez's announcement.

Mr. Chávez offered no details of how the nationalization would proceed or whether shareholders in the private companies would receive market value for their stakes. As one of the world's top 10 oil-producing nations and founding member of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, Venezuela is flush with cash from high oil prices and could easily pay compensation.

In a statement, Verizon said it wasn't aware of the details of the government's plan and couldn't issue a comment. It had agreed to a 60-day extension -- through Feb. 28 -- of its agreement to sell its 28.5% stake in CANTV to Mexico's America Móvil, the mobile-phone company controlled by billionaire Carlos Slim, for $676.6 million. On the New York Stock Exchange, CANTV shares fell 14% to $16.84 before trading was halted shortly after 3 p.m. Eastern time.

People familiar with the matter said Verizon had known since August that Mr. Chávez was considering nationalizing the company. They said the company was hopeful it might still reach an agreement with the fiery leader allowing the sale to proceed. A spokesman for Mr. Slim had no comment.

AES spokesman Robin Pence said the company had no comment.

Mr. Chávez also is consolidating power in the political arena. Soon after the recent election, he unveiled plans to join his coalition of some 20 center and leftist parties into a single party controlled by him called the United Venezuelan Socialist Party -- a move some analysts say leads the country down the road to a single-party state. Yesterday, he said he would ask Congress for special powers to pass bills by decree.

In recent years, Mr. Chávez has rewritten the constitution and stacked the Supreme Court with loyalists. Venezuela's Congress, entirely made up of supporters to Mr. Chávez after the opposition didn't field candidates, plans to amend the constitution again to allow him indefinite re-election.

In addition, Mr. Chávez is going after one of the few institutions he doesn't control -- the media. He recently said he would yank the broadcast license of one of the country's oldest TV broadcasters and most outspoken critics of his policies, RCTV. Yesterday, Mr. Chávez repeatedly called the secretary-general of the Organization of American States, José Miguel Insulza, an "idiot" for condemning the Venezuelan's decision not to renew the channel's license.

Since the price of oil began to rise a few years ago, many countries from Russia to Nigeria have reclaimed a bigger share of their energy industries to cash in. But Venezuela appears to be going further. Daniel Yergin, chairman of Cambridge Energy Research Associates, a U.S. oil-industry consulting firm, says Mr. Chávez's move represents "a return to another era: the 1970s," when it was commonplace for developing nations to own utilities and energy companies and manage them inefficiently.

Venezuelans had mixed reactions to the news. Nieves de Marquez, 53 years old, a hotel receptionist, applauded Mr. Chávez's move. "I've always criticized CANTV's high pricing. They also fired a lot of people when they privatized the company and some never got their severance." But others remembered the days when the government managed the phone company. Phone lines were hard to come by, and service was lousy -- it sometimes took less time to drive across town to talk to an acquaintance than to get a dial tone.

Analysts worry that Mr. Chávez isn't finished and will use his latest inauguration tomorrow to announce new measures, including increasing the government's role over private education. Last week, he tapped his brother Adán, the former Venezuelan envoy to Havana, as education minister. In Caracas, José Barcia, an economist for Metroeconomica consulting firm, said he expects Mr. Chávez to make moves against other industries as well as private property such as commercial farms.

Mr. Chávez's antimarket politics have spawned some imitators, whom he has supported rhetorically and often with loans and subsidies. In Ecuador, newly elected President Rafael Correa also wants a new constitution and a big hike in the government's take from Ecuador's oil industry.

In Nicaragua, where former Sandinista leader and Chávez ally Daniel Ortega is slated to assume the presidency this week, Venezuela's ambassador said Mr. Chávez planned to announce a big aid agreement on Thursday which could eventually make the impoverished central American country the most important recipient of Venezuelan aid, outstripping Bolivia and Cuba.

DOJ_NMG_0114264

But Venezuela's oil riches may make it a special case when it comes to buying out big companies. In Bolivia, President Evo Morales began to nationalize the country's natural-gas industry, but he has struggled to carry out his plan because his impoverished country lacks money and expertise. Meanwhile, more moderate leftist politicians such as Brazil's Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva and Chile's Michelle Bachelet have ignored Mr. Chávez' attempt to turn back the clock on the free market.

During his speech, Mr. Chávez also suggested he would further expand the state's role in the oil industry, taking a harder line with major oil firms that operate in the country's Orinoco region, where companies upgrade tarlike oil deposits into lighter grades of crude. Those include BP PLC, Exxon Mobil Corp., Chevron Corp., ConocoPhillips, and Total SA and Statoil ASA.

Until now Venezuelan oil officials have said that companies operating in the Orinoco region would have to give the state at least a 51% stake in upstream oil operations, but would allow its foreign partners to maintain control of multibillion-dollar upgraders that convert the tar oil. Yesterday, Mr. Chávez said the upgrading side of the business must also pass on to the state.

"International companies have the control and domination of the process of upgrading heavy crudes from the Orinoco. That should become property of the Venezuelan state," he said.

But so far, Mr. Chávez's power grabs have weakened the Venezuelan oil industry, once the pride of this nation. He ended a tradition of allowing state-run oil company Petróleos de Venezuela SA to run itself like a professional company rather than a source of government patronage and sinecures. Mr. Chávez has used the firm to fund numerous social programs that have left the company short on investment. As a result, oil output has fallen sharply, leaving the country vulnerable to a downturn in prices.

Mr. Chávez's free spending may ultimately undermine his expansion plans. Some analysts say that if the price of oil drops well below $50 a barrel, Venezuela could have a harder time paying its domestic and international commitments. Already, the country's policies last year generated 17% inflation.

Venezuela's move is unlikely to rattle investors in other developing countries, say market watchers. "Luckily Chávez is one of a kind," says Don Hanna, head of emerging-market economic analysis at Citigroup in New York. Mr. Hanna says he doesn't think Venezuela's nationalization moves have any ramifications for the larger markets in the region such as Brazil and Mexico.

Fund managers say that there could be some impact on countries viewed as aligned with Mr. Chávez's economic philosophy, such as Bolivia and, to a lesser degree, Ecuador. Venezuela's nationalizations could push businesspeople or multinationals to reconsider their investments in those countries, says Carlos Asilis, a portfolio manager at Vega Plus Capital Partners in Miami.

Bolivia Leader Lets Venezuela Send Soldiers, Angering Foes (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, January 9, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Jan. 8 — Political opponents of President Evo Morales of Bolivia have in recent days stepped up criticism of the country's strengthening military relationship with Venezuela after Bolivian officials acknowledged that more than two dozen uniformed members of the Venezuelan military had recently entered the country without congressional approval.

Jorge Quiroga, a former president of Bolivia and a prominent critic of Mr. Morales's alliance with President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela, accused Mr. Morales in a statement on Saturday of "trampling national sovereignty."

Legislators from Santa Cruz, a redoubt of anti-Morales sentiment in eastern Bolivia, previously criticized the unannounced arrival of about 30 Venezuelan military officials at Trompillo Airport there on Dec. 28.

President Morales has been facing increasing tension in eastern provinces seeking greater political autonomy from his administration. Part of the dispute stems from the Bolivian Congress's approval of a wide-reaching military cooperation pact with Venezuela, in a legislative session in November that opponents say was marred by irregularities.

Mr. Morales has also begun an ambitious land reform program that could encourage tens of thousands of highland peasants to move to the east, unsettling regional leaders there who view the project as a threat to their interests.

Venezuela's defense minister, Gen. Raúl Isaías Baduel, rushed to defend the deployment to Bolivia. The presence of Venezuelan soldiers in Bolivia does not violate Bolivian sovereignty, he said in comments issued Friday night through Venezuela's official news agency.

"This could be qualified as humanitarian aid, with what we know of Bolivia's economic limitations," General Baduel said.

DOJ_NMG_0114265

Venezuelan officials, including the country's ambassador in Bolivia, have been on the defensive in recent weeks as critics of Mr. Morales have raised fears over growing Venezuelan military involvement in Bolivia. The Bolivian defense minister, Walker San Miguel, said last week that the Venezuelans were there to assist in the piloting and maintenance of two Super Puma helicopters that Venezuela had put at Mr. Morales's disposal for travel within Bolivia.

Venezuela is also helping the Bolivian Army to build border posts and improve its military presence in the eastern lowlands, efforts that Mr. Morales's opponents say have more to do with intimidating his critics than protecting Bolivia's frontier from Brazil or Paraguay.

As United States influence in Bolivia has waned, Venezuela has stepped in to provide as much as $50 million in loans for military spending since Mr. Morales assumed the presidency a year ago.

In addition, Venezuela has counseled Mr. Morales on his economic policies and formed ventures with Bolivia's national energy company as he took greater control over the energy industry last year from multinational companies. As Venezuela raises its profile in Bolivia, Mr. Morales has emerged as Mr. Chávez's closest ally in South America. Resistance to the alliance has been vocal in Bolivia and here in Caracas.

Still, Mr. Morales seems to have cannily asserted his influence over a wary officer corps as he presses forward with efforts to promote more indigenous soldiers into the upper ranks of the armed forces, where a light-skinned, Europeanized elite remains dominant.

One of Mr. Morales's first moves as president was a purge of senior generals and other officials from the army after a scandal in which they were accused of allowing military technicians from the United States to dismantle more than two dozen antiquated Chinese-made shoulder-fired missiles, considered Bolivia's sole antiaircraft defense.

Some of the deposed officials have been explicitly critical of Mr. Morales's ties to Mr. Chávez and to Cuba's government. Gen. Marcelo Antezana, who was fired by Mr. Morales as army commander, said in September that there was discontent in the armed forces over what was viewed as subjugation to "Caribbean mulattoes" of a "Cuba-Venezuela axis."

An outcry followed published remarks by Julio Montes, Venezuela's ambassador in La Paz, who said last month that Venezuela would consider military intervention on Mr. Morales's behalf in case of a crisis. Mr. Montes later amended his comments, saying he was referring to assistance in general and not the deployment of troops.

Bush Discusses Cooperation With Nicaragua's Ortega (AFP)

AFP, January 9, 2007

US President George W. Bush told Nicaraguan president elect and former US foe Daniel Ortega that he hoped to work together on a range of issues, the White House said.

Bush telephoned Ortega, who assumes office this week, "to congratulate him and the Nicaraguan people on their commitment to democracy," said national security spokesman Gordon Johndroe.

"The president expressed his strong commitment to the well-being of the Nicaraguan people and our continued interest in a relationship with Nicaragua, noting such ongoing areas of cooperation" as trade and reform-driven economic development, he said.

"The president also noted that reconciliation, unity, democracy, and job creation -- the agenda outlined in Daniel Ortega's election platform -- are areas for possible cooperation," said Johndroe.

Ortega, 61, on Wednesday is to be sworn in to a five-year term as Nicaragua's president.

Bush also spoke with outgoing Nicaraguan President "Enrique Bolanos to thank him for his service to his country, commitment to democracy, and friendship with the United States," said Johndroe.

Ortega was the Marxist leader of the leftist Sandinista National Liberation Front that ousted US-backed dictator Anastasio Somoza in 1979. The Soviet-backed Sandinista government seized private assets, distributed land to poor farmers and battled US-financed Contra rebels throughout the 1980s.

Ortega was voted out of power in 1990, at the end of a bloody civil war against the Contras, and lost two subsequent presidential elections, before prevailing in his third earlier this month to succeed Bolanos on January 10.

DOJ_NMG_0114266

During his campaign against US-backed conservative rival Eduardo Montealegre, Ortega toned down his revolutionary rhetoric. But Washington, and particularly its ambassador in Managua, urged Nicaraguans to defeat him.

The White House also announceed that US Secretary of Health and Human Services Michael Leavitt would lead the US delegation to Ortega's inauguration.

The goup will also include the head of the US Millenium Challenge Corporation that rewards free-market and democratic reforms with aid, and the assistant US secretary of state for the Western Hemisphere, and the US ambassador to Nicaragua.

Russia Shuts Oil Pipeline To Europe (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky, George Parker, Bertrand Benoit, Jan Cienski And Roman Olearchyk

Financial Times, January 9, 2007

Russia yesterday halted its oil exports to Europe passing through Belarus as it accused its neighbour of siphoning oil from the Druzhba transit pipeline, threatening further disruptions to European supplies.

Transneft, Russia's oil pipeline monopoly, said it was forced to stop pumping oil through the pipeline, which carries about 30 per cent of its exports to Europe, claiming that Belarus was effectively stealing it.

Senior Russian officials said Minsk's actions "smelled of a trade war".

The shutdown is the latest interruption of Russian energy supplies to Europe and could further dent Russia's reputation as a reliable supplier of energy after last year's gas supply stand-off between Russia and Ukraine.

Moscow's action spurred a $1 rise in the price of crude oil on US markets in early trade yesterday, though West Texas Intermediate gave up its gains and traded 23 cents lower at $56.08 in midday New York trade.

Poland, which with Germany is one of the main recipients of the Russian crude passing via Belarus, reported that oil shipments had stopped overnight and admitted it was "completely dependent" on Russia to meet its oil needs. Germany demanded an "immediate and full re-opening" of the pipeline.

The European Union also called for an "urgent and detailed" explanation for the interrupted supply.

However, Andrei Sharonov, Russia's deputy minister for Trade and Economic Development, told the Financial Times that Belarus had been siphoning off oil since January 6, and that Russia had no choice but to act. "This is a force majeure situation," he said.

The dispute is the most serious blow to Russia's relationship with Belarus. The two countries are supposed to be moving towards an economic and political union but a series of trade disputes - which could still develop into a trade war - have jeopardised the plans.

On January 1, Russia ended a cosy arrangement whereby Belarus processed cheap Russian oil and sold it to Europe at a profit. The erstwhile allies then slapped tit-for-tat duties on each others' crude and petroleum products, which both refused to pay.

On January 6 Belarus informed Russia that it had started taking oil from the pipeline as a payment in kind. Russia yesterday responded by halting transits of oil through Belarus.

A Belarus delegation was last night heading for Moscow to resolve the situation.

